MEGA'LEAS (Μεγαλέας), was chief secretary to Antigonus Doson, king of Macedonia, who appointed him, by his will, to the same office under Philip V., his ward and successor (B. C. 220). Megaleas was entirely under the influence of Apelles, and readily entered into his treasonable designs (B. C. 218), to baffle the operations of Philip in his war against the Aetolians. Their treachery, however, was counteracted by Aratus, and the latter accordingly was assailed with personal violence by Megaleas, Leontius, and Crinon, at Limnaea, in Acarnania, when Philip had returned thither from his successful campaign in Aetolia. For this offence Megaleas and Crinon were thrown into prison till they should find security for a fine of twenty talents, but Megaleas was released on the bail of Leontius, who had contrived to escape in the tumult for which his accomplices were punished. In the same year (218) Megaleas and Leontius excited a mutiny at Corinth among the troops of Philip. It was soon quelled; and, though the king knew who had been the authors of it, he dissembled his knowledge, and Megaleas and his chief accomplices were still holding high military rank when Apelles returned to court from Chalcis. The reception, however, of the latter proved that he had quite lost his master's confidence, and Megaleas fled in alarm to Athens; and being refused refuge there, betook himself to Thebes. Here he continued his impotent and rancorous course of treason by writing letters to the Aetolians, filled with abuse of Philip, and with strong exhortations to them to persevere in the war against him, as his finances were exhausted. The letters were intercepted and brought to the king, who thereupon despatched ALEXANDER [Vol. I. p. 112] to Thebes, to sue Megaleas for the amount of his fine; and the traitor, not venturing to abide the issue of the trial, put an end to his own life. (Pol. iv. 87, v. 2, 14—16, 25—28.) [E. E.]

MEGALO'STRATA (Μεγαλοστράτα), a Lacedaemonian poetess, beloved by Alcman, the following fragment from whom contains all that is known of her:

Τοῦθ' ἁδεᾶν Μωσᾶν ἔδειξε
δῶρον μάκαιρα παρθένων
ἁ ξανθὰ Μεγαλοστράτα.

(Alcman, Fr. ap. Ath. xiii. p. 600. f., No. 27 in Welcker, 18 in Schneidewin's Delect. Poes. Graec., 21 in Bergk's Poet. Lyr. Graec.) [P. S.]

MEGAME'DE (Μεγαμήδη), a daughter of Arnaeus, and the wife of Thestius, by whom she became the mother of fifty daughters. (Apollod. ii. 4. § 10.) [L. S.]

MEGANEIRA (Μεγάνειρα). 1. A daughter of Crocon, and the wife of Arcas. (Apollod. iii. 9. § 1; comp. ARCAS.)

2. The wife of Celeus. (Paus. i. 39. § 1; comp. METANEIRA.) [L. S.]

MEGAPENTHES (Μεγαπένθης). 1. A son of Proetus, was king of Argos, and father of Anaxagoras and Iphianeira. (Paus. ii. 18. § 4; Diod. iv. 68.) He exchanged his dominion for that of Perseus, so that the latter received Tiryns instead of Argos. (Apollod. ii. 4. § 4; Paus. ii. 16. § 3.) He is said to have afterwards slain Perseus. (Hygin. Fab. 244.)

2. A son of Menelaus by an Aetolian slave, Pieris or Teridae. Menelaus brought about a marriage between Megapenthes and a daughter of Alector. (Hom. Od. iii. 188, iv. 11, xv. 100; Apollod. iii. 11. § 1.) According to a tradition current in Rhodes, Megapenthes, after the death of his father, expelled Helen from Argos, and she fled to Polyxo at Rhodes. (Paus. iii. 19. § 2; comp. ii. 18. § 5, iii. 18. § 7.)

A third personage of this name occurs in Eustathius (ad Hom. p. 1480). [L. S.]

ME'GARA (Μεγάρα), a daughter of king Creon of Thebes, and wife of Heracles. (Hom. Od. xi. 269; Eurip. Herc. Fur. 9; Apollod. ii. 4. § 11; Paus. i. 41; Pind. Isthm. i. 82.) Respecting her history see HERACLES. [L. S.]

MEGAREUS (Μεγαρεύς), a son of Onchestus, is also called a son of Poseidon by Oencpe, of Hippomenes, Apollo, or Aegeus. (Apollod. iii. 15. § 8; Paus. i. 39. § 5; Ov. Met. x. 605; Hygin. Fab. 157; Steph. Byz. s. v. Μέγαρα.) He was a brother of Abrote, the wife of Nisus, and the father of Euippus, Timalcus, and Euaechme, to whom Ovid adds a fourth, Hippomenes. (Paus. i. 41. § 4; Plut. Quaest. Graec. 16.) According to a Boeotian tradition, Megareus with his army went to the assistance of Nisus, king of Megara, against Minos; but he fell in battle, and was buried at Megara, which was called after him, for its previous name had been Nisa. (Apollod. l. c.; Paus. i. 39. § 5, 42. § 1.) According to a Megarian tradition, which discarded the account of an expedition of Minos against Megara, Megareus was the husband of Iphinoë, the daughter of Nisus, and succeeded his father-in-law in the government of Megara, which he left to Alcathous, because his own two sons had died before him. (Paus. i. 39. § 5; comp. ALCATHOUS.) [L. S.]

MEGARUS (Μέγαρος), a son of Zeus, by a Sithnian or Megarian nymph. In the Deucalionian flood he is said to have escaped to the summit of Mount Gerania, by following the cries of cranes. (Paus. i. 40. § 1.) [L. S.]

MEGA'STHENES (Μεγασθένης). 1. A Greek writer, to whom the subsequent Greek writers were chiefly indebted for their accounts of India. Megasthenes was a friend and companion of Seleucus Nicator (Clem. Alex. Strom. i. p. 305, d), and was sent by that monarch as ambassador to Sandracottus, king of the Prasii, whose capital was Palibothra, a town, probably, near the confluence of the Ganges and Sone in the neighbourhood of the modern Patna.* (Strab. ii. p. 70, xv. p. 702; Arrian, Anab. v. 6, Ind. 5; Plin. H. N. vi. 17. s. 21.) We know nothing more respecting the personal history of Megasthenes, except the statement of Arrian (Anab. l. c.), that he lived with Sibyrtius, the satrap of Arachosia, who obtained the satrapies of Arachosia and Gedrosia, in B. C. 323. (Diod. xviii. 3.) Whether Megasthenes accompanied Alexander or not in his invasion of India, is quite uncertain. The time at which he was sent to Sandracottus, and the reason for which he was sent, are also equally uncertain. Clinton (Fasti Hell. vol. iii. p. 482, note z) places the embassy a little before B. C. 302, since it was about this time that Seleucus concluded an alliance with Sandracottus; but it is no where stated that it was through the means of Megasthenes that the alliance was concluded; and as the latter resided some time at the court of Sandracottus, he may have been sent into India at a subsequent period. Since, however, Sandracottus died in B. C. 288, the mission of Megasthenes must be placed previous to that year. We have more certain information respecting the parts of India which Megasthenes visited. He entered the country through the district of the Pentapotamia, of the rivers of which he gave a full account (Arrian, Ind. cc. 4, 8, &c.), and proceeded thence by the royal road to Palibothra, but appears not to have visited any other parts of India. (Comp. Strab. xv. p. 689.) Most modern writers, from the time of Robertson, have supposed, from a passage of Arrian (πολλάκις δὲ λέγει (Μεγασθένης) ἀφικέσθαι παρὰ Σανδράκοττον τὸν Ἰνδῶν βασιλέα, Anab. v. 6), that Megasthenes paid several visits to India, but since neither Megasthenes himself, nor any other writer, alludes to more than one visit, these words may simply mean that he had several interviews with Sandracottus during his residence in the country.

The work of Megasthenes was entitled τὰ Ἰνδικά, and was probably divided into four books (Athen. iv. p. 153, e.; Clem. Alex. Strom. i. p. 305; Strab. xv. p. 687; Joseph. c. Apion. i. 20, Ant. x. 11. § 1). It appears to have been written in the Attic dialect, and not in the Ionic, as some modern writers have asserted; for in the passage of Eusebius (Praep. Ev. ix. 41), which has been quoted to prove that Megasthenes employed the Ionic dialect, the quotation from Megasthenes concludes with the word κατοικίσαι, and the remaining words are an extract from Abydenus (comp. Clinton, Fast. Hell. vol. iii. p. 483, note b.). Megasthenes is repeatedly referred to by Arrian, Strabo, Diodorus, and Pliny. Of these writers Arrian, on whose judgment most reliance is to be placed, speaks most highly of Megasthenes (Arrian, Anab. v. 5, Ind. 7), but Strabo (ii. p. 70) and Pliny (l. c.) treat him with less respect. Although his work contained many fabulous stories, similar to those which we find in the Indica of Ctesias, yet these tales appear not to have been fabrications of Megasthenes, but accounts which he received from the natives, frequently containing, as modern writers have shown, real truth, though disguised by popular legends and fancy. There is every reason for believing that Megasthenes gave a faithful account of every thing that fell under his own observation; and the picture which he presents of Indian manners and institutions is upon the whole more correct than might have been expected. Every thing that is known respecting Megasthenes and his work, is collected with great diligence by Schwanbeck, in a treatise entitled "Megasthenis Indica. Fragmenta collegit, commentationem et indices addidit E. A. Schwanbeck, Bonnae, 1846."

2. Of Chalcis in Euboea, was, along with Hippocles, the founder of Cumae in Italy. (Strab. v. p. 243; Vell. Pat. i. 4.)

MEGELLUS, a family-name of the Postumia Gens at Rome.

1. L. POSTUMIUS L. F. SP. N. MEGELLUS, who as curule aedile built, and in his second consulship dedicated, a temple to Victory with the produce of the fines levied by him for encroachments on the demesne-land. The year of his aedileship is unknown. Megellus was consul for the first time in B. C. 305, according to the Fasti, although some of the annalists placed this consulate two years earlier. It was towards the close of the second Samnite war, and Megellus, after defeating the Samnites in the field, took Bovianum, one of their principal fortresses on the north side of the Matese. On their march homeward Megellus and his colleague Minucius recovered Sora and Arpinum in the valley of the Liris, and Cerennia or Censennia (Liv. ix. 44; Diod. xx. 90), whose site is unknown. For this campaign Livy ascribes a triumph to Megellus, which the Fasti do not confirm. Megellus was propraetor in B. C. 295, when Rome was awaiting a combined invasion of the Gauls and Samnites, the Etruscans and Umbrians. Megellus was stationed in the Vatican district, on the right bank of the Tiber, to cover the approaches to the city. He probably remained there till after the great battle at Sentinum, when he was recalled by the senate and his legions disbanded. In B. C. 294, Megellus was consul for the second time. Ill health detained him awhile at Rome, but a victory of the Samnites obliged him to take the field, and he signalised himself by taking in Samnium Milionia and Ferentinum, and Rusellae in Etruria, and by ravaging both territories. The accounts of both these consulates of Megellus are very obscure and contradictory—some assign to him different fields of action, and defeats instead of victories. It is, however, probable that some illegal or contemptuous conduct in his second consulship—for the temper of Megellus was obstinate and arbitrary in the extreme, and the Postumian gens notorious for its patrician pride—brought upon Megellus, at the expiration of his office, an impeachment by M. Scantius, tribune of the plebs, from which his services as the lieutenant of Sp. Carvilius in the campaign with Samnium, in B. C. 293, and the popularity of his general, rescued him. The third consulship of Megellus (B. C. 291) is better known: his imperious, perhaps his insane, extravagances made it remarkable. At the close of B. C. 292, Megellus was appointed interrex to hold the consular comitia. He followed the example of Appius Claudius Caecus in B. C. 297 (Liv. xxvii. 6), and nominated himself. His administration was answerable to his assumption of office. He refused to wait for the usual allotment of the consular provinces, and took Samnium for himself. He employed his legionaries, not in quenching the embers of an expiring war, but in levelling the woods on his own demesne. He violently, and in defiance of a deputation from the senate, expelled the proconsul Q. Fabius Gurges from his command at Cominium, and undertook the siege. There his military talents once more displayed themselves; he took Cominium and several other places, and acquired the important post of Venusia, where he recommended the senate to establish a numerous colony. His counsel was followed (Vell. i. 14), but the name of Megellus was carefully excluded from the list of commissioners for establishing it. In revenge he divided among his soldiers the whole of the booty he had taken without making any reserve for the treasury, and he disbanded his soldiers without awaiting the arrival of his successor. The senate refused him a triumph. Megellus appealed to the people who faintly supported him, and, although only three tribunes favoured while seven opposed his claim, he triumphed in despite of the senate. For his many delinquencies Megellus, as soon as he went out of office, was prosecuted by two of the tribunes and condemned by all the three-and-thirty tribes. He was fined the sum of 500,000 asses, the heaviest mulct to which any Roman had been hitherto sentenced. (Comp. Plut. Camill. 39.) According to the Fasti, indeed, Megellus triumphed in his second consulship—March 24th, B. C. 294, "De Samnitibus et Etrusceis" and Livy refers his dispute with the senate to this period. (Liv. ix. 44, x. 26, 27, 32, 33, 34, 36, 37, 47, id. Epit. xi; Dionys. xvi. 15—18; Frontin. Strat. i. 8, § 3.)

* Sandracottus is called Chandragupta in the Sanscrit writers and his capital Pâtaliputra.

2. L. POSTUMIUS L. F. L. N. MEGELLUS, son of the preceding, was praetor, according to the Fasti, but in what year is unknown. His father's unpopularity and disgrace had no effect on the fortunes of the younger Megellus. He was consul in B. C. 262, the third year of the second Punic war. Sicily was assigned to both Megellus and his colleague, and the siege of Agrigentum, which they took after six arduous months of blockade, employed them during their whole period of office. Megellus was censor in B. C. 253, the year of his death. (Fasti; Polyb. i. 17—20; Zonar. viii. 10; Diod. Fr. Hoeschel. xxiii. 5; Oros. iv. 7; Liv. Epit. xvi.) [W. B. D.]

MEGES (Μέγης), a son of Phyleus by Eustyoche, Ctimene, or Timandra, and a grandson of Augeas. He is mentioned among the suitors of Helen, and in forty ships he led his bands from Dulichium and the Echinades against Troy. (Hom. Il. ii. 625, &c., v. 69, xiii. 692, xv. 520, &c., xix. 269; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 303; Paus. x. 25. § 2; Strab. x. pp. 456, 459.) Polygnotus had painted him in the Lesche at Delphi as a wounded man. According to Dictys Cretensis (iii. 10) he was killed in the Trojan war. [L. S.]

MEGES (Μέγης), an eminent surgeon, born at Sidon in Phoenicia (Galen, De Meth. Med. vi. 6, vol. x. p. 454), who practised at Rome with great reputation and success, shortly before the time of Celsus, and therefore probably in the first century B. C. (Cels. De Medic. vii. praef.) He wrote some works which are highly praised and several times quoted by Celsus, but of which nothing remains. He is, perhaps, the same person who is quoted by Pliny (H. N. xxxii. 24), Galen (De Compos. Medicam. sec. Locos, iii. 3, v. 3, vol. xii. pp. 684, 845), and Scribonius Largus (De Compos. Medicam. c. 70. § 202, p. 227). A Greek fragment by Meges is preserved by Oribasius (Coll. Medic. xliv. 14), and was first published by Cardinal Mai in his collection entitled "Classici Auctores e Codicibus Vaticanis editi," vol. iv. p. 27, Rome, 8vo. 1831, and is also to be found in Dr. Bussemaker's edition of the forty-fourth book of Oribasius, p. 72, Groning. 1835, 8vo. [W. A. G.]

MEGILLUS or MEGELLUS (Μέγιλλος, Μέγελλος), a man of Eleia, in Lucania, was one of those who, under the auspices of Timoleon, recolonised Agrigentum, and gathered together the remnant of its citizens, about B. C. 338. (Plut. Timol. 35; Diod. xvi. 82, 83.) This was the first attempt to restore the city after its desolation by the Carthaginians in B. C. 406. (Diod. xiii. 81, &c.) [E. E.]

MEGILLUS (Μέγιλλος), a Lacedaemonian, was one of the three commissioners for ratifying the short and hollow truce with Tissaphernes on behalf of Agesilaus, who had just crossed over to Asia, B. C. 396. (Xen. Hell. iii. 4. § 6.) The more common readings in Xenophon are Megialius and Megialus. One of the interlocutors in the "Laws" of Plato is Megillus, a Lacedaemonian. [E. E.]

MEGILLUS (Μέγιλλος), a writer on arithmetic, mentioned in the Θεολογούμενα Ἀριθμητικῆς, p. 28. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. i. p. 852, vol. v. p. 649.) [C. P. M.]

MEGI'STIAS (Μεγιστίας), a celebrated soothsayer, a native of Acarnania, who traced his descent up to Melampus. He was present at the battle of Thermopylae; and though he foresaw by his art the fatal issue of the conflict, refused to quit his post, though requested to withdraw by Leonidas. He sent away his only son, but himself remained and was killed. A separate monument was erected to his memory with an inscription by his friend Simonides, which is quoted by Herodotus. (Herod. vii. 219, 221, 228.) Plutarch (Apophth. Lacon. vol. ii. p. 221, c.) gives the name Themisteas to the soothsayer whom Leonidas wished to send away. [C. P. M.]

MEGISTO (Μεγιστώ), is in some writers another form for Callisto, the mother of Arcas, who is also called Themisto. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Ἀρκάς; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 300; Hygin. Poet. Astr. ii. 1.) [L. S.]

MEGI'STONUS or MEGISTO'NOUS (Μεγιστόνους), a Spartan of rank and influence, whom Cratesicleia, the mother of Cleomenes III., took for her second husband, with the view, as it would seem, of securing him to her son's party; and we find him accordingly entering readily into the plans of Cleomenes for the reformation of the state. In B. C. 226 he was taken prisoner by Aratus in a battle near Orchomenus in Arcadia; but he must have been soon released, for he appears again not long after at Sparta, co-operating with Cleomenes in the measures which he proposed after the murder of the Ephori, and setting an example to his countrymen by the voluntary surrender of his property. In B. C. 223, when Cleomenes took Argos, Megistonous induced him to adopt no steps against those citizens who were suspected of an attachment to the Achaean party, beyond the requisition of twenty hostages. In the same year Cleomenes, having taken possession of Corinth, and besieged the citadel, sent Megistonous and Tripylus, or Tritymallus, to Aratus, then at Sicyon, with an offer of terms, which, however, were rejected. Not long after this, the Achaean party in Argos excited an insurrection against the Spartan garrison; and Megistonous, being sent by Cleomenes with 2000 men to quell the revolt, was slain in battle soon after he had thrown himself into the city. (Plut. Cleom. 6, 7, 11, 19, 21, Arat. 38, 41, 44; comp. Polyb. ii. 47, 52, 53; Droysen, Hellenismus, vol. ii. b. ii. ch. 4.) [E. E.]

MEHERDA'TES, the grandson of Phraates IV., king of Parthia, lived at Rome as a hostage, but was sent by the emperor Claudius, about A. D. 50, into Parthia at the request of the inhabitants, who were disgusted at the cruelty of their reigning sovereign Gotarzes. Cassius Longinus, the governor of Syria, received orders to support Meherdates in his attempt to gain the crown; but Meherdates was defeated in battle, and taken prisoner by Gotarzes, who spared his life but cut off his ears. (Tac. Ann. xi. 10, xii. 10—14.) The name Meherdates is merely another form of Mithridates.

MEIDIAS (Μειδίας), a native of Scepsis, and son-in-law of Mania, satrapess of the Midland Aeolis, whom he strangled, and added to the crime the murder of her son, a boy about sixteen years old. He then seized the towns of Scepsis and Gergis, where the greater part of Mania's treasures was deposited. The other cities, however, of the satrapy refused to acknowledge him as their ruler, and, when he sent presents to Pharnabazus with a request to be invested with the government which his mother-in-law had held, he received a threatening answer and an assurance that the satrap would rather die than leave Mania unrevenged. At this crisis Dercyllidas, the Spartan general, arrived in Asia (B. C. 399), and, having proclaimed freedom to all the Aeolian towns and received several of them into alliance, advanced against Scepsis, where Meidias was. The latter, equally afraid of Pharnabazus and of the Scepsians, sent to Dercyllidas to propose a conference on receiving hostages for his safety. These he obtained; but, when he asked on what terms he might hope for alliance, the Spartan answered, "on condition of giving freedom and independence to the citizens." He then entered Scepsis and proclaimed liberty amidst the joy of the inhabitants. Meidias, accompanying him thence on his march to Gergis, begged leave to retain the town, and received for answer, that he should have his due. Having taken possession of the place, Dercyllidas deprived Meidias of his guards, and seized the treasures of Mania as his by right of conquest over Pharnabazus, leaving to Meidias nothing beyond his private property. The murderer, alarmed with good reason for his safety, asked where he was to live? "Even where it is most just you should," — was the answer, — "in Scepsis, your native city, and in your father's house," — words which could have conveyed to him no other meaning than, "Even where you will be exposed unprotected to the indignation and vengeance of your countrymen." (Xen. Hell. iii. 1. §§ 14—28; Polyaen. ii. 6.) [MIDIAS.] [E. E.]

MEILA'NION (Μειλανίων), a son of Amphidamas, and husband of Atalante, by whom he became the father of Parthenopaeus. (Apollod. iii. 9. § 2; comp. ATALANTE.) [L. S.]

MEILI'CHIUS (Μειλίχιος), i. e. the god that can be propitiated, or the gracious, is used as a surname of several divinities. 1. Of Zeus, as the protector of those who honoured him with propitiatory sacrifices. At Athens cakes were offered to him every year at the festival of the Diasia. (Thucyd. i. 126; Xenoph. Anab. vii. 7. § 4.) Altars were erected to Zeus Meilichius on the Cephissus (Paus. i. 37. § 3), at Sicyon (ii. 9. § 6), and at Argos (ii. 20. § 1; Plut. De cohib. Ir. 9). 2. Of Dionysus in the island of Naxos. (Athen. iii. p. 78.) 3. Of Tyche or Fortune. (Orph. Hymn. 71. 2.) The plural θεοὶ μειλίχιοι is also applied to certain divinities whom mortals used to propitiate with sacrifices at night, that they might avert all evil, as e. g. at Myonia in the country of the Ozolian Locrians. (Paus. x. 38. § 4; comp. Orph. E. 30.) [L. S.]

MELA, or MELLA, M. ANNAEUS, was the youngest son of M. Annaeus Seneca, the rhetorician, and Helvia [HELVIA], and brother of L. Seneca and Gallio [GALLIO] (et docti Senecae ter numeranda domus. Mart. Ep. iv. 40). He was born at Corduba, and, although raised to senatorian rank, he always preferred the name and station of an eques. (Sen. Consol. ad Helv. xvi., Controv. ii. Prooem.; comp. Tac. Ann. xvi. 17.) Mela studied rhetoric with success; but, leaving to his brothers the dangerous honours in Nero's reign of the state and the forum, he adhered to a life of privacy. His first occupation was that of steward to his father's estates in Spain; and through his brother L. Seneca's influence with Nero, he afterwards held the office of procurator or agent to the imperial demesnes. Mela married Acilia, daughter of Acilius Lucanus of Corduba, a provincial lawyer of some note. By Acilia he had at least one son, the celebrated Lucan, A. D. 40. [LUCANUS.] After Lucan's death, A. D. 65, Mela laid claim to his property; and the suit arising from this claim proved ultimately his own destruction. Fabius Romanus, who opposed him, had been his son's intimate friend, and was thought to have inserted among the papers of the deceased forged letters involving Mela in at least a knowledge of Piso's conspiracy, A. D. 65. (Tac. Ann. xv. 48, &c.) Mela was rich, Nero was needy and rapacious, and the former anticipated a certain sentence by suicide,

A. D. 66. To save a part for his family, Mela bequeathed to Tigellinus and his son-in-law, Cossutianus Capito [CAPITO], a large portion of his wealth. Codicils, believed however to be spurious, were annexed to Mela's will, accusing Anicius Cerialis [CERIALIS] and Rufius Crispinus [CRISPINUS] of participation in Piso's plot. The character and studies of Mela are agreeably sketched by the elder Seneca in the prooemium to his 2d book of Controversiae, which book is also especially addressed to Mela. (Tac. Ann. xvi. 17; Dion Cass. lxii. 25; Sen. Controv. ii. v. prooem., Cons. ad Helv. xvi.) [W. B. D.]

MELA, FA'BIUS, a Roman jurist, who is often cited in the Digest; but there is no excerpt from his writings there. The fact that he is cited by Africanus (Dig. 46. tit. 3. s. 39, and 50. tit. 16. s. 207) shows that he was at least his contemporary. But it may be collected from another passage (Dig. 9. tit. 2. s. 11) that he was prior to Proculus, or at least his contemporary; for in that passage Ulpian cites Mela before Proculus. In another passage Ulpian (Dig. 19. tit. 1. s. 17) cites Mela as the authority for an opinion of Gallus Aquilius who was a friend of Cicero, and praetor B. C. 66; and again (Dig. 19. tit. 9. s. 3) as authority for an opinion of Servius Sulpicius. He is often cited in connection with Labeo and Trebatius. As Africanus wrote under Hadrian, who died A. D. 138, and in the reign of Pius, the successor of Hadrian, we cannot with certainty fix the period of Mela as earlier than that of Antoninus Pius; but from the other citations here mentioned it has been inferred that he was a contemporary of Labeo and Trebatius. We are not acquainted with the title of any of Mela's writings, though he wrote at least ten books about something. (Dig. 46. tit. 3. s. 39.) [G. L.]

MELA, POMPO'NIUS, the first Roman author who composed a formal treatise upon Geography. From one passage in his work (ii. 6. § 74) we learn that he was born at a town situated on the bay of Algesiras, and the name of the place seems to have been Tingentera or Cingentera; but the text is here so corrupt, that it is impossible to speak with certainty. From a second passage (iii. 6. § 25, comp. Sueton. Claud. 17) it is highly probable that he flourished under the emperor Claudius; but at all events it is certain that he must have written after the campaigns of Augustus in Spain, for he speaks of the ancient Jol as having been ennobled by the appellation of Caesareia (i. 6. § 5), and mentions two towns in the country of the Cantabri which had been named after their conqueror. Beyond these particulars our knowledge does not extend. Funccius indeed conjectures that the designation Pomponius was acquired by adoption, and that he is in reality the L. Annaeus Mela of Corduba, who was the son of Seneca the rhetorician—the brother of Seneca the philosopher, and of Junius Gallio—and the father of the poet Lucan; but there appears to be no evidence in favour of this hypothesis beyond the bare facts that both of these personages were Spaniards, and that both bore the surname of Mela. (Senec. Controv. lib. ii. praef.; Tac. Ann. xvi. 17; Hieron. in Chron. Euseb. Olymp. ccxi.; comp. Plin. H. N. xix. 33, who, probably by mistake, wrote Tiberio for Nerone.)

The title prefixed to the Compendium of Mela in the best MSS. is De Situ Orbis Libri III. After a short prooemium, in which he dwells upon the importance and the difficulties of the undertaking, and states the manner in which he proposes to execute his task, he proceeds to define the cardinal points, and to explain the division of the world into two hemispheres and five zones. The northern hemisphere is that portion of the earth which is known, and is separated by the impassable torrid zone from the southern hemisphere, which is altogether unknown, and is the abode of the Antichthones. The northern or known hemisphere is completely surrounded by the ocean, which communicates with the four great seas: one on the north, the Caspian; two on the south, the Persian and the Arabian; one on the west, the Mediterranean, with its subdivisions of the Hellespont, the Propontis, the Thracian Bosporus, the Euxine, the Cimmerian Bosporus, and the Palus Maeotis. By this sea and the two great rivers, the Tanais and Nile, the whole of the northern hemisphere is portioned out into three great divisions. All to the north of the Mediterranean and the west of the Tanais constitute Europe; all to the south of the Mediterranean and the west of the Nile constitute Africa; what remains is Asia. Next follows a brief general description of the three continents, and an enumeration of the chief tribes by which they are inhabited. These preliminaries being discussed, the author enters upon more minute details, and makes a complete circuit of the known world, tracing first the coast of the Mediterranean and the shores of the ocean. Thus commencing at the straits of Hercules with Mauritania, he passes on in regular order to Numidia, Africa Proper, the Cyrenaica, Egypt, Arabia, Syria, Phoenicia, Cilicia, Pamphylia, Lycia, Caria, Ionia, Aeolis, Bithynia, Paphlagonia, the Asiatic nations on the Euxine and the Palus Maeotis, European Scythia, Thrace, Macedonia, Greece, the Peloponnesus, Epirus, Illyricum, Italy from the head of the Adriatic round by Magna Graecia to the Ligurian Gulf, Gallia Narbonnensis, and the eastern coast of Spain. (Hispaniae ora citerior.) The tour of the Mediterranean being now completed, a chapter is devoted to its islands. Passing beyond the Straits, we stretch along the western coast of Spain (Hispaniae ora exterior), the western coast of Gaul (Galliae ora exterior), the islands of the Northern Ocean, Germany, Sarmatia, the shores of the Caspian, the Eastern Ocean and India, the Mare Rubrum and its two gulfs, the Persian and Arabian, Aethiopia, and those portions of Aethiopia and Mauritania bordering upon the Atlantic, which brings him round to the point from which he started. It will be seen from the above sketch that the existence of the northern countries of Europe and of the northern and eastern countries of Asia were unknown, it being supposed that these regions formed part of the ocean, which, in like manner, was supposed to occupy the whole of Central and Southern Africa.

As might be expected in a tract which consists chiefly of proper names, the text is often excessively and hopelessly currupt, but the style is simple, unaffected, and perspicuous; the Latinity is pure; all the best authorities accessible at that period, especially Eratosthenes, appear to have been carefully consulted; and although everything is compressed within the narrowest limits, we find the monotony of the catalogue occasionally diversified by animated and pleasing pictures.

The Editio Princeps of Pomponius Mela appeared at Milan, in 4to. 1471, without any printer's name. Numerous editions were published before the end of the fifteenth century, but the text first began to assume an improved appearance in those superintended by Vadianus, fol. Vienn. 1518, and fol. Basil. 1522, especially in the second. Further emendations were introduced by Vinetus, 4to. Paris, 1572; by Schottus, 4to. Antv. 1582; but the great restorers of this author were Vossius, 4to. Hag. Com. 1658; Jac. Gronovius, 8vo. Lug. Bat. 1685, 1696; and Abr. Gronovius, Lug. Bat. 8vo. 1722, and especially 1728. This last edition gives a completely new recension, and remained the standard until superseded by that of Tzschuckius, 7 parts, 8vo. Lips. 1807, which is executed with the greatest care, presents us with the labours of former critics in their best form, is enriched by the collation of several new MSS., contains an ample collection of the most valuable commentaries, and supplies everything which either the scholar or the student can require. We have an old translation into English: "The rare and singular Work of Pomponius Mela, that excellent and worthy Cosmographer, of the Situation of the World, most orderly prepared, and divided every parte by its selfe: with the Longitude and Latitude of everie Kingdome, Regent, Province, Rivers, &cc. Whereunto is added, that learned Worke of Julius Solinus Polyhistor, with a necessarie Table for this Booke; right pleasant and profitable for Gentlemen, Merchaunts, Mariners, and Travellers. Translated into Englyshe by Arthur Golding, Gent." 4to. Lond. The Mela was first published in 1585, the Solinus in 1587, and then both were bound up in one volume, and reissued with the above title in 1590. There is a translation into French by C. P. Fradin, 3 vols. 8vo. Paris, 1804, and with a new title-page 1827; into Italian by Poreacchi, 8vo. Venet. 1547; and into German by J. C. Dietz, 8vo. Giessen, 1774, which is said to be very bad. (Bähr, Gesch. der Röm. Litterat. § 362, 3d ed.) [W. R.]

MELAENEUS (Μελαινεύς), a son of Lycaon, who is said to have built the Arcadian town of Melaeneae. (Paus. viii. 26. § 5; Steph. Byz. s. v. Μελαινεαί.) [L. S.]

MELAENIS (Μελαινίς), i. e. the dark, a surname of Aphrodite, under which she was worshipped at Corinth. (Paus. ii. 2. § 4; comp. viii. 6. § 2, ix. 17. § 4; Athen. xiii. p. 588.) [L. S.]

MELA'MPODES (Μελαμπόδης). 1. A Greek grammarian, the author of a treatise which is still extant, though unpublished, addressed to Dionysius the Thracian. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vi. p. 345.)

2. A writer on astrology, the author of an extant, though unpublished treatise, entitled Methodus Praedictionum Lunarium. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iv. p. 160.) [C. P. M.]

MELAMPUS (Μελάμπους), a son of Amythaon by Eidomene, or according to others, by Aglaia or Rhodope (Apollod. i. 9. § 1; Diod. iv. 68; Schol. ad Theocrit. iii. 43), and a brother of Bias. He was looked upon by the ancients as the first mortal that had been endowed with prophetic powers, as the person that first practised the medical art, and established the worship of Dionysus in Greece (Apollod. ii. 2. § 2). He is said to have been married to Iphianassa (others call her Iphianeira or Cyrianassa,—Diod. iv. 68; Serv. ad Virg. Eclog. vi. 48), by whom he became the father of Mantius and Antiphates (Hom. Od. xv. 225, &c.). Apollodorus (i. 9. § 13) adds a son, Abas; and Diodorus calls his children Bias, Antiphates, Manto, and Pronoe (comp. Paus. vi. 17. § 4). Melampus at first dwelt with Neleus at Pylus, afterwards he resided for a time at Phylace, near Mount Othrys, with Phylacus and Iphiclus, and at last ruled over a third of the territory of Argos (Hom. l. c.). At Aegosthena, in the north-western part of Megaris, he had a sanctuary and a statue, and an annual festival was there celebrated in his honour. (Paus. i. 44. § 8.)

With regard to his having introduced the worship of Dionysus into Greece, Herodotus (ii. 49) thinks that Melampus became acquainted with the worship of the Egyptian Dionysus, through Cadmus and the Phoenicians, and his connection with the Dionysiac religion is often alluded to in the ancient writers. Thus, we are told, for example, that he taught the Greeks how to mix wine with water (Athen. ii. p. 45; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1816). Diodorus (i. 97) further adds that Melampus brought with him from Egypt the myths about Cronos and the fight of the Titans. As regards his prophetic power, his residence at Phylace, and his ultimate rule over a portion of Argos, the following traditions were current in antiquity. When Melampus lived with Neleus, he dwelt outside the town of Pylos, and before his house there stood an oak tree containing a serpent's nest. The old serpents were killed by his servants, and burnt by Melampus himself, who reared the young ones. One day, when they had grown up, and Melampus was asleep, they approached from both sides and cleaned his ears with their tongues. Being thus roused from his sleep, he started up, and to his surprise perceived that he now understood the language of birds, and that with their assistance he could foretell the future. In addition to this he acquired the power of prophesying, from the victims that were offered to the gods, and, after having had an interview with Apollo on the banks of the Alpheius, he became a most renowned soothsayer (Apollod. i. 9. § 11; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1685). During his stay with Neleus it happened that his brother Bias was one of the suitors for the hand of Pero, the daughter of Neleus, and Neleus promised his daughter to the man who should bring to him as a gift for the maiden, the oxen of Iphiclus, which were guarded by a dog whom neither man nor animal could approach. Melampus undertook the task of procuring the oxen for his brother, although he knew that the thief would be caught and kept in imprisonment for one whole year, after which he was to come into possession of the oxen. Things turned out as he had said; Melampus was thrown into prison, and in his captivity he learned from the wood-worms that the building in which he was would soon break down. He accordingly demanded to be let out, and as Phylacus and Iphiclus became thus acquainted with his prophetic powers, they asked him in what manner Iphiclus, who had no children, was to become father. Melampus, on the suggestion of a vulture, advised Iphiclus to take the rust from the knife with which Phylacus had once cut his son, and drink it in water during ten days. This was done, and Iphiclus became the father of Podarces. Melampus now received the oxen as a reward for his good services, and drove them to Pylos; he thus gained Pero for his brother, and henceforth remained in Messenia (Apollod. i. 9. § 12; Paus. iv. 36. § 2; Schol. ad Theocrit. iii. 43). His dominion over Argos is said to have been acquired in the following manner. In the reign of Anaxagoras, king of Argos, the women of the kingdom were seized with madness, and roamed about the country in a frantic state. Melampus cured them of it, on condition that he and his brother Bias should receive an equal share with Anaxagoras in the kingdom of Argos (Paus. ii. 18. § 4; Diod. iv. 68). Others, however, give the following account. The daughters of Proetus, Iphinoe, Lysippe and Iphianassa, were seized with madness, either because they opposed the worship of Dionysus (Diod. l. c.; Apollod. i. 9. § 12), or because they boasted of equalling Hera in beauty, or because they had stolen the gold from the statue of the goddess (Serv. ad Virg. Ecl. vi. 48). Melampus promised to cure the women, if the king would give him one-third of his territory and one of his daughters in marriage. Proetus refused the proposal: but when the madness continued, and also seized the other Argive women, messengers came to Melampus to request his aid; but he now demanded two-thirds of the kingdom, one for himself, and the other for his brother. The demand was complied with, and with a band of youths, he pursued the women as far as Sicyon, with Bacchic shouts. Iphinoe died during the pursuit, but the surviving women were cured by purifications in a well, Anigrus, or in a temple of Artemis near Lusi, or in the town of Sicyon itself; and Melampus and Bias married the two daughters of Proetus. (Apollod. ii. 2. § 2; Strab. viii. p. 346; Ov. Met. xv. 322; Paus. ii. 7. § 8, viii. 18, in fin.; Herod. ix. 34; Schol. ad Pind. Nem. ix. 30.)

Another mythical personage of the same name occurs in Virgil (Aen. x. 320). [L. S.]

MELAMPUS (Μελάμπους), the author of two little Greek works still extant, one entitled Περὶ Παλμῶν Μαντική, Divinatio ex Palpitatione, the other Περὶ Ἐλαιῶν τοῦ Σώματος, De Naevis Oleaceis in Corpore. He lived probably in the third century B. C., as the former of these works is addressed to "king Ptolemy," who is supposed by Fabricius (Biblioth. Gr. vol. i. p. 99, ed. vet.) to have been Ptolemy Philadelphus. Both the works (as might be anticipated from the titles) are full of superstitions and absurdities. They were first published in Greek by Camillus Peruscus, in his edition of Aelian's Varia Historia, &c., Rom. 1545, 4to. They were translated into Latin by Nicolaus Petreius, and published together with Meletius, De Natura Hominis, Venet. 1552, 4to. They have also been translated into French and German. The last and best edition is that by J. G. F. Franz, in his "Scriptores Physiognomiae Veteres," Altenburg, 1780, 8vo. (Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. i. p. 99, ed. vet.; Choulant, Handb. d. Bücherkunde für die Aeltere Medicin, p. 415.) [W. A. G.]

MELAMPUS, an architect, of little note, who wrote Praecepta Symmetriarum. (Vitruv. vii. Praef. § 14.) [P. S.]

MELANAEGIS (Μελαναιγίς), i. e. armed or clad with a black aegis, occurred as a surname of Dionysus at Eleutherae (Suid. s. v. Ἐλεύθερος; Paus. i. 38. § 8), and at Athens (Suid. s. v. Ἀπατούρια; Conon, Narrat. 39; Paus. ii. 35. § 1; comp. MELANTHUS), and of the Erinnys. (Aeschyl. Sept. 700.) [L. S.]

MELA'NCOMAS (Μελαγκόμας), an Ephesian, and NICO'MACHUS (Νικόμαχος), a Rhodian, were the two men whom ACHAEUS, the rebellious general of Antiochus the Great, employed to carry on his negotiations with Ptolemy IV. (Philopator), as well as all his other transactions with foreign powers. It was chiefly through recommendatory letters from Melancomas and Nicomachus that Bolis, of whose treachery they had no suspicion, was enabled to gain, to a great extent, the confidence of Achaeus, and so to betray him to Antiochus, in B. C. 214. (Polyb. viii. 17, 18, 20, 21.) [E. E.]

ME'LANEUS (Μελανεύς), a son of Apollo, and king of the Dryopes. He was the father of Eurytus and a famous archer. According to a Messenian legend Melaneus came to Perieres who assigned to him a town as his habitation which he called Oechalia, after his wife's name. (Paus. iv. 2. § 2; Anton. Lib. 4.)

Two other mythical personages of this name occur in Ovid (Met. xii. 306) and in the Odyssey (xxiv. 103). [L. S.]

MELANIPPE (Μελανίππη). 1. A daughter of Cheiron, is also called Euippe. Being with child by Aeolus, she fled to mount Pelion; but Cheiron made search after her; and in order that her condition might not become known, she prayed to be metamorphosed into a mare. Artemis granted the prayer, and in the form of a horse she was placed among the stars. (Eratosth. Catast. 18; Aristoph. Thesm. 512; Hygin. Fab. 86.) Another account describes her metamorphosis as a punishment for having despised Artemis or divulged the counsels of the gods. (Hygin. Poet. Astr. ii. 18.)

2. The wife of Hippotes and the mother of Aeolus. (Diod. iv. 67.)

3. A daughter of Aeolus, or, according to others, of Hippotes or Desmontes. (Schol. ad Hom. Od. x. 2; Hygin. Fab. 186.)

4. A queen of the Amazons, whom Heracles, in his fight with the Amazons, restored to freedom in consequence of a present she gave him. (Diod. iv. 16; Schol. ad Pind. Nem. iii. 64; Apollon. Rhod. ii. 966.) For two other mythical personages of this name, see BOEOTUS and MELEAGER. [L. S.]

MELANI'PPIDES (Μελανιππίδης), of Melos, one of the most celebrated lyric poets in the department of the dithyramb. Suidas (s. v.) distinguishes two poets of this name, of whom the elder was the son of Criton, and flourished about Ol. 65 (B. C. 520), and wrote numerous books of dithyrambs, and epic poems, and epigrams, and elegies, and very many other things; he was the grandfather, on the mother's side, of the younger Melanippides, whose father's name was also Criton. No other ancient writer recognises this distinction, which, therefore, probably arises out of some confusion in the memory of Suidas. At all events, it is better to place under one head all that we know of Melanippides.

The date of Melanippides can only be fixed within rather uncertain limits. He may be said, somewhat indefinitely, to have flourished about the middle of the 5th century B. C. He was younger than Lasus of Hermione (Plut. Mus. p. 1141, c.), and than Diagoras of Melos (Suid. s. v. Διαγόρας). He was contemporary with the comic poet Pherecrates (Plut. l. c.). He lived for some time at the court of Perdiccas, of Macedonia, and there died (Suid. s. v.). He must therefore have died before B. C. 412.

His high reputation as a poet is intimated by Xenophon, who makes Aristodemus give him the first place among dithyrambic poets, by the side of Homer, Sophocles, Polycleitus, and Zeuxis, as the chief masters in their respective arts (Xenoph. Mem. i. 4. §. 3), and by Plutarch, who mentions him, with Simonides and Euripides, as among the most distinguished masters of music (Non poss. suav. viv. sec. Epic. p. 1095, d.). He did not, however, escape the censures which the old comic poets so often heap upon their lyric contemporaries, for their corruption of the severe beauties of the ancient music. Pherecrates places him at the head of such offenders, and charges him with relaxing and softening the ancient music by increasing the chords of the lyre to twelve (or, as we ought perhaps to read, ten: see Ulrici, Gesch. d. Hellen. Dichtkunst, vol. ii. p. 605, n. 104), and thus paving the way for the further licences introduced by Cinesias, Phrynis, and Timotheus (Plut. de Mus. p. 1141; comp. Meineke, Frag. Com. Graec. pp. 326—335). According to Aristotle, he altogether abandoned the antistrophic arrangement, and introduced long preludes (ἀναβολαί), in which the union, which was anciently considered essential, between music and the words of poetry, seems to have been severed (Aristot. Rhet. iii. 9). Plutarch (or the author of the essay on music which bears his name) tells us that in his flute-music he subverted the old arrangement, by which the flute-player was hired and trained by the poet, and was entirely subordinate to him (De Mus. l. c.); but there is probably some mistake in this, as the fragment of Pherecrates, which the author quotes in confirmation of his statement, contains not a word about flute-music, but attacks only the alterations in the lyre; while, on the other hand, Athenaeus cites a passage from the Marsyas of Melanippides, which seems to show that he rejected and despised flute-music altogether (Athen. xiv. p. 616, e.).

According to Suidas, Melanippides wrote lyric songs and dithyrambs. Several verses of his poems are still preserved, and the following titles, Marsyas, Persephone, The Danaids, which have misled Fabricius and others into the supposition that Melanippides was a tragic poet, a mistake which has been made with respect to the titles of the dithyrambs of other poets. The fragments are collected by Bergk (Poët. Lyr. Graec. pp. 847—850). We learn from Meleager (v. 7) that some of the hymns of Melanippides had a place in his Garland:—

(Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. pp. 129, 130; Ulrici, Hellen. Dichtk. vol. ii. pp. 26, 141, 590—593; Schmidt, Diatribe in Dithyramb. pp. 77—85, who maintains the distinction of Suidas, and attempts to distinguish between the extant fragments of the two poets.) [P. S.]

MELANIPPUS (Μελάνιππος). 1. A son of Agrius, was slain by Diomedes. (Apollod. i. 8. § 6; comp. OENEUS.)

2. A son of Astacus of Thebes, who, in the attack of the Seven on his native city, slew Tydeus and Mecisteus. His tomb was shown in the neighbourhood of Thebes on the road to Chalcis. (Aeschyl. Sept. 409; Apollod. iii. 6. § 8; Herod. v. 67; Paus. ix. 18. § 1.)

3. A son of Theseus and Perigune, and father of Ioxus. (Paus. x. 25. § 2; Plut. Thes. 8.)

4. A son of Ares and Tritaea, the daughter of Triton. (Paus. vii. 22. § 5.)

5. One of the sons of Priam. (Apollod. iii. 12. § 5.)

6. A youth of Patrae, in Achaia, who was in love with Comaetho, a priestess of Artemis Triclaria. As the parents on both sides would not consent to their marriage, Melanippus profaned the temple of the goddess by his intercourse with Comaetho. The goddess punished the two offenders with instantaneous death, and visited the whole country with plague and famine. The oracle of Delphi revealed the cause of these calamities, and ordered the inhabitants to sacrifice to Artemis every year the handsomest youth and the handsomest maiden. (Paus. vii. 19. § 2.) A seventh mythical personage of this name is mentioned by Homer. (Il. xv. 547, 576.) [L. S.]

MELANIPPUS (Μελάνιππος), a youth of Agrigentum, who, having been treated with injustice by Phalaris, proposed to his friend Chariton to form a conspiracy against the tyrant. Chariton, alarmed for the safety of Melanippus, urged him to say nothing to any one of his intention, and promised to devise a fitting opportunity for the enterprise. Having then resolved to take the whole risk upon himself, he attempted the life of Phalaris, and, being apprehended, was put to the torture, which he bore resolutely, refusing to confess that he had any accomplices. Melanippus hereupon came to Phalaris and avowed himself the instigator of the design, and the tyrant, struck with their mutual friendship, spared the lives of both on condition of their leaving Sicily. (Ael. V. H. ii. 4.) [E. E.]

MELANO'PUS (Μελάνωπος), a son of Laches, the Athenian general, was one of three ambassadors (the other two being Glaucias and ANDROTION) who were sent to remonstrate with Mausolus, king of Caria, on his attempt to subject to himself the islands on the eastern coast of the Aegean. On their way they fell in with and captured a merchant ship of Naucratis, which was brought into the Peiraeeus, and condemned by the Athenians as an enemy's vessel. The prize-money, however, was retained by Melanopus and his colleagues; and, when the time drew near at which they would have to surrender it on pain of imprisonment, Timocrates proposed a law exempting public debtors from that penalty on their giving security for payment. A prosecution was hereupon instituted against Timocrates by Diodorus and Euctemon (private enemies of Androtion); and for them Demosthenes wrote the speech, still extant, which was delivered by Diodorus in B. C. 353. Before the trial came on, Melanopus and his colleagues paid the money. In the speech against Timocrates Melanopus is mentioned as having been guilty of treason, of embezzlement, of misconduct in an embassy to Egypt, and of injustice towards his own brothers. (Dem. c. Tim. p. 740.) [E. E.]

MELANO'PUS (Μελάνωπος), of Cyme, a poet of the mythical period, whom Pausanias places between Olen and Aristaeus, is said by that author to have composed a hymn to Opis and Hecaerge, in which he stated that those goddesses came from the Hyperboreans to Delos before Achaeia. (Paus. v. 7. §. 4. s. 8.) In some of the old genealogies Melanopus was made the grandfather of Homer. (Procl. and Pseudo-Herod. Vit. Hom.) [P. S.]

MELA'NTHIUS (Μελάνθιος), also called Melantheus, a son of Dolius, was a goat-herd of Odysseus, sided with the suitors of Penelope, and was cruelly killed by Odysseus. (Hom. Od. xvii. 212, &c., xxi. 176, xxii. 474, &c.) [L. S.]

MELA'NTHIUS (Μελάνθιος), an Athenian tragic poet, who seems to have been of some distinction in his day, but of whom little is now known beyond the attacks made on him by the comic poets. Eupolis, Aristophanes, Pherecrates, Leucon, and Plato, satirized him unmercifully; and it is remarkable that he was attacked in all the three comedies which gained the first three places in the dramatic contest of B. C. 419, namely, the Κόλακες of Eupolis, the Εἰρήνη of Aristophanes, and the Φράτορες of Leucon (Athen. viii. p. 343; Schol. ad Aristoph. Pac. 804). He is again attacked by Aristophanes in the Ὄρνιθες, B. C. 414. In addition to these indications of his date, we are informed of a remark made by him upon the tragedies of Diogenes Oenomaus, who flourished about B. C. 400 (Plut. de Aud. p. 41, c.). The story of his living at the court of Alexander of Pherae, who began to reign B. C. 369, is not very probable, considering the notoriety which he had acquired fifty years earlier, and yet the allusion made to his position and conduct there is quite in keeping with all that we know of his character (Plut. de Adul. et Amic. p. 50, e.).

The most important passage respecting Melanthius is that in the Peace of Aristophanes (796, &c.), which we subjoin in the form in which Welcker gives it:

Τοιάδε χρὴ Χαρίτων δαμώματα καλλικόμων τὸν
σοφὸν ποιητὴν
ὑμνεῖν, οταν ἠρινὰ μὲν φωνῇ χελιδὼν ἑζομενη κελαδῇ, χορὸν δὲ μὴ ᾽χῃ Μόρσιμος, μηδὲ Μελάνθιος, οὗ δὴ πικροτάτην ὅπα γηρύσαντος ἤκουσ᾽, ἡνίκα τῶν τραγῳδῶν τὸν χόρον εἶχον ἀδελφός τε
καὶ αὐτὸς ἀμφώ·
Γόργονες ὀψοφάγοι, βατιδοσκόποι, ἅρπυιαι, γραοσόβαι, μιαροὶ, τραγομάσχαλοι, ἰχθυολῦμαι.

It has been much doubted whether the fifth line means that Melanthius and Morsimus were brothers, or whether we should understand the word ἀδελφός to refer to some brother of Melanthius, whose name is not mentioned. The two ancient scholiasts held opposite opinions on the point (comp. Suid. s. v.); while among modern scholars, the former view is held by Ulrici, Meineke, Welcker, and Kayser, and the latter by Elmsley, Böckh, Müller and Clinton (comp. Elms. ad Eurip. Med. 96, with Welcker, die Griech. Tragöd. p. 1029). The character given of Melanthius in the above extract, his worthlessness as a poet, his voracious gluttony, his profligacy, and his personal offensiveness, is confirmed by several other passages of the comic poets and other writers (Aristoph. Pax, 999, Av. 152, and Schol.; Archippus, ap. Athen. viii. p. 343; Athen. i. p. 6, c.). He was celebrated for his wit, of which several specimens are preserved (Plut. de Aud. Poët. p. 20, c., de Aud. p. 41, c., de Adul. et Amic. p. 50, d., Conjug. Praec. p. 144, b., Sympos. p. 631, d., p. 633, d.). Aristophanes has preserved the title and two lines, somewhat parodied, of one of his dramas, the Medea, for it is absurd to suppose the Medea of Euripides is meant (Pax, 999); and Plutarch has more than once (De cohib. Ira, p. 453, f., de sera Num. Vindict. p. 551, a.) quoted a line, in which Melanthius says that ὁ θυμὸς

Τὰ δεινα πράττει τὰς φρένας μετοικίσας

Athenaeus informs us that Melanthius also wrote elegies (viii. p. 343, d.), and Plutarch (Cim. 4) refers to the epigrammatic elegies of Melanthius on Cimon and Polygnotus, of which he quotes one distich. But if the Melanthius quoted by Plutarch lived and wrote in the time of Cimon, as he seems clearly to mean, he could not have been, as Athenaeus supposed, the same person as the tragic poet. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. p. 310; Ulrici, Hellen. Dichtkunst, vol. ii. p. 572; Welcker, Die Griech. Trag. pp. 1030—1032; Kayser, Hist. Crit. Trag. Graec. pp. 59—65.) [P. S.]

MELA'NTHIUS or MELANTHUS (Μελάνθιος, Μέλανθος), an eminent Greek painter of the Sicyonian school, was contemporary with Apelles (B. C. 332), with whom he studied under Pamphilus, and whom he was considered even to excel in one respect, namely, in composition or grouping (dispositio). Quinctilian praises his ratio, by which perhaps he means the same thing. (Plin. xxxv. 10. s. 36. §§ 8, 10, adopting in the latter passage the reading of the Bamberg MS., which Brotier had previously suggested, Melanthio for Amphioni; Quinctil. xii. 10.)

He was one of the best colourists of all the Greek painters: Pliny mentions him as one of the four great painters who made "immortal works" with only four colours. (H. N. xxxv. 7. s. 32; comp. Dict. of Ant. s. v. Colores.) The only one of his pictures mentioned is the portrait of Aristratus, tyrant of Sicyon, riding in a triumphal chariot, which was painted by Melanthius and his pupils, and some parts of which were said to have been touched by the hand of Apelles; and respecting the fate of which a curious story is quoted from Polemon by Plutarch (Arat. 13); from whom also we learn the high esteem in which the pictures of Melanthius were held. (Ibid. 12; comp. Plin. H. N. xxxv. 7. s. 32.) Melanthius wrote a work upon his art (περὶ ζωγραφικῆς), from which a passage is quoted by Diogenes (iv. 18), and which Pliny cites among the authorities for the 35th book of his Natural History. [P. S.]

MELANTHO (Μελανθώ). 1. A daughter of Dolius, and sister of Melanthius; she was a slave in the house of Odysseus; and having sided, like her brother, with the suitors, she was hanged by Odysseus. (Hom. Od. xviii. 321; Paus. x. 25. § 1.)

2. A daughter of Deucalion, became the mother of Delphus, by Poseidon, who deceived her in the form of a dolphin. (Tzetz. ad Lyc. 208; Ov. Met. vi. 120.) [L. S.]

MELANTHUS (Μέλανθος). 1. One of the Tyrrhenian pirates, who wanted to carry off young Bacchus, but were metamorphosed into dolphins. (Ov. Met. iii. 671, &c.)

2. One of the sons of Laocoon. (Serv. ad Aen. ii. 211.) In Lycophron (767) the name occurs as a surname of Poseidon. [L. S.]

MELANTHUS or MELA'NTHIUS (Μέλανθος, Μελάνθιος), one of the Neleidae, and king of Messenia, whence he was driven out by the Heracleidae on their conquest of the Peloponnesus, and, following the instructions of the Delphic oracle, took refuge in Attica. In a war between the Athenians and Boeotians, Xanthus, the Boeotian king, challenged Thymoetes, king of Athens and the last of the Theseidae, to single combat. Thymoetes declined the challenge on the ground of age and infirmity. So ran the story, which strove afterwards to disguise the violent change of dynasty; and Melanthus undertook it on condition of being rewarded with the throne in the event of success. He slew Xanthus, and became king, to the exclusion of the line of Theseus. According to Pausanias, the conqueror of Xanthus was Andropompus, the father of Melanthus; according to Aristotle, it was Codrus, his son. To the period of the reign of Melanthus Pausanias refers the expulsion of the Ionians from Aegialus by the Achaeans, and their settlement at Athens as a place of refuge. (Her. i. 147, v. 65; Paus. ii. 18, iv. 5, vii. 1, 2; Strab. viii. p. 359, ix. p. 393, xiv. p. 633; Con. Narr. 39; Aristot. Pol. v. 10, ed. Bekk.; Schol. ad Aristoph. Ach. 146, Pac. 855; Suid. s. v. Ἀπατούρια; Dict. of Ant. s. v. Ἀπατούρια.) [E. E.]

MELAS (Μέλας.) 1. A son of Poseidon by a nymph of Chios, and brother of Angelus. (Paus. vii. 4. § 6.)

2. One of the Tyrrhenian pirates mentioned under MELANTHUS No. 1.

3. A son of Phrixus and Chalciope, was married to Eurycleia, by whom he became the father of Hyperes. (Apollod. i. 9. § 1; Apollon. Rhod. ii. 1158; Schol. ad Pind. Pyth. iv. 221.)

4. A son of Porthaon and Euryte, and brother of Oeneus. (Hom. Il. xiv. 117; Apollod. i. 7. § 10; comp. OENEUS and TYDEUS.)

5. A son of Antassus, at Gonusa, near Sicyon. He joined the Dorians on their march against Corinth. His services were at first declined, but he was afterwards allowed to fight in the ranks of the Dorians. He was the ancestor of the family of Cypselus. (Paus. ii. 4. § 4, v. 18. § 7, 20, in fin.)

There are three other mythical personages of this name. (Paus. vii. 4. § 6, viii. 28. § 3; Apollod. ii. 7. § 7.) [L. S.]

MELEA'GER (Μελέαγρος), a son of Oeneus (whence he is called Οἰνείδης), and Althaea, the daughter of Thestius, and was married to Cleopatra, by whom he became the father of Polydora. (Apollod. i. 8. § 2; Paus. iv. 2 in fin.; Orph. Argon. 157.) Other accounts call Meleager a son of Ares, by Althaea (Plut. Parall. Min. 26; Ov. Met. viii. 437; Hygin. Fab. 171); and Hyginus calls Parthenopaeus a son of Meleager. (Fab. 99, 270.) His brothers and sisters were Phereus or Thyreus, Agelaus, Toxeus, Periphas, Gorge, Eurymede, Deianeira, Melanippe. Meleager is one of the most famous Aetolian heroes of Calydon, and distinguished himself by his skill in throwing the javelin, as one of the Argonauts, and in the Calydonian hunt. Thus he gained the victory at the funeral games of Acastus (Hygin. Fab. 273; Athen. iv. p. 172); and the spear with which he had slain the Calydonian boar he dedicated in the temple of Apollo at Sicyon. (Paus. ii. 7. § 8.) In the expedition of the Argonauts he was said in some legends to have slain Aeetes in the contest for the golden fleece. (Diod. iv. 48.) While Meleager was at Calydon, Oeneus, the king of the place, once neglected to offer up a sacrifice to Artemis, whereupon the angry goddess sent a monstrous boar into the fields of Calydon, which were ravaged by the beast, while no one had the courage to hunt it. At length Meleager, with a band of other heroes, whose number and names are different in the different accounts (Apollod. i. 8. § 2; Ov. Met. viii. 300, &c.; Hygin. Fab. 174; Paus. viii. 45. § 4), went out to hunt the boar, which was killed by Meleager. Artemis, however, created a dispute about the animal's head and skin among the Calydonians and Curetes. Late writers represent Atalante as taking part in this famous hunt; but the huntsmen refused to go out with her, until Meleager, who loved her, prevailed upon them. According to Ovid (Met. viii. 380), Atalante inflicted the first wound upon the animal; while, according to others, Meleager first struck and killed it. He gave his prize, the boar's skin, to Atalante, who was deprived of it by the sons of Thestius; but Meleager slew them. (Apollod. Ov. ll. cc.; Diod. iv. 34.) During the war between the Calydonians and Curetes, the former were always victorious, so long as Meleager went out with them. But on one occasion he killed his mother's brothers; and his mother pronounced a curse upon him, in consequence of which he became indignant, and stayed at home, so that the victorious Curetes began to press Calydon very hard. It was in vain that the old men of the town made him the most brilliant promises if he would again join in the fight, and also the entreaties of his own friends remained without effect. At length, however, he yielded to the prayers of his wife, Cleopatra: he put the Curetes to flight, but never returned home, for the Erinnys, who had heard the curse of his mother, overtook him. (Hom. Il. ix. 527—600; comp. ii. 641.) The post-Homeric account gives a different cause of his death. When Meleager was seven days old, it is said, the Moerae appeared, declaring that the boy would die as soon as the piece of wood that was burning on the hearth should be consumed. When Althaea heard this, she extinguished the firebrand, and concealed it in a chest. Meleager himself became invulnerable; but after he had killed the brothers of his mother, she lighted the piece of wood, and Meleager died, whereupon Althaea and Cleopatra hung themselves. (Apollod. i. 8. § 2, &c.; Hygin. Fab. 171; Diod. iv. 34; Ov. Met. viii. 450, &c., 531.) The sisters of Meleager wept unceasingly after his death, until Artemis changed them into guinea-hens (μελεαγρίδες), who were transferred to the island of Leros. Even in this condition they mourned during a certain part of the year for their brother. Two of them, Gorge and Deianeira, through the mediation of Dionysus, were not metamorphosed. (Anton. Lib. 2; Ov. Met. viii. 532, &c.; Apollod. i. 8. § 3.) The story of Meleager, his hunt of the Calydonian boar, his contest with the sons of Thestius, and other scenes of his life, were frequently represented by ancient artists. (Paus. iii. 18. § 9, viii. 45, § 4.) He usually appears as a robust hunter, with curly hair, the Aetolian chlamys, and a boar's head. (Philostr. Icon. 15; comp. Welcker, Zeitschrift für die alte Kunst, p. 123, &c.) [L. S.]

MELEA'GER (Μελέαγρος). 1. Son of Neoptolemus, a Macedonian officer of distinction in the service of Alexander the Great. He is first mentioned in the war against the Getae (B. C. 335); and at the passage of the Granicus in the following year, we find him commanding one of the divisions (τάξεις) of the phalanx, a post which he afterwards held apparently throughout the campaigns in Asia. He was appointed, together with Coenus and Ptolemy the son of Seleucus, to command the newly-married troops which were sent home from Caria to spend the winter in Macedonia, and rejoined Alexander at

Gordium in the following summer (B. C. 333). We afterwards find him present at the battles of Issus and Arbela; associated with Craterus in the important task of dislodging the enemy who guarded the passes into Persia; and again bearing a part in the passage of the Hydaspes, and in various other operations in India (Arrian, Anab. i. 4, 14, 20, 24, ii. 8, iii. 11, 18, v. 12; Curt. iii. 24, v. 14, vii. 27; Diod. xvii. 57). But notwithstanding this long series of services we do not learn that Alexander promoted him to any higher or more confidential situation, nor do we find him employed in any separate command of importance. Already, before the king's death, Meleager had given evidence of an insolent and factious disposition, and these qualities broke out in their full force during the discussions which ensued after the death of Alexander. His conduct on that occasion is differently related. According to Justin, he was the first to propose in the council of officers, that either Arrhidaeus or Heracles the son of Barsine should at once be chosen king, instead of waiting for the chance of Roxana bearing a son. Curtius, on the contrary, represents him as breaking out into violent invectives against the ambition of Perdiccas, and abruptly quitting the assembly, in order to excite the soldiery to a tumult. Diodorus, again, states that he was sent by the assembled generals to appease the clamours and discontent of the troops, but instead of doing so he himself joined the mutineers. In any case it is certain that Meleager early assumed the lead of the opposition to Perdiccas and his party; and placed himself at the head of the infantry, who had declared themselves (probably at his instigation) in favour of the claims of Arrhidaeus to the vacant throne. Meleager even went so far as to order the execution of Perdiccas, without any express authority from his puppet of a king; but this project was disconcerted by the boldness of the regent: and the greater part of the cavalry, together with almost all the generals, sided with Perdiccas, and, quitting Babylon, established themselves in a separate camp without the walls of the city. Matters thus seemed tending to an open rupture, but a reconciliation was effected, principally by the intervention of Eumenes, and it was agreed that the royal authority should be divided between Arrhidaeus and the expected son of Roxana, and that in the mean time Meleager should be associated with Perdiccas in the regency. It was, however, evidently impossible that these two should long continue on really friendly terms, and Meleager proved no match for his wily and designing antagonist. Perdiccas contrived by his profound dissimulation, to lull his rival into fancied security, while he made himself master both of the person and the disposition of the imbecile Arrhidaeus, of which he immediately took advantage, and hastened to strike the first blow. The whole army was assembled under pretence of a general review and lustration, when the king, at the instigation of Perdiccas, suddenly demanded the surrender and punishment of all the leaders in the late disorders. The infantry were taken by surprise, and unable to offer any resistance; 300 of the alleged mutineers were singled out, and instantly executed; and though Meleager himself was not personally attacked, he deemed it necessary to provide for his safety by flight, and took refuge in a temple, where he was quickly pursued and put to death by order of Perdiccas. (Curt. x. 21—29; Justin. xiii. 2—4; Arrian, ap. Phot. p. 69, a.; Diod. xviii. 2.)

2. An ilarch or commander of a squadron of cavalry in the army of Alexander at the battle of Arbela. (Arrian, Anab. iii. 11; Curt. iv. 50.) He is certainly distinct from the preceding, and is probably the same person whom we afterwards find mentioned among the friends and adherents of Pithon, who participated in his projects of revolt against Antigonus, B. C. 316. [PITHON.] After the death of their leader, Meleager and Menoetas broke out into open insurrection, but were speedily defeated by Orontobates and Hippostratus, who had been left by Antigonus in the government of Media, and Meleager was slain in the battle. (Diod. xix. 47.)

3. A son of Ptolemy Soter and Eurydice, daughter of Antipater, succeeded his brother Ptolemy Ceraunus on the throne of Macedonia, after the latter had fallen in battle against the Gauls (B. C. 280); but was compelled by the Macedonian troops to resign the crown, after a reign of only two months. (Euseb. Arm. pp. 156, 157; Dexippus, ap. Syncell. pp. 267, 270.) His reign is omitted by Justin. [E. H. B.]

MELEA'GER (Μελέαγρος), son of Eucrates, the celebrated writer and collector of epigrams, was a native of Gadara in Palestine, and lived about B. C. 60. There are 131 of his epigrams in the Greek Anthology, written in a good Greek style, though somewhat affected, and distinguished by sophistic acumen and amatory fancy. (Brunck, Anal. vol. i. pp. 1—38; Jacobs, Anth. Graec. vol. i. pp. 1—40, vol. xiii. pp. 639, 698, 915, 916; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iv. pp. 416—420.) Besides the various editions of the Greek Anthology, there are separate editions of the epigrams of Meleager, for which see Fabricius. An account of his Στέφανος, or collection of epigrams, is given under PLANUDES. [P. S.]

MELES (Μέλης), an Athenian, who was beloved by Timagoras, but refused to listen to him, and ordered him to leap from the rock of the acropolis. Timagoras, who was only a metoikos at Athens, did as he was bid; but Meles, repenting of his cruel command, likewise threw himself from the rock; and the Athenians from that time are said to have worshipped Anteros, as the avenger of Timagoras. (Paus. i. 30. § 1.)

Meles is also the god of the river Meles, near Smyrna; and this river-god was believed by some to have been the father of Homer. (Vit. Script. Graec. p. 27, ed. Westermann.) [L. S.]

MELES (Μέλης). 1. Of Colophon, the father of the poet Polymnestus (Plut. de Mus. p. 1133, a.).

2. Of Athens, the father of the dithyrambic poet Cinesias, was himself also a dithyrambic poet, and is ranked by Pherecrates as the worst of all the citharoedic poets of his day (Schol. ad Aristoph. Av. 858). Plato also tells us that his performances annoyed the audience (Gorg. p. 502). [P. S.]

MELESA'GORAS. [AMELESAGORAS.]

MELESIPPUS (Μελήσιππος), a Lacedaemonian, son of Diacritus, was one of the three ambassadors sent to Athens in B. C. 432, just before the commencement of the Peloponnesian war, with the final demand of Lacedaemon for the restoration of the independence of all the Greek states. By the advice of Pericles, the Athenians refused compliance. In the following year, when Archidamus was on his march to invade Attica, he again sent Melesippus to Athens, in the hope of effecting a negotiation; but the Athenians would not even admit him to a hearing. (Thuc. i. 139—145, ii. 12.) [E. E.]

ME'LETE (Μελέτη), the name of one of the Muses. (Pausanias, ix. 29. § 2; compare MUSAE.) [L. S.]

MELE'TIUS (Μελέτιος), literary and ecclesiastical.

1. Of ANTIOCH, an eminent Greek ecclesiastic of the fourth century. He was born at Melitene, near the right bank of the Euphrates, in the district of Melitene, in Armenia Minor. His parents were persons of rank, at least of respectable condition (Gregor. Nyssen. Oratio habit. in funere Meletii), and he probably inherited from them an estate which he possessed in Armenia. (Basil. Epist. 187, editt. vett., 99, ed. Benedict.) His gentleness of disposition, general excellence of character, and persuasive eloquence, acquired for him a high reputation: but his first bishopric, that of Sebaste, in Armenia, in which he succeeded Eustathius [EUSTATHIUS, No. 7], apparently after the latter had been deposed in the council of Melitene (A. D. 357), proved so troublesome, through the contumacy of his people, that he withdrew from his charge and retired to Beroea, now Aleppo in Syria, of which city, according to one rendering of a doubtful expression in Socrates, he became bishop. The East was at this time torn with the Arian controversy; but the character of Meletius won the respect of both parties, and each appears to have regarded him as belonging to them, a result promoted by his dwelling, in his discourses, on practical rather than polemical subjects. According to Philostorgius he feigned himself an Arian, and subscribed the Confession of the Western bishops, probably that of Ariminum; and, according to Socrates, he subscribed the creed of the Acacians, at Seleuceia in A. D. 359. These concurrent testimonies fix on him the charge either of instability or dissimulation. Still his real tendency to the Homoousian doctrine was known to or suspected by many; and, therefore, when, by the influence of Acacius and the Arians, he was appointed to the see of Antioch (A. D. 360 or 361), all the bishops, clergy, and people of the city and neighbourhood, Arians and Orthodox, went out to meet him. Even the Jews and Heathens flocked to see a person who had already attained so great celebrity. For a time, but apparently a very short time, he confined himself to practical subjects, avoiding or speaking ambiguously on the doctrines in dispute between the contending parties, but presently gave more open indications of his adherence to the orthodox party. It was probably to draw out his sentiments more distinctly that he was desired by the emperor Constantius to give an exposition of the passage, Prov. viii. 22. [GEORGIUS, No. 29.] He was preceded in the pulpit by George of Laodiceia and by Acacius of Caesareia, who gave explanations more or less heterodox; and when Meletius in his turn came to speak, and avowed his adherence to the orthodox doctrine, a scene of great excitement ensued, the people applauding, and the Arians among the clergy, especially the archdeacon, attempting to stop his mouth. Determined now to get rid of him, the Arians charged him with Sabellianism, and persuaded the emperor to depose him and banish him, apparently on a charge either of perjury or of having violated the discipline of the church, to his native country, Melitene, while Euzoius was appointed bishop of Antioch in his room (A. D. 361). This step led to an immediate and extensive schism: the orthodox party broke off from the communion of the Arians, and met in the church of the Apostles, in what was called the old town of Antioch. There had been a previous secession of the more zealous part of the orthodox on occasion of the deposition of Eustathius (A. D. 331), but the two seceding bodies remained separate, the Eustathians objecting that Meletius had been ordained by Arians. On the accession of the emperor Julian Meletius returned to Antioch (A. D. 362), and the most earnest endeavours were made to reconcile the two sections of the orthodox party: but though the death of Eustathius seemed to present a fair opportunity for such reconciliation, all the efforts made were frustrated by the intemperate zeal of Lucifer of Cagliari [LUCIFER], who ordained Paulinus bishop of the Eustathians. Meanwhile, the Arians appear to have retained possession of most of the churches, the orthodox having one or two assigned for their use, of which, however, on the accession of the emperor Valens, they were deprived, and Meletius was again (A. D. 365?) banished from the city. According to Tillemont, who grounds his assertion on two passages of Gregory Nyssen (ibid.), Meletius was twice banished under Valens, or three times in all, which supposes a return from his first banishment under that prince. Gregory's assertion, however, is not corroborated by any of the ecclesiastical historians; and we have no means of determining the dates of Meletius's return and subsequent exile, if they really took place. Tillemont thinks he was recalled in A. D. 367 at latest, and places his last banishment in A. D. 371. During his exile his party were directed by Flavian and Diodorus. [FLAVIANUS, No. 1; DIODORUS, No. 3.] He was recalled on the death of Valens A. D. 378, but the edict of Gratian, which recalled all those who were in exile, allowed the Arians (who had chosen Dorotheus their bishop in the room of Euzoius, now deceased) to retain the churches which they occupied; however they were after a time delivered up to Meletius, who again manifested his anxiety to heal the schism between his own party and the Eustathians; but his equitable offers were rejected by his more tenacious rival Paulinus. In A. D. 381 Meletius was at Constantinople at the second general council, and died in that city during its session. His body was conveyed with great honour to Antioch, and deposited close to the tomb of the martyr Babylas. His funeral oration, pronounced by Gregory Nyssen, is extant. There is no reason to doubt the truth of the encomiums bestowed on the gentleness of his temper and general kindness of his disposition: that these very qualities, combined perhaps with indifference to the points in dispute, rendered him more pliant in the earlier part of his life than was consistent with strict integrity, at least with consistency. But from the time of his elevation to the see of Antioch, there is no need to doubt his consistent adherence to what he judged to be the truth. In the Western church, indeed, which fraternized with the ultra party of the Eustathians, his reputation was lower: he was regarded as an Arian, and it was long before the imputation was removed. A short piece, ascribed to Athanasius, and published with his works (vol. ii. p. 30, ed. Benedict.), but the genuineness of which is very doubtful, charges him with hypocrisy. He enjoyed the friendship of Basil and other leading men of the orthodox party. Epiphanius has spoken favourably of him, but Jerome is less favourable, owing, probably, to his connection with Paulinus. A part of the first sermon preached by Meletius at Antioch has been preserved by Epiphanius, and is given in the Bibliotheca Patrum of Galland, vol. v. A synodical epistle to the emperor Jovian, given by Socrates (H. E. iii. 25), and Sozomen (H. E. vi. 4), and reprinted in the Concilia, vol. i. col. 741, ed. Hardouin, and in the Bibliotheca of Galland, vol. v., may perhaps be ascribed to him. The Greek Church honours his memory on February the 12th, and the Latin Church at last received him into the calendar on the same day.

Meletius was succeeded in the see of Antioch by Flavian [FLAVIANUS, No. 1], under whom the Eustathian schism was at length healed, and the suppression of the Arians under Theodosius the Great restored for a while the unity of the see. (Socrates, H. E. ii. 43, 44, iii. 6, 9, iv. 2, v. 3, 5, 9; Sozomen, H. E. iv. 25, 28, v. 12, 13, vi. 7, vii. 3, 7, 8, 10; Theodoret. *H. 2. IATROSOPHISTA. [No. 6.]

3. Of LYCOPOLIS, a schismatical bishop of the third and fourth centuries. There is a remarkable discrepancy in the accounts given of this person. According to Athanasius, whose contests with the Meletians render his testimony less trustworthy, Meletius, who was bishop of Lycopolis in Upper Egypt at the time of the persecution under Diocletian and his successors, yielded to fear and sacrificed to idols; and being subsequently deposed, on this and other charges, in a synod, over which Petrus or Peter, bishop of Alexandria, presided, determined to separate from the church, and to constitute with his followers a separate community. Epiphanius, on the other hand, relates that both Peter and Meletius being in confinement for the faith, differed concerning the treatment to be used toward those who, after renouncing their Christian profession, became penitent and wished to be restored to the communion of the Church. He states that Peter, who was willing to receive them, was opposed by Meletius, who was next to Peter in influence, and had, in fact, the larger number of followers on this question: and the schism which arose on this account he represents as owing rather to the former than to the latter. Although the ecclesiastical historians Socrates and Theodoret have adopted, wholly or partially, the account of Athanasius, the statement of Epiphanius is the more probable. Had Meletius been convicted, as Athanasius states, it is hardly probable that either he would have been able to raise and keep up so formidable a schism, or that the Council of Nice (which left him the title of bishop, though it deprived him of the power to ordain) would have dealt so leniently with him. The Council allowed those whom he had ordained to retain the priestly office, on condition of re-ordination, and of their yielding precedence to those whose first ordination had been regular. The schism begun in prison was continued in the mines of Phaenon, in Arabia Petraea, to which Meletius and others were banished, and after their release. Meletius ordained bishops, presbyters, and deacons, and kept his followers a distinct body, under the title of "the Church of the Martyrs." He even extended his sect into Palestine, where he visited Jerusalem, Eleutheropolis, and Gaza, and ordained many in those towns to the priesthood. In this state matters remained till the Nicene Council (A. D. 325), the sentence of which has been already mentioned. The synodical letter to the Egyptian clergy, which notifies the sentence, gives no information as to the origin of the schism: it describes, indeed, Meletius as disorderly, hasty, and headstrong; characteristics more in harmony with the conduct ascribed to him by Epiphanius, than with the charges of Athanasius.

There is no dispute that the theological sentiments of the Meletians were at first what is deemed orthodox; and, according to Epiphanius, Meletius was the first to detect the heretical teachings of Arius, and to report them to Alexander, bishop of Alexandria. Meletius died very shortly after the Council of Nice, for Alexander, who himself only survived the council about five months, lived long enough to persecute the followers of Meletius after their leader's death, because, deeming Meletius ill-treated, they would not accept the terms of reconciliation offered by the Council. The schism continued under the leadership of John Arcaph, whom Meletius had appointed to succeed him [JOANNES, No. 16]; and the Meletians co-operated with the Arians in their hostility to Athanasius [ATHANASIUS]; an alliance more conducive to the gratification of their revenge than to the maintenance of their orthodoxy. (Athanas. Apol. contra Arian. c. 59; Epiphan. Haeres. lxviii. 1—5; Socrat. H. E. i. 6, 9; Sozomen, H. E. i. 24, ii. 21; Theodoret. H. E. i. 9; Tillemont, Mémoires, vol. v. p. 453, &c.; Le Quien, Oriens Christian. vol. ii. col. 598.)

7. Of MOPSUESTIA, an ardent supporter of the unfortunate Nestorius [NESTORIUS], of Constantinople. He succeeded the celebrated Theodore as bishop of Mopsuestia, in Cilicia [THEODORUS MOPSUESTENUS], probably in or about A. D. 427. He supported John, patriarch of Antioch [JOANNES, No. 9], in his opposition to the hasty and unjust deposition of Nestorius by Cyril of Alexandria and his party [CYRILLUS, ST. of ALEXANDRIA], in the third general (Ephesian) council, A. D. 431: and when John was induced to come to terms with Cyril and to join in condemning Nestorius, Meletius persisted in supporting the cause of the deposed patriarch, and refused to hold communion with either Cyril or John, denouncing such communion as diabolical; and when the latter sent a conciliatory letter to him, he threw it in the messenger's face. Being forcibly expelled from his see by the emperor Theodosius II., at the desire of

John, on account of his pertinacious support of Nestorius, he induced many persons to secede from the church, and, forming them into separate communities, continued to exercise the priestly office among them. This being regarded as an aggravation of his offence, he was banished by the emperor's order, issued at John's instigation, to Melitene in Armenia Minor, and placed in the charge of Acacius, bishop of that city, from whom he endured much hard usage. In this exile Meletius died, retaining his zeal for the cause of Nestorius till the last. Various epistles of Meletius were published in a Latin version, in the Ad Ephesinum Concilium Variorum Patrum Epistolae of Christianus Lupus of Ypres, 4to. Louvain, 1682; and were re-published by Baluzius, in his Nova Concilior. Collectio, by Garnier, in his Auctarium Theodoreti, fol. Paris, 1684, and by Schulze, in his edition of Theodoret, 5 vols. 8vo., Halae, 1769—1774. From these letters of Meletius, and from other letters in the same collection, the foregoing facts of his history are derived. The letters of Meletius are contained in Cap. seu Epist. 92 (not 82, as Cave has it), 119, 124, 141, 145, 155, 158, 163, 171, 174, and 177, in the work of Lupus. The memorandum of his death is in Cap. 190. In the editions of Garnier and Schulze they are Epist. 76, 101, 105, 121, 125, 133, 136, 141, 149, 152, 155. The memorandum of Meletius' death is inserted after Epist. 164. (Cave, Hist. Litt. ad ann. 428, vol. i. p. 414; Le Quien, Oriens Christianus, vol. ii. col. 891; Fabric. Biblioth. Graec. vol. ix. p. 305, vol. x. p. 348; Tillemont, Mémoires, vol. xiv.)

8. PHILOSOPHUS. [See below.]

9. SCRIPTOR DE AZYMIS. There are extant two short treatises, Περὶ τῶν ἀζύμων, De Azymis, one of them being a compendium or abridgment of the other, which in the MSS. are ascribed to Joannes Damascenus [DAMASCENUS], and are consequently inserted by Le Quien in his edition of the works of that father (Opera Damasceni, fol. Paris, 1712, vol. i. p. 647.) But Le Quien has observed that they are not his: they distinctly deny the general tradition of the fathers, that our Lord celebrated the passover with his disciples the day before the regular time, which tradition Damascenus certainly held. But this is not the only evidence; an anonymous preface to the larger tract states, that it was written by "one Meletius, a pious man (θεοφόρος), and a diligent student of the Scriptures," and was addressed to one Syncellus, who had asked his opinion on the subject. Of the time or place where this Meletius lived nothing is known. (Fabric. Biblioth. Graec. vol. ix. p. 307.)

10. Of TIBERIOPOLIS. [See below.] [J. C. M.]

MELE'TIUS (Μελέτιος), the author of a short Greek work, entitled Περὶ τῆς τοῦ Ἀνθρώπου Κατασκευῆς, De Natura (or Fabrica) Hominis. He appears from the inscription at the beginning of the work to have been a Christian and a monk, and to have belonged to the city of Tiberiopolis in Phrygia Magna. The time at which he lived is unknown, but he probably cannot be placed earlier than the sixth or seventh century after Christ. His work (the subject-matter of which is sufficiently indicated by the title) is interesting, and evidently written by a religious man, but is of no particular value in a physiological point of view. It was first published in a Latin translation by Nicolaus Petreius, Venet. 1552, 4to. The Greek text, though existing in MS. in several European libraries, remained unpublished till 1836, when Dr. Cramer inserted it in the third volume of his "Anecdota Graeca," 8vo. Oxon. It is badly edited, and the text contains numerous errors, some arising from the editor's evident ignorance of the subject-matter of the treatise, and others apparently from haste and carelessness. The beginning of the work was published by Fred. Ritschel, Vratislav. 4to. 1837; and there is an essay by L. E. Bachmann, entitled "Quaestio de Meletio Graece inedito, ejusque Latino Interprete Nic. Petreio," Rostoch. 4to. 1833.

It is uncertain whether this is the same person who wrote a commentary on the Aphorisms of Hippocrates, some extracts from which are inserted by Dietz in the second volume of his "Scholia in Hippocratem et Galenum," Regim. Pruss. 8vo. 1834. It is indeed doubtful whether the commentary is the work of Meletius or Stephanus Atheniensis.

One of the letters of St. Basil, dated A. D. 375 (Epist. 193, vol. iii. p. 285, ed. Bened.) is addressed to a physician named Meletius, who is called by the title Archiater, but of whom no particulars are known. [W. A. G.]

MELE'TUS (Μέλητος), an obscure tragic poet, but notorious as one of the accusers of Socrates, was an Athenian, of the Pitthean demus (Plat. Euthyph. p. 2, b.). At the time of the accusation of Socrates, he is spoken of by Plato (l. c.) as young and obscure (comp. Apol. p. 25, d., 26, e.). But the fact that he was mentioned by Aristophanes in the Γεωργοί, gives rise to a difficulty (Schol. in Plat. Apol. p. 330, Bekker). For the Γεωργοὶ was evidently acted during the life of Nicias (Plut. Nic. 8); and not only so, but the passage cited by Plutarch seems to have been rightly understood by him, as referring to the affair of Sphacteria, and on this and other grounds Meineke assigns the play to the year B. C. 425 (Frag. Com. Graec. vol. ii. pp. 983—985). Supposing Meletus to have been only twenty at this time, he must have been upwards of forty-five when he accused Socrates. Meineke attempts to get rid of the difficulty, by a slight change in the text of the scholiast, which would then imply that Meletus was still a boy when alluded to in the Γεωργοί (Frag. Com. Graec. vol. ii. p. 993). At all events, if the Meletus thus referred to was really the same person as the accuser of Socrates, he must at the latter period have been between thirty and forty; and in that case he might still have been called νέος by Socrates. In fact, though the attack upon Socrates was his first essay as a public politician, and was indeed made, as Plato insinuates, in order to bring himself into some notoriety (Euthyph. pp. 2, 3, Apol. p. 25, d.), yet it is clear from Plato himself that Meletus was already known as a poet; for he imputes to Meletus, as another motive for the accusation, the resentment felt by him and the other poets for the strictures made upon them by Socrates (Apol. p. 23, e.; Diog. Laërt. ii. 39). Besides, when Plato calls him ἀγνώς, he perhaps refers rather to his being a man of no merit than to his being altogether unknown in the city. With respect to his tragedies, we are informed by the scholiast on Plato (l. c.), on the authority of Aristotle in the Didascaliae, that Meletus brought out his Οἰδιπόδεια in the same year in which Aristophanes brought out his Πελαργοί, but we know nothing of the date of that play. His Scolia are referred to in the Frogs (1302), B. C. 405; and in the Γηρυτάδης, which was probably acted a few years after the Frogs, to which it was similar in its argument, Aristophanes makes him one of the ambassadors sent by the poets on earth to the poets in Hades (Athen. xii. p. 551). He was also ridiculed by Sannyrion in his Γέλως (Athen. l. c.); and his erotic poetry was referred to by Epicrates in his Ἀντιλαΐς (Athen. xiii. p. 605, e.). Suidas (s. v.) calls him an orator as well as a poet, no doubt on account of his accusation of Socrates, and perhaps of Andocides. (See below.)

The character of Meletus, as drawn by Plato and Aristophanes and their scholiasts, is that of a bad, frigid, and licentious poet, and a worthless and profligate man,—vain, silly, effeminate, and grossly sensual. Plato makes Socrates call him τετανότριχα καὶ οὐ πάνυ εὐγένειον, ἐπίγρυπον δέ. Aristophanes, in the Γηρυτάδης, ridiculed him for his excessive thinness, and light weight, and his natural tendency to the infernal regions, where, as Thirlwall remarks, "to understand the point of the sarcasm, we must compare the balancing scene in the Frogs, and the remarks of Aeschylus, 867, ὅτι ἡ ποίησις οὐχὶ συντέθνηκέ μοι, τούτῳ δὲ συντέθνηκεν" (Hist. of Greece, vol. iv. p. 275, note). Aristophanes again, in the Πελαργοί, calls him the son of Laïus, a designation which not only contains an allusion to his Oedipodeia, but is also meant to insinuate a charge of the grossest vice (see Meineke, ad loc., Frag. Com. Graec. vol. ii. pp. 1126, 1127). Misled by this passage, Suidas (s. v. Μέλιτος) makes him a son of Laïus (as Clinton has corrected the word from Λάρου); the real name of his father was Meletus, as we learn from Diogenes Laërtius, on the authority of Phavorinus, in whose time the deed of accusation against Socrates was still preserved in the Metroum at Athens (Diog. Laërt. ii. 40). The epithet Θρᾷξ, applied to him by Aristophanes, in the fragment just referred to, probably alludes to the foreign origin of his family.

In the accusation of Socrates it was Meletus who laid the indictment before the Archon Basileus; but in reality he was the most insignificant of the accusers; and according to one account he was bribed by Anytus and Lycon to take part in the affair. (Liban. Apol. pp. 11, 51, ed. Reiske.) Soon after the death of Socrates, the Athenians repented of their injustice, and Meletus was stoned to death as one of the authors of their folly. (Diog. Laërt. ii. 43; Diod. xiv. 37; Suid. s. v. Μέλιτος: it may here be observed that the article in Suidas is a mass of confusion; there is evidently in it a mixing up of the lives of two different persons, Melissus of Samos and Meletus.)

There is room for some doubt whether the accuser of Socrates was the same person as the Meletus who was charged with participation in the profanation of the mysteries, and in the mutilation of the Hermae, B. C. 415, and who was an active partizan of the Thirty Tyrants, both as the executioner of their sentence of death upon Leon of Salamis, and as an emissary to Lacedaemon on their behalf, and who was afterwards one of the accusers of Andocides in the case respecting the mysteries, B. C. 400 (Andoc. de Myst. pp. 7, 18, 46, Reiske; Xen. Hell. ii. 4. § 36): but as all this is perfectly consistent with the indications we have noticed above respecting the age of Meletus, there seems no good ground for distinguishing the two persons, though they cannot be identified with absolute certainty. (Droysen, Rhein. Mus. vol. iii. p. 190.)

Respecting the form of the name, Μέλητος is almost universally adopted by modern scholars, though Welcker defends Μέλιτος. For the arguments on both sides, and respecting Meletus in general, see Clinton, F. H. vol. ii. p. xxxvi.; Welcker, die Griech. Trag. pp. 872—874; Kayser, Hist. Crit. Trag. Graec. pp. 284, 285. Plato makes Socrates pun upon the name several times in the Apology (p. 24, c. d., 25, c., 26, d.). [P. S.]

MELIA (Μελία), a nymph, a daughter of Oceanus, became by Inachus the mother of Phoroneus and Aegialeus or Pegeus. (Apollod. ii. 1. § 1; Schol. ad Eurip. Orest. 920.) By Seilenus she became the mother of the centaur, Pholus (Apollod. ii. 5. § 4), and by Poseidon of Amycus. (Apollon. Rhod. ii. 4; Serv. ad Aen. v. 373.) She was carried off by Apollo, and became by him the mother of Ismenius (some call her own brother Ismenus, Schol. ad Pind. Pyth. xi. 5; Tzetz. ad Lyc. 1211), and of the seer Tenerus. She was worshipped in the Apollinian sanctuary, the Ismenium, near Thebes. (Paus. ix. 10. § 5, 26, § 1; Strab. p. 413.)

In the plural form Μελίαι or Μελιάδες is the name of the nymphs, who, along with the Gigantes and Erinnyes, sprang from the drops of blood that fell from Uranus, and which were received by Gaea. (Hes. Theog. 187.) The nymphs that nursed Zeus are likewise called Meliae. (Callim. Hymn. in Jov. 47; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1963.) [L. S.]

MELIADES (Μελιάδες), the same as the Maliades, or nymphs of the district of Melis, near Trachis. (Soph. Philoct. 715.) [L. S.]

MELIBOEA (Μελίβοια.) 1. A daughter of Oceanus, and, by Pelasgus, the mother of Lycaon. (Apollod. iii. 8. § 1.)

2. A daughter of Magnes, who called the town of Meliboea, in Magnesia, after her. (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 338.)

3. One of the daughters of Niobe. (Apollod. iii. 5. § 6; Paus. ii. 21, § 10.)

4. An Ephesian maiden who was in love with a youth of the name of Alexis. As, however, her parents had destined her for another man, Alexis quitted his native place; and on the day of her marriage Meliboea threw herself from the roof of her house. But she was not injured, and escaped to a boat which was lying near, and the ropes of which became untied of their own accord. The boat then carried her to her beloved Alexis. The united happy lovers now dedicated a sanctuary to Aphrodite, surnamed Automate and Epidaetia (Serv. ad Aen. i. 724.)

5. The mother of Ajax, and wife of Theseus. (Athen. xiii. p. 557.)

Meliboea occurs also as a surname of Persephone. (Lasus, ap. Athen. xiv. p. 624.) [L. S.]

MELICERTES (Μελικέρτης), a son of Athamas and Ino, was metamorphosed into a marine divinity, under the name of Palaemon. (Apollod. i. 9. § 5; comp. ATHAMAS, PALAEMON, and LEUCOTHEA.) [L. S.]

MELINAEA (Μελιναία), a surname of Aphrodite, which she derived from the Argive town Meline. (Steph. Byz. s. v.; Lycoph. 403.) [L. S.]

MELINE (Μελίνη), a daughter of Thespius, became by Heracles the mother of Laomedon. (Apollod. ii. 7. § 8.) [L. S.]

MELINNO (Μελιννώ), a lyric poetess, the author of an ode on Rome in five Sapphic stanzas, which is commonly ascribed to Erinna of Lesbos. Nothing is known of her with certainty, except what the ode itself shows, namely, that she lived in the flourishing period of the Roman empire. The ode is printed, with an admirable essay upon it, by Welcker, in Creuzer's Meletemata, 1817, p. 1, and in Welcker's Kleine Schriften, vol. ii. p. 160. [P. S.]

MELISANDER (Μελίσανδρος), of Miletus, is said to have written an account of the battles of the Lapithae and Centaurs, and is classed by Aelian with the poets Oroebantius and Dares, who are stated to have been the predecessors of Homer. (Aelian, V. H. xi. 2.)

MELISSA (Μέλισσα), that is, the soother or propitiator (from μελίσσω or μειλίσσω), occurs, 1. As the name of a nymph who discovered and taught the use of honey, and from whom bees were believed to have received their name, μέλισσαι. (Schol. ad Pind. Pyth. iv. 104.) Bees seem to have been the symbol of nymphs, whence they themselves are sometimes called Melissae, and are sometimes said to have been metamorphosed into bees. (Schol. ad Pind. l. c.; Hesych. s. v. Ὀροδεμνίαδες; Columell. ix. 2; Schol. ad Theocrit. iii. 13.) Hence also nymphs in the form of bees are said to have guided the colonists that went to Ephesus (Philostr. Icon. ii. 8); and the nymphs who nursed the infant Zeus are called Melissae, or Meliae. (Anton. Lib. 19; Callim. Hymn. in Jov. 47; Apollod. i. 1. § 3.)

2. From the nymphs the name Melissae was transferred to priestesses in general, but more especially to those of Demeter (Schol. ad Pind. l. c.; Callim. Hymn. in Apoll. 110; Hesych. s. v. Μέλισσαι), Persephone (Schol. ad Theocrit. xv. 94), and to the priestess of the Delphian Apollo. (Pind. Pyth. iv. 106; Schol. ad Eurip. Hippol. 72.) According to the scholiasts of Pindar and Euripides, priestesses received the name Melissae from the purity of the bee. Comp. a story about the origin of bees in Serv. ad Aen. i. 434.

3. Melissa is also a surname of Artemis as the goddess of the moon, in which capacity she alleviates the suffering of women in childbed. (Porphyr. De Antr. Nymph. p. 261.)

4. A daughter of Epidamnus, became by Poseidon the mother of Dyrrhachius, from whom the town of Dyrrhachium derived its name. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Δυρράχιον.) [L. S.]

MELISSA (Μέλισσα), the wife of Periander, tyrant of Corinth. She was the daughter of Procles, tyrant of Epidaurus, and Eristheneia; and, according to Diogenes Laërtius (i. 94), was called Lysis before her marriage, and received the name Melissa from Periander. She bore two sons, Cypselus and Lycophron, and her husband was passionately attached to her; but in a fit of jealousy, produced by the slanderous tales of some courtesans, he killed her in a barbarous manner. [PERIANDER.] From the story of the appearance of the shade of Melissa to the ambassadors sent by Periander to consult the oracle of the dead among the Thesprotians, and the mode in which Periander sought to appease her, we may gather that he sought to still his remorse by the rites of a dark and barbarous superstition: he took a horrible revenge on those who had instigated him to the murder of his wife. (Herod. iii. 50, v. 92; Athen. xiii. p. 589, f.; Diog. Laërt. i. 94; Plut. Sept. Sap. Conv. p. 146.) Pausanias (ii. 28. § 8) mentions a monument in memory of Melissa, near Epidaurus. [C. P. M.]

MELISSE'NUS GREGO'RIUS. [MAMMAS.]

MELISSEUS (Μελισσεύς or Μέλισσος), an ancient king of Crete, who, by Amalthea, became the father of the nymphs Adrastea and Ida, to whom Rhea entrusted the infant Zeus to be brought up. (Apollod. i. 1. § 6; Hygin. Poet. Astr. ii. 13.) Other accounts call the daughters of this king Melissa and Amalthea. (Lactant. i. 22.) [L. S.]

MELISSEUS (Μελισσεύς), a Greek writer of uncertain date, wrote a work entitled Δελφικά. (Tzetz. Chil. vi. 90; Schol. in Hesiod. p. 29, ed. Oxon.)

MELISSUS (Μέλισσος), of Samos, a Greek philosopher, the son of Ithagenes, is said to have been likewise distinguished as a statesman, and to have commanded the fleet which first conquered a part of the Athenian armament which blockaded the island under the command of Pericles; but it is stated afterwards that he was conquered by Pericles, in Ol. 85. Thucydides does not mention Melissus. (Plut. Pericl. 26, 27; comp. Themist. 2, adv. Colot. 32.) This account is supported by the statement of Apollodorus, that Melissus flourished in Ol. 84; but it is irreconcilable with the account which represents him as personally connected with Heracleitus, who lived at a much earlier period. (Diog. Laërt. ix. 24.) There seems to be less reason for doubting that he was a disciple of Parmenides, and it is quite certain that he was acquainted with the doctrines of the Eleatics, which in fact he completely adopted, though he took up the letter rather than the spirit of their system, as is proved by the fragments of his work, which was written in prose, and in the Ionic dialect. They have been preserved by Simplicius, and their genuineness is attested by the work of Aristotle or Theophrastus. He proves that the coming into existence and the annihilation of any thing that exists are both inconceivable, whether it be supposed that it arises from a non-existence or from some existence. But even here Melissus is unable to maintain the pure idea of existence, which we find in Parmenides, for he denies that existence, and still more absolute existence (τὸ ἁπλῶς ἐόν) can arise from non-existence. Parmenides could not have admitted the difference of degrees of existence, which is here assumed, any more than the parts of existence which Melissus assumes as possible, or at least as not absolutely opposed to the idea, since he thinks it necessary to prove that no part of existence could have come into existence any more than existence itself. (Simplic. in Aristot. Phys. f. 22, b; Aristot. De Xenoph. Gorg. et Meliss. 1.) The inference of Melissus which now follows, that things which have neither beginning nor end must be infinite and unlimited in magnitude, and accordingly one (ibid. and Simplic. f. 23, b. fragm. 2 and 7—10; in Brandis, Commentat. Eleatic.), is manifestly erroneous, since, without even attempting a mediation, he assumes infinitude of space in things which have no beginning or end in time. The simplicity of existence he infers from its unity, and he appears to have endeavoured very minutely to show that no change could take place either in quantity or quality, and neither internal nor external motion. (Fr. 4. 11, &c.; Aristot. l. c.) From this he then argued backwards, and assumed the impossibility of finding existence in the actual world. (Simplic. De Coelo, f. 138, and the corrected text of the Schol. in Aristot. ed. Brandis, p. 509, b.) He thus made the first, though weak attempt, which was afterwards carried out by Zeno with far more acuteness and sagacity, to prove that the foundations of all knowledge derived from experience are in themselves contradictory, and that the reality of the actual world is inconceivable. The fragments of Melissus are collected by Ch. A. Brandis, Commentationum Eleaticarum, pars prima, p. 185, &c., and by Mullach, Aristotelis de Melisso, Xenophane, et Gorgia Disputationes, cum Eleaticorum philosophorum fragmentis, &c., Berol. 1846. [L. S.]

MELISSUS (Μέλισσος). 1. A Theban, the son of Telesiades, of the family of the Cleonymidae, who conquered in the chariot race at the Nemean games, and in the pancratium at the Isthmian games. The dates of his victories are uncertain. Pindar's third Isthmian ode is written to celebrate the latter of his victories.

2. A Greek writer, a native of Euboea, who wrote a work explaining various mythological stories by the facts of natural history. (Fulgent. ii. 16.) He is probably the same as the Melissus referred to by Palaephates (Proëm.) and by Servius (ad Virg. Aen. iv. 146).

3. A Roman writer mentioned by Pliny among those from whom he drew materials for his 7th, 9th, 10th, 11th, and 35th books. [C. P. M.]

MELISSUS, AE'LIUS, a distinguished Roman grammarian mentioned by Aulus Gellius (xviii. 6). He was the author of a work, De loquendi Proprietate. [C. P. M.]

MELISSUS, C., MAECE'NAS, a native of Spoletium. He was of free birth, but was exposed in his infancy, and presented by the person who found and reared him to Maecenas. Though his mother declared his real origin, he refused to leave Maecenas. He was, however, speedily manumitted, and obtained the favour of Augustus, who commissioned him to arrange the library in the portico of Octavia. At an advanced period of life he commenced the composition of a collection of jokes and witticisms. He also wrote plays of a novel sort, which he called Trabeatae. (Suet. de Illustr. Gramm. 21; Ov. ex Pont. iv. 16. 30.) Suetonius, in the passage already referred to, calls him C. Melissus, but in another place (de Illustr. Gramm. 3), he terms him Lenaeus Melissus, for which it has been conjectured we ought to read Cilnius Melissus. By Pliny (H. N. xxviii. 6. s. 17) he is called Maecenas Melissus. [C. P. M.]

ME'LITE (Μελίτη). 1. A nymph, one of the Nereides, a daughter of Nereus and Doris. (Hom. Il. xviii. 42; Hes. Theog. 246; Apollod. i. 2. § 7; Virg. Aen. v. 825.)

2. A Naias, a daughter of the river-god Aegaeus, who became, by Heracles, the mother of Hyllus, in the country of the Phaeacians. (Apollon. Rhod. iv. 538.)

3. A daughter of Erasinus of Argos, was visited by Britomartis. [BRITOMARTIS.] [L. S.]

MELITEUS (Μελιτεύς), a son of Zeus by an Othreïan nymph. He was exposed by his mother in a wood, lest Hera should discover the affair. But Zeus took care that he was reared by bees, and the boy grew up. At length he was found by his step-brother Phagous, who took him with him, and gave him the name of Meliteus, from his having been reared by bees. The town of Melite in Phthia was said to have been built by him. (Anton. Lib. 13.) [L. S.]

ME'LITO (Μελίτων), a Christian writer of considerable eminence, who lived in the second century. He was contemporary with Hegesippus, Dionysius of Corinth, Apollinaris of Hierapolis, and others (Euseb. H. E. iv. 21). Of his personal history very little is known. The epithets Asianus and Sardensis, given to him by Jerome (De Vir. Illustr. c. 24), indicate the place of his episcopal charge, not, so far as appears, of his birth. Polycrates of Ephesus, a writer of somewhat later date, in his letter to Victor, bishop of Rome (apud Euseb. H. E. v. 24), calls him "Eunuchus," but it is not clear whether this term is to be understood literally, or is simply expressive of his inviolate chastity. At what time he became bishop of Sardes is not known: he probably was bishop when the controversy arose at Laodiceia respecting the observance of Easter, which occasioned him to write his book on the subject (Clem. Alexandr. apud Euseb. H. E. iv. 26). This controversy arose when Servilius Paulus was proconsul of Asia, and at the time of the martyrdom of Sagaris, who is thought to have suffered in the persecution under M. Aurelius. During the same persecution, Melito composed his Apologia, which, as it was addressed to Aurelius alone, appears to have been written after the death of Lucius Verus, in A. D. 169. The Chronicon of Eusebius places its presentation in A. D. 169—170: it must have been written then or between those years and A. D. 180, in which Aurelius himself died [AURELIUS MARCUS]. The Chronicon Paschale seems to ascribe to Melito two apologies, one presented to Aurelius and Verus, A. D. 165, the other to Aurelius alone, A. D. 169. Tillemont is disposed to place the Apology as late as the year 175; Pearson and Dodwell between 170 and 175; and Basnage (Annales Politic. Eccles.) and Lardner as late as A. D. 177. The time, place, and manner of Melito's death are not accurately and certainly known: from the silence of Polycrates (apud Euseb. l. c.) it may be inferred that he was not a Martyr; the place of his death may be conjectured from that of his interment, which Polycrates states to have been Sardes; and as for the date of it, Polycrates, whose letter to Victor was apparently written about 196, speaks of it in a way which indicates that it was not then recent.

The works of Melito are enumerated by Eusebius (H. E. iv. 26) as follows:—1. Περὶ τοῦ πάσχα δύο, De Pascha Libri duo. 2. Περὶ πολιτείας καὶ προφητῶν, De Recta Vivendi Ratione (s. de Recta Conversatione) et de Prophetis. Some interpreters, including Rufinus, have inaccurately rendered this passage, as if it spoke of two distinct works. Jerome (De Viris Illustr. c. 24) gives the title of this work in Latin, De Vita Prophetarum, which his translator, the so-called Sophronius, re-translates into Greek, Περὶ βίου προφητικοῦ, giving reason to think that the original text of Eusebius was Περὶ τῆς πολιτείας τῶν προφητῶν; but all the MSS. and the text of Nicephorus Callisti support the common reading. 3. Περὶ ἐκκλησίας, De Ecclesia. 4. Περὶ κυριακῆς, De Die Dominica. 5. Περὶ φύσεως ἀνθρώπου, De Natura Hominis. Rufinus appears to have read Περὶ πίστεως ἀνθρώπου, for he renders it De Fide Hominis. 6. Περὶ πλάσεως, De Creatione, or according to Jerome, De Plasmate and according to Rufinus, De Figmento. Nicephorus Callisti, who, like Rufinus, read πίστεως in the title of No. 5, speaks of Nos. 5 and 6 as one work, Περὶ πίστεως ἀνθρώπου καὶ πλάσεως, De Fide Hominis et Creatione. 7. Περὶ ὑπακοῆς πίστεως αἰσθητηρίων, De Obedientia Sensuum Fidei praestanda s. De Obedientia Sensuum Fidei. Nicephorus Callisti speaks of two works, Περὶ ὑπακοῆς πίστεως, and Περὶ αἰσθητηρίων; and Jerome, in his catalogue of the works of Melito, enumerates consecutively De Sensibus and De Fide, which Sophronius renders Περὶ διανοίας and Περὶ τῶν πιστῶν. Rufinus also gives two titles as of separate books, De Obedientia Fidei and De Sensibus, which two titles represent the one title given in the present text of Eusebius. 8. Περὶ ψυχῆς καὶ σώματος ἢ νοός, De Anima et Corpore seu de Mente: or, as Rufinus renders it, De Anima et Corpore et Mente. Jerome has only De Anima et Corpore. 9. Περὶ λουτροῦ, De Baptismate s. De Lavacro. One MS. of Eusebius, supported by Nicephorus Callisti, speaks of this work as a portion of No. 8. 10. Περὶ ἀληθείας, De Veritate. 11. Περὶ κτίσεως καὶ γενέσεως Χριστοῦ, De Creatione et Generatione Christi. Some MSS. read πίστεως instead of κτίσεως; but this reading was probably introduced after the rise of the Arian controversy caused the word κτίσεως to be regarded as heterodox. Rufinus has De Fide (as if he had read Περὶ πίστεως instead of Περὶ κτίσεως) and De Generatione Christi as the titles of two separate books. Jerome has only De Generatione Christi, omitting to render the obnoxious word κτίσεως. 12. Περὶ προφητείας, De Prophetia. Jerome renders the title De Prophetia sua. Rufinus, who has De Prophetia ejus, connects this title by the conjunction et with the title of the latter work mentioned under No. 11, De Generatione Christi et de Prophetia ejus. It may be mentioned, in vindication of Jerome's version, that according to the testimony of Tertullian (in a work now lost, but which Jerome (l. c.) cites, and which was written after he became a Montanist), Melito was regarded by many persons (whether among the Montanists or the Catholics, is not clear) as a prophet. 13. Περὶ φιλοξενίας, De Philoxenia s. De Hospitalitate. 14. Ἡ κλείς, Clavis; of which we shall speak presently. 15. Περὶ τοῦ διαβόλου καὶ τῆς ἀποκαλύψεως Ἰωάννου, De Diabolo et de Apocalypsi Joannis. Both Rufinus and Jerome speak of two books, one De Diabolo, the other De Apocalypsi; they are perhaps right. 16. Περὶ ἐνσωμάτου Θεοῦ, De Deo Corpore induto. From a passage in Origen, quoted by Theodoret (Quaest. in Genesim, c. 20), Melito appears to have believed that God possessed a bodily form, and to have written in support of that doctrine. This work was probably the one referred to by Origen; and it is in vain that some modern critics have argued that it was written on the incarnation of Christ. Anastasius Sinaita, in his Ὁδηγός, Dux Viae adversus Acephalos, c. 13, has, indeed, quoted a passage from Melito's book, Περὶ σαρκώσεως Χριστοῦ, De Incarnatione Christi, but this appears to be a different work from the present, and is not mentioned by Eusebius. 17. Πρὸς Ἀντωνῖνον Βιβλίδιον, Libellus (sc. supplex) ad Antoninum. This was the Apologia or defence of Christianity already mentioned. 18. Ἐκλογαί, Eclogae, sc. ex Libris Vet. Testamenti, comprised, according to Jerome, in six books. This last work is not mentioned by Eusebius when enumerating the works of Melito, but he afterwards gives a quotation from it. (Euseb. H. E. iv. 26.) To this catalogue, furnished by Eusebius, we may add the following works on the authority of Anastasius Sinaita, who lived in the middle of the sixth century. 19. Περὶ σαρκώσεως Χριστοῦ, De Incarnatione Christi, consisting of at least three books, and directed, partly or wholly, against Marcion. (See above, No. 16.) 20. Λόγος εἰς τὸ πάθος, Oratio in Passionem. Besides these genuine writings of Melito, another has been ascribed to him, De Transitu Beatae Virginis, which is extant in Latin, and appears in most editions of the Bibliotheca Patrum, but it is generally allowed to be spurious. It is mentioned, but without the author's name, in the Decretum of Pope Gelasius I., in which it is placed among the spurious books; and is mentioned as extant, under the name of Melito, by the venerable Beda (Retractat. in Acta, cap. 8, Opera, vol. vi. col. 15, ed. Col. 1612), who describes it as a forgery, and points out its inconsistencies with the Scripture narratives.

The number of his genuine works sufficiently shows the industry of Melito, and their subjects indicate the variety of his attainments; and the eulogies of the most learned fathers, and their testimony of the high reputation which Melito enjoyed, make us regret that of all these writings only a few fragments have descended to our times. It is, however, to be observed that these eulogies are qualified by intimations of his gross error as to the Deity. The express declaration of Origen as to his belief that God had a bodily form is supported by the testimony of Gennadius of Massilia (Lib. Dogm. Eccles. c. 4). Modern writers seek in vain to exculpate him; and Tillemont, though unwilling to conclude positively that a writer so eminent could have held so gross an error, admits that, possibly, this imputation, or the ascription to him of the book De Transitu B. Virginis, may have prevented the church from honouring his memory by an appointed office. Modern Roman Catholics, as Bellarmin, Baronius, Halloix, Tillemont, Ceillier, &c., do not hesitate to give him the title of "Saint," and Tillemont pleads that they are in this only following the tradition of the Asiatic church.

The book published in French (12mo. 1662), under the title of Apocalypse de Meliton, was a satire against the monks.

The fragments of Melito's writings are as follows. We prefix to the notice of each the number of the work, from which it is taken, in the catalogue of the works of this father already given. 1. A fragment of the work De Pascha, preserved by Eusebius (H. E. iv. 26), showing when Melito wrote it. 17. Several fragments of the Apologia, all but one, preserved by Eusebius (l. c.), and the remaining one in the Chronicon Paschale (p. 259, ed. Paris, 207, ed. Venice, and vol. i. p. 483, ed. Bonn). 18. A very valuable passage preserved by Eusebius (l. c.) from the Eclogae, or rather from the introductory letter to the Eclogae addressed to "Onesimus, my brother" (whether his natural brother, or simply a fellow-Christian, is not clear), containing the earliest catalogue of "the books of the Old Covenant (or Testament)," given by a Christian writer. His catalogue agrees with the received canon of the Old Testament, except that it omits the books of Nehemiah and Esther; but Nehemiah is perhaps included under the title Esra or Esdras. None of the books of the Apocrypha are mentioned: the book of Wisdom has been thought to be included, but, according to the testimony of several ancient MSS. of Eusebius, supported by Rufinus and Nicephorus Callisti, the name is mentioned as a second title of the Book of Proverbs. From Melito's use of the term τὰ τῆς παλαιᾶς διαθήκης βιβλία, "Veteris Testamenti (s. Foederis) Libri," Lardner infers that the Christian Scriptures had been already collected into a volume under the title of The New Testament. 19. An extract from the work De Incarnatione Christi, preserved by Anastasius Sinaita (Hodeg. s. Dux Viae, c. 13), and exultingly appealed to by Cave (Hist. Litt.) as showing Melito's orthodoxy as to the two natures of Christ. The quotation, however, appears to be a summary of Melito's statements rather than an exact citation of his words. That Melito wrote in support of the two natures of Christ is affirmed by an anonymous writer cited by Eusebius (H. E. v. 28). It is further observable that Melito extends our Lord's ministry to three years, contrary to the more general opinion of his day. 20. A very brief extract from the Oratio in Passionem, "God suffered by the right hand of Israel," is also preserved by Anastasius (ibid. c. 12). Four extracts, perhaps from the Eclogae, in an ancient MS. Catena in Genesin.

These fragments have been collected by the diligence of successive writers. Those preserved by Eusebius, and the Chronicon Paschale, are given by Halloix, in his Illustr. Eccles. Orient. Script. Saec. II. together with three of the fragments from the Catena in Genesin. These fragments from the Catena were enlarged by the diligence of Woog (Dissert. II. de Melitone) and Nicephorus (Catena in Octateuch. 2 vols. fol. Lips. 1772—3). The passages from Anastasius Sinaita are added in the Biblioth. Patrum of Galland, but he omits those from the Catena. The whole of the fragments of Melito are given in the Reliquiae Sacrae of Routh (vol. i. p. 109, &c. 8vo. Oxon. 1814, &c.), in which the extracts from the Catena are fuller than in any previous edition. The notes to this edition are very valuable.

Labbe, in his book De Scriptorib. Ecclesiast. (vol. ii. p. 87), mentions a Latin version of the Clavis of Melito, as being in his time extant in MS. in the College of Clermont, at Paris. From a transcript of this MS. (collated with another), which is among the papers of Grabe, in the Bodleian Library at Oxford, it appears to be much interpolated, if indeed any part of it is genuine. It is a sort of vocabulary of the figurative terms of Scripture, somewhat similar to the De Formulis Spiritualis Intelligentiae of Eucherius of Lyon. Crusius, and after his death Woog, had intended to publish it; but it remains still in MS. Woog, in his Dissert. Secunda de Melitone, has given a syllabus of the Capita, and printed the first Caput as a specimen. In the MS. in the Clermont College the author is termed Melitus or Miletus. It is possible that the fourth extract, given by Routh from the Catena, is from the original Clavis of Melito. (Euseb. Hieronym. Chron. Paschale, ll. cc.; Halloix, l. c.; Cave, Hist. Litt. ad ann. 170, vol. i. p. 71, ed. MELITO'DES (Μελιτώδης), i. e. sweet as honey, occurs as a Euphemistic surname of Persephone. (Theocrit. xv. 94; Porphyr. Antr. Nymph. p. 261.) [L. S.]

ME'LIUS (Μήλιος), the name of two mythical personages, the one a son of Priam (Apollod. iii. 12. § 5), and the other is commonly called Melus. [MELUS.] [L. S.]

MELLA, ANNAEUS. [MELA.]

MELLOBAUDES or MALLOBAUDES, one of the Frankish kings of the time of the emperor Gratian. He becomes known to us first as an officer under the emperor Constantius in Gaul. (Amm. Marc. xiv. 11, xv. 5.) He was afterwards distinguished by his victory over Macrianus, king of the Alemanni, the date of which is unknown. (Amm. Marc. xxx. 3.) In the campaign of Gratian against the Alemanni, A. D. 377, he was Comes domesticorum, and shared with Nannienus the chief military command, and had a principal part in the victory of Argentaria. [GRATIANUS, No. 2.] Mellobaudes is sometimes identified, it is difficult to say whether correctly or not, with Merobaudes, an active officer of the emperors Valentinian I. and Gratian. It was by his advice that on the death of Valentinian I. his son of the same name, a child of four years old, was made colleague in the empire with his brother Gratian [GRATIANUS, No. 2], much to the dissatisfaction of the latter. (Amm. Marc. xxx. 10.) Merobaudes was twice consul, A. D. 377 and 383. In the latter year he commanded the army of Gratian against the usurper Maximus, and is commonly charged with betraying his master [GRATIANUS, No. 2], from which charge Tillemont (Hist. des Emp. vol. v. p. 723) defends him. At any rate he gained little by his treason, being soon put to death by Maximus. (Pacatus, Panegyric. ad Theodos.) [J. C. M.]

MELLO'NA or MELLO'NIA, a Roman divinity, who was believed to protect the honey, but is otherwise unknown. (Aug. De Civ. Dei, iv. 34; Arnob. adv. Gent. iv. 7, 8, 11.) [L. S.]

MELO'BIUS (Μηλόβιος), was one of the thirty tyrants established at Athens in B. C. 404, and was among those who were sent to the house of Lysias and Polemarchus to apprehend them and seize their property. (Xen. Hell. ii. 3. § 2; Lys. c. Erat. p. 121.) [E. E.]

MELO'BOSIS or MELO'BOTE (Μηλόβοσις or Μηλοβότη), a nymph, said to have been a daughter of Oceanus. (Hom. Hymn. in Cer. 420; Hes. Theog. 354; Paus. iv. 30. § 3; comp. DEMETER.) [L. S.]

MELPO'MENE (Μελπομένη), i. e. the singing (goddess), one of the nine Muses, became afterwards the Muse of Tragedy. (Hes. Theog. 77; comp. MUSAE.) [L. S.]

MELPO'MENUS (Μελπόμενος), or the singer, was a surname of Dionysus at Athens, and in the Attic demos of Acharne. (Paus. i. 2. § 4, 31. § 3.) [L. S.]

MELUS (Μῆλος). 1. A son of Manto, from whom the sanctuary of Apollo Malloeis in Lesbos was believed to have derived its name. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Μαλλόεις.)

2. A Delian who fled to Cinyras in Cyprus. Cinyras gave him his son Adonis as a companion, and his relative Peleia in marriage. The fruit of this marriage was a son, who was likewise called Melus, and whom he caused to be brought up in the sanctuary of Venus. On the death of Adonis, the elder Melus hung himself from grief, and his wife followed his example. Aphrodite then metamorphosed Melus into an apple (μῆλον), and his wife into a dove (πέλεια). The younger Melus was ordered by the goddess to return with a colony to Delos, where he founded the town of Delos. There the sheep were called from him μῆλα, because he first taught the inhabitants to shear them, and make cloth out of their wool. (Serv. ad Virg. Eclog. viii. 37.)

3. A son of the river-god Scamander. (Ptolem. Heph. ap. Phot. Bibl. 152.) [L. S.]

MEMBLIARUS (Μεμβλίαρος), a son of Poecilus, a Phoenician, and a relation of Cadmus. Cadmus left him at the head of a colony in the island of Thera or Calliste. (Herod. iv. 147; Paus. iii. 1. § 7.) [L. S.]

ME'MMIA, SULPI'CIA, one of the three wives of Alexander Severus. Her father was a man of consular rank; her grandfather's name was Catulus. (Lamprid. Alex. Sev. c. 20.) [W. R.]

ME'MMIA GENS, a plebeian house at Rome, whose members do not occur in history before B. C. 173. But from the epoch of the Jugurthine war, B. C. 111, they held frequent tribunates of the plebs; and in the age of Augustus they must have been a conspicuous branch of the later Roman nobility, since Virgil derives the Memmii from the Trojan Mnestheus (Aen. v. 117; comp. Tac. Ann. xiv. 47). The Memmia Gens bore the cognomens Gallus, Gemellus, Pollio, Quirinus, Regulus: all the members of the gens are given under MEMMIUS. [W. B. D.]

ME'MMIUS. 1. C. MEMMIUS C. F. QUIRINUS, was the aedile who first exhibited the Cerealia at Rome, as we learn from the annexed coin; but the name does not occur in any ancient writer. The obverse has C. MEMMI. C. F. QVIRINVS, with a head which may be that of Quirinus: the reverse has MEMMIVS. AED. CEREALIA. PREIMVS. FECIT, and represents Ceres sitting; a serpent at her feet; in her right hand, three ears of corn; in her left, a distaff. The date of the introduction of the Cerealia at Rome (Dionys. vii. 72; Liv. xxii. 56; Ovid. Fast. iv. 397), and consequently of the aedileship of Memmius Quirinus, is unknown, though it must have been previous to B. C. 216. (Liv. l. c.)

COIN OF C. MEMMIUS QUIRINUS.

2. C. MEMMIUS GALLUS, was praetor for the second time in B. C. 173. Sicily was his province, and he remained in it as propraetor during the next year. (Liv. xlii. 9, 10, 27.) The annexed coin of the Memmia gens, which bears on the reverse L. MEMMI. GAL., may have been struck by some relation of C. Memmius Gallus.

COIN OF L. MEMMIUS GALLUS.

3. T. MEMMIUS, was sent by the senate in B. C. 170 as its commissioner to hear the complaints of the provincials in Achaia and Macedonia against the Roman magistrates in those districts. (Liv. xliii. 5.)

4. Q. MEMMIUS, was legatus from the senate to the Jewish nation about B. C. 163—2. (Maccab. ii. 11.)

5. C. MEMMIUS, tribune of the plebs in B. C. 111, was an ardent opponent of the oligarchical party at Rome during the Jugurthine war. His exposure of its venality, incompetence, and traffic with Jugurtha first opened the command of the legions to the incorruptible Metellus Numidicus, and finally to the low-born but able C. Marius, and thus laid the foundation of ultimate victory and triumph. (Sall. Jug. 27, 30—34.) Among the nobles impeached by Memmius were L. Calpurnius Bestia [BESTIA, No. 1], and M. Aemilius Scaurus. (Cic. de Orat. ii. 70, pro Font. 7.) Memmius was slain with bludgeons by the mob of Saturninus and Glaucia, while a candidate for the consulship in B. C. 100. (Cic. in Cat. iv. 2; Appian, B. C. i. 32; Liv. Epit. 69; Flor. iii. 16.) Sallust (Jug. 31) gives a speech of Memmius which, however, is rather a dramatic than an authentic version of the original, and he had a higher opinion of the tribune's eloquence than Cicero (Brut. 36) altogether sanctions. In the "Life of Terence" (3), ascribed to Suetonius, is preserved a fragment of Memmius's speech "de Se,"—the defence, probably, at which the judices rejected the evidence of Memmius's enemy M. Aemilius Scaurus (Cic. pro Font. 7), and there is another doubtful fragment in Priscian (viii. 4). (Compare Ellendt, Proleg. in Cic. Brut. lxi.; Meyer, Fragm. Rom. Orat. p. 138.) From some forensic witticisms of L. Licinius Crassus [CRASSUS, No. 23], it would appear that Memmius had the by-name of "Mordax." (Cic. de Orat. ii. 59. § 240, 66. § 267; Quint. Inst. vi. 3. § 67.)

6. L. MEMMIUS, was an orator of some eminence during the war of Sulla with the Marian party, B. C. 87—81. (Cic. Brut. 36, 70, 89.) From Cicero (pro Sext. Rosc. 32) it would appear that Memmius was a supporter of C. Marius.

7. C. MEMMIUS, brother, probably, of the preceding (Cic. Brut. 36), married a sister of Cn. Pompey. He was Pompey's propraetor in Sicily, and his quaestor in Spain, during the Sertorian war, B. C. 76, and was slain in battle with Sertorius near Saguntum. (Cic. pro Balb. 2; Plut. Pomp. 11, Sert. 21; Oros. v. 23.)

8. C. MEMMIUS L. F. GEMELLUS, son of No. 6, was tribune of the plebs in B. C. 66, when he opposed the demand of L. Lucullus for a triumph, on his return from the Mithridatic war. (Plut. Lucull. 37.) Memmius was a man of profligate character. He wrote indecent poems (Plin. Ep. v. 3; Ovid. Trist. ii. 433; Gell. xix. 9), made overtures to Cn. Pompey's wife (Suet. Ill. Gr. 14), and, when curule aedile, in B. C. 60, seduced the wife of M. Lucullus, whence Cicero, combining this intrigue with Memmius's previous hostility to L. Lucullus, calls him a Paris, who insulted not only Menelaus (M. Lucullus), but Agamemnon also (L. Lucullus). (Cic. ad Att. i. 18. § 3; comp. Val. Max. vi. 1. § 13.) Memmius was praetor in B. C. 58. (Cic. ad Quint. Fr. i. 2, 5, 15.) He belonged at that time to the Senatorian party, since he impeached P. Vatinius, consul in B. C. 47 (Cic. in Vatin. 14); opposed P. Clodius (id. ad Att. ii. 12); and was vehement in his invectives against Julius Caesar (Suet. Caes. 23, 49, 73; Schol. Bob. in Cic. pro Sest. p. 297, in Cic. Vatinian. p. 317, 323, Orelli); and attempted to bring in a bill to rescind the acts of his consulate. Before, however, Memmius himself competed for the consulship, B. C. 54, he had been reconciled to Caesar, who supported him with all his interest. (Cic. ad Att. iv. 15, 17; Suet. Caes. 73.) But Memmius soon again offended Caesar by revealing a certain coalition with his opponents at the comitia. (Cic. ad Quint. Fr. ii. 15, ad Att. iv. 16, 18.) Memmius was impeached for ambitus, and, receiving no aid from Caesar, withdrew from Rome to Mytilene, where he was living in the year of Cicero's proconsulate. (Cic. ad Quint. Fr. iii. 2, 8, ad Fam. xiii. 19, ad Att. v. 11, vi. 1.) Memmius married Fausta, a daughter of the dictator Sulla, whom he divorced after having by her at least one son C. Memmius [No. 9]. (Ascon. in Cic. pro M. Aemil. Scaur. p. 29, Orelli; Cic. pro Sull. 19.) He was eminent both in literature and in eloquence, although in the latter his indolence, his fastidious taste, and exclusive preference of Greek to Roman models rendered him less effective in the forum. (Cic. Brut. 70.) Lucretius dedicated his poem, De Rerum Natura, to this Memmius, and Cicero addressed three letters to him (ad Fam. xiii. 1—3).

9. C. MEMMIUS, son of the preceding by Fausta, daughter of Sulla the dictator, was tribune of the plebs in B. C. 54. He prosecuted A. Gabinius, consul in B. C. 58, for malversation in his province of Syria (Cic. ad Quint. Fr. iii. 1. 5, 15, 2. 1, 3. 2, pro Rabir. Post. 3; Val. Max. viii. 1. § 3), and Domitius Calvinus for ambitus at his consular comitia in B. C. 54 (Cic. ad Quint. Fr. iii. 2. § 3, 3. 2). Memmius addressed the judices in behalf of the defendant at the trial of M. Aemilius Scaurus in the same year (Ascon. in Cic. Scaurian. p. 29, Orelli). Memmius was step-son of T. Annius Milo who married his mother after her divorce by C. Memmius (No. 7). (Ascon. l. c.; Cic. pro Sull. 19.) Memmius was consul suffectus in B. C. 34, when he exhibited games in honour of one of the mythic ancestors of the Julian house, Venus Genetrix. (Dion Cass. xlix. 42.)

10. P. MEMMIUS, was cited a witness for the defendant at the trial of A. Caecina, B. C. 69. (Cic. pro Caec. 10.) [CAECINA, No. 1.]

11. P. MEMMIUS REGULUS, was supplementary consul in A. D. 31 (Fasti; Dion Cass. lviii. 9), and afterwards praefect of Macedonia and Achaia, in which office he received orders from Caligula to remove to Rome the statue of the Pheidian Jupiter from Olympia. (Joseph. Antiq. xix. 1; Pausan. ix. 27; comp. Dion Cass. l. 6.) Memmius was the husband of Lollia Paulina, and was compelled by Caligula to divorce her. (Tac. Ann. xii. 23; Suet. Cal. 25; Dion Cass. lix. 12; Euseb. in Chron.; comp. Tac. Ann. xii. 1.) Memmius died in A. D. 63. (Tac. Ann. xiv. 47.)

12. C. MEMMIUS REGULUS, son, probably, of the preceding, was consul in A. D. 63. (Fasti; Tac. Ann. xv. 23; Gruter, Inscr. p. 8.)

13. L. MEMMIUS POLLIO, was supplementary consul in B. C. 49. Memmius was a creature of Agrippina's, the wife of Claudius, and was employed by her to promote the marriage of her son Nero with the emperor's daughter Octavia. (Tac. Ann. xii. 9.)

14. C. MEMMIUS, C. F., is only known from coins of the republican period, a specimen of which is annexed. The obverse bears the head of Ceres, with C. MEMMI, C. F.: the reverse a trophy supported by a captive, with C. MEMMIVS IMPERATOR. This coin is of beautiful workmanship. [W. B. D.]

COIN OF C. MEMMIUS.

MEMNON (Μέμνων), a son of Tithonus and Eos, and brother of Emathion. In the Odyssey and Hesiod he is described as the handsome son of Eos, who assisted Priam with his Ethiopians against the Greeks. He slew Antilochus, the son of Nestor, at Troy. (Hes. Theog. 984, &c.; Hom. Od. iv. 188, xi. 522; Apollod. iii. 12. § 4.) Some writers called his mother a Cissian woman (Κισσία), from the Persian province of Cissia. (Strab. p. 728; Herod. v. 49, 52.) As Eos is sometimes identical with Hemera, Memnon's mother is also called Hemera. [Eos.] Homer makes only passing allusions to Memnon, and he is essentially a post-Homeric hero. According to these later traditions, he was a prince of the Ethiopians, and accordingly black (Ov. Amor. i. 8. 4, Epist. ex Pont. iii. 3. 96; Paus. x. 31. § 2); he came to the assistance of his uncle Priam, for Tithonus and Priam were step-brothers, being both sons of Laomedon by different mothers. (Tzetz. ad Lyc. 18.) Respecting his expedition to Troy there are different legends. According to some Memnon the Ethiopian first went to Egypt, thence to Susa, and thence to Troy. (Paus. i. 42. § 2.) At Susa, which had been founded by Tithonus, Memnon built the acropolis which was called after him the Memnonium. (Herod. v. 53, vii. 151; Strab. p. 728; Paus. iv. 31. § 5.) According to some Tithonus was the governor of a Persian province, and the favourite of Teutamus; and Memnon obtained the command of a large host of Ethiopians and Susans to succour Priam. (Diod. ii. 22, iv. 75; Paus. x. 31. § 2.) A third tradition states that Tithonus sent his son to Priam, because Priam had made him a present of a golden vine. (Serv. ad Aen. i. 493.) Dictys Cretensis (iv. 4) makes Memnon lead an army of Ethiopians and Indians from the heights of Mount Caucasus to Troy. In the fight against the Greeks he was slain by Achilles. The principal points connected with his exploits at Troy are, his victory over Antilochus, his contest with Achilles, and lastly, his death and the removal of his body by his mother. With regard to the first, we are told that Antilochus, the dearest friend of Achilles after the fall of Patroclus, hastened to the assistance of his father, Nestor, who was hard pressed by Paris. Memnon attacked Antilochus, and slew him. (Pind. Pyth. vi. 30, &c.) According to others, Memnon was fighting with Ajax; and before his Ethiopians could come to his assistance, Achilles came up, and killed Memnon (Dict. Cret. iv. 6); the same accounts represent Antilochus as having been conquered by Hector. (Ov. Heroid. i. 15; Hygin. Fab. 113.) According to the common account, however, Achilles avenged the death of Antilochus upon Memnon, of whose fate Achilles had been informed by his mother, Thetis. While both were fighting Zeus weighed the fate of the two heroes, and the scale containing that of Memnon sank. (Pind. Ol. ii. 148, Nem. iii. 110, vi. 83; Quint. Smyrn. ii. 224, &c.; Philostr. Icon. ii. 7; Plut. De Aud. Poët. 2.) According to Diodorus (ii. 22) Memnon was not killed in an open contest, but fell into an ambush in which the Thessalians lay in wait for him. Eos prayed to Zeus to grant her son immortality, and removed his body from the field of battle. She wept for him every morning; and the dew-drops which appear in the morning are the tears of Eos. (Serv. ad Aen. i. 493; Ov. Met. xiii. 622.)

Philostratus (Her. iii. 4) distinguishes between a Trojan and an Ethiopian Memnon, and believes that the former, who was very young and did not distinguish himself till after the death of Hector, slew Antilochus; and he adds, that Achilles, after having avenged his friend, burnt the armour and head of Memnon on the funeral pile of Antilochus. Some say that the Ethiopian warriors burned the body of Memnon, and carried the ashes to Tithonus (Diod. l. c.); or that those who had gone to Troy under his general, Phallas, received his ashes near Paphos, in Cyprus, and gave them to Memnon's sister, Himera, who was searching after his body, and buried them in Palliochis (an unknown place), whereupon she disappeared. (Dict. Cret. vi. 10.) Tombs of Memnon were shown in several places, as at Ptolemais in Syria, on the Hellespont, on a hill near the mouth of the river Aesepus, near Palton in Syria, in Ethiopia and other places. (Strab. pp. 587, 728.) His armour was said to have been made for him by Hephaestus, at the request of his mother; and his sword was shown in the temple of Asclepius, at Nicomedeia. (Paus. iii. 3. § 6.) His companions, who indulged in excessive wailings at his death, were changed by the gods into birds, called Memnonides, and some of them died of grief. (Serv. ad Aen. i. 755.) According to Ovid (Met. xiii. 576, &c.), Eos implored Zeus to confer an honour on her son, to console her for his loss. He accordingly caused a number of birds, divided into two swarms, to fight in the air over the funeral sacrifice until a portion of them fell down upon the ashes of the hero, and thus formed a funeral sacrifice for him. According to a story current on the Hellespont, the Memnonides every year visited the tomb of Memnon, cleared the ground round about, and moistened it with their wings, which they wetted in the waters of the river Aesepus. (Paus. x. 31. § 2; comp. Plin. H. N. xxxvi. 7.)

At a comparatively late period, when the Greeks became acquainted with Egypt, and the colossal statue in the neighbourhood of Thebes, the stone of which, when reached by the rays of the rising sun, gave forth a sound resembling that of a breaking chord, they looked upon that statue as representing the son of Eos, or confounded it with their own Helios, although they well knew that the Egyptians did not call the statue Memnon, but Amenophis. (Paus. i. 42. § 2; comp. Callistrat. Stat. i. 9.) This colossal figure, made of black stone, in a sitting posture, with its feet close together, and the hands leaning on its seat, was broken in the middle, so that the upper part had fallen down; but it was afterwards restored. (Paus. l. c.; Strab. p. 816; Philostr. Her. iii. 4, Icon. i. 7, Vit. Apollon. vi. 4; Lucian, Tox. 27; Tacit. Ann. ii. 61; Juven. xv. 5.) Several very ingenious conjectures have been propounded respecting the alleged meaning of the so-called statue of Memnon; and some have asserted that it served for astronomical purposes, and others that it had reference to the mystic worship of the sun and light, though there can be little doubt that the statue represented nothing else than the Egyptian king Amenophis. (Creuzer, Symbolik, p. 149, &c.; Jablonski, De Memnone; and the various works on Egyptian antiquities.)

The fight of Memnon with Achilles was often represented by Greek artists, as for example, on the chest of Cypselus (Paus. v. 19. § 1), on the throne of Apollo, at Amyclae (iii. 18. § 7), in a large group at Olympia, the work of Lycius, which had been dedicated there by the inhabitants of Apollonia (v. 22. § 2), in the Lesche at Delphi, by Polygnotus (x. 31. § 2; comp. Millingen, Monum. Inedit. 1, 4, 5, 40). [L. S.]

MEMNON (Μέμνων), historical. 1. A distinguished Greek, a native of Rhodes. The date of his birth is not accurately known, but Demosthenes (c. Aristocr. p. 672) speaks of him as a young man in B. C. 352. His sister was the wife of Artabazus, satrap of Lower Phrygia, and he joined the latter in his revolt against Dareius Ochus. When fortune deserted the insurgents they fled to the court of Philip. Mentor, the brother of Memnon [MENTOR], being high in favour with Dareius on account of his services in Egypt, interceded on behalf of Artabazus and Memnon, who were pardoned and again received into favour. On the death of Mentor, Memnon, who possessed great military skill and experience, succeeded him in his authority, which extended over all the western coast of Asia Minor (about B. C. 336). When Alexander invaded Asia, Memnon, with the satraps Spithridates and Arsites, collected an army, with which they encamped on the banks of the Granicus. Memnon, thinking their forces insufficient to oppose Alexander, recommended that they should retire and lay waste the country behind them; but his advice was overruled. After the defeat of the Persian troops, Memnon sent his wife and children to Dareius as tokens and pledges of his fidelity. As he had hoped, he was invested by the king with the supreme command in the west of Asia. He defended Halicarnassus against Alexander with great skill and bravery, until it was no longer possible to hold out. Having set fire to the place, he and Orontobates made their escape, and crossed over to Cos. Memnon now formed the design of carrying the war into Greece, and attacking Macedonia. Dareius had furnished him with large supplies of money. He collected a large force of mercenaries, and a fleet of 300 ships. At the head of this force he attacked and took Chios, and thence proceeded to Lesbos. Here he captured several towns without difficulty, but was delayed for a considerable time in the reduction of Mytilene. At this place he was taken ill and died, B. C. 333. His death was an irreparable loss to the Persian cause; for several Greek states, and in particular the Spartans, hearing of his success and intentions, were prepared to join him, had he carried the war into Greece. According to Polyaenus (v. 44. § 1) he was some time or other engaged in hostilities with Leucon, king of Bosporus, who died B. C. 353. (Arrian, i. 12, 20—23, ii. 1; Diod. xvi. 34, 52, xvii. 7, 18, 23, 24, 29, 31; Clinton, F. H. vol. ii. p. 284.)

2. Governor of Thrace, who, while Alexander was absent in the East, seized the opportunity afforded by the disaster of Zopyrion, and revolted. The outbreak, however, was speedily suppressed by Antipater, B. C. 330. (Diod. xvii. 62.)

3. One of the demiurgi of the Achaeans, at the time of the Roman embassy to the League. (Liv. xxxii. 22.) [C. P. M.]

MEMNON (Μέμνων), a Greek historical writer, a native probably of Heracleia Pontica. He wrote a large work on the history of that city, especially of the tyrants under whose power Heracleia had at various times fallen. Our knowledge of this work is derived from Photius. Of how many books it consisted we do not know. Photius had read from the ninth to the sixteenth inclusive, of which portion he has made a tolerably copious abstract. The first eight books he had not read, and he speaks of other books after the sixteenth. The ninth book begins with an account of the tyrant Clearchus, the disciple of Plato and Isocrates. The last event mentioned in the sixteenth book was the death of Brithagoras, who was sent by the Heracleians as ambassador to J. Caesar, after the latter had obtained the supreme power. From this Vossius supposes that the work was written about the time of Augustus; in the judgment of Orelli, not later than the time of Hadrian or the Antonines. It is, of course, impossible to fix the date with any precision, as we do not know at all down to what time the entire work was carried. The style of Memnon, according to Photius, was clear and simple, and the words well chosen. The Excerpta of Photius, however, contain numerous examples of rare and poetical expressions, as well as a few which indicate the decline of the Greek language. These Excerpta of Photius were first published separately, together with the remains of Otesias and Agatharchides by H. Stephanus, Paris, 1557. The best edition is that by J. Conr. Orelli, Leipzig, 1816, containing, together with the remains of Memnon, a few fragments of other writers on Heracleia. There is a French translation of Photius's Excerpta in the Mémoires de l'Academie des Inscriptions, vol. xiv. (Phot. Cod. ccxxiv.; Voss. De Hist. Graecis, ed. Westermann, p. 226; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vii. p. 748; Groddeck, Initia Historiae Graecorum Literariae, ii. p. 74.) [C. P. M.]

MEMPHIS (Μέμφις). 1. A daughter of Neilus and wife of Epaphus, by whom she became the mother of Libya. The town of Memphis in Egypt was said to have derived its name from her. (Apollod. ii. 1. § 4.) Others call her a daughter of the river-god Uchoreus, and add that by Neilus she became the mother of Aegyptus. (Diod. i. 51.)

2. One of the daughters of Danaus (Apollod. ii. 1. § 5.) [L. S.]

MEN (Μήν), or translated into Latin, Lunus, the god presiding over the months, was a Phrygian divinity. (Strab. xii. pp. 557, 577; Procl. in Plat. Tim. iv. 251; Spartian. Carac. 7.) [L. S.]

MENAECHMUS and SOIDAS (Μέναιχμος καὶ Σοΐδας), were the makers of the gold and ivory statue of the Laphrian Artemis, which Pausanias saw in the temple of that goddess in the citadel of Patrae in Achaia, whither it had been removed from Calydon by Augustus. The goddess was represented in the attitude of the chase. The artists were natives of Naupactus, and were supposed to have lived not much later than Canachus of Sicyon and Callon of Aegina. (Paus. vii. 18. § 6. s. 10, 11.) If so, they must have flourished about B. C. 500. [CALLON, CANACHUS.] Pliny quotes among the authorities for his 33d and 34th books, Menaechmus, a writer on the toreutic art, under which designation the chryselephantine statues were included. (Plin. H. N. Elench. xxxiii. xxxiv.) He also mentions (xxxiv. 8. s. 19. § 18) a group by Menaechmus, of a calf pressed down by the knee, and with the neck doubled back (no doubt by some one about to sacrifice it, but this Pliny omits); and he adds that Menaechmus wrote upon his art. He does not expressly say what this art was, but of course we must consider this Menaechmus as the same person whom Pliny quotes as one of the authorities for this book of his work; and then again, since the subject on which he wrote was toreutice, it would follow, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, that he was the same person as the artist mentioned by Pausanias.

Harduin (Index Auct.) and Thiersch (Epochen, p. 202) are therefore almost certainly wrong in identifying Pliny's Menaechmus with the Menaechmus or Manaechmus of Sicyon, who wrote a work περὶ τεχνιτῶν (which means here actors, not artists, as Harduin and the rest evidently thought: see Meineke, Hist. Crit. Com. Graec. p. 17), and also a history of Alexander the Great, and a book on Sicyon, and whom Suidas states to have flourished in the time of the successors of Alexander. (Suid. s. v.; Athen. ii. p. 65, a, vi. p. 271 d, xiv. p. 635 b, p. 637 f.; Schol. ad Pind. Nem. ii. 1, ix. 30; Vossius, de Hist. Graec. p. 102, ed. Westermann.) [P. S.]

MENA'LCIDAS (Μενάλκίδας), a Lacedaemonian adventurer, who, in some way not further specified by Polybius, took advantage of the circumstances of Egypt, in its war with Antiochus Epiphanes (B. C. 171—168), to advance his own interests at the Ptolemies' expence. He was thrown into prison by Philometor and Physcon, but was released by them in B. C. 168, at the request of C. Popillius Laenas, the Roman ambassador, who was sent to command Antiochus to withdraw from the country. (Polyb. xxx. 11; comp. Liv. xlv. 12, 13; Just. xxxiv. 2, 3; Val. Max. vi. 4. § 3.) In B. C. 150 we find Menalcidas, as general of the Achaean league, engaging for a bribe of ten talents to induce the Achaeans to aid Oropus against Athens. By the promise of half the sum, he won Callicrates to the same cause, and they succeeded in carrying a decree for the succour required. No effectual service, however, was rendered to the Oropians, but Menalcidas still exacted the money he had agreed for, and then evaded the payment of his portion to Callicrates. The latter accordingly retaliated on him with a capital charge of having attempted to prevail on the Romans to sever Sparta from the league; and Menalcidas only escaped the danger through the protection of Diaeus, which he purchased with a bribe of three talents. [CALLICRATES, No. 4.] In B. C. 149 he supported at Rome, against Diaeus, the cause of the Lacedaemonian exiles. [DIAEUS.] In B. C. 147, when the war between the Achaeans and Lacedaemonians had been suspended at the command of Caecilius Metellus, he persuaded his countrymen to break the truce, and seized and plundered Iasus, a subject town of the Achaeans on the borders of Laconia. The Lacedaemonians, soon repenting of their rashness, were loud in their outcry against their adviser; and he, driven to despair, put an end to his own life by poison, "having shown himself," says Pausanias, "as leader of the Lacedaemonians at that time, the most unskilful general; as leader of the Achaeans formerly, the most unjust of men." (Polyb. xl. 5; Paus. vii. 11, 12, 13, 16.) [E. E.]

MENALIPPUS (Μενάλιππος, an equivalent form to Μελάνιππος), an architect, probably of Athens, who, in conjunction with the Roman architects, C. and M. Stallius, was employed by Ariobarzanes II. (Philopator), king of Cappadocia, to restore the Odeum of Pericles, which had been burnt in the Mithridatic war, in Ol. 173, 3, B. C. 86-5. The exact date of the restoration is unknown; but Ariobarzanes reigned from B. C. 63 to about B. C. 51. (Böckh, Corp. Insc. vol. i. No. 357; Vitruv. v. 9. 1.) [P. S.]

MENALIPPUS. [MELANIPPUS.]

MENANDER (Μένανδρος), an Athenian officer in the Syracusan expedition, was, together with Euthydemus, associated in the supreme command with Nicias, towards the end of the year B. C. 414. The operations of Menander and his colleague Euthydemus are narrated in the life of the latter. [Vol. II. p. 123, b.] (Thuc. vii. 16, 43, 69; Diod. xiii. 13; Plut. Nicias, c. 20.) It appears to have been this same Menander whom we find serving under Alcibiades in the campaign against Pharnabazus, in the winter of B. C. 409—408 (Xen. Hell. i. 2. § 16), and probably the same who was appointed, with Tydeus and Cephisodotus in B. C. 405, to share the command of the Athenian fleet with the generals who had been previously appointed—Conon, Philocles, and Adeimantus. He was therefore one of the commanders at the disastrous battle of Aegos-potami; and he and Tydeus are especially mentioned as rejecting with contempt the advice of Alcibiades before the battle. (Id. ii. 1. §§ 16, 26.)

MENANDER (Μένανδρος). 1. An officer in the service of Alexander, one of those called ἑταῖροι, but who held the command of a body of mercenaries. He was appointed by Alexander, during the settlement of the affairs of Asia made by that monarch when at Tyre (B. C. 331), to the government of Lydia, and appears to have remained at that post till the year 323, when he was commissioned to conduct a reinforcement of troops to Alexander at Babylon, where he arrived just before the king's last illness. (Arrian, Anab. iii. 6. § 12, vii. 23. § 2.) In the division of the provinces, after the death of Alexander, he received his former government of Lydia, of which he hastened to take possession. (Arrian, ap. Phot. p. 69, b.; Dexippus, ibid. p. 64, a.; Justin. xiii. 4; Curt. x. 30. § 2; Diod. xviii. 3, erroneously has Meleager instead.) He appears to have early attached himself to the party of Antigonus, to whom he was the first to give information of the ambitious schemes of Perdiccas for marrying Cleopatra. (Arrian, ap. Phot. p. 70, b.) In the new distribution of the provinces at Triparadeisus he lost his government of Lydia, which was given to Cleitus (Id. p. 72, a.); but this was probably only in order that he might cooperate the more freely with Antigonus, as we find him commanding a part of the army of the latter in the first campaign against Eumenes (B. C. 320). The following year, on learning the escape of Eumenes from Nora, he advanced with an army into Cappadocia to attack him, and compelled him to take refuge in Cilicia. (Plut. Eum. 9; Diod. xviii. 59.) From this time no farther mention of Menander is found in history.

2. An officer appointed by Alexander to command a fortress in Bactria, whom he afterwards put to death for abandoning his post. (Plut. Alex. 57.)

3. A native of Laodiceia, who was a general of cavalry in the service of Mithridates, and figures on several occasions in the wars of that monarch. He was one of those selected to command the army under the king's son, Mithridates, which was opposed to Fimbria, B. C. 85 (Memnon, c. 34); and again in the operations against Lucullus, near Cabeira, he commanded a detachment of the army of Mithridates, which was destined to cut off a convoy of provisions guarded by Sornatius, but was defeated by that general with heavy loss. (Plut. Lucull. 17.) He afterwards fell a prisoner into the hands of Pompey, and was one of the captives who served to adorn his triumph. (App. Mithr. 117.) [E. H. B.]

MENANDER (Μένανδρος), king of BACTRIA, was, according to Strabo (xi. 11), one of the most powerful of all the Greek rulers of that country, and one of those who made the most extensive conquests in India. Plutarch tells us that his rule was mild and equitable, and that he was so popular with his subjects, that the different cities under his authority, after vying with each other in paying him funeral honours, insisted upon dividing his remains among them. (De Rep. Ger. p. 821.) Both these authors term him king of Bactria; but recent inquirers are of opinion that he did not reign in Bactria Proper, but only in the provinces south of the Paropamisus, or Indian Caucasus. (Lassen, Gesch. d. Bactr. Kön. p. 225, &c.; Wilson's Ariana, p. 282.) According to Strabo (l. c.), he extended his conquests beyond the Hypanis or Sutlej, and made himself master of the district of Pattalene at the mouths of the Indus. These conquests appear to have been related by Trogus Pompeius in his forty-first book (see Prol. Lib. xli.), but they are omitted by Justin. The author of the Periplus of the Erythraean sea, commonly ascribed to Arrian, tells us (p. 27, ed. Huds.) that silver coins of Menander and Apollodotus were still in circulation in his day among the merchants of Barygaza (Baroach); and they have been discovered in modern times in considerable numbers in the countries south of the Hindoo Koosh, and even as far east as the Jumna. (Wilson, p. 281.) The period of his reign is wholly uncertain. [E. H. B.]

MENANDER, A'RRIUS, a Roman jurist, who lived under Septimius Severus and Antoninus Caracalla, the son of Severus. Caracalla succeeded his father A. D. 211. Menander was a Consiliarius, or a member of the Consilium of Caracalla, as appears from a passage of Ulpian (Dig. 4. tit. 4. s. 11. § 2), coupled with the fact that Ulpian wrote his Libri ad Edictum, which contain the passage just cited, under the reign of Caracalla. Aemilius Macer, who wrote in the time of Alexander Severus, cites Menander. There are six excerpts in the Digest from a work of Menander, entitled "Militaria, or De Re Militari;" and Macer, who wrote on the same subject, also cites Menander as an authority. [G. L.]

MENANDER (Μένανδρος), of ATHENS, the most distinguished poet of the New Comedy, was the son of Diopeithes and Hegesistrate, and flourished in the time of the successors of Alexander. He was born in Ol. 109. 3, or B. C. 342-1, which was also the birth-year of Epicurus; only the birth of Menander was probably in the former half of the year, and therefore in B. C. 342, while that of Epicurus was in the latter half, B. C. 341. (Suid. s. v.; Clinton, F. H. sub ann.) Strabo also (xiv. p. 526) speaks of Menander and Epicurus as συνεφήβους. His father, Diopeithes, commanded the Athenian forces on the Hellespont in B. C. 342—341, the year of Menander's birth, and was defended by Demosthenes in his oration περὶ τῶν ἐν Χερσονήσῳ. (Anon. de Com. p. xii.) On this fact the grammarians blunder with their usual felicity, not only making Menander a friend of Demosthenes, which as a boy he may have been, but representing him as inducing Demosthenes to defend his father, in B. C. 341, when he himself was just born, and again placing him among the dicasts on the trial of Ctesiphon, in B. C. 330, when he was in his twelfth year. (Meineke, Menand. Reliq. p. xxiv.) Alexis, the comic poet, was the uncle of Menander, on the father's side (Suid. s. v. Ἄλεξις); and we may naturally suppose, with one of the ancient grammarians (Anon. de Com. p. xii.), that the young Menander derived from his uncle his taste for the comic drama, and was instructed by him in its rules of composition. His character must have been greatly influenced and formed by his intimacy with Theophrastus and Epicurus (Alciph. Epist. ii. 4), of whom the former was his teacher (Diog. Laërt. v. 36), and the latter his intimate friend. That his tastes and sympathies were altogether with the philosophy of Epicurus is proved, among numerous other indications, by his epigram on "Epicurus and Themistocles." (Brunck, Anal. vol. i. p. 203, Anth. Pal. vii. 72, vol. i. p. 327, Jacobs.)

Χαῖρε, Νεοκλείδα δίδυμον γένος, ὧν ὁ μὲν ὑμῶν
Πατρίδα δουλοσύνας ῥύσαθ', ὁ δ' ἀφροσύνας.

From Theophrastus, on the other hand, he must have derived much of that skill in the discrimination of character which we so much admire in the Χαρακτῆρες of the philosopher, and which formed the great charm of the comedies of Menander. His master's attention to external elegance and comfort he not only imitated, but, as was natural in a man of an elegant person, a joyous spirit, and a serene and easy temper, he carried it to the extreme of luxury and effeminacy. Phaedrus (v. 1. 11, 12) describes him, when paying his court to Demetrius Phalereus, thus:

"Unguento delibutus, vestitu adfluens, Veniebat gressu delicato et languido."

His personal beauty is mentioned by the anonymous writer on comedy (l. c.), though, according to Suidas, his vision was somewhat disturbed, στραβὸς τὰς ὄψεις, ὀξὺς δὲ τὸν νοῦν. He is represented in works of sculpture which still exist, and of one of which Schlegel gives the following description: "In the excellent portrait-statues of two of the most famous comedians, Menander and Posidippus (to be found in the Vatican), the physiognomy of the Greek New Comedy seems to me to be almost visibly and personally expressed. They are seated in arm-chairs, clad with extreme simplicity, and with a roll in the hand, with that ease and careless self-possession which always marks the conscious superiority of the master in that maturity of years which befits the calm and impartial observation which comedy requires, but sound and active, and free from all symptoms of decay; we may discern in them that hale and pithy vigour of body which bears witness to an equally vigorous constitution of mind and temper; no lofty enthusiasm, but no folly or extravagance; on the contrary, the earnestness of wisdom dwells in those brows, wrinkled not with care, but with the exercise of thought, while, in the searching eye, and in the mouth, ready for a smile, there is a light irony which cannot be mistaken." (Dramatic Lectures, vii.) The moral character of Menander is defended by Meineke, with tolerable success, against the aspersions of Suidas, Alciphron, and others. (Menand. Reliq. pp. xxviii. xxix.) Thus much is certain, that his comedies contain nothing offensive, at least to the taste of his own and the following ages, none of the purest, it must be admitted, as they were frequently acted at private banquets. (Plut. de Fals. Pud. p. 531, b., Sympos. viii. p. 712, b.; Comp. Arist. et Men. p. 853, b.) Whether their being eagerly read by the youth of both sexes, on account of the love scenes in them, is any confirmation of their innocence, may at least be doubted. (Ovid. Trist. ii. 370.)

Of the actual events of Menander's life we know but little. He enjoyed the friendship of Demetrius Phalereus, whose attention was first drawn to him by admiration of his works. (Phaedrus, l. c.) This intimacy was attended, however, with danger as well as honour, for when Demetrius Phalereus was expelled from Athens by Demetrius Poliorcetes (B. C. 307), Menander became a mark for the sycophants, and would have been put to death but for the intercession of Telesphorus, the son-in-law of Demetrius. (Diog. Laërt. v. 80.) The first Greek king of Egypt, Ptolemy, the son of Lagus, was also one of his admirers; and he invited the poet to his court at Alexandria; but Menander seems to have declined the proffered honour. (Plin. H. N. vii. 29. s. 31; Alciphr. Epist. ii. 3, 4.) Suidas mentions some letters to Ptolemy as among the works of Menander.

The time of his death is differently stated. The same inscription, which gives the date of his birth, adds that he died at the age of fifty-two years, in the archonship of Philippus, in the 32nd year of Ptolemy Soter. Clinton shows that these statements refer to the year B. C. 292-1 (F. H. vol. ii. p. xv. and sub ann. 342, 291); but, to make up the fifty-two years, we must reckon in both extremes, 342 and 291. The date is confirmed by Eusebius (Chron.); by the anonymous writer on comedy (p. xii.), who adds that Menander died at Athens; by Apollodorus (ap. Aul. Gell. xvii. 4); and by Aulus

Gellius (xvii. 21). Respecting the manner of his death, all that we know is that an old commentator on Ovid applies the line (Ibis, 593)

"Comicus ut medius periit dum nabat in undis"

to Menander, and tells us that he was drowned while swimming in the harbour of Peiraeeus; and we learn from Alciphron (Epist. ii. 4) that Menander had an estate at Peiraeeus. He was buried by the road leading out of Peiraeeus towards Athens. (Paus. i. 2. § 2). There are two epigrams upon him in the Greek Anthology: the one an epitaph by Diodorus (Brunck, Anal. vol. ii. p. 188, Anth. Pal. vii. 370, vol. i. p. 413, Jacobs), the other anonymous. (Brunck, Anal. vol. iii. p. 268, Anth. Pal. ix. 187, vol. ii. p. 63, Jacobs.)

Notwithstanding Menander's fame as a poet, his public dramatic career, during his lifetime, was not eminently successful; for, though he composed upwards of a hundred comedies, he only gained the prize eight times. (Aul. Gell. xvii. 4; comp. Martial. v. 10.) His preference for elegant exhibitions of character above coarse jesting may have been the reason why he was not so great a favourite with the common people as his principal rival, Philemon, who is said, moreover, to have used unfair means of gaining popularity. (Gell. l. c.)

Menander appears to have borne the popular neglect very lightly, in the consciousness of his superiority; and once, when he happened to meet Philemon, he is said to have asked him, "Pray, Philemon, do not you blush when you gain a victory over me?" (Gell. l. c.; comp. Athen. xiii. p. 594, d.; Alciphr. Epist. ii. 3). The Athenians erected his statue in the theatre, but this was an honour too often conferred upon very indifferent poets to be of much value: indeed, according to Pausanias, he was the only distinguished comic poet of all whose statues had a place there. (Paus. i. 21. § 1; Dion Chrysost. Or. xxxi. p. 628, 13.)

The neglect of Menander's contemporaries has been amply compensated by his posthumous fame. His comedies retained their place on the stage down to the time of Plutarch (Comp. Men. et Arist. p. 854, b.), and the unanimous consent of antiquity placed him at the head of the New Comedy, and on an equality with the great masters of the various kinds of poetry. The grammarian Aristophanes assigned him the second place among all writers, after Homer alone (Brunck, Anal. vol. iii. p. 269). To the same grammarian is ascribed the happy saying, Ὦ Μένανδρε, καὶ βίε, πότερος ἄρ' ὑμῶν πρότερον ἐμιμήσατο (or, according to Scaliger's correction, πότερον ἀπεμιμήσατο). Among the Romans, besides the fact that their comedy was founded chiefly on the plays of Menander, we have the celebrated phrase of Julius Caesar, who addresses Terence as dimidiate Menander. (Donat. Vit. Terent. p. 754.) Quintilian's high eulogy of him is well known (x. 1).

The imitations of Menander are at once a proof of his reputation and an aid in appreciating his poetic character. Among the Greeks, Alciphron and Lucian were, in various degrees, indebted to his comedies. (Meineke, p. xxxv.) Among the Romans, his chief imitators were Caecilius, Afranius, and Terentius. How much Caecilius was indebted to him may be conjectured from the titles of his plays, of which there are very few that are not taken from Menander. Respecting Afranius we have the well-known line of Horace (Epist. ii. 1. 57):—

"Dicitur Afrani toga convenisse Menandro."

Plautus was an exception, as we learn from the next line of Horace:—

"Plautus ad exemplar Siculi properare Epicharmi Dicitur;"

and his extant plays sufficiently show that the ruder energy of the old Doric comedy was far more congenial to him than the polished sententiousness of Menander, whom, therefore, he only followed in a few instances, one of the most striking of which is in the Cistellaria (i. 1. 91; comp. Meineke, Menand. Reliq. p. 208, Frag. Com. Graec. vol. iv. p. 243). With respect to Terence, the oft-repeated statement, that he was simply a translator of Menander, is an injustice to the latter. That Terence was indebted to him for all his ideas and very many of his lines, is true enough; but that from any one play of Terence we can form a fair notion of the corresponding play of Menander, is disproved by the confession of Terence himself (Prolog. in Andr.) that he compressed two of Menander's plays into one; while the coolness with which he defends and even boasts of the exploit, shows how little we can trust him as our guide to the poetical genius of Menander. The one merit of Terence was felicity of expression; he had not the power of invention to fill up the gaps left by the omissions necessary in adapting a Greek play for a Roman audience, and therefore he drew again upon the rich resources of his original. It was this mixing up of different plays that his contemporaries condemned when they said, "Contaminari non decere fabulas," and that Caesar pointed to by the phrase O dimidiate Menander. In the epigram in which that phrase occurs, Caesar expressly intimates that the spirit of the Greek original had greatly evaporated in Terence:—

"Tu quoque, tu in summis, o dimidiate Menander, Poneris, et merito, puri sermonis amator.
Lenibus atque utinam scriptis adjuncta foret vis;
Comica ut aequato virtus polleret honore
Cum Graecis, neque in hac despectus parte jaceres.
Unum hoc maceror et doleo tibi deesse, Terenti."

The following epigram is worth quoting by the side of Caesar's (Burmann, Anth. Lat. vol. i. p. 140):—

"Tu quoque, qui solus tecto sermone, Terenti,
Conversum expressumque Latina voce Menandrum
In medio populi sedatis vocibus effers."

Still, the comedies of Terence are a valuable contribution to our knowledge of Menander, especially considering the scantiness of the extant fragments.

Meineke well remarks that the quality which Caesar missed in Terence was what the Greeks call τὸ παθητικόν, which Menander had with admirable art united with τῷ ἠθικῷ. And thus the poetry of Menander is described as διὰ πολλῶν ἀγομένη παθῶν καὶ ἠθῶν by Plutarch, in his Comparison of Menander and Aristophanes (p. 853, d.), which is the most valuable of the ancient testimonies concerning our poet. The style of his language is described by an old grammarian as λέξις λελυμένη καὶ ὑποκοιτική, which may be contrasted with another writer's description of the diction of Philemon, as συνηρτημένην καὶ οἷον ἠσφαλισμένην τοῖς συνδέσμοις. (Meineke, pp. xxxvi, xxxvii.)

To criticise the poetry of Menander is to describe the whole spirit and genius of the New Comedy, of which his plays may be safely taken as the normal representatives. This has been done with a most masterly hand by Schlegel, in his seventh lecture, from which the following passage is quoted:—"The New Comedy, in a certain point of view, may indeed be described as the Old Comedy tamed down: but, in speaking of works of genius, tameness does not usually pass for praise. The loss incurred in the interdict laid upon the old, unrestricted freedom of mirth, the newer comedians sought to compensate by throwing in a touch of earnestness borrowed from tragedy, as well in the form of representation, and the connection of the whole, as in the impressions, which they aimed at producing. We have seen how tragic poetry, in its last epoch, lowered its tone from its ideal elevation, and came nearer to common reality, both in the characters and in the tone of the dialogue, but especially as it aimed at conveying useful instruction on the proper conduct of civil and domestic life, in all their several emergencies. This turn towards utility Aristophanes has ironically commended in Euripides. (Ran. 971—991.) Euripides was the forerunner of the New Comedy; the poets of this species admired him especially, and acknowledged him for their master. Nay, so great is this affinity of tone and spirit, between Euripides and the poets of the New Comedy, that apophthegms of Euripides have been ascribed to Menander, and vice versâ. On the contrary, we find among the fragments of Menander maxims of consolation, which rise in a striking manner even into the tragic tone." (It may be added, that we have abundant testimony to prove that Menander was a great admirer and imitator of Euripides. An elaborate comparison of the parallel passages is instituted by Meineke in an Epimetrum to his Trag. Com. Graec. vol. iv. p. 705.)

"The New Comedy, therefore, is a mixture of sport and earnest. The poet no longer makes a sport of poetry and the world, he does not resign himself to a mirthful enthusiasm, but he seeks the sportive character in his subject, he depicts in human characters and situations that which gives occasion to mirth; in a word, whatever is pleasant and ridiculous."

Menander is remarkable for the elegance with which he threw into the form of single verses, or short sentences, the maxims of that practical wisdom in the affairs of common life which forms so important a feature of the New Comedy. Various "Anthologies" of such sentences were compiled by the ancient grammarians from Menander's works, of which there is still extant a very interesting specimen, in the collection of several hundred lines (778 in Meineke's edition), under the title of Γνῶμαι μονόστιχοι. Respecting the collection entitled Μενάνδροι καὶ Φιλιστίωνος σύγκρισις, see PHILISTION.

The number of Menander's comedies is stated at a few more than a hundred; 105, 108, and 109, according to different authorities. (Suid. s. v.; Anon. de Com. p. xii.; Donat. Vit. Ter. p. 753; Aul. Gell. xvii. 4.) We only know with certainty the date of one of the plays, namely, the Ὀργή, which was brought out in B. C. 321, when Menander was only in his twenty-first year. (Clinton, F. H. sub ann.; Meineke, p. xxx.) We have fragments of, or references to, the following plays, amounting in all to nearly ninety titles:—Ἀδελφοί (imitated by Terence, who, however, has mixed up with it the Συναποθνήσκοντες of Diphilus), Ἀλαεῖς not Ἀλαί Ἀραφηνίδες, Ἁλιεῖς, Ἀνατιθεμένη ἢ Μεσσηνία, Ἀνδρία (mixed up with the Περινθία in the Andria of Terence), Ἀνδρόγυνος ἢ Κρής, Ἀνεψιοί, Ἄπιστος, Ἀρρηφόρος ἢ Αὐλητρίς, Ἀσπίς, Αὐτὸν πενθῶν, Ἀφροδίσια, Βοιωτία, Γεωργός, Δακτύλιος, Δάρδανος, Δεισιδαίμων, Δημιουργός, Δίδυμαι, Δὶς ἐξαπατῶν, Δύσκολος, Ἑαυτὸν τιμωρούμενος (copied by Terence), Ἐγχειρίδιον, Ἐμπιπραμένη, Ἐπαγγελλόμενος, Ἐπίκληρος, Ἐπιτρέποντες (the plot of which was similar to that of the Hecyra of Terence), Εὐνοῦχος (imitated by Terence, but with a change in the dramatis personae), Ἐφέσιος, Ἡνίοχος, Ἥρως, Θαΐς, Θετταλή, Θεοφρουμένη, Θησαυρός (translated into Latin by Lucius Lavinius), Θρασυλέων, Ἱέρεια, Ἰμβρίοι, Ἱπποκόμος, Κανηφόρος, Καρίνη, Καρχηδόνιος (from which Plautus probably took his Poenulus), Καταψευδόμενος, Κερκύφαλος, Κιθαριστής, Κνιδία, Κόλαξ (partly followed in the Eunuchus of Terence), Κονειαζόμεναι (perhaps better Κωνιαζόμεναι), Κυβερνῆται, Λευκαδία, Λοκροί, Μέθη, Μηναγύρτης, Μισογύνης (reckoned by Phrynichus the best of all Menander's comedies, Epit. p. 417), Μισούμενος (another of his best plays, Liban. Orat. xxxi. p. 701), Ναύκληρος, Νομοθέτης, Ξενολόγος, Ὀλυνθία, Ὁμοπάτριοι, Ὀργή, Παιδίον, Παλλακή, Παρακαταθήκη, Περικειρομένη, Περινθία, Πλόκιον, Πρόγαμοι, Προεγκαλῶν, Πωλούμενοι, Ῥαπιζομένη, Σαμία, Σικυώνιος, Στρατιῶται, Συναριστῶσαι, Συνερῶσα, Συνέφηβοι, Τίτθη, Τροφώνιος, Ὑδρία, Ὑμνίς, Ὑποβολιμαῖος ἢ Ἄγροικος, Φάνιον, Φάσμα, Φιλάδελφοι, Χαλκεῖα, Χαλκίς, Χήρα, Ψευδηρακλῆς, Ψοφοδεής. There are also about 500 fragments which cannot be assigned to their proper places. To these must be added the Γνῶμαι μονόστιχοι, some passages of the Γνῶμαι (or Σύγκρισις) Μενάνδρου καὶ Φιλιστίωνος, and two epigrams, one in the Greek Anthology (quoted above), and one in the Latin version of Ausonius (Epig. 139). Of the letters to Ptolemy, which Suidas mentions, nothing survives, and it may fairly be doubted whether they were not, like the so-called letters of other great men of antiquity, the productions of the later rhetoricians. Suidas ascribes to him some orations, λόγους πλείστους καταλογάδην, a statement of which there is no confirmation; but Quintilian (x. 1. § 70) tells us that some ascribed the orations of Charisius to Menander.

Of the ancient commentators on Menander, the earliest was Lynceus of Samos, his contemporary and rival [LYNCEUS]. The next was the grammarian Aristophanes, whose admiration of Menander we have spoken of above, and whose work, entitled παράλληλοι Μενάνδρου τε καὶ ἀφ' ὧν ἔκλεψεν ἐκλογαί, is mentioned by Eusebius (Praep. Evan. x. 3), who also mentions a work by a certain Latinus or Cratinus, περὶ τῶν οὐκ ἰδίων Μενάνδρου. Next comes Plutarch's Comparison of Menander and Aristophanes: next Soterides of Epidaurus, who wrote a ὑπόμνημα εἰς Μένανδρον (Eudoc. p. 387; Suid. vol. iii. p. 356); and lastly Homer, surnamed Sellius, the author of a work entitled περιοχαὶ τῶν Μενάνδρου δραμάτων. (Suid.

vol. ii. p. 690.) The Menandrean letters of Alciphron also contain some valuable information [ALCIPHRON]. They are printed by Meineke in his edition of Menander.

The fragments of Menander were first printed in the collection of Sententiae, chiefly from the New Comedy, by Morellius, Greek and Latin, Paris, 1553, 8vo. (see Hoffmann, Lexicon Bibliograph.); next in the similar collection of Hertelius, Greek and Latin, Basel, 1560, 8vo.; next in that of H. Stephanus, Greek and Latin, with the Tractatus of Stephanus, De habendo Delectu Sententiarum quae γνῶμαι a Graecis dicuntur, and the Dissertatio de Menandro of Greg. Gyraldus, 1569 (this curiously shaped little volume, which is 4½ inches long, by scarcely 2 wide, contains extracts from several poets of the Middle and New Comedy); next, Menandri et Philistionis Sententiae Comparatae, Graece, cur. Nic. Rigaltii, excud. R. Stephanus, 1613, 8vo.; Menandri et Philistionis ΣΥΓΚΡΙΣΙΣ, c. vers. Lat. et not. Rutgersii et D. Heinsii, 1618, 8vo. (in the Var. Lect. of Rutgers); Menandri Fragmenta, Graec. et Lat. in H. Grotii Excerpt. ex Trag. et Com. Graec. Paris, 1626, 4to.; Menandri Sententiae, in Winterton's Poet. Min. Graec., Cantab. et Lond. 1653. The first attempt at a complete critical edition was the following:—Menandri et Philemonis Reliquiae, quotquot reperire potuerunt, Graece et Latine, cum notis Hug. Grotii et Joh. Clerici, &c., Amst. 1709, 8vo.: this edition was reprinted in 1732, 1752, 1771, and 1777, but has been very generally condemned. Since the publication of that work there has been no edition of Menander worthy of notice, except that his Γνῶμαι have had a place in the various collections of the gnomic poets, until the appearance of Meineke's Menandri et Philemonis Reliquiae, Berol. 1823, 8vo.: this admirable edition contains, besides the fragments, dissertations on the lives and writings of the two poets, and Bentley's emendations on the fragments. The fragments are reprinted by Meineke (with the annotations somewhat condensed) in the fourth volume of his Fragmenta Comicorum Graecorum, Berol. 1841, 8vo.; but in the first volume of that work, which contains the Historia Critica Comicorum Graecorum, he passes over the lives of Menander and Philemon, referring the reader to his former work. Meineke's collection has been also reprinted (carefully revised, and with the addition of a Latin version), by Dübner, as an appendix to the Aristophanes of Didot's Bibliotheca Scriptorum Graecorum, Paris, 1840, roy. 8vo. (For the works on Menander, see Hoffman, Lexicon Bibliograph.: the chief authorities, besides Meineke, are Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. pp. 454—469; Bernhardy, Grundriss der Griechischen Litteratur, vol. ii. p. 1014; Müller, Grk. Lit.) [P. S.]

MENANDER, minor literary persons.

1. A rhetorician of Laodiceia, on the river Lycus, wrote a commentary on the τέχνη of Hermogenes, and on the προγυμνάσματα of Minucianus, and other works. (Suid. s. v.)

2. Of Ephesus, an historian, wrote the acts of kings among the Greeks and the barbarians (τὰς ἐφ' ἑκάστου τῶν βασιλέων πράξεις παρὰ τοῖς Ἕλλησι καὶ βαρβάροις γενομένας), founded on the native chronicles of the respective countries, as we learn from Josephus, who preserves a considerable fragment of the work respecting Hiram, king of Tyre. (Joseph. c. Apion. i. 18.) He is also quoted by other authors. (Vossius, de Hist. Graec. p. 467, ed. Westermann.)

Menander of Pergamus, who wrote on Phoenician history, appears to have been the same person, on account of the resemblance of the fragment quoted from him by Clement of Alexandria (Strom. i. p. 140) to that quoted by Josephus. (Comp. Tatian, adv. Graec. 58.) An historian of the same name, who wrote a work on Cyprus, is quoted in the Etymologicum Magnum, s. v. Σφηκεία. (Vossius, l. c.)

3. Protector (Προτίκτωρ, i. e. body-guard), the son of Euphratas of Byzantium, was a rhetorician and historical writer under the emperor Mauricius, whose reign began in A. D. 581. He has left us an account of his own literary pursuits, in a fragment preserved by Suidas (s. v.). He continued the history of the Eastern Empire from the point where Agathias broke off, namely, the twenty-third year of Justinian, A. D. 558, down nearly to the death of Tiberius II. in A. D. 583. A considerable fragment of this history is preserved in the Eclogae of embassies, published by Hoeschel, Aug. Vindol. 1603. Menander is often quoted by Suidas, and is mentioned by Theophylact of Simocatta (Hist. Mauric. i. 3), who continued his history, and by Constantinus Porphyrogenitus (Them. i. 2). According to Niebuhr (Dexipp. p. 281), he may be trusted as an historian, but his style is a close imitation of Agathias, varied by occasional ridiculous attempts at fine writing. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vii. pp. 540, 541; Vossius, de Hist. Graec. p. 329, ed. Westermann.) There is one epigram by him in the Greek Anthology. (Jacobs, vol. xiii. p. 916.)

A few insignificant writers of the same name are mentioned by Fabricius (Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. p. 454) and Meineke (Menand. et Philem. Reliq. pp. xxxvii.—xxxix.) [P. S.]

MENAS (Μηνᾶς). 1. A Lacedaemonian, was one of the commissioners for ratifying the fifty years' truce between Athens and Sparta in B. C. 421, and also the separate treaty of alliance between these states in the same year. (Thuc. v. 19, 24.)

2. A Bithynian, whom Prusias II. (κυνηγός), sent to Rome in B. C. 149, to join with Nicomedes (son of Prusias) in an application to the senate to remit the remainder of the sum which they had compelled him to engage to pay to Attalus II. of Pergamus in B. C. 154. The counter-representations, however, of Andronicus, the envoy of Attalus, prevailed, and the senate decided against Prusias. In the event of failure, Menas had received a command from Prusias to put Nicomedes to death, in order to make way for his sons by a second wife; but he shrank from doing so, and entered into a conspiracy with Nicomedes and Andronicus against his master, inducing the 2000 soldiers whom Prusias had sent with him, to transfer their allegiance to Nicomedes. (App. Mithr. 4, 5; comp. Just. xxxiv. 4; Liv. Epit. 50; Polyb. xxxiii. 11, xxxvii. 2; Diod. xxxii. Eclog. iv. p. 523.) [E. E.]

MENAS (Μηνᾶς), a freedman of Pompey the Great and of Sextus Pompeius. Appian calls him MENODORUS (Μηνόδωρος), a name which he may not improbably have taken on his manumission. (See Dyer in the Classical Museum, vol. ii. p. 218.) In B. C. 40, Sextus Pompeius, being then in alliance with Antony against Octavian, sent out Menas with a large squadron of ships and four legions, with which he took Sardinia, and gained over two legions that were stationed there. Sardinia was soon after recaptured by Helenus, a favourite freedman of Octavian's; but Menas, in the same year (B. C. 40), was again entrusted by Sextus with a fleet to carry on operations against Octavian and Antony, who had just been reconciled to one another; and in this expedition he ravaged the Etrurian coast, and once more gained possession of Sardinia; but, wishing to secure a refuge in the protection of Octavian should circumstances make it desirable, he sent back to him Helenus and several other prisoners without ransom. In B. C. 39 he tried in vain to dissuade his master from concluding a peace with Octavian and Antony; and, at an entertainment given to them by Sextus on board his ship at Misenum, Menas suggested to him to cut the cables of the vessel, and, running it out to sea, despatch both his rivals. The treacherous proposal, however, was rejected by Pompeius. (Dion Cass. xlviii. 30. 36—38; Appian, B. C. v. 56, 66, 70—73; Plut. Ant. 32; Vell. Paterc. ii. 73, 77.) Meanwhile Pompey's suspicions of the fidelity of Menas had been excited by his dismissal of Helenus and his communication with Octavian, and had been further fomented by the representations of certain persons who were envious of his power in Sardinia. He therefore sent for him early in B. C. 38, on pretence of requiring an account of the provisions and money which he had had to administer. But Menas put all the messengers to death, and covenanted with Octavian to surrender to him the island, together with the whole force, military and naval, under his command. Octavian gladly embraced his offer, and not only refused to give him up, according to Dion, on the application of Sextus, but treated him with great distinction, advanced him to the equestrian order, and, investing him with the authority of legate under Calvisius Sabinus, placed him in command of the ships which he had himself brought over. In this capacity he was engaged in the naval campaign towards the end of B. C. 38, which was on the whole disastrous to Octavian, but in which Menas did good service, and, through his skilful seamanship, saved the ships entrusted to him from destruction by a storm which shattered a great portion of the fleet. (Dion Cass. xlviii. 45—48; Appian, B. C. v. 77—90.) Just before the re-commencement of hostilities between Sextus and Octavian, in B. C. 36, Menas again played the deserter, and returned to his old master's service, not only because the last campaign may have given him reason to think that the stronger side, but also because he was indignant at having merely a subordinate command assigned to him. In the operations which ensued, he gained some advantages over the enemies' ships; and having raised an impression that, formidable as an opponent, he might be equally useful as an ally, he again revolted to Octavian, being especially offended at not having been reinstated in his former command by Pompeius, under whose suspicion he felt uneasy. Octavian received him gladly, but continued to regard him with distrust. In B. C. 35 he accompanied his patron on his expedition to the north-eastern coast of the Adriatic, and was slain in the Pannonian campaign at the siege of Siscia. (Dion Cass. xlviii. 54, xlix. 1, 37; Appian, B. C. v. 96, 100, 101.)

According to the old scholiasts, the person so vehemently attacked by Horace in his fourth epode was no other than the subject of the present article. This statement has been called in question by many modern commentators; but their arguments, drawn exclusively from internal evidence, are far from satisfactory. The discussion of the point is, in this place, impossible, connected as it is with the vexata quaestio of the chronology of the poems of Horace. For the literature of the subject, see above, Vol. II. p. 522, and comp. Classical Museum, vol. ii. pp. 207—209, 217—221. [E. E.]

MENDEIS. [SITHON.]

MENDES (Μένδης), an Egyptian divinity, worshipped in the town of Mendes. He is said to have resembled the Arcadian Pan. (Herod. ii. 46; Strab. xvii. pp. 802, 812.) [L. S.]

MENE (Μήνη), a female divinity presiding over the months. (Hom. Hymn. xii. 1; Apollon. Rhod. iii. 533, iv. 55; August. De Civ. Dei, vii. 2.) [L. S.]

MENECLEIDAS (Μενεκλείδας), a Theban orator, was one of those who joined Pelopidas in delivering Thebes from Sparta and the oligarchical government in B. C. 379. After this, however, finding himself eclipsed by Pelopidas and Epaminondas, he strove in every way to bring them into discredit with their countrymen, and, in particular, he took part in the prosecution against them for having retained their command beyond the legal time in the campaign of B. C. 369. Being further exasperated by their acquittal, he continued his rancorous attacks on them; and, as he was a powerful speaker, he so far succeeded against Epaminondas as to exclude him from the office of Boeotarch. Against Pelopidas his efforts were of no avail, and he therefore endeavoured, in the true spirit of envy, to throw his merits into the shade, by advancing and exaggerating those of Charon. The latter had been successful in a slight skirmish of cavalry just before the great battle of Leuctra (B. C. 371), and Menecleidas brought forward a decree for commemorating the exploit by a picture, to be dedicated in one of the temples, and inscribed with Charon's name. For this he was impeached by Pelopidas, on the ground that the honour of all victories belonged, not to any individual, but to the state. He was found guilty and fined; and his inability to pay the penalty led him afterwards to enter into revolutionary designs against his country. (Plut. Pelop. 25. See Vol. II. p. 23, a.) [E. E.]

MENECLES (Μενεκλῆς). 1. Of Barce in Cyrene, is mentioned by Athenaeus (iv. p. 184) simply as an historian, and is perhaps the same as the one whose work in another passage (ix. p. 390) he mentions under the title of συναγωγή. There also existed an historical work on Athens (περὶ Ἀθηνῶν), the authorship of which was doubtful, even in antiquity, some attributing it to Menecles, and others to Callistratus (Harpocrat. s. vv. Κεραμεικός, ἑκατόμπεδον; Etym. Magn. s. v. Αἰολεῖς; Harpocrat., Phot., Suid. s. v. Ἑρμαῖ). But it is scarcely probable that this historian of Athens should be the same as Menecles of Barce. It is more likely that the Barcaean is identical with the author of a work on the history of Libya, who is mentioned in an anonymous treatise, De Mulieribus Bello claris, § 10, which is printed in the Bibliothek der Alt. Lit. und Kunst, vi. p. 21. It is highly probable that the Menecles of Barce was also the author of a work from which a fragment concerning Battus of Cyrene, is still extant. (Schol. ad Pind.

Pyth. iv. 10 ; Tzetz. ad Lyc. 886 ; Schol. Hom. Il. v. 640.)

2. Of Alabanda, a celebrated rhetorician, who lived shortly before the time of Cicero. He and his brother Hierocles taught rhetoric at Rhodes, where the orator M. Antonius heard them, about B. C. 94. They both belonged to the Asiatic or florid school of eloquence, which was distinguished more for pomp and elegance of diction, than for precision of thought. But the two brothers enjoyed extraordinary reputation, for Cicero says that they were imitated by all Asia. (Cic. Brut. 95, Orat. 69, de Orat. ii. 23 ; Strab. xiv. p. 661.) [L. S.]

MENE'CRATES (Μενεκράτης), a freedman of Sextus Pompeius, was sent out by him as commander of a large squadron of ships, in B. C. 38, to act against Calvisius Sabinus (Octavian's admiral) and MENAS, the renegade. The fleets came to an engagement off Cumae, and Menecrates had the advantage over the enemy in manoeuvring ; but burning with hatred against Menas, he attacked and grappled with the ship in which he sailed, and though disabled by a severe wound, continued to encourage his men until he saw that the enemy was on the point of capturing his vessel. He then threw himself overboard and perished. (Dion Cass. xlviii. 46 ; Appian, B. C. v. 81, 82.) [E. E.]

MENE'CRATES (Μενεκράτης). 1. A comic poet, mentioned only by Suidas, who says δράματα αὐτοῦ Μανέκτωρ ἢ Ἑρμιονεύς, where the plural δράματα suggests the alteration of ἢ to καί. Μανέκτωρ is obviously an abbreviation of Μάνης Ἕκτωρ, a title which seems to belong to the Middle Comedy. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. p. 469 ; Meineke, Hist. Crit. Com. Graec. p. 493.)

2. Of Smyrna, the author of two epigrams in the Greek Anthology (Brunck, Anal. vol. i. p. 476 ; Jacobs, Anth. Graec. vol. i. p. 227), is not improbably the same as Menecrates of Ephesus, a poet mentioned by Varro, de Re Rustica, i. 1. (See Jacobs, Anth. Graec. vol. xiii. pp. 916, 917.) [P. S.]

MENE'CRATES, a sculptor, of whom we only know, what shows him, however, to have been a very eminent artist, that he was the teacher of Apollonius and Tauriscus, the sculptors of the celebrated group of the Farnese Bull. (Plin. H. N. xxxvi. 5. s. 4. § 10.) [P. S.]

MENE'CRATES (Μενεκράτης), a Syracusan physician at the court of Philip, king of Macedon, B. C. 359—336. He seems to have been a successful practitioner, but to have made himself ridiculous by calling himself "Jupiter," and assuming divine honours. (Suid. s. v. Μενεκράτης.) He once wrote a letter to Philip, beginning Μενεκράτης Ζεὺς Φιλίππῳ χαίρειν, to which the king wrote back an answer in these words, Φίλιππος Μενεκράτει ὑγιαίνειν.* (Athen. vii. p. 289 ; Aelian. Var. Hist. xii. 51.) He was invited one day by Philip to a magnificent entertainment, where the other guests were sumptuously fed, while he himself had nothing but incense and libations, as not being subject to the human infirmity of hunger. He was at first pleased with his reception, but afterwards, perceiving the joke, and finding that no more substantial food was offered him, he left the party in disgust. (Athen, Aelian, l. c.)

2. TIBERIUS CLAUDIUS QUIRINA (Κουίρεινα†) MENECRATES, a physician mentioned in a Greek inscription (Gruter, Inscript. p. 581. § 9), is no doubt the same person who is frequently quoted by Galen. He lived in the former part of the first century after Christ, and was physician to some of the emperors, probably to Tiberius and Claudius. He enjoyed a great reputation, and composed more than 150 medical works, of which only a few fragments remain. He was the inventor of the well-known plaister called diachylon (i. e. διὰ χυλῶν), and his directions for preparing it were put into verse by Damocrates. (Galen, de Compos. Medicam. sec. Gen. vii. 9, 10, vol. xiii. pp. 995, &c.) In consequence of his having observed how easily the signs and contractions used in medical formulae were mistaken by careless transcribers, he wrote the quantities, &c. in his prescriptions at full length ; but Galen tells us (l. c.) that his carefulness did not much benefit posterity, as his works were afterwards written with the usual contractions. The Menecrates Zeophletensis (or native of Zeophleta?) quoted by Caelius Aurelianus (De Morb. Chron. i. 4, p. 323) may be the same person as the preceding. [W. A. G.]

MENEDAEUS or MENE'DATUS (Μενεδαῖος, Μενέδατος), a Spartan, was one of the three leaders of the Peloponnesian force which was sent to aid the Aetolians in the reduction of Naupactus, in B. C. 426. The place, however, was saved by Demosthenes, with the help of the Acarnanians. In the same year Menedaeus was engaged in the expedition against Amphilochian Argos ; and after the death of his two colleagues, Eurylochus and Macarius, at the battle of Olpae, he concluded with Demosthenes and the Acarnanian generals a secret agreement, by which the Peloponnesians were permitted to withdraw in safety, leaving their allies, the Ambraciots, to their fate. (Thuc. iii. 100—102, 105—111.) [E. E.]

MENEDE'MUS, historical. 1. One of the generals of Alexander the Great, who was sent against Spitamenes, but was surprised and slain, together with 2000 foot-soldiers and 300 horse. (Arrian, iv. 3. § 15 ; Curt. vii. 7, 9.)

2. A native of Alabanda, the leader of part of the forces of Antiochus in Coelesyria. (Polyb. v. 69, 79, 82.)

3. Chief of that part of Macedonia which bore the name of Libera. He took part with Caesar in the civil war B. C. 48. (Caes. B. C. iii. 34.) He is probably the same with the Menedemus mentioned by Cicero with considerable aversion as a friend of Caesar (Philipp. xiii. 16, ad Att. xv. 2, 4.) [C. P. M.]

MENEDE'MUS (Μενέδημος), historical. 1. A citizen of high rank at Crotona, who was appointed one of the generals to carry on the war against the exiles that had been driven from the city on occasion of the war with Syracuse in B. C. 317. Together with Paron, his colleague in the command, he totally defeated the exiles and their auxiliaries, and put them all to the sword. (Diod. xix. 10.) It appears that he subsequently raised himself to the supreme power in his native city ; and in that position entered into friendly relations with Agathocles; notwithstanding which the latter took an opportunity to make himself master of Crotona, by a sudden and treacherous attack. (Id. xxi. Exc. Hoesch. p. 490.) This must have been about 295 B. C.

* According to Plutarch, it was Agesilaus from whom he got this answer to his letter. (Vita Ages. c. 21, vol. vi. p. 29, ed. Tauchn. ; Apophthegm. Reg. et Imper. vol. ii. p. 52, Apophthegm. Lacon. vol. ii. p. 109.)

2. A general of the Rhodians, who, during the siege of Rhodes by Demetrius Poliorcetes (B. C. 305—304), intercepted and took many ships that were bringing provisions and supplies to Demetrius, including one containing presents for the king himself from Phila, which were immediately sent to Ptolemy in Egypt. (Diod. xx. 93; Plut. Demetr. 22.)

3. A friend and attendant of Lucullus, who was thought to have saved the life of that general during the war against Mithridates, by refusing to admit a Scythian chief named Olthacus into the tent where Lucullus was sleeping. (Plut. Lucull. 16; Appian. Mithr. 79.) [E. H. B.]

MENEDE'MUS (Μενέδημος), literary. 1. A Greek philosopher, a native of Eretria, the son of a man named Cleisthenes, who, though of noble birth, belonging to the family of the Theopropidae, was poor, and worked for a livelihood either as a builder or as a tent-maker, both which trades were learnt and practised by Menedemus. According to Diogenes Laërtius, he seized the opportunity afforded by his being sent on some military service to Megara to hear Plato, and abandoned the army to addict himself to philosophy. But it may be questioned whether he was old enough to have heard Plato before the death of the latter; if the duration of his life as given by Diogenes is accurate, it would have been impossible, for at the time of Plato's death he would have been only about four years old. Ritter considers the account to have arisen from a confusion of names. According to the story in Athenaeus (iv. p. 168), he and his friend Asclepiades got their livelihood as millers, working during the night, that they might have leisure for philosophy in the day. Menedemus and his friend Asclepiades afterwards became disciples of Stilpo at Megara. From Megara they went to Elis, and placed themselves under the instruction of some disciples of Phaedo. On his return to Eretria Menedemus established a school of philosophy, which was called the Eretriac. He did not, however, confine himself to philosophical pursuits, but took an active part in the political affairs of his native city, and came to be the leading man in the state, though at first he had been regarded with contempt and dislike. He went on various embassies to Ptolemaeus (probably Ptolemaeus Ceraunus), to Lysimachus, and to Demetrius, and seems to have done his native city good service by procuring for it a remission of part of the tribute paid to Demetrius, and opposing the machinations of his emissaries. At some period of his life he visited Cyprus, and greatly incensed the tyrant Nicocreon by the freedom of his remarks. The story of his having been in Egypt and having something to do with the making of the Septuagint version, which is found in Aristeas, is no doubt erroneous. He was in high favour with Antigonus Gonatas, and induced the Eretrians to address to him a public congratulation after his victory over the Gauls. This led to his being suspected of the treacherous intention of betraying Eretria into the power of Antigonus. According to one account, these suspicions induced him to quit Eretria secretly and take refuge in the sanctuary of Amphiaraus, at Oropus. But some golden vessels belonging to the temple having been lost while he was there, the Boeotians compelled him to leave it. He then betook himself to the court of Antigonus, where he shortly after died of grief. According to another account, he went from Eretria to Antigonus for the purpose of inducing him to interfere to establish the freedom of his native city; but not succeeding, starved himself to death in the 74th year of his age, probably about the year B. C. 277.

As a teacher, his intercourse with his disciples was marked by the entire absence of all formality and restraint, though he seems to have been noted for the sternness with which he rebuked all kinds or dissoluteness and intemperance; insomuch, that the fear of incurring his censure seems occasionally to have acted as a salutary check. He lived with his friend Asclepiades, between whom and himself there existed an intimacy which resembled that of Pylades and Orestes. For the latter part of his life, at any rate, he seems to have lived in considerable affluence. Athenaeus (x. p. 419) and Diogenes Laërtius give a somewhat curious account of the convivial usages established at his entertainments. Menedemus was twice married. He and Asclepiades married daughter and mother. His first wife he divorced when he rose to distinction in the government of Eretria, that he might marry one of rank and wealth, though the management of the household was still left to the former wife, whom Asclepiades married, his first wife being dead. By his wife Oropia, Menedemus had three daughters. He was remarkable in his old age for his bodily strength and vigour. He is reported to have been of a somewhat superstitious turn of mind.

Epicrates, in a passage quoted by Athenaeus (ii. p. 59), classes Menedemus with Plato and Speusippus; but it appears, from Diogenes Laërtius, that his opinion of Plato and Xenocrates was not very high. Of Stilpo he had a great admiration.

Of the philosophy of Menedemus little is known, except that it closely resembled that of the Megarian school. [EUCLEIDES.] Its leading feature was the dogma of the oneness of the Good, which he carefully distinguished from the Useful.

All distinctions between virtues he regarded as merely nominal. The Good and the True he looked upon as identical. In dialectics he rejected all merely negative propositions, maintaining that truth could be predicated only of those which were affirmative, and of these he admitted only such as were identical propositions. He was a keen and vehement disputant, frequently arguing, if we may believe Antigonus Carystius, as quoted by Diogenes, till he was black in the face. In his elocution he was not easy to be understood. He never committed any of his philosophical doctrines to writing. (Diog. Laërt. ii. 125—144; Athen. l. c.; Cic. Academ. ii. 42; Plut. De Adul. et Amici Disc. p. 55, c.; Strab. ix. p. 393, c.; Ritter, Geschichte der Philosophie, book vii. c. 5.)

2. A Cynic philosopher, or rather fanatic, a disciple of Colotes of Lampsacus. He used to go about garbed as an Erinnys, proclaiming himself a sort of spy from the infernal regions. (Diog. Laërt. vi. 102.) Suidas (s. v. φαίος) relates the same of Menippus, probably by mistake.

3. If the text of Aulus Gellius be correct (xiii.

5), a distinguished disciple of Aristotle, a native of Rhodes, bore the name Menedemus.

4. An Athenian rhetorician, who came to Rome and taught there in the time of L. Crassus the orator. (Cic. de Orat. i. 19.) [C. P. M.]

MENELA'US (Μενέλαος, Μενέλεως, or Μενέλαας), a son of Atreus, and younger brother of Agamemnon and Anaxibia. He was king of Lacedaemon, and married to the beautiful Helen, by whom he was the father of Hermione and Megapenthes (Hom. Il. vii. 470, x. 37, Od. iv. 11, &c. xi. 469 ; comp. AGAMEMNON). When his wife Helen had been carried off by Paris, Menelaus and Odysseus set out to Troy to claim her back. Menelaus was hospitably treated by Antenor (Hom. Il. iii. 206), but the journey was of no avail, and the Trojan Antimachus even advised his fellow-citizens to kill Menelaus and Odysseus (xi. 139, &c.). In order, therefore, to avenge the rape of Helen, and to punish the offender, Menelaus and his brother resolved to march against Troy with all the forces that Greece could muster (i. 159, ii. 589, iii. 351, &c.). The two brothers, in their travels through Greece to rouse the chiefs to avenge the insult offered to a Greek prince, also visited Odysseus in Ithaca (Hom. Od. xxiv. 115), along with whom Menelaus is said to have consulted the Delphic oracle about the expedition against Troy ; and at Delphi he dedicated the necklace of Helen to Athena Pronoea (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1466). Hereupon Menelaus in sixty ships led the inhabitants of Lacedaemon, Pharis, Sparta, Messe, Bryseiae, Amyclae, Helos, Laas, and Oetylus, against Troy (Il. ii. 581, &c.). In Troas he was under the special protection of Hera and Athena, and one of the most gallant heroes (iv. 8, 129, v. 715), who slew many Trojans, such as Scamandrius (v. 50), Pylaemenus (v. 576), Peisander (xiii. 614, &c.), Dolops (xv. 541), Thoas (xvi. 311), Euphorbus (xvii. 45), and Podes (xvii. 575).

We shall pass over his minor exploits, and mention only his engagement with Paris. When Menelaus saw his chief enemy stepping forth from the Trojan ranks, he rejoiced like a lion at the sight of a stag, and leaped from his chariot to attack him (Il. iii. 27, &c.) ; but Paris took to flight, until, encouraged by Hector, he challenged Menelaus to decide the contest for the possession of Helen and the treasures by single combat (iii. 97, &c.). Menelaus accepted the challenge, and his spear penetrated the shield of Paris, but did not wound him. Menelaus thereupon drew his sword, which, however, broke on the shield of his opponent. He then seized him by the helmet, and dragged him to the camp of the Achaeans. But Aphrodite loosened the helmet and wrapped her favourite in a cloud, in which he escaped from his enemy (iii. 325, &c., iv. 12, &c.). At the funeral games of Patroclus, Menelaus fought with Antilochus in the chariot race, but voluntarily gave up the second prize, and was satisfied with the third (xxiii. 293, 401, 516—609). Menelaus also was one of the heroes concealed in the wooden horse (Od. iv. 280 ; comp. Virg. Aen. ii. 264) ; and, along with Odysseus, he hastened to the house of Deiphobus, as soon as the town was taken (Od. viii. 518 ; Virg. Aen. vi. 523). After the destruction of Troy, he advised the assembled Achaeans to return home, which involved him in a dispute with his brother (Od. iii. 141, &c.). He was among the first that sailed away from Troy, accompanied by his wife Helen and Nestor (Od. iii. 276). When near the coast of Attica, his steersman Phrontis died, and Menelaus was detained some time by his burial. When he reached Maleia, Zeus sent a storm, in which part of his ships were thrown on the coast of Crete, and five others and Menelaus himself landed in Egypt (iii. 278 ; comp. Paus. x. 25. § 2). After this he wandered about for eight years in the eastern parts of the Mediterranean, where he visited Cyprus, Phoenicia, the Ethiopians, the Erembians, and Libya. These Eastern people were not so inhospitable as those in the West who were visited by Odysseus, and on his return home Menelaus brought with him a large number of presents which he had received (Od. iii. 301, 312, iv. 90, 128, 131, 228, 617 ; comp. Herod. ii. 113, 116). His last stay on his wanderings was in the island of Pharos, near the coast of Egypt, where he remained twenty days (Od. iv. 355), being kept back by the gods. Hunger already began to affect his companions, and his steersman Canobus died (Strab. p. 801). Eidothea, the daughter of Proteus, advised him to seize her father, who would reveal to him the means of returning home. Proteus, when caught, told him that he must first return to Egypt and propitiate the gods with hecatombs. This Menelaus did, and having there erected a monument to his brother, whose death he learned from Proteus, he, next to Odysseus, the last of the heroes, returned home, and arrived at Sparta on the very day on which Orestes was engaged in burying Clytaemnestra and Aegisthus (Od. iv. 365 ; comp. i. 286, iii. 257, 311). Henceforward he lived with Helen at Sparta in peace, comfort, and wealth, and his palace shone in its splendour like the sun or the moon (iv. 45, 72, 80 ; comp. Paus. iii. 14. § 6). At the time when Telemachus came to him to inquire after his father, Menelaus was just solemnising the marriage of his daughter Hermione with Neoptolemus, and of his son Megapenthes with a daughter of Alector (iv. 1, &c.). According to the Homeric poems Menelaus was a man of an athletic figure ; he spoke little, but what he said was always impressive ; he was brave and courageous, but milder than Agamemnon, intelligent and hospitable. According to the prophecy of Proteus, Menelaus and Helen were not to die, but the gods were to conduct them to Elysium (iv. 561) ; but according to a later tradition, he and Helen went to the Taurians, where they were sacrificed by Iphigeneia to Artemis (Ptolem. Heph. 4). Menelaus was worshipped as a hero at Therapne, where also his tomb and that of Helen were shown (Paus. iii. 19. § 9). On the chest of Cypselus he was represented at the moment when, after the taking of Troy, he was on the point of killing Helen. (Paus. v. 18. § 1 ; comp. Millingen, Inedit. Monum. i. 32). [HELENA.] [L. S.]

MENELA'US (Μενέλαος), historical. 1. Father of Amyntas II., king of Macedonia, and grandfather of Philip of Macedon, according to Justin (vii. 4) and Aelian (V. H. xii. 43).* But there is much discrepancy on this point: Dexippus (ap. Syncell. p. 263, a.) calls the father of Amyntas Arrhidaeus ; and Diodorus (xv. 60), Tharraleos. Justin represents him as brother of Alexander the First, king of Macedonia, which is a gross error. (See Clinton, F. H. vol. ii. p. 225.)

* The latter author states that he was of illegitimate birth.

2. A son of Amyntas II., king of Macedonia, by his wife Gygaea. (Justin. vii. 4.) According to Justin, he was put to death by his step-brother Philip, after the capture of Olynthus, B. C. 347. (Id. viii. 3.)

3. Son of Lagus, and brother of Ptolemy Soter. His name does not occur among the officers or generals of Alexander during the lifetime of that monarch, though it is incidentally mentioned by Phylarchus (ap. Athen. xii. p. 539, d.) in terms that would seem to imply that he then already occupied a distinguished position. (See also Aelian, V. H. ix. 3.) The first occasion on which he appears in history is in B. C. 315, when he was appointed by his brother to the chief command of the forces despatched to Cyprus, where they were destined to co-operate with the fleet of Seleucus, and with Nicocreon, king of Salamis. (Diod. xix. 62.) By their combined efforts, they soon reduced all the cities of Cyprus to subjection, with the exception of Cittium; and that also, it would appear, must have ultimately submitted. Menelaus now remained in the island, which he governed with almost absolute authority, the petty princes of the several cities being deposed, imprisoned, or assassinated on the slightest symptom of disaffection. He still held the chief command in 306, when Demetrius Poliorcetes arrived in Cyprus with a powerful fleet and army. Unable to contend with this formidable antagonist in the open field, Menelaus drew together all his forces, and shut himself up within the walls of Salamis, which he prepared to defend to the utmost. But having risked an action under the walls of the town, he was defeated with much loss; and Demetrius pressed the siege with his wonted vigour. Menelaus, however, succeeded in burning his battering engines; and by the most strenuous exertions, made good his defence until the arrival of Ptolemy himself, with a powerful fleet, to the relief of the island. In the great sea-fight that ensued, Menelaus sent a squadron of sixty ships to assist Ptolemy; but though these succeeded in forcing their way out of the harbour of Salamis, they came too late to retrieve the fortune of the day; and the total defeat of the Egyptian fleet having extinguished all his hopes of succour, he immediately afterwards surrendered the city of Salamis, with all his forces, both military and naval, into the hands of Demetrius. The conqueror, with characteristic magnanimity, sent him back to Egypt, accompanied by his friends, and carrying with him all his private property. (Diod. xix. 62, 79, xx. 21, 47—53; Plut. Demetr. 15—17; Justin. xv. 2; Paus. i. 6, § 6.) From this time we hear no more of Menelaus. There is a coin, attributed to him, which must have been struck during the period of his occupation of Cyprus. (Borrell, Notice de Quelques Médailles des Rois de Chypre, p. 64.)

4. Onias, son of Simon, who was made high-priest of the Jews by Antiochus Epiphanes, assumed the name of Menelaus. (Joseph. Ant. xii. 5. § 1.) [E. H. B.]

MENELA'US (Μενέλαος), literary. 1. Of Anaea in Caria, is called by Stephanus Byzantinus (s. v. Ἀναία) a peripatetic philosopher, and a great historian, but is otherwise unknown.

2. Of Maratho in Phoenicia, a Greek rhetorician, whose assistance C. Sempronius Gracchus was said to have used in composing his speeches. (Cic. Brut. 26.)

3. Of Aegae, an epic poet, who among other works which are not specified, wrote an epic poem, Thebais (Θηβαΐς), consisting, according to Suidas, of twelve, and according to Eudocia, of thirteen books. As Longinus mentioned Menelaus with praise, he must have lived before A. D. 273, for in that year Longinus died (Waltz, Rhet. Graec. vi. p. 93; Ruhnken, Dissert. de Vit. et Script. Longini, 30, &c. ed. Toupius). The first five books of this epic are referred to by Stephanus Byzantinus (s. vv. Τέμμιξ, Τρμίνη, Ἀμφιγένεια, Λύκαια, Εὕτρησις), but no fragments of any importance have come down to us. [L. S.]

MENELA'US (Μενέλαος), a Greek mathematician, a native of Alexandria, the author of a treatise in three books, on the Sphere, which is comprised in the mathematical collection called μικρὸς ἀστρονόμος, or μικρὸς ἀστρονομούμενος. Menelaus is mentioned by Pappus, Proclus, and Ptolemaeus, who, in his Magna Syntaxis (p. 170), says that he made some astronomical observations at Rome in the first year of the emperor Trajan (A. D. 98). He is probably the same with the Menelaus introduced by Plutarch in his dialogue De Facie in Orbe Lunae, p. 930. Besides his work on the Sphere, Menelaus wrote a treatise "On the Quantity and Distinction of Mixed Bodies." Both works were translated into Syriac and Arabic. A Latin translation of the treatise on the Sphere was published at Paris in 1644; and it was also published by Marinus Mersennus in his Synopsis Mathematica, Paris, 1644. This edition contained many additions and interpolations. A more correct edition was published at Oxford by Halley, a reprint of which, with a preface by G. Costard, appeared in 1758. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iv. pp. 16, 23.) [C. P. M.]

MENELA'US, a pupil of Stephanus, was the sculptor of a marble group in the villa Ludovisi at Rome, which bears the inscription ΜΕΝΕΛΑΟΣ ΣΤΕΦΑΝΟΥ ΜΑΘΗΤΗΣ ΕΠΟΙΕΙ. The group, which consists of a male and female figure, the size of life, has been differently explained. It used to be taken to refer to the story of Papirius and his mother. (Aul. Gell. i. 23.) Thiersch maintains that it is impossible not to recognise the Roman matron in the female figure, and in both the expression of maternal and filial love; and he supposes that it represents some scene from the family life of the Caesars, probably Octavia and Marcellus, "Tu Marcellus eris, manibus date lilia plenis," &c. (Epochen, pp. 295, 296.) Winckelmann at first took it for Phaedra and Hippolytus (Geschichte d. Kunst, Vorrede, § 5); but he afterwards explained it as representing the recognition of Orestes by Electra (bk. xi. c. 2. § 29), and this supposition has been generally adopted. Thiersch (l. c.) refers the work to the Augustan age. [Compare STEPHANUS.] [P. S.]

MENE'MACHUS (Μενέμαχος), a physician born at one of the cities named Aphrodisias, who belonged to the medical sect of the Methodici, and lived in the second century after Christ. (Galen, Introd. c. 4, vol. xiv. p. 684, De Meth. Med. i. 7, vol. x. p. 53, 54.) He wrote some works which are not now extant, and is probably the physician quoted by Caelius Aurelianus (De Morb. Acut. ii. 1. p. 75), Galen (De Compos. Medicam. sec. Locos. iii. 1, vol. xii. p. 625), and Oribasius (Coll. Medic. vii. 21, p. 218, and in Matthaei's collection, Mosq. 1808). The Menemachus, however, who is quoted by Celsus (De Medic. vi. 9, p. 129), is not the same person, and must have lived at least a century earlier. [W. A. G.]

MENE'NIA GENS, was a very ancient and illustrious patrician house at Rome from B. C. 503 to B. C. 376. Its only cognomen is Lanatus. [LANATUS.] Cicero (ad Fam. xiii. 9) mentions a Menenian tribe, and Appian a Menenius who was proscribed by the triumvirs in B. C. 43, and rescued from death by the self-devotion of one of his slaves. (B. C. iv. 44.) [W. B. D.]

MENEPHRON, an Arcadian, who is said to have lived in incestuous intercourse with his mother Blias and his daughter Cyllene. (Ov. Met. vii. 386; Hygin. Fab. 253, who calls him Menophrus.) [L. S.]

MENES (Μένης), a Thracian, from whom the town of Menebria or Mesembria was said to have received its name. (Strab. vii. p. 319.) [L. S.]

MENES (Μήνης). This is the most usual form of the name, which, however, we also find written as Menas, Menis, Meinis, Men, Min, and Mein (Μηνᾶς, Μῆνις, Μεῖνις, Μῆν, Μῖν, Μεῖν). Menes was the first king of Egypt, according to the traditions of the Egyptians themselves. Herodotus records of him that he built Memphis on a piece of ground which he had rescued from the river by turning it from its former course, and erected therein a magnificent temple to Hephaestus (Pthah). (Comp. Diod. i. 50; Wess. ad loc.) Diodorus tells us that he introduced into Egypt the worship of the gods and the practice of sacrifices, as well as a more elegant and luxurious style of living. As the author of this latter innovation, his memory was dishonoured many generations afterwards by king Tnephachthus, the father of Bocchoris; and Plutarch mentions a pillar at Thebes in Egypt, on which was inscribed an imprecation against Menes, as the introducer of luxury. There is a legend also, preserved by Diodorus, which relates (in defiance of chronology, unless Mendes is to be substituted for Menas), that he was saved from drowning in the lake of Moeris by a crocodile, in gratitude for which he established the worship of the animal, and built a city near the lake called the City of Crocodiles, erecting there a pyramid to serve as his own tomb. That he was a conqueror, like other founders of kingdoms, we learn from an extract from Manetho preserved by Eusebius. By Marsham and others he has been identified with the Mizraim of Scripture. According to some accounts he was killed by a hippopotamus. (Herod. ii. 4, 99; Diod. i. 43, 45, 89; Wess. ad loc.; Plut. De Is. et Osir. 8; Perizon. Orig. Aegypt. c. 5; Shuckford's Connection, bk. iv.; Bunsen, Aegyptens Stelle in der Weltgeschichte, vol. ii. pp. 38—45.) [E. E.]

MENES (Μένης), a citizen of Pella, son of Dionysius, was one of the officers of Alexander the Great; and after the battle of Issus (B. C. 333) was admitted by the king into the number of his body-guards, in the room of Balacrus, who was promoted to the satrapy of Cilicia. In B. C. 331, after Alexander had occupied Susa, he sent Menes down to the Mediterranean to take the government of Syria, Phoenicia, and Cilicia, entrusting him at the same time with 3000 talents, a portion of which he was to transmit to Antipater for his war with the Lacedaemonians and the other confederate states of Greece. Apollodorus of Amphipolis was joined with him in this command. (Arr. Anab. ii. 12, iii. 16; Diod. xvii. 64; Curt. v. 1; Freinsh. ad loc.) [E. E.]

MENESAECHMUS (Μενέσαιχμος), an Athenian, an inveterate enemy of the orator Lycurgus, by whom he was impeached on a charge of impiety and convicted. When Lycurgus felt his end drawing near, he had himself brought into the council to give an account of his public conduct, and Menesaechmus was the only man who ventured to find fault with it. He continued his hostility to the sons of Lycurgus after their father's death, and so far succeeded in a prosecution against them, that they were delivered into the custody of the Eleven. They were released, however, on the remonstrance of Demosthenes. (Pseudo-Plut. Vit. X. Orat. Lycurg.; Phot. Bibl. Cod. 268; Suid. s. vv. Λυκοῦργος, προηροσίαι; Harpocr. s. vv. Ἀρκύωρος, Δηλιασταί.) [E. E.]

MENESAECHMUS. [MNESAECHMUS.]

MENESTHES, an architect, whose pseudo-dipteral temple of Apollo is mentioned by Vitruvius (iii. 2. § 6. ed. Schneid.). [P. S.]

MENESTHEUS (Μενεσθεύς), a son of Peteus, an Athenian king, who led the Athenians against Troy, and surpassed all other mortals in arranging the war-steeds and men for battle (Hom. Il. ii. 552, &c., iv. 327; Philostr. Her. ii. 16; Paus. ii. 25. § 6). With the assistance of the Tyndarids, he is said to have driven Theseus from his kingdom, and to have died at Troy (Plut. Thes. 32, 35; Paus. i. 17. § 6). A second personage of this name occurs in Virgil. (Aen. x. 129.) [L. S.]

MENESTHEUS (Μενεσθεύς), son of Iphicrates, the famous Athenian general, by the daughter of Cotys, king of Thrace. Hence he said that he owed more to his mother than to his father; for that the latter, as far as in him lay, had made him a Thracian; the former had made him an Athenian. (Nep. Iph. 3; comp. Vol. II. p. 617, a.) He was born probably about B. C. 377 (see Rehdantz, Vit. Iphic. Chabr. Timoth. ii. § 4); and, as he grew up, his great height and size caused him to be thought older than he really was, so that he was called on, while yet a boy, to undertake λειτουργίαι, a demand which Iphicrates resisted. (Arist. Rhet. ii. 23. § 17.) He married the daughter of Timotheus; and in B. C. 356 was chosen commander in the Social war, his father and his father-in-law, according to C. Nepos, being appointed to aid him with their counsel and experience. They were all three impeached by their colleague, CHARES, for alleged misconduct and treachery in the campaign; but Iphicrates and Menestheus were acquitted in B. C. 355. (Nep. Tim. 3; Dion Hal. Dem. p. 667; Rehdantz, Vit. Iphic. &c., vi. § 7, vii. §§ 5, 7; comp. Diod. xvi. 21; Wess. ad loc.; Isocr. περὶ ἀντιδ. § 137.) Menestheus was distinguished for his military skill; and we find him again appointed commander of a squadron of 100 galleys, sent out, in B. C. 335, to check the Macedonians, who had intercepted some Athenian ships on their voyage down from the Euxine. We do not know the exact period of his death, but it took place before B. C. 325. (Plut. Phoc. 7; Pseudo-Dem., περὶ τῶν πρὸς Ἀλεξ. συνθ. p. 217, Epist. iii. p. 1482; Rehdantz, Vit. Iphic. &c., vii. § 8.) [IPHICRATES.] [E. E.]

MENESTHEUS, a sculptor whose name has been preserved by a fragment of a statue, bearing MENECΘETC MENECΘEωC AΦPOΔICIETC EΠOIEI. (Gruter, p. 1021, 2.) [P. S.]

MENE'STHIUS (Μενέσθιος). 1. A son of Areithous and Philomedusa, of Arne in Boeotia, was slain at Troy by Paris. (Hom. Il. vii. 9, &c., 136, &c.)

2. A son of the river-god Spercheius or of Borus and Polydora, was one of the commanders of the hosts of Achilles. (Hom. Il. xvi. 173, &c.) [L. S.]

MENE'STRATUS (Μενέστρατος), an Athenian, of the demus of Amphitrope, in the tribe Antiochis, who, being in danger from an accusation brought against him by the informer Agoratus, under the tyranny of the Thirty, saved his own life by giving false information against a number of his fellow-citizens. After the restoration of the democracy he was brought to trial for this, and condemned to be beaten to death,—ἀπετυμπανίσθη. (Lys. c. Agor. pp. 134, 135.) [E. E.]

MENE'STRATUS or MENESTAS (Μενέστρατος, Μενέστας), of Epeirus, was one of the chief instigators of the Aetolians to their war, in conjunction with Antiochus, against Rome, which commenced in B. C. 192. In the following year, when the Aetolians sued for peace, M'. Acilius Glabrio, the consul, demanded that Menestratus should be delivered up, but the demand was not complied with. (Polyb. xx. 10, xxii. 14; Liv. xxxvi. 28, xxxviii. 10.) [E. E.]

MENE'STRATUS (Μενέστρατος), artists. 1. A worthless painter, ridiculed in an epigram by Lucillius, who says that his Phaëthon was only fit for the fire, and his Deucalion for the water. (Brunck, Anal. vol. ii. p. 337. No. 93; Anth. Pal. xi. 213; comp. Martial, v. 53.) Nothing more is known of him, except what the epigram itself shows; namely, that he was a contemporary of Lucillius, and lived, therefore, in the time of Nero.

2. A sculptor, of uncertain time and country, whose Hercules and Hecate were greatly admired. The latter statue stood in the Opisthodomus (post aedem) of the temple of Artemis at Ephesus, and was made, says Pliny, of marble of such brilliancy that it was necessary to warn the beholders to shade their eyes. (Plin. H. N. xxxvi. 5. s. 4. § 10.) From this passage of Pliny, Sillig conjectures that the artist lived about the time of Alexander the Great. Tatian mentions him as the maker of a statue of a poetess named Learchis. (Adv. Graec. 52, p. 113, Worth.) [P. S.]

MENE'XENUS (Μενέξενος), an Athenian, son of Demophon, was a disciple of Socrates, and is introduced by Plato as one of the interlocutors in the dialogues Lysis and Menexenus. [C. P. M.]

ME'NIDAS (Μενίδας), one of the generals of Alexander the Great, whose name occurs on several occasions. (Arrian, iii. 13. § 4, 26. § 5; Curt. iv. 12, 15, 16, vii. 6, 10.) [C. P. M.]

MENIPPE (Μενίππη). 1. A daughter of Orion and sister of Metioche. After Orion was killed by Artemis, Menippe and Metioche were brought up by their mother, and Athena taught them the art of weaving, and Aphrodite gave them beauty. Once the whole of Aonia was visited by a plague, and the oracle of Apollo Gortynius, when consulted, ordered the inhabitants to propitiate the two Erinnyes by the sacrifice of two maidens, who were to offer themselves to death of their own accord. Menippe and Metioche offered themselves; they thrice invoked the infernal gods, and killed themselves with their shuttles. Persephone and Hades metamorphosed them into comets. The Aonians erected to them a sanctuary near Orchomenos, where a propitiatory sacrifice was offered to them every year by youths and maidens. The Aeolians called these maidens Coronides. (Ov. Met. xiii. 685; Anton. Lib. 25; Schol. ad Hom. Il. xviii. 486.)

2. A daughter of Peneius, and wife of Pelasgus, by whom she became the mother of Phrastor (Dionys. i. 28).

3. A daughter of Thamyris, and according to some the mother of Orpheus (Tzetz. Chil. i. 12).

4. A daughter of Nereus and Doris. (Hes. Theog. 260.) [L. S.]

MENIPPUS (Μένιππος), a son of Megareus, who was believed to be buried in the prytaneum at Megara. (Paus. i. 43. § 2.) [L. S.]

MENIPPUS (Μένιππος), historical. 1. One of those who, with Philistides, succeeded, against the opposition of Euphraeus, and by the aid of Philip of Macedon, in making themselves tyrants of Oreus in Euboea. They were driven out by the Athenians under Phocion, in B. C. 341. (Dem. Phil. iii. p. 126, De Cor. pp. 248, 252, &c.; comp. Aesch. c. Ctes. p. 68; Plut. Demosth. 17; Diod. xvi. 74.) [CALLIAS, Vol. I. p. 568, a; CLEITARCHUS.]

2. An officer of Philip V. of Macedon. In B. C. 208, when Philip was recalled from the war in the South against the Romans and Aetolians by tidings of disturbance and revolt in Macedonia, he left Menippus and Polyphantas in command of 2500 men for the protection of the Achaeans. In the following year Menippus was sent by Philip to aid in the defence of Chalcis in Euboea against Attalus I. of Pergamus and the Romans, by whom an unsuccessful attempt was made upon the town. (Liv. xxvii. 32, xxviii. 5, 6; Polyb. x. 42.)

3. One of the envoys of Antiochus the Great to Rome in B. C. 193, on which occasion, however, the negotiation failed in consequence of the demands of the Romans. (Liv. xxxiv. 57—59; App. Syr. 6.) [HEGESIANAX.] In B. C. 192, Menippus was sent by Antiochus as ambassador to the Aetolians, whom he stimulated to war with Rome by magnifying the power and resources of his master. In the same year Antiochus placed him in command of 3000 men to aid in intercepting all succours sent to Chalcis in Euboea by Eumenes II. of Pergamus and the Achaeans, who contrived, however, to throw aid into the town before the passage thither by sea and land had been barred by the Syrian forces. But, after Menippus had occupied the road to Antis, 500 Roman soldiers, also destined for the relief of Chalcis, arrived, and found themselves obliged to turn aside to Delium. Here, in spite of the sanctity of the place, they were suddenly attacked by Menippus, and were all slain except about fifty, whom he captured. (Liv. xxxv. 32, 33, 50, 51; comp. Diod. Exc. de Virt. et Vit. p. 574; App. Syr. 15.) [E. E.]

MENIPPUS (Μένιππος), literary. 1. A comic poet, according to Suidas; but Meineke suspects, on very good grounds, that the name is only a corruption of Hermippus. (Hist. Crit. Com. Graec. p. 494.)

2. A cynic philosopher, and originally a slave, was a native of Gadara in Coele-Syria (Steph. Byz. s. v. Γάδαρα; Strab. xvi. p. 759). Diogenes calls him a Phoenician: Coele-Syria was sometimes reckoned as a part of Phoenicia, sometimes not. He seems to have been a hearer of Diogenes. He amassed great wealth as a usurer (ἡμεροδανειστής), but was cheated out of it all, and committed suicide. Diogenes, who has given us a short life of him, with an epigram of his own upon him (ii. 99—100), informs us that he wrote nothing serious, but that his books were full of jests, like those of his contemporary Meleager; and Strabo and Stephanus call him σπουδόγελοιος; that is, he was one of those cynic philosophers who threw all their teaching into a satirical form. In this character he is several times introduced by Lucian, who in one place speaks of him as τῶν παλαιῶν κυνῶν μάλα ὑλακτικὸν καὶ κάρχαρον (Bis Accus. 33).

Even in the time of Diogenes, his works were somewhat uncertain; and they are now entirely lost: but we have considerable fragments of Varro's Saturae Menippeae, which were written in imitation of Menippus. (Cic. Acad. i. 2, 8; Gell. ii. 18; Macrob. Sat. i. 11.) The recent edition of the fragments of Varro by Oehler contains a short but excellent dissertation on the date of Menippus, whom he places at B. C. 60.

The works of Menippus were, according to Diogenes (vi. 101), thirteen in number, namely, Νεκυία, Διαθῆκαι, Ἐπιστολαὶ κεκομψευμέναι ἀπὸ τοῦ τῶν θεῶν προσώπου, πρὸς τοὺς φυσικοὺς καὶ μαθηματικοὺς καὶ γραμματικούς, καὶ γονὰς Ἐπικούρου καὶ τὰς θρησκευομένας ὑπ' αὐτῶν εἰκάδας, and others. (Comp. Menag. Observ. in loc.)

3. Of Stratonice, a Carian by birth, was the most accomplished orator of his time in all Asia. (About B. C. 79.) Cicero, who heard him, puts him almost on a level with the Attic orators (Brut. 91; Plut. Cic. 4; Diog. Laërt. vi. 101; Strab. xiv. p. 660).

4. Of Pergamus, a geographer, lived in the time of Augustus, and wrote a Περίπλους τῆς ἐντὸς θαλάττης, of which an abridgement was made by Marcianus, and of which some fragments are preserved. He is also quoted several times by Stephanus Byzantinus. (See Hoffmann, Menippos der Geograph. Leipz. 1841.) [P. S.]

MENIPPUS, artists. Diogenes Laërtius (vi. 101) mentions a statuary and two painters of this name. [P. S.]

MENO'CHARES (Μηνοχάρης), an officer of Demetrius Soter, king of Syria. In B. C. 161, when Demetrius had escaped from Rome and established himself on the Syrian throne, he sent Menochares to plead his cause with Tiberius Gracchus [No. 6.] and his fellow-commissioners, then in Cappadocia. In the following year, Menochares was sent by Demetrius to Rome, to conciliate the senate by the present of a golden crown and the surrender of Leptines, the assassin of Cn. Octavius, the Roman envoy. (Polyb. xxxi. 4, 6; Diod. xxxi. Exc. Leg. xxv. p. 626.) [LEPTINES, No. 6.] [E.E.]

MENODO'RUS, freedman of Pompey. [MENAS.]

MENODO'RUS (Μηνόδωρος), a writer on botany and materia medica, quoted by Athenaeus (Deipnos. ii. p. 59), who says he was a follower of Erasistratus, and a friend of the physician Hicesius. He lived, therefore, probably at the end of the first century B. C., and is perhaps the person who is quoted by Andromachus (ap. Gal. de Compos. Medicam. sec. Locos, vii. 3, vol. xiii. p. 64). [W. A. G.]

MENODO'RUS (Μενόδωρος), of Athens, a sculptor, who made for the Thespians a copy of the celebrated statue of Eros by Praxiteles, which originally stood at Thespiae, but was removed to Rome by the emperor Caligula. (Paus. ix. 27. §§ 3, 4, Bekker.) The date of this artist can only be conjectured by supposing that his copy was made about the same time that the original was removed, in order to supply its loss. There is nothing to determine whether or no he was the same person as the statuary mentioned by Pliny, who made athletas et armatos et venatores, sacrificantesque (H. N. xxxiv. 8. s. 19. § 34). [P. S.]

MENO'DOTUS (Μενόδοτος). 1. Of Samos, was the author of at least two works connected with the history of his native island. One bore the title Τῶν κατὰ Σάμον ἐνδόξων ἀναγραφή, and the other Περὶ τῶν κατὰ τὸ ἱερὸν τῆς Σαμίας Ἥρας. (Athen. xiv. p. 655, xv. pp. 672, 673.)

2. Of Perinthus, is referred to by Diodorus Siculus (Fragm. lib. xxvi. 3, p. 513) as the author of a work entitled Ἑλληνικαὶ πραγματεῖαι, in fifteen books, but is otherwise unknown.

3. The author of a work on the Athenian painter Theodorus. (Diog. Laërt. ii. 104.) [L. S.]

MENO'DOTUS (Μηνόδοτος), a physician of Nicomedeia in Bithynia, who was a pupil of Antiochus of Laodiceia, and tutor to Herodotus of Tarsus; he belonged to the medical sect of the Empirici, and lived probably about the beginning of the second century after Christ. (Diog. Laërt. ix. § 116; Galen, De Meth. Med. ii. 7, vol. x. p. 142, Introd. c. 4. vol. xiv. p. 683; Sext. Empir. Pyrrhon. Hypotyp. i. § 222, p. 57, ed. Fabric.) He refuted some of the opinions of Asclepiades of Bithynia (Gal. De Nat. Facult. i. 14, vol. ii. p. 52), and was exceedingly severe against the Dogmatici (id. De Subfig. Empir. c. 9, 13, vol. ii. pp. 343, 346, ed. Chart.). He enjoyed a considerable reputation in his day, and is several times quoted and mentioned by Galen. (De Cur. Rat. per Ven. Sect. c. 9, vol. xi. p. 277; Comment. in Hippocr. "De Artic." iii. 62, vol. xviii. pt. i. p. 575; Comment. in Hippocr. "De Rat. Vict. in Morb. Acut." iv. 17, vol. xv. p. 766; De Libr. Propr. c. 9, vol. xix. p. 38; De Compos. Medicam. sec. Locos, vi. i. vol. xii. p. 904.) He appears to have written some works which are quoted by Diogenes Laërtius, but are not now extant. There is, however, among Galen's writings a short treatise entitled, Γαλήνου Παραφράστου τοῦ Μηνοδότου Προτρεπτικὸς Λόγος ἐπὶ τὰς Τέχνας, Galeni Paraphrastae Menodoti Suasoria ad Artes Oratio. This is supposed to have been written originally by Menodotus, and afterwards revised and polished by Galen; but its history is not quite satisfactorily made out, and its genuineness (as far as Galen is concerned) has been doubted. Its object is sufficiently expressed by the title, and it is composed in a somewhat declamatory style, which has perhaps caused it to be both unduly admired, and unjustly depreciated. On the one hand, Erasmus translated it himself into Latin, and it has been several times published apart from Galen's other works; and on the other, a writer in the Cambridge Museum Criticum (vol. ii. p. 318) calls it "a very inferior composition, incorrect in language, inelegant in arrangement, and weak in argument." Perhaps the latest edition is that by Abr. Willet, Greek and Latin, 8vo. Lugd. Bat. 1812. [W. A. G.]

MENO'DOTUS, sculptor. [DIODOTUS, No. 2.]

MENOECEUS (Μενοικεύς). 1. A Theban, grandson of Pentheus, and father of Hipponome, Jocaste or Epicaste, and Creon. (Apollod. ii. 4. § 5, iii. 5. § 7 ; Eurip. Phoen. 10, and the schol. on 942.)

2. A grandson of the former, and a son of Creon. (Eurip. Phoen. 768.) In the war of the Seven Argives against Thebes, Teiresias declared that the Thebans should conquer, if Menoeceus would sacrifice himself for his country. Menoeceus accordingly killed himself outside the gates of Thebes (Eurip. Phoen. 913, 930 ; Apollod. iii. 6. § 7). Pausanias (ix. 25. § 1) relates that Menoeceus killed himself in consequence of an oracle of the Delphian god. His tomb was shown at Thebes near the Neitian gate. (Paus. l. c. ; comp. Stat. Theb. x. 755, &c., 790.) [L. S.]

MENOETES. The name of two mythical personages. (Virg. Aen. v. 161, &c. ; Ov. Met. xii. 116.) [L. S.]

MENOE'TIUS (Μενοίτιος). 1. A son of Iapetus and Clymene or Asia, and a brother of Atlas, Prometheus and Epimetheus, was killed by Zeus with a flash of lightning, in the fight of the Titans, and thrown into Tartarus. (Hes. Theog. 507, &c., 514 ; Apollod. i. 2. § 3 ; Schol. ad Aeschyl. Prom. 347.)

2. A son of Ceuthonymus, a guard of the oxen of Pluto. (Apollod. ii. 5. § 10 ; comp. HERACLES.)

3. A son of Actor and Aegina, a step-brother of Aeacus, and husband of Polymele, by whom he became the father of Patroclus. He resided at Opus, and took part in the expedition of the Argonauts (Hom. Il. xi. 785, xvi. 14, xviii. 326). Some accounts call his mother Damocrateia, and a daughter of Aegina ; and instead of Polymele they call his wife Sthenele or Periapis (Apollod. iii. 13. § 8 ; Schol. ad Pind. Ol. ix. 107 ; Strab. p. 425 ; comp. Val. Flacc. i. 407 ; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 112). When Patroclus, during a game, had slain the son of Amphidamas, Menoetius fled with him to Peleus in Phthia, and had him educated there (Hom. Il. xi. 770, xxiii. 85, &c. ; Schol. ad Pind. Ol. ix. 104). Menoetius was a friend of Heracles. (Diod. iv. 39.) [L. S.]

MENO'GENES (Μενογένης), one of the numerous commentators on Homer, who wrote a work in 23 books on the catalogue of ships in the second book of the Iliad. (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 199, ed. Basil.) [L. S.]

MENO'GENES, a statuary, who was admired for his quadrigae. (Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 8. s. 19. § 30.) [P. S.]

MENON (Μένων). 1. A citizen of Pharsalus in Thessaly, who aided the Athenians at Eion with 12 talents and 200 horsemen, raised by himself from his own penestae, and was rewarded by them for these services with the freedom of the city. (Dem. c. Arist. pp. 686, 687 ; Pseudo-Dem. περὶ συντάξεως, p. 173 ; Wolf, Proleg. ad Dem. c. Lept. p. 74.) By some this Menon has been identified with the Pharsalian who commanded the troops sent from his native city to the aid of the Athenians in the first year of the Peloponnesian war, B. C. 431 ; while the above-mentioned assistance at Eion is referred by them to the eighth year of the same war, B. C. 424. (Thuc. ii. 22, iv. 102, &c. ; Gedik. ad Plat. Men. p. 70.) Perhaps, however, the service may have been rendered at the siege of Eion by Cimon in B. C. 476 ; and in that case the Menon alluded to by Demosthenes may have been the father of the leader of Thessalian cavalry mentioned by Thucydides in B. C. 431. (Herod. vii. 107 ; Plut. Cim. 7 ; Paus. viii. 8 ; Thirlwall's Greece, vol. iii. p. 3.) [BOGES.]

2. An Athenian, a fellow-workman of PHEIDIAS, was suborned to bring against him the accusation by which he was ruined. For this service the faction which had employed Menon obtained for him from the people the privilege of ἀτέλεια. (Plut. Per. 31.)

3. A Thessalian adventurer, was a favourite of Aristippus of Larissa, who placed him in command of the forces, which he had obtained by the help of Cyrus the Younger in order to make head against a party opposed to him. When Cyrus began his expedition, in B. C. 401, Menon was sent by Aristippus to his aid with 1500 men, and joined the prince's army at Colossae. Cyrus having reached the borders of Cappadocia, employed Menon to escort back into her own country Epyaxa, the wife of Syennesis, the Cilician king. In passing through the defiles on the frontiers Menon lost a number of his men, who, according to one account, were cut off by the Cilicians ; and in revenge for this, his troops plundered the city of Tarsus and the royal palace. When the Cyrean army reached the Euphrates, Menon persuaded the soldiers under his command to be the first to cross the river, and thus to ingratiate themselves with the prince. At the battle of Cunaxa he commanded the left wing of the Greeks, and, after the battle, when Clearchus sent to Ariaeus to make an offer of placing him on the Persian throne, he formed one of the mission at his own request, as being connected with Ariaeus by ties of friendship and hospitality. He was again one of the four generals who accompanied Clearchus to his fatal interview with Tissaphernes, and was detained, together with his colleagues. Clearchus, in seeking the interview for the purpose of delivering up on both sides those who had striven to excite their mutual suspicions, had been instigated in a great measure by resentment against Menon, whom he suspected of having calumniated him to Ariaeus and Tissaphernes, with the view of obtaining the entire command of the army for himself. According to the statement which Ariaeus made to the Greeks immediately after the apprehension of the generals, Menon and Proxenus were honourably treated by the Persians, as having revealed the treachery of which he said Clearchus had been guilty ; and Ctesias relates, in ignorance certainly of the details and in direct opposition to Xenophon, that Clearchus himself distrusted Tissaphernes, and that the army was induced by the arts of Menon to compel him to agree to the interview. That Menon did really act a treacherous part towards his countrymen is by no means improbable, as well from the circumstances of the case as from his character, even if we make all allowance for some colouring which Xenophon's personal hostility to the man may have thrown into his invective against him. As to his fate, Ctesias merely says that he was not executed with the other generals ; but Xenophon tells us that he was put to death by lingering tortures, which lasted for a whole year. If this latter account is the true one, Bishop Thirlwall's hypothesis seems not improbable, viz., that he was given up to the vengeance of Parysatis as a compensation for the rejection of her entreaties on behalf of Clearchus and his colleagues. There can be no doubt of the identity of the subject of the present article with the Menon introduced in the dialogue of Plato, which bears his name. (Xen. Anab. i. 1. § 10, 2. §§ 6, 20—25, 4. §§ 13—17, 5. §§ 11—17, 7. § 1, 8. § 4, ii. 1. § 5, 2. § 1, 5. §§ 28, 31, 38, 6. §§ 21—29; Diod. xiv. 19, 27; Ctes. *Pers. ap. Phot. 4. A citizen of Pharsalus in Thessaly, and a man of great influence and reputation, took a prominent part in the Lamian war, and commanded the Thessalian cavalry in the battle with the Macedonians, in which LEONNATUS was slain. Plutarch tells us that his services were highly valued by the confederates, and that he held a place in their estimation second only to Leosthenes. At the battle of Cranon (B. C. 322), he and Antiphilus, the Athenian, were defeated by Antipater and Craterus, though the Thessalian horse under his command maintained in the action its superiority over that of the enemy; and they felt themselves compelled to open a negotiation with the conquerors, which led to the dissolution of the Greek confederacy. But when Antipater was obliged to cross over to Asia against Perdiccas, the Aetolians renewed the war, and were zealously seconded in Thessaly by Menon, through whose influence it probably was that most of the Thessalian towns were induced to take part in the insurrection. Soon after, however, he was defeated by Polysperchon in a pitched battle, in which he himself was slain, B. C. 321. His daughter Phthia he gave in marriage to Aeacides, king of Epeirus, by whom she became the mother of Pyrrhus. (Diod. xviii. 15, 17, 38; Plut. Pyrrh. 1, Phoc. 24, 25; Droysen, Gesch. der Nachf. Alex. pp. 71, 87, 127, 155.) [E. E.]

MENOPHANTUS (Μηνόφαντος), the sculptor of a beautiful statue of Aphrodite, which was found on the Caelian mount at Rome, and afterwards came into the possession of prince Chigi. It was first described by Winckelmann (Gesch. d. Kunst, b. v. c. 2. § 3, note), and it is figured in the Museo Capitolino (vol. iv. p. 392), and in Müller's Denkmäler d. alten Kunst (vol. ii. pl. xxv. No. 275). The attitude is nearly the same as that of the Venus de Medici, but the left-hand holds a fold of a piece of drapery, which falls down upon what is apparently a box, on the end of which is the inscription ΑΠΟ ΤΗC ΕΝ ΤΡΩΑΔΙ ΑΦΡΟΔΙΤΗC ΜΗΝΟΦΑΝΤΟC ΕΠΟΙΕΙ. The execution is extremely good, and the eyes, forehead, and hair are particularly admired. We know nothing further of the original statue, from which the copy of Menophantus was made, nor of Menophantus himself. [P. S.]

MENS, i. e. mind, a personification of mind, worshipped by the Romans. She had a sanctuary on the Capitol, which had been built, according to some, about the time of the battle of lake Trasimenus, B. C. 217, and according to others a century later. The object of her worship was, that the citizens might always be guided by a right and just spirit (Ov. Fast. vi. 241; Liv. xxii. 9, 10, xxiii. 31; Cic. De Nat. Deor. ii. 22, De Leg. ii. 11; Plut. De Fort. Rom. 5; August. De Civ. Dei, iv. 21; Lactant. i. 20). A festival in honour of Mens was celebrated on the 8th of June. [L. S.]

MENSOR, L. FARSULEIUS, a name known only from coins and some inscriptions quoted by Ursinus. The interpretation of the figures on the reverse of these coins, of which a specimen is given below, is very uncertain. It has been conjectured that they have reference to the lex Julia, by which the civitas was given to the allies, and that the latter are symbolically represented stepping into the chariot of the Roman people. This hypothesis is supposed to be favoured by the head on the obverse, which is believed to be that of Libertas, as the pileus is behind it. (Eckhel, vol. v. p. 212.)

COIN OF L. FARSULEIUS MENSOR.

MENTES (Μέντης). 1. The leader of the Cicones in the Trojan war, whose appearance Apollo assumed when he went to encourage Hector. (Hom. Il. xvii. 73.)

2. A son of Anchialus, king of the Taphians north of Ithaca. He was connected by ties of hospitality with the house of Odysseus. When Athena visited Telemachus, she assumed the personal appearance of Mentes. (Hom. Od. i. 105, 181, &c.; Strab. x. p. 456.) [L. S.]

MENTO, C. JU'LIUS. 1. Was consul in B. C. 431. He was superseded in the command of the Volscian war, which, from dissension with his colleague, he conducted unsuccessfully, by the dictator A. Postumius Tubertus. Mento was left in charge of the city, where he dedicated a temple to Apollo. (Liv. iv. 26, 27, 29.)

2. A rhetorician, cited by Seneca. (Contr. 2, 5, 7, 8, 14, 20, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 32.) [W. B. D.]

MENTOR (Μέντωρ). 1. A son of Eurystheus, fell, like his father and brothers, in a battle against the Heracleids and Athenians. (Diod. iv. 57; Apollod. ii. 8. § 1.)

2. A son of Heracles by Asopis. (Apollod. ii. 7. § 8.)

3. A son of Alcimus and a friend of Odysseus, who, on quitting Ithaca, entrusted to him the care of his house. (Hom. Od. ii. 226, &c., xxii. 235.) Athena assumed his appearance when she conducted Telemachus to Pylos. (Od. ii. 269, 402, iii. 13, &c., iv. 654.) On Odysseus' return, Mentor assisted him in the contest with the suitors, and brought about a reconciliation between him and the people (xxii. 206, xxiv. 445, &c.).

4. The father of Imbrius, and son of Imbrus, at Pedaeus, was an ally of the Trojans. (Hom. Il. xiii. 171.) [L. S.]

MENTOR (Μεντωρ), a Greek of Rhodes, the brother of Memnon [MEMNON]. With his brother Memnon he rendered active assistance to Artabazus. When the latter found himself compelled to take refuge at the court of Philip, Mentor entered the service of Nectanabis, king of Egypt. He was appointed to the command of his Greek forces, and afterwards led a force of 4000 Greeks to the assistance of Tennes, king of Sidon, in his revolt against Dareius Ochus. Tennes treacherously betrayed the Sidonians [TENNES], and at his command Mentor, who had been left in charge of the city, directed his troops to open the gates to

Dareius. Mentor with his troops was taken into the Persian service. When Dareius Ochus marched upon Egypt, one division of his Greek forces was placed under the command of Mentor and the eunuch Bagoas. When this division came before Bubastus, Mentor contrived that a report should reach the garrison, which consisted partly of Greeks, that all who surrendered would be pardoned. The Greek commanders on both sides were eager to be the first to make and to receive the submission; and Mentor contrived that Bagoas in entering the city should be taken prisoner by the Greeks. Having then himself received the surrender of the city, and procured the release of Bagoas, he secured the favour of Dareius and the gratitude of Bagoas, and was rewarded with a satrapy including all the western coast of Asia Minor. His influence with Dareius also enabled him to procure the pardon of his brother Memnon and of Artabazus. While engaged in the government of his satrapy he treacherously secured the person of Hermeias, tyrant of Atarneus, the friend of Aristotle [HERMEIAS; ARISTOTELES], and having forged letters in his name, obtained possession of his fortresses. He sent Hermeias to Dareius, who put him to death. He died in possession of his satrapy, and was succeeded by his brother Memnon. His wife's name was Barsine. His three daughters fell into the hands of Parmenion at Damascus. One of them was subsequently married to Nearchus. (Diod. xvi. 42, &c. 49—52; Arrian, vii. 4. § 9; Curt. iii. 13. § 14.) [C. P. M.]

MENTOR, the most celebrated silver-chaser among the Greeks, must have flourished before B. C. 356, for Pliny states that his choicest works perished in the conflagration of the temple of Artemis at Ephesus (H. N. xxxv. 12. s. 55). Others of them were burnt in the Capitol, and none were extant in Pliny's time (l. c.; comp. vii. 38. s. 39). His works were vases and cups, the latter chiefly of the kind called Thericlea (see Ernesti, Clav. Cic., and Orelli, Onom. Tullian. s. v.). The statement of Pliny respecting the utter loss of his works must be understood of the large vases, and not of the smaller cups, many of which existed, and were most highly prized (Cic. Verr. iv. 18; Martial, iii. 41, iv. 39, viii. 50, ix. 59, xiv. 91; Propert. i. 14. 2; Juv. viii. 104). Some of them were, however, certainly spurious. (Plin. H. N. xxxiii. 11. s. 53.) Lucian (Lexiph. p. 332, ed. Wetstein) uses the phrase μεντορουργῆ ποτήρια to describe elaborately-wrought silver cups. [P.S.]

MENYLLUS (Μένυλλος). 1. A Macedonian, who was appointed by Antipater to command the garrison which he established at Munychia after the Lamian war, B. C. 322. He is said by Plutarch to have been a just and good man, and to have sought as far as possible to prevent the garrison from molesting the Athenians. He was on friendly terms with Phocion, upon whom he in vain sought to force valuable presents. On the death of Antipater, B. C. 319, he was replaced by Nicanor. (Diod. xviii. 18; Plut. Phoc. 28—31.)

2. Of Alabanda, was sent ambassador to Rome, in B. C. 162, by Ptolemy VI. Philometor, to plead his cause against his younger brother Physcon. The senate, however, espoused the cause of the latter, and the next year Menyllus was sent again to endeavour to excuse Ptolemy for his non-compliance with the orders of the senate. But they refused to listen to him, and ordered the embassy to quit Rome within five days. (Polyb. xxxi. 18, xxxii. 1.) During his stay at Rome on the former occasion, Menyllus took an active part, in conjunction with the historian Polybius, in effecting the escape of Demetrius, the young king of Syria, who was detained at Rome as a hostage. (Id. xxxi. 20—22.) [DEMETRIUS.] [E. H. B.]

MENYTES or INDEX. [HERACLES.]

MEPHITIS, a Roman divinity who had a grove and temple in the Esquiliae, on a spot which it was thought fatal to enter. (Plin. H. N. ii. 93. s. 95; Varro, De L. L. v. 49.) Who this Mephitis was is very obscure, though it is probable that she was invoked against the influence of the mephitic exhalations of the earth in the grove of Albunea. She was perhaps one of the Italian sibyls. Servius (ad Aen. vii. 84) mentions that Mephitis as a male divinity was connected with Leucothea in the same manner as Adonis with Aphrodite, and that others identified her with Juno. (Comp. Tac. Ann. iii. 33.) [L. S.]

MERCATOR, ISIODO'RUS, also called Isidorus Peccator, a Spanish bishop, about A. D. 830, respecting whom see Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. x. p. 497, vol. xii. p. 159.

MERCA'TOR, MA'RIUS, distinguished among ecclesiastical writers as a most zealous antagonist of the Pelagians and the Nestorians, appears to have commenced his literary career during the pontificate of Zosimus, A. D. 218, at Rome, where he drew up a discourse against the opinions of Coelestius, which he transmitted to Africa and received in reply an epistle from St. Augustin, still extant (Ep. cxciii. ed. Bened.). Having repaired to Constantinople about ten years afterwards, for the purpose of counteracting the designs of the banished Julianus [JULIANUS ECLANENSIS], he presented his Commonitorium to Theodosius. He then became deeply involved in the controversy regarding the Incarnation, and in this found active occupation for the remainder of his life, which must have extended beyond the middle of the fifth century, since we find mention made in his writings of the Eutychians, whose name does not appear among the catalogue of heretics, until after the council of Chalcedon, held in 451. Mercator seems undoubtedly to have been a layman, but we are absolutely ignorant of every circumstance connected with his origin and personal history. Hence, in the absence of all ascertained facts, an ample field is thrown open for that unprofitable species of labour which seeks to create substance out of shadow; and here the exertions of Garnier and Gabriel Gerberon are especially conspicuous, but it would be a mere waste of time and space to recount their visions.

The works of Mercator refer exclusively to the Pelagian and Nestorian heresies, and consist for the most part, in so far as the latter is concerned, of passages extracted and translated from the chief Greek authorities upon both sides, and arranged in such a manner as to enable the orthodox to comprehend the doctrines advanced by their opponents, and the arguments by which they were confuted.

1. Commonitorium super nomine Coelestii, composed originally in Greek, presented in 429 to the emperor Theodosius, and translated into Latin some years afterwards. The object of this piece was to procure the expulsion of Julianus and Coelestius from Constantinople, by giving a history of the rise and progress of their errors, and by exposing the fatal tendency of their doctrines. We learn from the full title that this end was accomplished, and that the two hierarchs, with their followers, were banished by an imperial edict, and subsequently condemned in the Council of Ephesus (231) by the judgment of 275 bishops.

2. Commonitorium adversus Haeresin Pelagii et Coelestii vel etiam Scripta Juliani, made up of excerpts from the writings of Julianus, with answers (subnotationes) annexed by Mercator. Garnier gives to this production the title Liber Subnotationum ad Pieritium Presbyterum, and considers it as consisting of two parts, the first, or Commonitorium, being a preface or introduction; the second, or Subnotationes ad Verba Juliani, forming the main body of the work.

3. Refutatio Symboli Theodori Mopsuestani, an examination of the false doctrine with regard to the Nature of Christ, contained in a creed attributed to Theodorus of Mopsuestia, the friend and supporter of Julianus. Of the following it will be enough to give the names:—4. Comparatio Dogmatum Pauli Samosateni et Nestorii. 5. Sermones V. Nestorii adversus Dei Genitricem Mariam. 6. Nestorii Epistola ad Cyrillum Alexandrinum. 7. Cyrilli Alexandrini Epistola ad Nestorium. 8. Cyrilli Alexandrini Epistola secunda ad Nestorium. 9. Cyrilli Alexandrini Epistola ad Clericos suos. 10. Excerpta ex Codicibus Nestorii. 11. Nestorii Sermones IV. adversus Haeresim Pelagianam. 12. Nestorii Epistola ad Coelestium. 13. Nestorii Blasphemiarum Capitula, containing the replies of Nestorius to the letters of Pope Coelestinus and Cyril of Alexandria. 14. Synodus Ephesiana adversus Nestorium, extracts from those proceedings of this council which were most hostile to the views of Nestorius. 15. Cyrilli Alexandrini Apologeticus adversus Orientales. 16. Cyrilli Alexandrini Apologeticus adversus Theodoretum. 17. Fragmenta Theodoreti, Diodori et Ibae. 18. Eutherii Tyanensis Fragmentum. 19. Nestorii Epistola ad Papam Coelestinum. 20. Epistola Synodica Cyrilli ad Nestorium. 21. Cyrilli Scholia de Incarnatione Unigeniti.

Among the lost works of this author we may reckon the Libri contra Pelagianos, of which we hear in the epistle of St. Augustin (cxciii.). Dupin hazards a conjecture that the Hypognosticon, commonly attributed to the bishop of Hippo, may be in reality the treatise in question.

It is remarkable that no ancient writer, if we except St. Augustine in the letter named above, takes any notice of Mercator, who remained altogether unknown until the seventeenth century, when Holstein discovered a MS. of his works in the Vatican, and soon after a second was found by Labbe, in the library of the Chapter of Beauvais. Labbe printed the Commonitorium super Nomine Coelestii, in his collection of councils, fol. Paris, 1671, vol. ii. pp. 1512—1517; a selection from the Vatican MS. was published by Gabriel Gerberon, a Benedictine, under the assumed name of Righerius, 12mo. Brux. 1673, and in the same year the first complete edition appeared at Paris in folio, under the editorial inspection of the learned Garnier, the text being formed upon a comparison of the only two existing MSS. The most esteemed edition is that of Baluze, 8vo. Par. 1684, reprinted with additions and corrections, by Galland, in his Bibliotheca Patrum, vol. viii. pp. 615—737, fol. Venet. 1772. A very full account of the labours of Garnier and Baluze will be found in Schönemann, Bibl. Patrum Lat. vol. ii. § 16. See also Dupin, Ecclesiastical History of the Fifth Century; the preface of Garnier; and the Prolegomena of Galland. [W. R.]

MERCU'RIUS, a Roman divinity of commerce and gain, probably one of the dii lucrii. The character of the god is clear from his name, which is connected with merx and mercari. (Paul. Diac. p. 124, ed. Müller; Schol. ad Pers. Sat. v. 112.) A temple was built to him as early as B. C. 495 (Liv. ii. 21, 27; Ov. Fast. v. 669), near the Circus Maximus (P. Vict. Reg. Urb. xi.); and an altar of the god existed near the Porta Capena, by the side of a well; and in later times a temple seems to have been built on the same spot. (Ov. Fast. v. 673; P. Vict. Reg. Urb. i.) Under the name of the ill-willed (malevolus), he had a statue in what was called the vicus sobrius, or the sober street, in which no shops were allowed to be kept, and milk was offered to him there instead of wine. (Fest. pp. 161, 297, ed. Müller.) This statue had a purse in its hand, to indicate his functions. (Schol. ad Pers. l. c.) His festival was celebrated on the 25th of May, and chiefly by merchants, who also visited the well near the Porta Capena, to which magic powers were ascribed; and with water from that well they used to sprinkle themselves and their merchandise, that they might be purified, and yield a large profit. (Ov. Fast. v. 670, &c.; Fest. p. 148, ed. Müller.)

The Romans of later times identified Mercurius, the patron of merchants and tradespeople, with the Greek Hermes, and transferred all the attributes and myths of the latter to the former (Hor. Carm. i. 10), although the Fetiales never recognised the identity; and instead of the caduceus used a sacred branch as the emblem of peace. The resemblance between Mercurius and Hermes is indeed very slight; and their identification is a proof of the thoughtless manner in which the Romans acted in this respect. [Comp. HERMES.] [L. S.]

MERCU'RIUS MO'NACHUS (Μερκούριος Μόναχος), the reputed author of a short treatise (or fragment) on the Pulse, published at Naples, in Greek and Latin, with notes and a long introduction, by Salvator Cyrillus, 8vo. 1812. It does not seem to be derived from Greek sources, and nothing is known respecting the writer. Some suppose him to have been a monk, who lived in the south of Italy, about the tenth century; but Sprengel, in the last edition of his Gesch. der Arzneikunde (ii. p. 560, quoted by Choulant in his Handb. der Bücherkunde für die Aeltere Medicin) conjectures that he lived in the thirteenth century, and derived his opinions from some one who had travelled in the East,—perhaps Carpini. Cardinal Mai, however, in the preface to the fourth volume of his collection Classicor. Auctor. e Vatican. Codicib. Editor. (p. xii. &c.) affirms, apparently from actual inspection of some manuscripts containing the work, that it does not belong to Mercurius at all, but to a person called Abitianus. The writer has no means of deciding whether this assertion is correct, but it agrees well enough with the proof arising from internal evidence that the work is derived from Oriental sources, for this Abitianus must be no other than the celebrated Arabic physician Abú 'Alí Ibn Síná, commonly called Avicenna. [ABITIANUS.] [W. A. G.]

MERCU'RIUS TRISMEGISTUS. [HERMES TRISMEGISTUS.]

MEREN'DA, was a surname, of rare occurrence in the Antonian and Cornelian gentes at Rome. Merenda signifies the mid-day meal (Fest. in v. p. 123, Muell. ed.; Non. p. 28, 32; comp. Isidor. Orig. xx. 2. § 12), and the word, unchanged in form, is extant in the modern Neapolitan dialect. The Merenda branch of the Gens Antonia was patrician (Dionys. x. 58) [ANTONIA GENS].

1. T. ANTONIUS MERENDA, was decemvir in B. C. 450—49, and was defeated by the Aequians on the Algidus. (Dionys. x. 58, xi. 23, 33; Liv. iii. 35, 38, 41, 42; Fasti.)

2. Q. ANTONIUS T. F. MERENDA, probably a son of the preceding, was tribune of the soldiers, with consular authority, in B. C. 422. (Liv. iv. 42; Fasti.)

3. SERVIUS CORNELIUS MERENDA, was legatus in B. C. 275, to the consul L. Cornelius Lentulus [LENTULUS, No. 5], and was presented by him, for the capture of a town in Samnium, with a golden chaplet of five pounds' weight. In the following year Merenda was consul, and again commanded in Samnium and Lucania. (Plin. H. N. xxxiii. 11; Fasti.) [W. B. D.]

MERGUS, M. LAETO'RIUS. [LAETORIUS, No. 3.]

ME'RICUS, a leader of Spanish mercenaries in the service of Syracuse at the time when that city was besieged by Marcellus. After the departure of Epicydes, and the massacre of the officers whom he had left in the command, six new praetors were appointed, of whom Mericus was one; but he entered into a correspondence with his countrymen in the Roman service; and being entrusted with the charge of part of the island of Ortygia, took the opportunity to admit a body of Roman troops into that fortress. By this means Marcellus became master of the citadel, which soon led to the capture of the whole city, B. C. 212. Mericus was rewarded for his treachery by appearing in the ovation of the Roman general adorned with a crown of gold, besides the more substantial benefits of the Roman franchise, and an assignment of 500 jugera of land. (Liv. xxv. 30, 31, xxvi. 21.) [E. H. B.]

ME'RIONES (Μηριόνης), a son of Molus (Hom. Il. xiii. 249), conjointly with Idomeneus, led the Cretans in 80 ships against Troy (ii. 651, iv. 254), where he was one of the bravest heroes, and usually acted together with his friend Idomeneus (viii. 264, x. 58, xiii. 275, 304, xv. 302, xvii. 258). He slew Phereclus (v. 59), Hippotion, and Morys (xiv. 514), Adamas (xiii. 567), Harpalion (xiii. 650), Acamas (xvi. 342), Laogonus (xvi. 603), and wounded Deiphobus (xiii. 528). He also offered to fight with Hector, who afterwards slew his charioteer, Coeranus (vii. 165, xvii. 610). He offered to accompany Diomedes on his exploring expedition into the Trojan camp; but when Diomedes chose Odysseus for his companion, Meriones gave to the latter his bow, quiver, sword, and famous helmet (x. 662, &c.). He and Ajax protected the body of Patroclus (xvii. 669); and at the funeral games of Patroclus he won the fourth prize in the chariot-race, in shooting with the bow the first, and in throwing the javelin the second (xxiii. 351, 528, 614, 860, &c.). Later traditions state that on his way homeward he was thrown on the coast of Sicily, where he was received by the Cretans who had settled there (Diod. iv. 79); whereas, according to others, he returned safely to Crete, and was buried and worshipped as a hero, together with Idomeneus, at Cnossus. (Diod. v. 79.) [L. S.]

ME'RMERUS (Μέρμερος). 1. A son of Pheres, and grandson of Jason and Medeia. He was the father of Ilus and Ephyra, and skilled in the art of preparing poison. (Hom. Od. i. 260; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1416.)

2. A son of Jason and Medeia, is also called Macareus or Mormorus (Hygin. Fab. 239; Tzetz. ad Lyc. 175); he was murdered, together with his brother Pheres, by his mother at Corinth. (Apollod. i. 9. § 28; Hygin. Fab. 25; Diod. iv. 54.) According to others he was stoned to death by the Corinthians (Paus. ii. 3. § 6; Schol. ad Eurip. Med. 10), or he was killed during the chase by a lioness. (Paus. ii. 3. § 7.) A centaur, Mermerus, is mentioned by Ovid. (Met. xii. 305.) [L. S.]

ME'RMNADAE (Μερμνάδαι), a Lydian family, which, on the murder of Candaules by Gyges, succeeded the Heracleidae on the throne of Lydia, and held it for five generations, during a period of 170 years (about 716—546). The successive sovereigns of this family were Gyges, Ardys, Sadyattes, Alyattes, Croesus. (See these articles, and comp. DEIOCES; also Thirlwall's Greece, vol. ii. pp. 157, 158; Clint. F. H. vol. i. sub anno 716, vol. ii. App. xvii.) [E. E.]

MEROBAUDES, FLA'VIUS. In the collection of the Christian poets by G. Fabricius, fol. Basel. 1564, we find (p. 765) thirty hexameters, De Christo, said to be the work "Merobaudis Hispanici Scholastici," taken, as we are assured by the editor, from a very ancient MS. This hymn was, at a subsequent period, most erroneously ascribed to Claudian, and in all the later impressions of his poems is placed among the Epigrammata, and numbered xcviii.

About the year 1812 or 1813 the base of a statue was dug up in the Ulpian forum at Rome, bearing a long inscription in honour of Flavius Merobaudes, who is declared to have been equally brave and learned, capable of performing glorious deeds, and of celebrating the achievements of others, well skilled in wielding both the sword and the pen, a gallant and experienced soldier, a bard worthy of the Heliconian wreath. It is then set forth that, as a tribute to his rare qualities, a brazen image had been erected in the Ulpian forum, on the 29th of July, in the 15th consulship of Theodosius, and the 4th of Valentinian (A. D. 435).

Ten years afterwards Niebuhr succeeded in decyphering, upon eight leaves of a palimpsest belonging to the monastery of St. Gall, several Latin verses, which, from the subjects to which some of them referred, must have been composed about the middle of the fifth century. For a considerable time it seemed impossible to determine the author, no name appearing on the parchment; but upon comparing the preface to the principal piece with the inscription just mentioned, some expressions in the former were found to be so completely an echo of the words in the latter, that it became almost certain that Merobaudes must be the person sought, and this conclusion was confirmed by a passage in Sidonius Apollinaris, which contains an allusion to this very statue. (Carm. ix. Ad Felicem, 278—302, comp. the note of Sirmond.) The fragments thus recovered are miserably mutilated. The pages preserved do not follow each other in regular order; the initial or the final words in most of the larger lines have been pared off when the sheets were bound up into a new volume, and in some places the original writing has been completely obliterated. What remains consists of

I. Four Carmina. The first, a fragment comprising 23 lines in elegiac measure, is a description apparently of the Triclinium of Valentinian. The second, a fragment comprising 14 lines in elegiac measure, is a description of a garden probably attached to the Triclinium. The third, a fragment comprising 7 lines in elegiac measure, depicts the beauties of a garden, the property Viri Jul. Fausti. The fourth, a fragment in 46 hendecasyllabics, is a birthday ode in honour of the son of Aëtius Patricius.

II. A fragment, extending to 197 hexameters, of a panegyric on the third consulship of Aëtius Patricius, to which is prefixed an introduction in prose, in a very wretched condition. This Aëtius was consul for the first time A. D. 432, for the second time A. D. 437, for the third time A. D. 446. If we assume that the whole of these five scraps are by the same author, and that he is the Spanish Merobaudes who wrote De Christo, a proposition which, although highly probable, cannot be strictly demonstrated, it follows, as a matter of course, that he must have been a Christian, although unquestionably the terms in which he laments that the morals of the olden time and the ancient religion had passed away together. seem at first sight little favourable to such an idea. On the other hand, the reference to baptism (Carm. i. sub fin.) is such as could scarcely have proceeded from a gentile. Niebuhr conjectures that the Disticha de Miraculis Christi, and the Carmen Paschale, placed side by side with the De Christo, among the epigrams of Claudian (xcv. xcix.), to whom they confessedly do not belong, ought to be assigned to Merobaudes. (The fragments were first published by Niebuhr at Bonn, 8vo. 1823, again in 1824, and will be found, edited by Bekker, in the "Corpus Scriptorum Historiae Byzantinae," in the same volume with Corippus, 8vo. Bonn, 1836. See Rheinisches Museum, 1843, p. 531. The inscription is in Orelli, No. 1183. With regard to Aëtius, consult Hansen, De Vita Aëtii, 8vo. Dorpat. 1840; see also Nicol. Anton. Bibl. Hispan. Vet. ii. 3.) [W. R.]

ME'ROPE (Μερόπη). 1. A daughter of Oceanus, and by Clymenus the mother of Phaëton. (Hygin. Fab. 154.)

2. One of the Heliades or sisters of Phaëton. (Ov. Met. ii. 340, &c.; Hygin. Fab. 154.)

3. A daughter of Atlas, one of the Pleiades, and the wife of Sisyphus of Corinth, by whom she became the mother of Glaucus. In the constellation of the Pleiades she is the seventh and the least visible star, because she is ashamed of having had intercourse with a mortal man. (Apollod. i. 9. § 3, iii. 10. § 1; Ov. Fast. iv. 175; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1155; Serv. ad Virg. Georg. i. 138; comp. Hom. Il. vi. 154; Schol. ad Pind. Nom. ii. 16; SISYPHUS.)

4. A daughter of Oenopion and Helice in Chios, is also called Haero, Aerope, and Maerope. She was beloved by Orion, who was, in consequence, blinded by her father. (Apollod. i. 4. § 3; Hygin. Poet. Astr. ii. 34.)

5. The wife of Megareus, by whom she became the mother of Hippomenes. (Hygin. Fab. 185.)

6. A daughter of Cypselus, and wife of Cresphontes, and afterwards of Polyphontes, and mother of Aepytus. (Apollod. ii. 8. § 5; Paus. iv. 3. § 3, &c.; Hygin. Fab. 184; comp. AEPYTUS.) [L. S.]

MEROPS (Μέροψ). 1. The father of Eumelus, king of the island of Cos, which he thus called after his daughter, while the inhabitants were called after him, Meropes. His wife, the nymph Ethemea, was killed by Artemis, because she had neglected to worship that goddess, and was carried by Persephone to the lower world. Merops, from a desire after his wife, wished to make away with himself, but Hera changed him into an eagle, whom she placed among the stars. (Hygin. Poet. Astr. ii. 16; Anton. Lib. 15; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 318; Eurip. Helen. 384.

2. Also called Maerops, a king of the Ethiopians, by whose wife, Clymene, Helios became the father of Phaëton. (Strab. i. p. 33; Ov. Met. i. 763, Trist. iii. 4. 30; comp. Welcker, Die Aeschyl. Tril. p. 572, &c.)

3. A king of Rhindacus, of Percote, on the Hellespont, is also called Macar, or Macareus. He was a celebrated soothsayer and the father of Cleite, Arisbe, Amphius, and Adrastus. (Hom. Il. ii. 831, xi. 329; Apollon. Rhod. i. 975; Strab. xiii. p. 586; Conon, Narrat. 41; Steph. Byz. s. v. Ἀρίσβη; Serv. ad Aen. ix. 264; Apollod. iii. 12. § 5.)

4. A Trojan, who was slain by Turnus in his attack on the camp of Aeneas. (Virg. Aen. ix. 702.) [L. S.]

MEROVEUS, a Frankish chieftain, of whom little is known that is authentic, beyond the fact that he was the grandfather of Clovis, the real founder of the Frankish monarchy in Gaul. The chroniclers of the middle ages augmented this little by their fables, and Meroveus figured in the lists of the kings of the Frankish nation, of which he could have been only one among many petty chiefs. This list of French kings included Pharamundus or Pharamond, the reputed founder of the monarchy, and after him, in regular descent and succession, Clodion, Meroveus, Childericus or Childéric, and Chlodoveus or Clovis. Pharamundus is not mentioned by Gregory of Tours, the best, as well as the first in point of time, of the early historians of France. Gregory, however, does mention Clodion, or, as he writes the name, Chlogion, and states that, according to some accounts, he resided in the castle of Dispargum, on the border of the Thoringi, the locality of which is much disputed; that he surprised and took Camaracum (Caulbrai) and subdued all the country as far as the Sumina (Somme); he adds, that some affirmed that Meroveus was of the race of this Chlogion. (Greg. Turon. Histor. Francor. ii. 9.) The date of this conquest is not determined. Some place it before A. D. 428, in which year the Clodion who had occupied a part of Gaul was driven out by Aëtius; others make this a second and later invasion, placing it as late as A. D. 445, and consider the acquisition as permanent. That Meroveus succeeded Clodion is probable, but it could scarcely have been in more than a petty chieftainship. Whether he was the son of Clodion or his nephew is very doubtful: the accounts of his descent vary; one of them, which makes him the offspring of Clodion's wife by a seamonster, is obviously of later date, but may suggest the suspicion that he was illegitimate. The Chronicon of Ado of Vienne ascribes to the Franks under Meroveus the capture of Treveri

(Trèves), the burning of Mettis (Metz), and the invasion of the country as far as Aureliani or Aurelia (Orléans); but the silence of Gregory of Tours renders the account very questionable, unless we suppose that Meroveus and the Franks formed part of the army of Attila, who about that time destroyed Metz and penetrated to Orleans: but this is contrary to the opinion of Dubos, and most modern historians, who range Meroveus and his Franks on the side of Aëtius. If we suppose that Meroveus was with Attila, we may perhaps adopt the supposition that he was one of the two Frankish princes, sons of a deceased king, who according to the rhetorician Priscus (apud Excerpta de Legationibus, p. 40, ed. Paris), disputed their father's succession, and claimed the assistance, the one of Attila, the other of Aëtius. This would sufficiently accord with the Chronicon of Prosper Tyro, which places the commencement of Meroveus's reign in A. D. 448, but the authority of this probably interpolated chronicle is not great. Meroveus is said to have reigned ten years. That he was the father of Childeric, and the grandfather of Clovis, appears well established; as well as that the first race of the Frankish kings of Gaul derived from him the title Merovingi or Merovinchi, Merovingian; unless we suppose with Sismondi (Hist. des Français, ch. iii.) that this name was derived from an earlier Meroveus, the common ancestor of all the kings of the tribes who formed the Frankish confederacy. (Greg. Turon. l. c.; Fredegarius Scholast. Greg. Turon. Historia Epitomata, c. 9; Priscus, l. c.; Gesta Regum Francorum; Ado Vienn. Chron.; Mezerai, Le P. Daniel, Velly, Histoire de France; Dubos, Hist. Crit. de l'Etablissement de la Monarchie Francoise; Sismondi, Hist. des Français, ch. iv.) [J. C. M.]

MER'ULA, was a surname of the Gens Cornelia at Rome. It signifies an ouzle or blackbird. (Varr. R. R. iii. 2. §§ 2. 38; Quint. Inst. i. 6. § 38.) The following Cornelii Merulae occur in history:—

1. L. Cornelius L. f. Merula, was consul in B. C. 193. His province was Gallia Cisalpina. Merula closed an active predatory campaign by a total defeat of the Boian Gauls in the neighbourhood of Mutina. But since his victory cost the Romans dear, and the officers of Merula accused him of negligence on his march to Mutina, the senate refused him a triumph on his return to Rome. (Liv. xxxiv. 54, 55, 56, 57, xxxv. 4, 5, 6, 8.)

2. Cn. (Cornelius?) Merula, was appointed legatus by the senate in B. C. 162—161, to adjust the disputes between the brothers Ptolemy Philometor and Physcon respecting the sovereignty of Cyprus. Merula accompanied Physcon to Crete and Asia Minor, and, after an ineffectual embassy to the elder brother at Alexandria, he induced the senate, on his return to Rome, to cancel the existing treaty with Philometor. (Polyb. xxxi. 18, 25, 26, 27, xxxii. 1.)

3. L. Cornelius Merula, was flamen dialis, and, on the deposition of L. Cinna in B. C. 87, was elected consul in his place. [Cornelius Cinna, No. 2.] On the return of Marius from exile in the same year Merula was summoned to take his trial for illegally exercising the consulship. (Plut. Quaest. Rom. 113.) He had already resigned it, but his condemnation was certain. Merula therefore anticipated his sentence by opening his veins in the sanctuary of the Capitoline Jupiter. Before he inflicted his death-wounds he carefully laid aside his official head-dress (apex), and left a record in writing that he had not profaned by death the sacred emblem of his pontificate. His last breath was spent in imprecating curses on his murderers, Cinna and Marius. The priesthood of the flamen dialis was not filled up until 72 years after Merula's death. (Appian, B. C. 1, 65, 70, 75; Vell. ii. 20, 22; Flor. iii. 21. § 61; Val. Max. ix. 12. § 5; Dion Cass. liv. 36; Tac. Ann. iii. 58; Plut. Mar. 41, 45; Plut. Quaest. Rom. 40; Diod. ap. Val. Fr.; August. de Civ. Dei, iii. 27; Dict. of Antiq. s. v. Flamen.) [W. B. D.]

MERYLLUS (Μέρυλλος), a Greek writer, who wrote a work on Boeotia (Plut. Par. Min. c. 14), and another on Italy (ibid. c. 26). In the latter passage of Plutarch, perhaps Dercylus is the correct reading, as Dercylus was the author of a work on Italy. (Vossius, De Hist. Graec. p. 469, ed. Westermann.) [Dercylus.]

MESATEUS (Μεσατεύς), a surname of Dionysus, derived from the town of Mesatis, where, according to a tradition at Patrae, he had been educated. (Paus. vii. 18. § 3, 21. § 2.) [L. S.]

MESCI'NIUS RUFUS. [Rufus.]

MESOME'DES (Μεσομήδης), a lyric and epigrammatic poet under Hadrian and the Antonines, was a native of Crete, and a freedman of Hadrian, whose favourite Antinous he celebrated in a poem. (Suid. s. v.) A salary, which he had received from Hadrian, was diminished by Antoninus Pius. (Capit. Ant. Pius, 7.) Three poems of his are preserved in the Greek Anthology. (Brunck, Anal. vol. ii. p. 292; Jacobs, Anth. Graec. vol. iii. p. 6, vol. xiii. p. 917; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. pp. 130, 131.) [P. S.]

MESSALLA, a cognomen of the Gens Valeria at Rome, was originally assumed by M. Valerius Maximus [No. 1] after his relief of Messana in Sicily from blockade by the Carthaginians in the second year of the first Punic war, B. C. 263. (Macrob. Sat. i. 6; Sen. Brev. Vit. 13.) For the antiquity of the Messalla branch of the Valerian gens see Tibullus (Carm. i. 28; comp. Dionys. iv. 67; Rutil. Iter. i. 169; Sidon. Apoll. Ep. i. 9). They appear for the first time on the consular Fasti in B. C. 263, and for the last in A. D. 506; and, during this period of nearly eight centuries, they held twenty-two consulships and three censorships. (Sidon. Apoll. Carm. ix. 302; Rutil. l. c.; Symmach. Ep. vii. 90.) The cognomen Messalla, frequently written Messala, appears with the agnomens Barbatus, Niger, Rufus, with the nomens Ennodius, Pacatus, Silius, Thrasia Priscus, Vipstanus, and with the praenomens Potitus and Volesus, and was itself originally, and when combined with Corvinus, an agnomen, as M. Valerius Maximus Corvinus Messalla, i. e. of Messana.

1. M'. Valerius M. f. M. n. Maximus Corvinus Messalla, son of M. Valerius Maximus Corvinus, was consul in B. C. 263, the second year of the first Punic war. Sicily was assigned to both the consuls for their province. Their campaign was brilliant: more than sixty of the Sicilian towns acknowleged the supremacy of Rome, and the consuls concluded a peace with Hieron, which lasted the remainder of his long life, and proved equally advantageous to both Syracuse and Rome. [Hieron, No. 2.] Messalla's share in this campaign is inseparable from that of M. Otacilius

Crassus [CRASSUS, OTACILIUS, No. 1], his colleague. But that his contemporaries ascribed to Messalla the principal merit of these events appears from his alone triumphing "De Paeneis et Rege Siculorum Hierone" (Fasti), as well as from the cognomen he obtained on relieving Messana from blockade, which, slightly changed in pronunciation (Messana — Messalla), remained in the Valerian family for nearly eight centuries. A house on the Palatine hill was a more tangible recompence of his services (Ascon. in Pisonian. p. 13, Orelli); and his triumph was distinguished by two remarkable monuments of his victory—by a pictorial representation of a battle with the Sicilian and Punic armies, which he placed in the pronaos of the Curia Hostilia (Plin. H. N. xxxv. 4. § 7; Schol. Bob. in Vatinian. p. 318, Orelli; comp. Liv. xli. 28), and which Pliny regards as one of the earliest encouragements to art at Rome—and by a sun-dial, Horologium, from the booty of Catana, which was set up on a column behind the rostra, in the forum. (Varro, ap. Plin. H. N. vii. 60; Dict. of Antiq. s. v. Horologium.) Messalla was censor in B. C. 252, when he degraded 400 equites to aerarians for neglect of duty in Sicily. (Polyb. i. 16, 17; Diod. Eclog. xxiii. 5; Zonar. viii. 9; Liv. xvi. Epit.; Eutrop. ii. 19; Oros. iv. 7; Sen. Brev. Vit. 13; Macrob. Sat. i. 6; Val. Vax. ii. 9. § 7.)

2. M. VALERIUS M'. F. M. N. MESSALLA, son probably of the preceding, was consul in B. C. 226. His year of office was employed in organising a general levy of the Italian nations against an expected invasion of the Gauls from both sides of the Alps. (Zonar. viii. 19; Oros. iv. 13; Fasti; comp. Polyb. ii. 23.)

3. M. VALERIUS M. F. M'. N. MESSALLA, son of the preceding, was prefect of the fleet in Sicily in B. C. 210, the ninth year of the second Punic war. He was ordered by M. Valerius Laevinus [LAEVINUS, No. 2], the consul of that year, to effect a landing in Africa. Messalla ravaged the neighbourhood of Utica, and returned with his booty and captives to Lilybaeum fourteen days after his departure from Sicily. Laevinus being directed by the senate to nominate a dictator, named his lieutenant Messalla, but both the senate and people cancelled the appointment. (Liv. xxvii. 5.) He is probably the same Messalla who was praetor peregrinus in B. C. 194, and consul in 188. In the latter year the province of Liguria and a consular army were assigned him, but he performed nothing memorable, and gave some offence by returning late in the year to hold the next comitia. In B. C. 174 Messalla was legatus in Macedonia, and in 172 was appointed decemvir sacrorum, in the room of M. Aemilius Papus, deceased. (Liv. xxxiv. 54, 55, xxxviii. 35, 42, xli. 22, xlii. 28.)

4. M. VALERIUS M. F. M. N. MESSALLA, son of the preceding, was consul in B. C. 161. His consulate was remarkable chiefly for a decree of the senate prohibiting the residence of Greek rhetoricians at Rome. (Gell. ii. 24, xv. 11; Suet. Clar. Rhet. i.) The "Phormion" and "Eunuch" of Terence were first acted in this year. (Titul. Phorm. et Eunuch. Terentii.) Messalla, having been once degraded by the censors, became himself censor in B. C. 154. (Val. Max. ii. 9. § 9.)

5. — VALERIUS MESSALLA was a legatus of the consul P. Rutilius Lupus at the breaking out of the Marsic or Social War, B. C. 90. (Appian. B. C. i. 40.)

6. M. VALERIUS M. F. M. N. MESSALLA, with the agnomen NIGER, was praetor in the year of Cicero's consulship, B. C. 63, and consul in 61, the year in which Clodius profaned the mysteries of the Bona Dea, and Cn. Pompey triumphed for his several victories over the Cilician pirates, Tigranes and Mithridates. Messalla, as consul, took an active part in the prosecution of Clodius, and tried to elicit from Pompey a public avowal of his opinion and intentions. Cicero's character of Messalla (ad Att. i. 14. § 6) must be regarded as a mere party-sketch, heightened by the feelings and circumstances of the time at which it was drawn. Messalla was censor in B. C. 55, a member of the college of pontifices (pseudo-Cic. Harusp. Resp. 6), and a respectable orator. (Cic. Brut. 70.) In B. C. 80 he was engaged in collecting evidence for the defence in the cause of Sextus Roscius of Ameria (id. pro Sext. Rosc. 51); in 62 he solicited Cicero to undertake the defence of his kinsman, P. Sulla (id. pro Sull. 6); and in 54 he was one of the six orators whom M. Aemilius Scaurus retained on his trial. (Ascon. in Scaurian. p. 20, Orelli). Messalla married a sister of the orator Q. Hortensius (Cic. ad Fam. viii. 2, 4), by whom he had at least one son, No. 7. (Dion Cass. xxxvii. 46; Caes. B. G. i. 2; Plin. H. N. vii. 26, viii. 36, xxxviii. 2; Cic. ad Att. i. 12, 13, 14.)

7. M. VALERIUS MESSALLA, son of the preceding, was a successful candidate for the consulship in B. C. 53; but, owing to the disturbances at Rome, and the repeated appointment of interreges, he could not enter upon its functions until half of his official year had expired. (Dion Cass. xl. 17, 45; Appian, B. C. ii. 19; Plut. Pomp. 54; Ascon. ad Milonian. p. 48, Orelli.) Messalla paid high for his election (Cic. ad Att. iv. 16. § 6); his success was anxiously desired by Cicero, who at that time was in daily dread of Clodius (id. ad Quint. Fratr. iii. 1, 2, 5, 8, 9, 16); but he was secretly opposed by Cn. Pompey, who disliked Messalla, and wanted to be named dictator himself. (Id. ad Att. iv. 9, 15.) Messalla was prosecuted for bribery at the comitia by Q. Pompeius Rufus, a grandson of Sulla's. Cicero admitted Messalla's guilt, but, in common with the bulk of the senatorian party, gave him his political support. (Ad Att. iv. 16, ad Quint. Fratr. iii. 2.) He was defended by his uncle, Q. Hortensius (Cic. Brut. 96); acquitted of direct bribery, but found guilty of transgressing the Lex Licinia de Sodalitiis, that is, of causing and countenancing assemblies or clubs for controlling the elections. (Dict. of Antiq. s. v. Ambitus; Cic. ad Fam. viii. 2, 4.) Messalla was stoned by the Clodian mob during his consulate. (Schol. Bob. in Or. de aere al. Milon. p. 343, Orelli.) In B. C. 47 Messalla was with Caesar in the East, and was probably the legatus of that name whom in the African war in the following year a mutinous centurion and his company besieged in Messana. (Auct. B. Afr. 28.) After the battle of Thapsus Messalla was sent to Utica. (Id. 86.) Messalla was in high repute for his skill in augury, on which science he wrote; and scanty fragments from his treatise are preserved by Gellius (N. A. xiii. 14, 15) and Festus (vv. "serpula serpserit" and "vernisera"). Cicero (ad Fam. vi. 18) mentions letters of Messalla written during the so-cond Spanish war, in B. C. 45. He was the purchaser of the domus Autroniana. (Cic. ad Att. i. 13.)

8. M. VALERIUS, M. F. M. N. MESSALLA CORVINUS, son of the preceding, was born, according to Eusebius, in B. C. 59, in the same year with Livy the historian. (Hieron. in Euseb. Chron. Olymp. 180. 2.) Since, however, Messalla had gained some reputation for eloquence before the breaking out of the civil war in B. C. 43, the earlier date assigned by Scaliger (ad loc. Euseb.) for his birth, about B. C. 70, seems preferable. (Ellendt, Proleg. ad Cic. Brut. p. 131, comp. Clinton, F. H. vol. iii. p. 183, B. C. 59.) He was partly educated at Athens (Cic. ad Att. xii. 32), where probably began his intimacy with Horace and L. Bibulus. (Hor. Sat. i. 10. 81—86; Appian, B. C. iv. 38; comp. Plut. Brut. 24.) In the interval between Caesar's death and the formation of the triumvirate, Messalla returned to Italy. (Cic. ad Att. xv. 17.) He attached himself to the senatorian party, and especially to its leader, Cassius, whom, long after, when he had become the friend of Augustus, he was accustomed to call "my general." (Tac. Ann. iv. 34; Dion Cass. xlvii. 24; Plut. Brut. 40; Vell. ii. 71.) Messalla was proscribed; but since his kinsmen proved his absence from Rome at the time of Caesar's assassination, the triumvirs, notwithstanding his wealth and influence (Appian, l. c.; Cic. ad Att. xvi. 16), erased his name from the list, and offered him security for his person and property. Messalla, however, rejected their offers, followed Cassius into Asia, held the third place in the command of the republican army (Vell. Pat. ii. 71), and at Philippi, in the first day's battle, turned Augustus's flank, stormed his camp, and narrowly missed taking him prisoner. (Plut. Brut. 41.) To Messalla, on the night before the battle, Cassius made his protest that, like Cn. Pompey at Pharsalia, he was compelled to set his country's fortune on a single stake. (Id. ib. 40.) After the death of Brutus and Cassius, Messalla, with a numerous body of fugitives, took refuge in the island of Thasos. His followers, though defeated, were not disorganised and offered him the command. But he induced them to accept honourable terms from Antony (Appian, B. C. iv. 38), to whom he attached himself until Cleopatra's influence made his ruin certain and easy to be foreseen. Messalla then, for the third time, changed his party, and served Augustus effectively in Sicily (Appian, B. C. v. 102—103, 110—113) B. C. 36; against the Salassians, a mountain tribe, lying between the Graian and the Pennine Alps, B. C. 34 (Dion Cass. xlix. 38; Appian, Illyr. 17; Strab. iv. p. 189), and at Actium, B. C. 31. A decree of the senate had abrogated Antony's consulship for B. C. 31, and Messalla was appointed to the vacant place. (Dion Cass. l. 10.) At Actium he commanded the centre of the fleet, and so highly distinguished himself, that Augustus remarked, Messalla had now fought as well for him as formerly at Philippi against him. "I have always taken the best and justest side," was Messalla's adroit rejoinder. (Plut. Brut. 53.) At Daphne in Syria, Messalla proved himself an unscrupulous partisan, by dispersing among distant legions and garrisons Antony's gladiators, and finally destroying them, although they had not submitted until life and freedom had been guaranteed them. (Dion Cass. li. 7.) He was proconsul of Aquitaine in B. C. 28—27, and obtained a triumph for his reduction of that province. (Fasti; Dion Cass. liii. 12; Appian, B. C. iv. 38; Tibull. i. 7, ii. 1. 33, ii. 5. 117, iv. 1, iv. 8. 5.) Shortly before or immediately after his administration of Aquitaine Messalla held a prefecture in Asia Minor. (Tibull. i. 3.) He was deputed by the senate, probably in B. C. 30, to greet Augustus with the title of "Pater Patriae;" and the opening of his address on that occasion is preserved by Suetonius. (Aug. 58; comp. Flor. iv. 12. § 66; Ovid. Fast. ii. 127, Trist. ii. 39, 181; Dion Cass. lvi. 8, 41.) During the disturbances at the comitia in B. C. 27, Augustus nominated Messalla to the revived office of warden of the city; but he resigned it in a few days, either because he deemed its functions unconstitutional—incivilem potestatem (Euseb. 1991),—or himself unequal to their discharge—quasi nescius imperandi (Tac. Ann. vi. 11; comp. Dion Cass. liv. 6). Messalla soon afterwards withdrew from all public employments except his augurship, to which Augustus had specially appointed him, although, at the time of his admission, there was no vacancy in the augural college. (Dion Cass. xlix. 16.) About two years before his death, which happened about the middle of Augustus's reign, B. C. 3—A. D. 3 (Dialog. de Orat. 17), Messalla's memory failed him, and he often could not recall his own name. (Hieron. ad Euseb. 2027; Plin. H. N. vii. 24.) A statue erected by Augustus in his own forum to M. Valerius Corvus, consul in B. C. 348, was probably either a tribute to his living or a memorial of his deceased friend Messalla. (Gell. ix. 11; comp. Suet. Aug. 21.) He left at least one son, Aurelius Cotta Messallinus [COTTA, No. 12]; and he had a brother who bore the name of Gellius Poplicola. (Dion Cass. xlvii. 24.) His tomb was of remarkable splendour. (Mart. Ep. viii. 3, x. 2.)

Messalla was as much distinguished in the literary as in the political world of Rome. He was a patron of learning and the arts, and was himself an historian, a poet, a grammarian, and an orator. He wrote a history, or, more properly, commentaries on the civil wars after Caesar's death, from which both Suetonius (Aug. 58, 74) and Plutarch (Brut. 40, 41, 45, 53) derived materials. (Tac. Ann. iv. 34; Tibull. iv. 1. 5.) Towards the close of his life he composed a genealogical work, De Romanis Familiis (Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 13, xxxv. 2; Suet. Aug. 74.) The treatise, however, de Progenie Augusti, which sometimes accompanies Eutropius and the minor Roman historians, is the forgery of a much later age. Messalla's poems were probably occasional—vers de société merely—and of a satirical or even licentious character. (Plin. Ep. v. 3.) His writings as a grammarian were numerous and minute, comprising treatises on collocation and lexicography, and on the powers and uses of single letters. The titles of two of these treatises have been preserved, "Liber de S. Litera" (Quinct. Inst. i. 7. § 23, i. 5. § 15, ix. 4, § 38) and "Liber de involute Dictis" (Fest. v. Sanates); and Suetonius (Ill. Gr. 4) cites part of a grammatical work or letter of Messalla's. (Quinct. Inst. i. 5. § 61, 6. § 42, viii. 3. § 24, ix. 4. § 38.) His eloquence reflected the character of his age. It was an era of transition from the decaying forms of an aristocratical republic to the vigorous centralisation of the imperial system of Trajan and the Antonines. The ancient freedom of the forum was extinct; no great public causes survived; the measures of the government and the person of the ruler were hazardous topics, and the orator addressed not a mixed multitude, but a select audience. A scholastic spirit was rapidly encroaching upon the province of eloquence, and preparing the way for the rhetorical finesse of the later Roman schools. Messalla was not chargeable with all the vices of the rhetoricians, but neither had he retained the purity of the preceding age. He was preferred to Cicero, and the preference is a proof of the incompetence of his critics. More smooth and correct than vigorous or original, he persuaded rather than convinced, and conciliated rather than persuaded. His health was feeble, and the prooemia of his speeches generally pleaded indisposition and solicited indulgence. (Quint. iv. 1. § 8; Dialog. de Orat. 17, 18, 21.) Of his speeches the following titles have been transmitted: 1. Contra Aufidiam (Quinct. x. 1. § 22); 2. Pro Liburnia, of which there is a fragment in Festus (s. v. tabem); 3. Pro Pythodoro (Sen. Contr. ii. 12, p. 171, Bipont. ed.); 4. Contra Antonii Literas (Charis. p. 103); and 5. De Antonii Statuis (id. p. 80), both of which were probably delivered in B. C. 32, 31. Messalla mostly took the defendants' side, and was frequently associated in causes with C. Asinius Pollio. (Quinct. Inst. x. 1. § 24.) He recommended and practised translation from the Greek orators; and his version of the Phryne of Hyperides was thought to exhibit remarkable skill in either language. (Quinct. x. 5. § 2). Messalla was somewhat of a jurist in his diction, preferring native Latinisms to adoptive Greek words: e. g. funambulus to schoenobates (Schol. Cruqu. ad Hor. Sat. i. 10, 28), and archaisms to novelties in expression and orthography. In the age of Domitian Messalla had become nearly obsolete; beside the gaudy ornaments and measured declamation of the rhetoricians, he appeared tame and insipid. (Sen. Excerpt. Contr. iii. Prooem.; Dialog. de Orat. 21; Meyer, Fragm. Or. Rom. p. 208; Schott, de Rhet. ap. Sen. Memor.)

His political eminence, the wealth he inherited or acquired in the civil wars (Casaub. in Pers. Sat. ii. 71), and the favour of Antony and Augustus, rendered Messalla one of the principal persons of his age, and an effective patron of its literature. (Quinct. xii. 10. § 11, 11. § 28.) His friendship for Horace (Od. iii. 21, Sat. i. 6. 42, 10. 29, 85, A. P. 371) and his intimacy with Tibullus are well known. In the elegies of the latter poet, indeed, even where he is not (as in elegies i. 7, iv. 1) the immediate subject of the poem, the name of Messalla is continually introduced. The dedication of the "Ciris," a doubtful work, is not sufficient proof of his friendship with Virgil; but the companion of "Plotius and Varius, of Maecenas and Octavius" (Hor. Sat. i. 10. 81), cannot well have been unknown to the author of the Eclogues and Georgics. He directed Ovid's early studies (ex Pont. iv. 16), and Tiberius sought his acquaintance in early manhood, and took him for his model in eloquence. (Suet. Tib. 70.) Some of Messalla's bon mots, which were highly relished by his contemporaries, have been handed down to us. (Sen. Suas. 1, 2, 3.) He was a man well suited to the era in which he lived. He was courtly, cautious, and serviceable to the government both abroad and at home; and his early passion for liberty easily subsided into reasonable acquiescence in a government that at least protected life and property. If he merited his own description of Dellius [DELLIUS], a man who had danced through a revolution (Sen. Suas. 1), he atoned for his compliance by his zeal in behalf of his friends (Plut. Brut. 53), by his encouragement of literary aspirants (Sen. Suas. 6), and by his intimacy with the best and wisest men of his generation.

Messalla's life forms the subject of several monographies, e. g. De Burigny, Mémoires de l'Acad. des Inscript. xxxiv. p. 99 ff.; D. G. Moller, Disputat. de M. Val. Corv. Messalla, Altorf. 1689, 4to.; L. Wiese, de M. Val. Messall. Corvin. Vita et Studiis Doctrinae, Berol. 1829, 8vo.; to which add Ellendt. Proleg. ad Cic. Brut. pp. 131—138.

9. POTITUS VALERIUS MESSALLA, was one of the supplementary consuls in B. C. 29. He was probably father of No. 11.

10. M. VALERIUS M. F. M. N. MESSALLA BARBATUS, with the agnomen APPIANUS, was consul in B. C. 12, and died in his year of office. He was the father (or grandfather) of the empress Messallina [MESSALLINA, No. 1]; and Suetonius (Claud. 26) calls him cousin of the emperor Claudius I. Strictly speaking, however, he was cousin only by marriage; and there is some difference of opinion as to the name of his wife. Lipsius (ad Tac. Ann. xi. 37) and Perizonius (Ep. ad N. Heins. Collect. Burmann. iv. pp. 801—802) make Messalla to have married Domitia Lepida, daughter of Antonia major, and granddaughter of M. Antony and Octavia. Claudius, son of Antonia minor, was therefore Domitia Lepida's first cousin, but Messalla's cousin only by marriage. The following stemma will show their respective relationship:—

Ryckius (ad loc. Tac.), on the other hand, and Brotier (Tac. Supplem. Stemm. Caes.), make two Messallae Barbati, father and son, of whom the elder married Marcella major, daughter of Claudius Marcellus, consul B. C. 50, and Octavia, and the younger Domitia Lepida. (Dion Cass. liv. 28; Tac. Ann. xi. 37.)

11. L. VALERIUS POTITI F. MESSALLA VOLESUS, son probably of No. 9, was consul in A. D. 5, and afterwards proconsul of Asia, where his cruelties drew on him the anger of Augustus and a condemnatory decree from the senate. According to Seneca, Messalla in one day decapitated 300 persons, and walked among the headless trunks exclaiming "a royal spectacle, and more than royal, for what king ever did the like!" (Tac. Ann. iii. 68; Sen. de Ira, ii. 5; Fasti.)

12. M. VALERIUS M. F. MESSALLA, consul in A. D. 20, moved at the first meeting of the senate under Tiberius, in A. D. 14, that the oath to the emperor (sacramentum) should for the future be repeated annually instead of at intervals of five or ten years (Tac. Ann. i. 8, iii. 2; Fasti.)

13. M. VALERIUS MESSALLA, great-grandson of M. Valerius Messalla Corvinus (No. 8), was Nero's colleague in the consulship A. D. 58. His immediate predecessors had squandered the wealth of his ancestors; and Messalla, who had been content with honourable poverty, received from the treasury an allowance to enable him to meet the expences of the consulship. (Tac. Ann. xiii. 34; comp. Suet. Ner. 10.)

14. L. VIPSTANUS MESSALLA, was legionary tribune in Vespasian's army, A. D. 70. He rescued the legatus Aponius Saturninus from the fury of the soldiers who suspected him of corresponding with the Vitellian party. Messalla was brother of Aquilius Regulus, the notorious delator in Domitian's reign (Plin. Ep. i. 5). He is one of Tacitus' authorities for the history of the civil wars after Galba's death, and a principal interlocutor in the dialogue De Oratoribus, ascribed to Tacitus. (Tac. Hist. iii. 9, 11, 18, 25, 28, iv. 42, Dialog. de Orat. 15—25.) [W. B. D.]

MESSALLA, SI'LIUS, was consul suffectus from the 1st of May, A. D. 193, and was the person who formally announced to the senate the deposition of Didius Julianus and the elevation of Septimius Severus. He is apparently the Messalla who stands in the Fasti as consul for A. D. 214, and who subsequently (A. D. 218) fell a sacrifice to the jealous tyranny of Elagabalus. (Dion Cass. lxxiii. 17, lxxix. 5.) [W. R.]

MESSALLI'NA STATI'LIA, granddaughter of T. Statilius Taurus, cos. A. D. 11, was the third wife of the emperor Nero, who married her in A. D. 66. She had previously espoused Atticus Vestinus, cos. in that year, whom Nero put to death without accusation or trial, merely that he might marry Messallina. After Nero's death Otho, had he been successful against Vitellius, purposed to have married her, and in the letters he sent to his friends before he destroyed himself, were some addressed to Messallina. (Tac. Ann. xv. 68; Suet. Ner. 35, Oth. 10.) There are only Greek coins of this empress. [W. B. D.]

MESSALLI'NA, VALE'RIA, daughter of M. Valerius Messalla Barbatus and of Domitia Lepida, was the third wife of the emperor Claudius I. She married Claudius, to whom she was previously related, before his accession to the empire. Her character is drawn in the darkest colours by the almost contemporary pencils of Tacitus and the elder Pliny, by the satirist Juvenal, who makes her the exemplar of female profligacy, and by the historian Dion Cassius, who wrote long after any motive remained for exaggerating her crimes. We must accept their evidence; but we may remember that in the reign of Nero even Messallina's vices may have received a deeper tinge from malignity and fear; that it was the interest of Agrippina [AGRIPPINA, No. 2], her successor in the imperial bed, to blacken her reputation, and that the fears of her confederates may have led them to ascribe their common guilt to their victim alone. That the reign of Claudius owed some of its worst features to the influence of his wives and freedmen is beyond doubt; and it is equally certain that Messallina was faithless as a wife, and implacable where her fears were aroused, or her passions or avarice were to be gratified. The freedmen of Claudius, especially Polybius and Narcissus, were her confederates; the emperor was her instrument and her dupe; the most illustrious families of Rome were polluted by her favour, or sacrificed to her cupidity or hate, and the absence of virtue was not concealed by a lingering sense of shame or even by a specious veil of decorum. Among her most eminent victims were the two Julias, one the daughter of Germanicus [JULIA, No. 8], the other the daughter of Drusus, the son of Tiberius [JULIA, No. 9], whom she offered up, the former to her jealousy, the latter to her pride; C. Appius Silanus, who had rejected her advances and spurned her favourite Narcissus; Justus Catonius, whose impeachment of herself she anticipated by accusing him [CATONIUS JUSTUS]; M. Vinicius, who had married a daughter of Germanicus [JULIA, No. 8], and whose illustrious birth and affinity to Claudius awakened her fears; and Valerius Asiaticus, whose mistress Poppaea she envied, and whose estates she coveted. The conspiracy of Annius Vinicianus and Camillus Scribonianus in A. D. 42, afforded Messallina the means of satiating her thirst for gold, vengeance, and intrigue. Claudius was timid, and timidity made him cruel. Slaves were encouraged to inform against their masters; members of the noblest houses were subjected to the ignominy of torture and a public execution; their heads were exposed in the forum; their bodies were flung down the steps of the Capitol; the prisons were filled with a crowd of both sexes; even strangers were not secure from her suspicions or solicitations; and the only refuge from her love or hate was the surrender of an estate or a province, an office or a purse, to herself or her satellites. The rights of citizenship were sold by Messallina and the freedmen with shameless indifference to any purchaser, and it was currently said that the Roman civitas might be purchased for two cracked drinking cups. Nor was the ambition of Messallina inferior to her other passions. She disposed of legions and provinces without consulting either Claudius or the senate; she corrupted or intimidated the judicial tribunals; her creatures filled the lowest as well as the highest public offices; and their incompetency for the posts they had bought led in A. D. 43 to a scarcity and tumult. The charms, the arts, or the threats of Messallina were so potent with the stupid Claudius that he thought her worthy of the honours which Livia, the wife of Augustus, had enjoyed; he alone was ignorant of her infidelities, and sometimes even the unconscious minister of her pleasures. At his triumph for the campaign in Britain (A. D. 44), Messallina followed his chariot in a carpentum or covered carriage (comp. Dion Cass. lx. 33; Tac. Ann. xii. 42; Suet. Claud. 17)—a privilege requiring a special grant from the senate. The adulteress received the title of Augusta and the right of precedence—jus consessus—at all assemblies; her lover, Sabinus, once praefect of Gaul, but for his crimes degraded to a gladiator, was, at her request, reprieved from death in the arena; and the emperor caused a serious riot at Rome by withholding the popular pantomime Mnester from the stage while Messallina detained him in the palace. Messallina was safe so long as the freedmen felt themselves secure; but when her malice or her rashness endangered her accomplices, her doom was inevitable. She had procured the death of Polybius, and Narcissus perceived the frail tenure of his own station and life. The insane folly of Messallina, in A. D. 48, furnished the means of her own destruction. Hitherto she had been content with the usual excesses of a profligate age, with the secrecy of the palace, or the freedom of the brothel. But in A. D. 47 she had conceived a violent passion for a handsome Roman youth, C. Silius. She compelled him to divorce his wife Junia Silana, and in return discarded her favourite Mnester. In 48, her passion broke through the last restraints of decency and prudence, and, during the absence of Claudius at Ostia, she publicly married Silius with all the rites of a legal connubium. Messallina had wrought upon the fears of Claudius for the destruction of others; those fears were now turned against herself. Narcissus persuaded the feeble emperor that Silius and Messallina would not have dared such an outrage had they not determined also to deprive him of empire and life. Claudius wavered long, and at length Narcissus himself issued Messallina's death-warrant, which he committed to his freedman Euodus, and to a tribune of the guards. Without transcribing Tacitus it is impossible to describe worthily the irresolution of the emperor, the trepidation of the freedmen, the maternal love of Domitia Lepida, and the helpless agony of Messallina. She perished by the tribune's hand in the gardens of Lucullus—a portion of the demesnes of her victim Valerius Asiaticus. Her name, titles, and statues were removed from the palace and the public buildings of Rome by a decree of the senate. She left two children by Claudius, Britannicus and Octavia. There are Greek and colonial but no Latin coins of this empress. The inscription on her coins is VALERIA MESSALINA. VALERIA MESSALINA AUG. (Tac. Ann. xi. 1, 2, 12, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38; Dion Cass. lx. 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 27, 28, 29, 31; Juv. Sat. vi. 115—135, x. 333—336, xiv. 331; Suet. Claud. 17, 26, 27, 29, 36, 37, 39, Ner. 6, Vitell. 2; Vict. Caes. iv; Plin. H. N. x. 63; Sen. Mort. Claud.; Joseph. Antiq. xx. 8. § 1, Bell. ii. 12. § 8.) [W. B. D.]

MESSALLI'NUS AURELIUS COTTA. [COTTA, No. 12.]

MESSALLI'NUS, M. VALE'RIUS CATULLUS, was governor of the Libyan Pentapolis in the reigns of Vespasian and Titus, where he treated the Jewish provincials with extreme cruelty, and by a fictitious plot involved in a charge of perduellion the principal Jews residing at Alexandria and Rome, and among them the historian Josephus. Messallinus was recalled from his province, but eluded the punishment due to his crimes, probably through Domitian's interest with his father and brother. Under Domitian Messallinus distinguished himself as a delator. Josephus represents him as dying in extreme torments aggravated by an evil conscience. Messallinus was probably consul in A. D. 73. (Fasti; Joseph. B. J. vii. 11. § 3; Plin. Ep. iv. 22; Juv. Sat. iv. 113—122.) [W. B. D.]

MESSAPEUS (Μεσσαπεύς), a surname of Zeus, under which he had a sanctuary between Amyclae and mount Taygetus. It was said to have been derived from a priest of the name of Messapeus. (Paus. iii. 20. § 3.) [L. S.]

MESSA'PUS (Μέσσαπος). 1. A Boeotian, from whom Mount Messapion, on the coast of Boeotia, and Messapia (also called Iapygia), in southern Italy, were believed to have derived their names. (Strab. ix. p. 405.)

2. A son of Neptune and king of Etruria, who was invulnerable, and a famous tamer of horses. (Virg. Aen. vii. 691, &c., with the note of Servius.) [L. S.]

MESSE'NE (Μεσσήνη), a daughter of Triopas, and wife of Polycaon, whom she induced to take possession of the country which was called after her, Messenia. She is also said to have introduced there the worship of Zeus and the mysteries of the great goddess of Eleusis. In the town of Messene she was honoured with a temple and heroic worship. (Paus. iv. 1. §§ 2, &c., 3. § 6, 27. § 4, 31. § 9.) L. S.]

C. ME'SSIUS, was tribune of the plebs in B. C. 56, when he brought in a bill for Cicero's recall from exile. (Cic. Post. Red. in Sen. 8.) In the same year the Messian law, by the same tribune, assigned extraordinary powers to Cn. Pompey (id. ad Att. iv. 1.) Cicero defended Messius when he was recalled from a legatio, and attacked by the Caesarian party (id. ad Att. iv. 15, viii. 11). Messius afterwards appears as an adherent of Caesar's, whose troops he introduced into Acilla, a town in Africa. (Caes. B. A. 33.) Messius was aedile, but in what year is unknown. [W. B. D.]

ME'SSIUS MA'XIMUS. [MAXIMUS.]

ME'SSIUS, VE'CTIUS, a Volscian, who, in B. C. 431, distinguished himself in battle against the Romans. (Liv. iv. 28, 29.) [W. B. D.]

MESTOR (Μήστωρ), the name of four mythical personages, of whom nothing of interest is related. (Apollod. ii. 4. § 5, iii. 12. § 5; Hom. Il. xxiv. 257.) [L. S.]

MESTRA (Μήστρα), a daughter of Erysichthon, and granddaughter of Triopas (whence she is called Triopeïs, Ov. Met. viii. 872). She was sold by her hungry father, that he might obtain the means of satisfying his hunger. In order to escape from slavery, she prayed to Poseidon, who loved her, and conferred on her the power of metamorphosing herself whenever she was sold, and of thus each time returning to her father. (Tzetz. ad Lyc. 1393; Ov. Met. viii. 847, &c.; Anton. Lib. 17, who calls her Hypermestra.) [L. S.]

META (Μήτα), a daughter of Hoples, and first wife of Aegeus. (Apollod. iii. 15. § 6.) In other traditions she was called Melite. (Schol. ad Eurip. Med. 668.) [L. S.]

ME'TABUS (Μέταβος), a son of Sisyphus, from whom the town of Metapontum, in Southern Italy, was believed to have derived its name. (Strab. vi. p. 265; Serv. ad Aen. xi. 540; Steph. Byz. s. v. Μεταπόντιον.) [L. S.]

METACLEIDES (Μετακλείδης), a peripatetic philosopher, who wrote on Homer, mentioned by Tatianus and Suidas (s. v.). There is some dispute as to whether the name should be Metacleides or Megacleides. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. i. pp. 321, 517.) [C. P. M.]

META'GENES (Μεταγένης), an Athenian comic poet of the Old Comedy, contemporary with Aristophanes, Phrynichus, and Plato. (Schol. in Aristoph. Av. 1297.) Suidas gives the following titles of his plays:—Αὖραι, Μαμμάκυθος, Θουριοπέρσαι, Φιλοθύτης, Ὅμηρος ἢ Ἀσκηταί, some of which appear to be corrupt. (Meineke, Trag. Com. Graec. vol. i. pp. 218—221, vol. ii. pp. 751—760; Bergk, Com. Att. Ant. Reliq. p. 421; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. p. 470.) [P. S.]

META'GENES, artists. 1. The son of Chersiphron, and one of the architects of the temple of Artemis at Ephesus. [CHERSIPHRON.]

2. An Athenian architect in the time of Pericles, was engaged with Coroebus and Ictinus and Xenocles in the erection of the great temple at Eleusis. (Plut. Peric. 13.) [P. S.]

METANEIRA (Μετάνειρα), the wife of Celeus, and mother of Triptolemus, received Demeter on her arrival in Attica. (Hom. Hymn. in Cer. 161; Apollod. i. 5. § 1.) Pausanias (i. 39. § 1) calls her Meganaera. [L. S.]

METAPHRA'STES, SY'MEON (Συμεὼν ὁ Μεταφράστης), a celebrated Byzantine writer, lived in the ninth and tenth centuries. He was descended from a noble family of great distinction in Constantinople, and, owing to his birth, his talents, and his great learning, he was raised to the highest dignities in the state; and we find that he successively held the offices of proto-secretarius, logotheta dromi, and perhaps magnus logotheta, and at least that of magister, whose office resembled much that of our president of the privy council. The title of Patricius was likewise conferred upon him. The circumstance of his having held the post of magister caused him to be frequently called Symeon Magister, especially when he is referred to as the author of the Annales quoted below, but his most common appellation is Symeon Metaphrastes, or simply Metaphrastes, a surname which was given to him on account of his having composed a celebrated paraphrase of the lives of the saints. There are many conflicting hypotheses as to the time when he lived, which the reader will find in the sources below. We shall only mention, that it appears from different passages in works of which the authorship of this Symeon (Metaphrastes) is pretty well established, that he lived in the time of the emperor Leo VI. Philosophus; that in 902 he was sent as ambassador to the Arabs in Crete, and in 904 to those Arabs who had conquered Thessalonica, whom he persuaded to desist from their plan of destroying that opulent city; and that he was still alive in the time of the emperor Constantine VII. Porphyrogenitus. Michael Psellus wrote an Encomium of Metaphrastes, which is given by Leo Allatius, quoted below. The principal works of Metaphrastes are:—

1. Vitae Sanctorum. Metaphrastes, it is said, undertook this work at the suggestion of the emperor Constantine Porphyrogenitus, but this is not very probable, unless the emperor requested him to do so while still a youth. The work, however, is no original composition, but only a paraphrase or metaphrase of the lives of a great number of saints which existed previously in writing; Metaphrastes has the merit of having re-written them in a very elegant style for his time, omitted many things which appeared irrelevant to him, and added others which he thought worth admitting. The biographers of Metaphrastes were in their turn remodelled by later writers, and in many places completely mutilated; but whatever was left untouched is easily to be distinguished from the additions. Fabricius gives a list of 539 lives which are commonly attributed to Metaphrastes: out of these, 122 are decidedly genuine; but, according to Cave, the greater part of the remaining 417, which are extant in MSS. in different libraries, can be traced to Metaphrastes. The principal lives are published, Greek and Latin, in "Bollandii Acta Sanctorum." Agapius, a monk, made an extract of them, which was published under the title Liber dictus Paraclitus seu illustrium Sanctorum Vitae, desumptae ex Simeone Metaphraste, Venice, 1541, 4to.

2. Annales, beginning with the emperor Leo Armenus (A. D. 813—820), and finishing with Romanus, the son of Constantine Porphyrogenitus, who reigned from 959—963. It is evident that the Metaphrastes who was ambassador in 902 cannot possibly be the author of a work that treats on matters which took place 60 years afterwards: thence some believe that the latter part of the Annales was written by another Metaphrastes, while Baronius thinks that the author of the whole of that work lived in the 12th century. The Annales were published with a Latin version by Combéfis in Hist. Byzant. Script. post Theophanem, of which the edition by Immanuel Bekker, Bonn, 1838, 8vo., is a revised reprint. The Annales are a valuable source of Byzantine history.

3. Annales ab Orbe Condito, said to be extant in MS.

4. Epistolae IX., Greek and Latin, apud Allatium, quoted below.

5. Carmina Pia duo Politica, apud Allatium, and in Poetae Graeci Veteres, ed. Lectius, Geneva, 1614, fol.

6. Sermo in Diem Sabbati Sancti, Latin, in the 3d vol. of Combéfis, Biblioth. Concionator.

7. Εἰς τὸν θρῆνον τῆς ὑπεραγίας Θεοτόκου, &c., In Lamentationem Sanctae Deiparae, &c., Greek and Latin, apud Allatium.

8. Several Hymns or Canones still used in the Greek church.

9. Ἠθικοὶ λόγοι, Sermones XXIV. de Moribus, extracted from the works of S. Basil, ed. Greek and Latin by Morellus, Paris, 1556, 8vo.; also Latin, by Stanislas Ilovius, in Opera Basilii Magni; the same separate, Frankfort, 8vo. (when?) (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vii. p. 683, x. 180, &c.; Cave, Hist. Lit. p. 492, &c. ed. Geneva; Hankius, Script. Byzant. c. 24; Oudin, Dissertatio de Aetate et Scriptis Simeonis Metaphrastis, in his Commentarii; Baronius, Annales ad ann. 859; Leo Allatius, Diatriba de Simeonibus.) [W. P.]

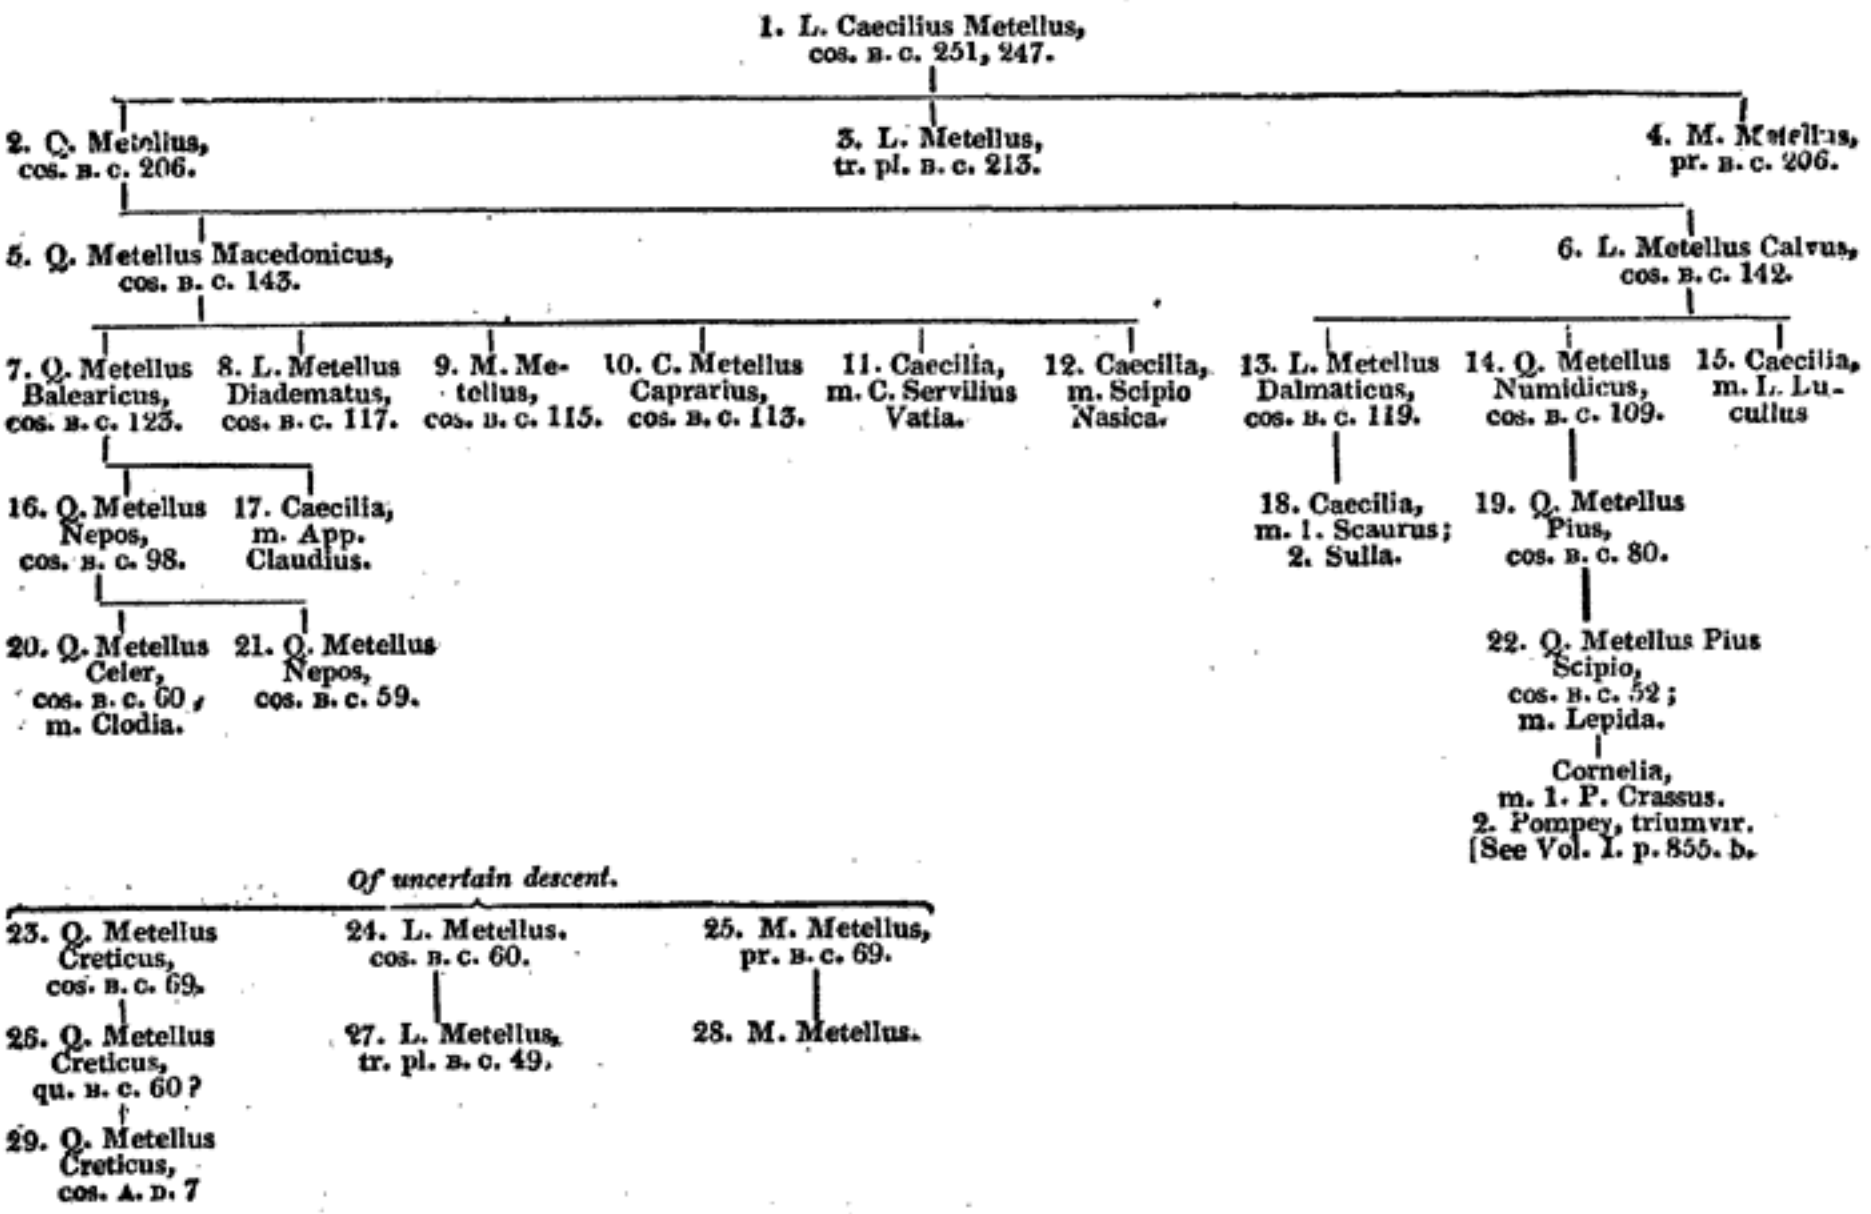
METELLA. [CAECILIA.]

METELLUS, the name of a noble family of the plebeian Caecilia gens. This family is first mentioned in the course of the first Punic war, when one of its members obtained the consulship; and if we are to believe the satirical verse of Naevius,—Fato Metelli Romae fiunt Consules,—it was indebted for its elevation to chance rather than its own merits. It subsequently became one of the most distinguished of the Roman families, and in the latter half of the second century before the Christian era it obtained an extraordinary number of the highest offices of the state. Q. Metellus, who was consul B. C. 143, had four sons, who were raised to the consulship in succession; and his brother L. Metellus, who was consul B. C. 142, had two sons, who were likewise elevated to the same dignity. The Metelli were distinguished as a family for their unwavering support of the party of the optimates. The etymology of the name is quite uncertain. Festus connects it (p. 146, ed. Müller), probably from mere similarity of sound, with mercenarii. It is very difficult to trace the genealogy of this family, and the following table is in many parts conjectural. The history of the Metelli is given at length by Drumann (Geschichte Roms, vol. ii. pp. 17—58.)

STEMMA METELLORUM.



1. L. Caecilius L. f. C. n. Metellus, consul B. C. 251, with C. Furius Pacilus, in the first Carthaginian war, was sent with his colleague into Sicily to oppose Hasdrubal, the Carthaginian general. The Roman soldiers were so greatly alarmed at the elephants in the Carthaginian army, that their generals did not venture to attack the enemy, but lay inactive for a long time. At last, when Furius Pacilus returned to Italy with a part of the forces, Hasdrubal availed himself of the opportunity to attack Panormus, but was entirely defeated by Metellus, who slew a great number of his troops, and captured all his elephants, which he afterwards exhibited in his triumph at Rome. This victory established the Roman supremacy in Sicily, and may be said to have had a decisive influence on the fate of the war. (Polyb. i. 39, 40; Flor. ii. 2. § 27; Eutrop. ii. 24; Oros. iv. 9; Frontin. Strateg. ii. 5. § 4; Cic. de Rep. i. 1; Liv. Epit. 19; Plin. H. N. vii. 43. s. 45; Dionys. ii. 66.)

In B. C. 249, Metellus was magister equitum to the dictator A. Atilius Calatinus, and in B. C. 247 consul a second time with N. Fabius Buteo, but nothing of importance took place during this year. Four years afterwards (B. C. 243) he was elected pontifex maximus, and held this dignity for twenty-two years. He must, therefore, have died shortly before the commencement of the second Punic war, B. C. 221. An act of Metellus during his high-priesthood is recorded by the historians. In B.C. 241 he rescued the Palladium when the temple of Vesta was on fire, but lost his sight in consequence: he was, therefore, rewarded by the people with a statue on the Capitol, and the permission, previously granted to no one, of riding to the senate-house in a carriage. In addition to his other honours he was appointed dictator in B.C. 224, for the purpose of holding the comitia. His merits and distinctions are recorded by Pliny in an extract which he has made from the funeral oration delivered by his son, Q. Metellus. (Plin. Liv. Dionys. ll. cc.; Cic. Cat. 9, pro Scaur. 2; Val. Max. i. 4. § 4; Ov. Fast. vi. 436.)

2. Q. Caecilius L. f. L. n. Metellus, son of the preceding, is enumerated by Cicero in his list of Roman orators (Brut. 14, 19), and his oration at his father's funeral has been spoken of above. (Comp. Plin. H. N. vii. 43. s. 45.) He was elected one of the pontifices in B. C. 216, plebeian aedile in B. C. 209, and curule aedile in B. C. 208 (Liv. xxiii. 21, xxvii. 21, 36). In B. C. 207 he served in the army of the consul Claudius Nero, and was one of the legates sent to Rome to convey the joyful news of the defeat and death of Hasdrubal; and it was mainly in consequence of his services in this war that he owed his elevation to the consulship in the following year. On his return to Rome he was appointed magister equitum to M. Livius Salinator, who was nominated dictator for the purpose of holding the comitia, and it was at these comitia (B. C. 206) that he was elected consul with L. Veturius Philo, who had served with him in the campaign against Hasdrubal (Liv. xxvii. 51, xxviii. 9, 10; Cic. Brut. 14). The consuls received Bruttii as their province, in order to prosecute the war against Hannibal; but their year of office passed over without anything of importance occurring, and Metellus remained in the same province as proconsul, during the following year. At the end of the year he was recalled to Rome, and nominated dictator for the purpose of holding the comitia (Liv. xxviii. 10, 11, 45, 46, xxix. 10, 11). Q. Metellus had, like his other distinguished contemporaries, taken an active part in the Hannibalian war; but at the conclusion of this war in B. C. 201, he is reported to have said in the senate that he did not look upon its termination as a blessing to Rome, since he feared that the Roman people would now sink back again into its former slumbers, from which it had been roused by the presence of Hannibal. (Val. Max. vii. 2. § 3.)

Metellus survived the war many years, and was employed in several public commissions. In B. C. 201 he was appointed one of the decemviri for dividing the public land in Samnium and Apulia among the Roman soldiers, who had served in Africa against Hannibal (Liv. xxxi. 4). In B. C. 185 he was one of the ambassadors sent to Philip of Macedonia and to the Achaeans. (Liv. xxxix. 24, 33; Polyb. xxiii. 6, &c., vel Excerpt. Legat. 40, 41; Paus. vii. 8. § 6, vii. 9. § 1.) The name of Metellus also occurs in the debates in the senate in B. C. 193, and his address to the censors in B. C. 179 is given by Livy. (Liv. xxxv. 8, xl. 46.)

3. L. Caecilius Metellus, brother of No. 2, had, after the battle of Cannae in B. C. 216, formed the project, with other noble youths, of abandoning Italy and trying their fortunes elsewhere; but P. Scipio compelled him and his associates to swear that they would abandon this design. In consequence of his conduct on this occasion the censors removed him from his tribe, and reduced him to the condition of an aerarian two years afterwards (B. C. 214), when he was quaestor. Notwithstanding this degradation he was elected tribune of the plebs for the following year, and immediately he had entered upon his office, he cited the censors before the court of the people, but was prevented by the other tribunes from proceeding in his accusation. (Liv. xxii. 53, xxiv. 18, 43; Val. Max. ii. 9. § 8, v. 6. § 7.)

4. M. Caecilius Metellus, brother of Nos. 2 and 3, was plebeian aedile in B. C. 208, the same year in which his brother Quintus was curule aedile, and praetor urbanus B. C. 206, during the consulship of Quintus. In the following year he was one of the ambassadors sent to king Attalus, and brought to Rome the sacred stone, which was regarded as the mother of the gods. (Liv. xxvii. 36, xxviii, 10, xxix. 11.)

5. Q. Caecilius Q. F. L. N. Metellus Macedonicus, son of No. 2, is first mentioned in B. C. 168, when he was serving in the army of Aemilius Paullus in Macedonia, and was sent to Rome with two others to announce the defeat of Perseus. In B. C. 148 he was praetor, and received Macedonia as his province, where Andriscus, who pretended to be a son of Perseus, and had assumed the name of Philip, had defeated the Roman praetor Juventius. He was, however, defeated and taken prisoner by Metellus. After Metellus had concluded this war he turned his arms against the Achaeans, who had insulted an embassy which he had sent to Corinth, and refused to listen to any overtures of peace. At the beginning of B. C. 146 he defeated Critoläus, the Achaean praetor, near Scarpheia in Locris, and subsequently an Arcadian army near Chaeroneia; but he was unable to bring the war to a conclusion before the arrival of the consul L. Mummius, for whom was reserved the glory of subduing Greece. On his return to Rome in B. C. 146, Metellus celebrated a triumph on account of his victory over Andriscus, and received in consequence the surname of Macedonicus.

Notwithstanding the glory which he had acquired in this war, Metellus was twice a candidate for the consulship without success; and he did not obtain this honour till B. C. 143 along with Ap. Claudius Pulcher. The province of Nearer Spain fell to the lot of Metellus, who carried on the war with success during this and the following year against the Celtiberi, and was succeeded by Q. Pompeius in B. C. 141. Many anecdotes are related of his conduct during this campaign; the severity with which he maintained discipline, the humanity which he displayed on one occasion towards the enemy (a rare virtue with Roman generals!), and the prudence and skill with which he prosecuted the war, are particularly celebrated by Valerius Maximus and Frontinus. But he sullied his reputation by the efforts which he used to render his army as inefficient as possible on his departure from the province, in order that his successor, Q. Pompeius, whom he envied and hated, might find it difficult to obscure his glory.

In B. C. 131 Metellus was censor with Q. Pompeius, the first time that both the censors were elected from the plebs. In his censorship Metellus proposed that every Roman should be compelled to marry, for the purpose of increasing the free population of the city: the oration which he delivered on the subject was extant in the time of Augustus, and was read by that emperor in the senate when he brought forward his law de Maritandis Ordinibus. (Suet. Aug. 89.) Some fragments of it are preserved by A. Gellius (i. 6), who, however, attributes it erroneously to Metellus Numidicus. Metellus during his censorship narrowly escaped death at the hands of the tribune C. Atinius Labeo, whom he had expelled from the senate during the first year of his censorship, and who, in the following year, seized him in the forum and commanded him to be thrown down the Tarpeian rock: he was rescued from death by the intervention of another tribune, but Labeo revenged himself by dedicating the property of Metellus to the gods.

It is related of Metellus, that he was a political opponent of Scipio Africanus the younger, but that he conducted his opposition without any bitterness or malice, and was one of the first at his death to recognise and acknowledge his greatness. He united with the aristocracy in opposing the measures of the Gracchi; and the speech which he delivered against Tib. Gracchus is referred to by Cicero, who speaks highly of his eloquence, and alludes to several of his orations. (Cic. de Orat. i. 49, Brut. 21.) Like the other Roman nobles of his time, he either had or pretended to have a love of art. He erected a splendid porticus, and two temples dedicated to Jupiter and Juno, which were the first at Rome built of marble; and in front of them was placed the celebrated group of horsemen who fell at the battle of the Granicus, which Lysippus executed at the command of Alexander the Great, and which Metellus carried to Rome, on the conquest of Andriscus in Macedonia.

Metellus died in B. C. 115, when his son Marcus was consul, full of years and honours. He is frequently quoted by the ancient writers as an extraordinary instance of human felicity. Not only was he distinguished by his noble birth, his military glory, and the high political offices he had held, but his was the rare lot of living to see four sons rise to the highest honours of the state, and of being carried to the funeral pile by these four children. Three of these sons had obtained the consulship in his lifetime, and the fourth was a candidate for the office at the time of his father's death. Metellus also left behind him two married daughters (not three, as some writers state), and numerous grandchildren. (Liv. Epit. 49, 50, 52, 53, 59; Vell. Pat. i. 11; Tac. Ann. xii. 62; Flor ii. 14, 17; Eutrop. iv. 13, 16; Aurel. Vic. de Vir Ill. 61; Zonar. ix. 28; Paus. vii. 13, 15; App. Hisp. 76; Val. Max. ii. 7. § 10, iii. 2. § 21, v. 1. § 5, vii. 1. § 1, vii. 5. § 4, ix. 3. § 7; Frontin. Strat. iii. 7, iv. 1. § 23; the passages of Cicero in Orelli's Onom. Tull. vol. ii. p. 102; Meyer, Orator. Roman. Fragm. p. 159, 2d. ed.)

6. L. Caecilius Q. f. L. n. Metellus Calvus, brother of No. 5, was consul B. C. 142 with Q. Fabius Maximus Servilianus. All that is recorded of this Metellus is that he bore testimony, along with his brother Macedonicus, against Q. Pompeius, the consul of B. C. 141, when he was accused of extortion. (Oros. v. 4; Obsequ. 81; Cic. ad Att. xii. 5. § 3, pro Font. 7; Val. Max. viii. 5. § 1.)

7. Q. Caecilius Q. f. Q. n. Metellus Balearicus, eldest son of No. 5, was consul B. C. 123 with T. Quinctius Flamininus, and during this year and the following carried on war against the inhabitants of the Balearic islands, who were accused of piracy. He entirely subdued them, and founded several cities in the islands; and in consequence of his victories he obtained a triumph in B. C. 121, and received the surname of Balearicus. He was censor in B. C. 120 with L. Calpurnius Piso. (Plut. de Fort. Rom. 4; Cic. Brut. 74, pro Dom. 53; Liv. Epit. 60; Eutrop. iv. 21, who erroneously calls him Lucius; Oros. v. 13; Flor. iii. 8; Strab. iii. p. 167.)

8. L. Caecilius Q. f. Q. n. Metellus Diadematus, brother of the preceding and son of No. 5, has been frequently confounded with Metellus Dalmaticus, consul B. C. 119 [No. 13], who was a son of Metellus Calvus [No. 6]. Metellus Diadematus received the latter surname from his wearing for a long time a bandage round his forehead, in consequence of an ulcer. He was consul B. C. 117, with Q. Mucius Scaevola; and Eutropius (iv. 23) erroneously ascribes to him the triumph of Dalmaticus. Clinton (ad ann.) falls into the same mistake. He lived to see the return of his first-cousin Metellus Numidicus from exile, and exerted himself to obtain his recall. (Cic. post Red. in Sen. 15, post Red. ad Quir. 3.)

9. M. Caecilius Q. f. Q. n. Metellus, brother of the two preceding and son of No. 5, was consul B. C. 115, with M. Aemilius Scaurus, the year in which his father died. In B. C. 114 he was sent to Sardinia as proconsul, to suppress an insurrection in the island, which he succeeded in doing, and obtained a triumph in consequence in B. C. 113, on the same day as his brother Caprarius. (Vell. Pat. i. 11, ii. 8; Eutrop. iv. 25.)

The annexed coin which bears the legend M. METELLUS Q. F. was struck by order of the preceding Metellus. The reverse represents the head of an elephant enclosed in Macedonian shields, and the whole surrounded by a laurel crown: the elephant has reference to the victory of his great-grandfather in Sicily over the Carthaginians [No. 1], and the Macedonian shields to the conquest of Andriscus in Macedonia by his father [No. 5]. (Eckhel, vol. v. p. 151.)

10. C. Caecilius Q. f. Q. n. Metellus Caprarius, younger brother of the three preceding, and son of No. 5. The origin of his surname is quite uncertain. He served under Scipio at the siege of Numantia, B. C. 133, and the abuse which he received from Scipio, according to the tale related by Cicero (de Orat. ii. 66), may have been owing to the enmity between his father [see above, p. 1057, b.] and Scipio, rather than to any demerits of his own. He was consul B. C. 113 with Cn. Papirius Carbo, and went to Macedonia to carry on war with the Thracians, whom he quickly subdued. He obtained a triumph in consequence in the same year and on the same day with his brother Marcus. He was censor in B. C. 102 with Metellus Numidicus; and he exerted himself, along with his brother Lucius, to obtain the recall of Numidicus from banishment in B. C. 99. (Eutrop. iv. 25; Tac. Germ. 37; Obsequ. 98; Vell. Pat. ii. 8; Cic. post Red. in Sen. 15, post Red. ad Quir. 3.) The annexed coin was struck by order of this C. Metellus. The head of the obverse is that of Pallas, and the elephants drawing a triumphal car on the reverse, refer, like the reverse of the preceding coin, to the victory of the ancestor of L. Metellus over the Carthaginians. [No. 1.]

13. L. Caecilius L. f. Q. n. Metellus Dalmaticus, son of No. 6, and frequently confounded, as has been already remarked, with Diadematus. [No. 8.] He is spoken of by Cicero as the maternal grandfather of Scaurus, whom Cicero defended, since his daughter Caecilia married the father of Scaurus. Metellus was consul in B. C. 119, with L. Aurelius Cotta, and through desire of a triumph declared war against the Dalmatians, who had been guilty of no offence against Rome. The Dalmatians offered no opposition to him, and after passing the winter quietly in their town of Salonae, he returned to Rome and obtained the undeserved honour of a triumph, and the surname Dalmaticus or Delmaticus. With the booty obtained in this war he repaired the temple of Castor and Pollux. In B. C. 115 he was censor with Cn. Domitius Ahenobarbus, and, in conjunction with his colleagues, expelled thirty-two members from the senate, among whom was C. Licinius Geta, who was afterwards censor himself. Metellus was also pontifex maximus; and the decision which he came to in the case of the Vestals, who were brought before him for trial in B. C. 114, was generally condemned. [See above, p. 782, a.] He was alive in B. C. 100, when he is mentioned as one of the senators of high rank, who took up arms against Saturninus. (Appian. Illyr. 11; Liv. Epit. 62; Cic. pro Scaur. 2; Plut. Pomp. 2; Cic. Verr. i. 55, 59, pro Cluent. 42; Ascon. in Cic. Mil. p. 46, ed Orelli; Cic. pro C. Rabir. 7.)

14. Q. Caecilius L. f. Q. n. Metellus Numidicus, younger brother of the preceding and son of No. 6, was one of the most distinguished members of his family. The character of Metellus stood very high among his contemporaries; in an age of growing corruption his personal integrity remained unsullied; and he was distinguished for his abilities in war and peace. He was one of the chief leaders of the aristocratical party at Rome, and displayed the usual arrogance and contempt for all those who did not belong to his order, which distinguished the Roman nobles of his time. The year of his praetorship is not stated; but it was probably after his return from his praetorian province that he was accused of extortion, on which occasion it is related that the judges had such confidence in his integrity that they refused to look at his accounts when they were produced in court. Some modern writers, however, suppose that this trial took place after his return from Numidia (Cic. pro Balb. 5, ad Att. 1, 16; Val. Max. ii. 10. § 1). Metellus obtained the consulship in B. C. 109, with M. Junius Silanus, and received Numidia as his province, with the conduct of the war against Jugurtha, who had in the year before inflicted great disgrace upon the Roman arms. Their honour, however, was fully retrieved by Metellus, who gained a great victory over Jugurtha near the river Muthul. It is unnecessary to enter here into the details of the war, as they are given in the life of Jugurtha. Metellus remained in Numidia during the following year as proconsul, but as he was chiefly occupied in the siege of towns, and was unable to bring the war to a conclusion, his legate C. Marius, whom he had grossly affronted [see above p. 954, a.], industriously circulated reports in the camp and the city that Metellus designedly protracted the war, for the purpose of continuing in the command. These rumours had the desired effect. Marius was raised to the consulship, Numidia was assigned to him as his province, and Metellus saw the honour of finishing the war snatched from his grasp. The blow was all the heavier, since his successor had sprung from the lower classes, and had at the commencement of his political career been assisted by Metellus himself [see p. 952, a.]. So bitter were his feelings that he could not brook the sight of Marius, and accordingly left the army in charge of his legate P. Rutilius, who was to hand it over to Marius. On his arrival at Rome, Metellus was, contrary to his expectation, received with the utmost respect and applause. The people probably felt that injustice had been done him: he celebrated a splendid triumph in B. C. 107, received the honorary surname of Numidicus, and retired into private life, full of glory and honour.

In B. C. 102 Metellus was censor with his cousin Metellus Caprarius. He attempted to expel from the senate L. Appuleius Saturninus and Servilius Glaucia, two of the greatest enemies of the aristocracy, but was prevented by the interposition of his colleague from carrying his design into effect. He refused to allow the name of L. Equitius, who pretended to be a son of Gracchus, to stand upon the list of citizens, notwithstanding the popular tumult which this refusal occasioned. Saturninus and his party resolved in revenge to ruin Metellus, and were supported in their design by Marius, who hated Metellus both on personal and political grounds. By the murder of A. Nonius, who was likewise a candidate for the tribunate, Saturninus obtained this dignity in B. C. 100, the same year in which Glaucia was praetor and Marius consul for the sixth time. Saturninus forthwith proposed an agrarian law, to which he added the clause, that the senate should swear obedience to it within five days after its enactment, and that whosoever should refuse to do so should be expelled from the senate, and pay a fine of twenty talents. In order to entrap his enemy, Marius got up in the senate and asserted that he would never take the oath; and Metellus made the same declaration; but when the senators were summoned to the rostra to comply with the law, Marius was the first to swear obedience, and Metellus was the only one in the senate who refused to do so. He was therefore expelled from the senate; and, not contented with this, the tribune brought forward a bill to punish him with exile. The friends of Metellus were ready to take up arms, if necessary, to resist the law; but Metellus would not avail himself of their assistance, and, in order to avoid a civil commotion, he departed from the city, and retired to Rhodes, where he bore his loss with great calmness, without troubling himself about his return. In the course of the same year, however, the mad schemes of Saturninus occasioned his own ruin and that of his friends; and the popular party received such a severe blow in consequence of their death, that very little opposition was offered to the recall of Metellus, which was proposed in the following year (B. C. 99) by the tribune Q. Calidius. The son of Metellus exerted himself so strongly in support of the rogation of Calidius, that he obtained from his contemporaries the surname of Pius. According to a tale preserved by Cicero (de Nat. Deor. iii. 33), Q. Varius, who was tribune of the plebs B. C. 91, and a violent enemy of the aristocracy, poisoned a Metellus, and as Cicero mentions him without any surname, he probably means the great Metellus Numidicus. The tale, however, may have been invented by the hatred of party.

The general character of Metellus has been already pourtrayed. He was certainly one of the best specimens of his class, and probably one of the most virtuous citizens of his time. He was not ignorant of literature and art, and was a generous patron of both. In his youth he had heard Carneades in Rome; he was a friend and patron of the poet Archias; and when he went into exile he took with him the rhetorician L. Aelius Praeconinus or Stilo, and occupied his time in reading the works and hearing the lectures of the philosophers. His powers of oratory are spoken of with praise by Cicero, and his orations continued to be read with admiration in the time of Fronto. (Sall. Jug. 43—88; Plut. Marius; Liv. Epit. 65, 69; Vell. Pat. ii. 11; Aurel. Vic. de Vir. Ill. 62; Flor. iii. 1; Eutrop. iv. 27; Oros. v. 15; Appian, B. C. i. 28, 30—33; Val. Max. ii. 10. § 1, ix. 7 § 2; Gell. i. 6, xvii. 2; Fronto, p. 15; the passages of Cicero in Orelli's Onom. Tull. vol. ii. p. 103, &c.; Meyer, Orator. Roman. Fragm. p. 272, &c. 2nd ed.)

15. Caecilia (Metella), sister of the two preceding, and daughter of No. 6, married Lucullus, the father of the conqueror of Mithridates. [Caecilia, No. 3.]

16. Q. Caecilius Q. f. Q. n. Metellus Nepos, son of Balearicus [No. 7], and grandson of the celebrated Macedonicus [No. 5], appears to have received the surname of Nepos, because he was the eldest grandson of the latter; for the Metelli were so numerous that it became necessary, for the sake of distinction, that each member of the family should have some personal designation. This surname of Nepos was also borne by one of his children [No. 21]. Metellus Nepos exerted himself in obtaining the recall of his kinsman Metellus Numidicus from banishment in B. C. 99, and was consul the following year, B. C. 98, with T. Didius. In this year the two consuls carried the lex Caecilia Didia. (Cic. post Red. in Sen. 15, pro Dom. 20, ad Att. ii. 9; Schol. Bob. pro Sext. p. 310, ed. Orelli; Obsequ. 107.)

17. CAECILIA (METELLA), sister of the preceding, and daughter of Balearicus, married App. Claudius, consul in B. C. 79. [CAECILIA, No. 4.]

18. CAECILIA (METELLA), daughter of Dalmaticus [No. 13], married first Scaurus, consul in B. C. 115, and afterwards the dictator Sulla. [CAECILIA, No. 5.]

19. Q. CAECILIUS Q. F. L. N. METELLUS PIUS, son of Numidicus [No. 14], received the surname of Pius on account of the love which he displayed for his father when he besought the people to recall him from banishment, in B. C. 99. He was about twenty years of age when he accompanied his father to Numidia in B. C. 109. He obtained the praetorship in B. C. 89, and was one of the commanders in the Marsic or Social war, which had broken out in the preceding year. He defeated and slew in battle Q. Pompaedius, the leader of the Marsians in B. C. 88. He was still in arms in B. C. 87, prosecuting the war against the Samnites, when Marius landed in Italy and joined the consul Cinna. The senate, in alarm, summoned Metellus to Rome; and, as the soldiers placed more confidence in him than in the consul Octavius, they entreated him to take the supreme command shortly after his arrival in the city. As he refused to comply with their request, numbers deserted to the enemy; and finding it impossible to hold out against Marius and Cinna, he left the city and went to Africa. Here he collected a considerable force and was joined by Crassus, who had also fled thither from Spain, but they quarrelled and separated shortly afterwards. In B. C. 84 Metellus was defeated by C. Fabius, one of the Marian party. He therefore returned to Italy, and remained in Liguria; but hearing of the return of Sulla from Asia in the following year (B. C. 83), he hastened to meet him at Brundisium, and was one of the first of the nobles who joined him. In the war which followed against the Marian party, Metellus was one of the most successful of Sulla's generals. Early in B. C. 82, Metellus gained a victory over Carrinas, near the river Aesis in Umbria, defeated shortly afterwards another division of Carbo's army, and finally gained a decisive victory over Carbo and Norbanus, near Faventia, in Cisalpine Gaul.

In B. C. 80, Metellus was consul with Sulla himself. In this year he rewarded the services of Calidius, in obtaining the recall of his father from banishment, by using his influence to obtain for him the praetorship. In the following year (B. C. 79), Metellus went as proconsul into Spain, in order to prosecute the war against Sertorius, who adhered to the Marian party. Here he remained for the next eight years, and found it so difficult to obtain any advantages over Sertorius, that not only was he obliged to call to his aid the armies in Nearer Spain and in Gaul, but the Romans also sent to his assistance Pompey with proconsular power and another army. Sertorius, however, was a match for them both; and when Metellus, after frequent disasters, at length gained a victory over Sertorius, he was so elated with his success, that he allowed himself to be saluted imperator, and celebrated his conquest with the greatest splendour. But Sertorius soon recovered from this defeat, and would probably have continued to defy all the efforts of Metellus and Pompey, if he had not been murdered by Perperna and his friends in B. C. 72. [SERTORIUS.] Metellus returned to Rome in the following year, and triumphed on the 30th of December.

In B. C. 65, Metellus was one of those who supported the accusation against C. Cornelius. He was pontifex maximus, and, as he was succeeded in this dignity by C. Caesar in B. C. 63, he must have died either in this year or at the end of the preceding. Metellus Pius followed closely in the footsteps of his father. Like him, he was a steady and unwavering supporter of the aristocracy; like him, his military abilities were very considerable, but not those of a first-rate general, and he was unable to adapt himself or his troops to the guerilla-warfare which had to be carried on in Spain; like his father, again, his personal character contrasted most favourably with the general dissoluteness of his contemporaries; and lastly, he imitated his father in the patronage which he bestowed upon Archias and other poets. His conduct at the time of his father's banishment, and the gratitude which he showed to Q. Calidius, are especially deserving of praise. He adopted the son of Scipio Nasica, who is called in consequence Metellus Pius Scipio [No. 22]. (Sall. Jug. 64; Appian, B. C. i. 33, 53, 68, 80—91, 97, 103, 108—115; Aurel. Vic. de Vir. Ill. 63; Oros. v. 18, 28; Plut. Mar. 42, Crass. 6, Sertor. 12—27; Liv. Epit. 84, 91, 92; Vell. 20. Q. CAECILIUS Q. F. Q. N. METELLUS CELER, consul B. C. 60, was son of Nepos, consul B. C. 98. [No. 16.] The latter was most probably his father, but his descent has given rise to much dispute. Cicero and Asconius both call Metellus Celer the frater of the younger Metellus Nepos [No. 21], and Asconius states that the latter was the son of the elder Nepos [No. 16], the grandson of Balearicus [No. 7], and the great-grandson of Macedonicus [No. 5]. (Cic. ad Fam. v. 1, 2; Ascon. in Cornel. p. 63.) From the way in which Celer speaks of Nepos, as well as from other circumstances, we are led to conclude that they were brothers and not first-cousins. The only difficulty in this supposition is, that they both bear the praenomen Quintus; but the ingenious hypothesis of Manutius (ad Cic. l. c.) removes this difficulty. He supposes that the elder Nepos [No. 16] may have had two sons, one called Quintus and the other perhaps Lucius: that the latter, the subject of this notice, was adopted by the Q. Metellus Celer, who is mentioned by Cicero as one of the orators in B. C. 90, and that he received in consequence the praenomen Quintus and the cognomen Celer. Manutius further supposes that after the death of the elder son Quintus, the wife of Nepos bore him a third son, to whom he again gave the names of Quintus and Nepos. This supposition accounts not only for the two brothers bearing the same praenomen, but also for the younger, and not the elder, having the cognomen of his father.

In B. C. 66, Metellus Celer served as legate in the army of Pompey in Asia, and distinguished himself by repulsing an attack which Oroeses, king of the Albanians, made upon his winter-quarters. He returned to Rome before Pompey, and was praetor in B. C. 63, the year in which Cicero was consul. Like the other members of his family he distinguished himself during his year of office by a warm support of the aristocratical party. He prevented the condemnation of C. Rabirius by removing the military flag from the Janiculum, as has been already narrated in the life of Caesar [Vol. I. p. 541]. He co-operated with Cicero in opposing the schemes of Catiline; and, when the latter left the city to make war upon the republic, Metellus had the charge of the Picentine and Senonian districts. By blocking up the passes he prevented Catiline from crossing the Apennines and penetrating into Gaul, and thus compelled him to turn round and face Antonius, who was marching against him from Etruria. In the following year, B. C. 62, Metellus went with the title of proconsul into the province of Cisalpine Gaul, which Cicero had relinquished because he was unwilling to leave the city. Although Metellus and Cicero had been thus closely connected, yet he was exceedingly angry when the orator attacked his brother Nepos, who had given him, however, abundant provocation. [See below, No. 21.] The letter which Celer wrote to Cicero on this occasion is still preserved, and is very characteristic of the haughty aristocratical spirit of the family. Cicero's reply is very clever. (Cic. ad Fam. v. 1, 2.)

In B. C. 61, Metellus was consul elect, and by his personal influence prevented the celebration of the Compitalia, which a tribune of the plebs was preparing to celebrate in opposition to a senatus-consultum. Towards the end of the year he took an active part in conjunction with M. Cato, and others of the aristocracy, in resisting the demands of the publicani, who petitioned the senate to allow them to pay a smaller sum for the farming of the taxes in Asia than they had agreed to give. Their request was accordingly refused, but was subsequently granted, in B. C. 59, by Caesar, who brought forward a bill in the comitia for the purpose. In B. C. 60, Metellus was consul with L. Afranius, who was a creature of Pompey, and had been raised to this dignity by Pompey's influence. Pompey was anxious to obtain the ratification of his acts in Asia, and an assignment of lands for his soldiers; but Afranius was not a man of sufficient ability and energy to be of much service to him, and Metellus thwarted all his plans, since Pompey, and not Caesar, was generally regarded at that time as the most formidable enemy of the aristocracy. It was this opposition which drove Pompey into the arms of Caesar, and thus prepared the downfall of the republic. So resolute was the opposition of Metellus to the agrarian law of the tribune L. Flavius, which he brought forward in order to provide for Pompey's veterans, that the tribune had him dragged to prison; but even this did not frighten Metellus, and the law was in consequence abandoned. He acted with such energy and decision in favour of the aristocracy that Cicero calls him "egregius consul"; and although he did not at first oppose the adoption of Clodius into a plebeian family, apparently not attaching much importance to the matter, yet as soon as he perceived that Clodius was resolved to favour the views of the democratical party, Metellus opposed his plans to the utmost of his power. Clodius was the first-cousin of Metellus, being the son of his father's sister, and likewise the brother of his own wife; but he did not allow this family connection to produce any change in his political conduct. As a war threatened to break out in Gaul, the senate determined that the consuls should draw lots for the provinces of the Gauls; but Metellus did not leave Rome this year, nor apparently the next. In B. C. 59, the year of Caesar's consulship, he took a leading part in the opposition to the agrarian law of Caesar, but in vain. He died in the course of the same year, so unexpectedly, that it was suspected that he had been poisoned by his wife Clodia, with whom he lived on the most unhappy terms, and who was a woman of the utmost profligacy. The character of Metellus has been sufficiently indicated in the preceding sketch of his life: he was one of the great leaders of the aristocracy, but did not possess either sufficient influence or sufficient genius to cope with such men as Caesar and Pompey. His oratory is spoken of favourably by Cicero, and was more adapted to the popular assemblies than to the courts. (Dion Cass. xxxvi. 37, and libb. xxxvii. xxxviii; Sall. Cat. 57; the passages of Cicero in Orelli's Onom. Tull. vol. ii. p. 107.)

21. Q. METELLUS, Q. F. Q. N. METELLUS NEPOS, brother of the preceding, and son of the elder Nepos [No. 16]. In B. C. 67 he served as legate of Pompey in the war against the pirates, and was still with him in Asia in B. C. 64. In B. C. 63 he returned to Rome, in order to become a candidate for the tribunate, that he might thereby favour the views of Pompey. The aristocracy, who now dreaded Pompey more than any one else in the state, were in the utmost consternation. They brought forward M. Cato as a rival candidate, and succeeded in carrying his election, but were unable to prevent the election of Metellus likewise. Metellus entered upon his office on the 10th of December, B. C. 63, and commenced his official career by a violent attack upon Cicero, whom he looked upon as the main support of the existing order of things. He openly asserted that he who had condemned Roman citizens without a hearing ought not to be heard himself, and accordingly prevented Cicero from addressing the people on the last day of his consulship, when he had to lay down his office, and only allowed him to take the usual oath, whereupon Cicero swore that he had saved the state. On the 1st of January, B. C. 62, Cicero attacked Metellus with great bitterness in the senate, and two days afterwards Metellus replied to him with equal bitterness, upbraiding him with his low origin, denouncing him as a tyrant for condemning Roman citizens to death unheard, and threatening him with an impeachment. Stung to the quick, Cicero published an oration against him, entitled "Metellina," of the nature of which the second Philippic will probably give us the best idea. Supported by Caesar, who was anxious, above all things, to drive Pompey to an open rupture with the senate, Metellus brought forward a bill to summon Pompey, with his army, to Rome, in order to restore peace and protect the citizens from arbitrary punishment. Parties were in the state of the highest exasperation: on the day on which the bill was to be brought forward, Cato attempted to prevent its being read, but was driven out of the forum by force. He soon, however, returned, supported by a large body of the aristocracy; and this time the victory remained in their hands. Metellus was obliged to take to flight, and repaired to Pompey: the senate proposed to deprive him of his office, and according to some accounts actually did so.

Metellus returned to Rome with Pompey, and was raised to the praetorship in B. C. 60. In this year he brought forward a law for the abolition of the vectigalia in Italy; and the senate, out of hatred to Metellus, attempted to call the law by the name of some other person. In the following year he appears not to have gone to a province, but to have remained in Rome. In B. C. 57 he was consul with P. Cornelius Lentulus Spinther. Cicero, who had been banished in the preceding year, and whose friends were now exerting themselves to obtain his recall, was greatly alarmed at the election of Metellus, since he was one of his bitterest personal enemies. But since Clodius had offended both Pompey and Caesar, and the latter was anxious to mortify and weaken the power of the demagogue, Metellus, out of respect to them, suppressed his feelings towards Cicero, and announced in the senate on the 1st of January, that he should not oppose his recall from exile. Cicero wrote to him to express his gratitude (ad Fam. v. 4), and in subsequent speeches he frequently praises his moderation and magnanimity. At the same time the friends of Cicero at Rome seem to have had some suspicions of Metellus; but he was eventually induced, very much by the influence of his relative, P. Servilius, to give a hearty support to Cicero's friends, and in the month of September the orator was at Rome. But almost immediately afterwards we again find Metellus on the other side, and in the month of November using his efforts to obtain the aedileship for Clodius.

In B. C. 56 Metellus administered the province of Nearer Spain. Either before he left Rome or soon afterwards Metellus had quarrelled with Clodius, and this enmity naturally led to a reconciliation with Cicero, to whom he writes in apparently cordial terms (ad Fam. v. 3). In the month of April he repaired, with many other distinguished Roman nobles, to Caesar's winter-quarters at Luca, doubtless with the view of obtaining the prolongation of his command. On his return to Spain he made a sudden and apparently unjustifiable attack upon the Vaccaei, whom he defeated; but in the following year (B. C. 55) they took the town of Clunia from him, and advanced with such considerable forces that Metellus dared not attack them. Metellus seems to have returned to Rome in the course of this year, and to have died in the same year, as his name does not occur again. In his testament he left Carrinas (probably the consul of B. C. 43) the heir of all his property, passing over all the Metelli and likewise the Claudii, with whom he was so nearly connected (Val. Max. vii. 8. § 3.) Metellus did not adhere strictly to the political principles of his family. He did not support the aristocracy, like his brother; nor, on the other hand, can he be said to have been a leader of the democracy. He was in fact little more than a servant of Pompey, and according to his bidding at one time opposed, and at another supported Cicero. (App. Mithr. 95; Flor. iii. 6; Joseph. Ant. iv. 2. § 3, B. J. i. 6. § 2; Plut. Cat. Min. 20; Dion Cass. xxxvii. 38—51, xxxix. 1—7, 54; Plut. Caes. 21; the passages of Cicero in Orelli's Onom. Tull. vol. ii. p. 107, &c.)

22. Q. Caecilius, Q. F. Metellus Pius Scipio, the adopted son of Metellus Pius [No. 19]. He was the son of P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica, praetor B. C. 94, and Licinia, a daughter of the orator L. Crassus, and was a grandson of P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica, consul B. C. 111, and Caecilia, a daughter of Metellus Macedonicus. Through his grandmother he was therefore descended from the family of the Metelli, into which he was subsequently adopted. Before his adoption he bore the names of P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica, and hence his name is given in various forms. Sometimes he is called P. Scipio Nasica, sometimes Q. Metellus Scipio, and sometimes simply Scipio or Metellus. His full legal name, as it appears in a senatus consultum (Cic. ad Fam. viii. 8), is the one given at the commencement of this notice. Appian erroneously gives him the praenomen Lucius. (B. C. ii. 24.)

Metellus is first mentioned in B. C. 63, when he is said to have come to Cicero by night, along with M. Crassus and Marcellus, bringing with them letters relating to the conspiracy of Catiline. In B. C. 60 he was elected tribune of the plebs, but was accused of bribery by M. Favonius, who had failed in his election, and was defended by Cicero. He was tribune in B. C. 59, and was one of the college of pontiffs before whom Cicero spoke respecting his house in B. C. 57. In the latter year he exhibited gladiatorial games in honour of his deceased father, Metellus Pius. In B. C. 53 Scipio was a candidate for the consulship along with Plautius Hypsaeus and Milo, and was supported by the Clodian mob, since he was opposed to Milo. The candidates had recourse to the most unblushing bribery, and to open violence and force. The most frightful scenes were daily occurring in the streets of Rome; and these disturbances were secretly fomented by Pompey, who was anxious to be named dictator, for the purpose of restoring order to the city, and thereby possessing the power which might enable him to crush Caesar, of whom he had now become jealous. The comitia could not be held for the election of consuls; and when the murder of Clodius at the beginning of the following year, B. C. 52, threw the state almost into anarchy, the senate consented that Pompey should be elected sole consul. This took place at the end of February; and shortly afterwards he married Cornelia, the daughter of Scipio, to whom he showed particular favour. Hypsaeus and Scipio were both accused of bribery; but though both were equally guilty, the former only was condemned. On the 1st of August Pompey made Scipio his colleague in the consulship; and Scipio showed his gratitude by using every effort to destroy the power of Caesar and strengthen that of Pompey. He was all the more ready to exert himself in Pompey's favour, since the latter was now obliged to enter into a close connection with the aristocratical party, to which Scipio belonged, for the purpose of crushing his rival. One of the first acts of Metellus after his appointment to the consulship was to bring forward a law restoring to the censors the powers of which they had been deprived by Clodius, intending thereby to expel Caesar's friends from the senate; for that he was actuated by no desire to preserve the purity and morality of the body, the scandalous tale related by Valerius Maximus (ix. 1. § 8) is a sufficient proof. In the following year (B. C. 51) Scipio proposed in the senate on the 1st of September that the senate should take into consideration the Gallic provinces on the 1st of March in the following year; but as this proposition was considered rather too open a declaration of hostility against Caesar, it was decreed that the consular provinces in general should be brought before the senate on that day. When stronger measures were resolved upon by the aristocracy, Scipio again appeared foremost in urging their adoption. He warmly seconded the consul Lentulus when he proposed in the senate at the beginning of January, B. C. 49, that Caesar should dismiss his army by a certain day, or else be regarded as an enemy of the state; and when the tribunes, M. Antonius and Q. Cassius, placed their veto upon the decree, Scipio urged on matters to an open rupture, and refused to listen to any overtures of peace. The consequence was that the two tribunes fled from the city, and Caesar took up arms against the senate. In the division of the provinces, which was made a few days afterwards, Syria fell to the lot of Scipio, who hastened thither without delay. His conduct in the province is drawn by Caesar in the blackest colours (B. C. iii. 31, 32). Although he suffered some loss in an engagement with the inhabitants of Mount Amanus, he assumed the title of imperator, and had it struck upon his coins. His exactions and extortions were almost unparalleled: new taxes of all kinds were imposed upon the inhabitants; Roman officers were sent into every part of the province to collect them; and there was scarcely a village which escaped their marauding visits: they plundered on their own account as well as on account of their general; and they had the fullest licence given them for every kind of oppression. After collecting large sums of money and a considerable body of troops, he took up his winter-quarters at Pergamum, leaving his province quite unprotected and exposed to a fresh attack of the Parthians. At the beginning of the following year, B. C. 48, he was preparing to plunder the temple of Diana in Ephesus, when he received a summons from Pompey to join him with his troops, as Caesar had already crossed over to Greece. Caesar sent Domitius Calvinus into Macedonia, and L. Cassius Longinus into Thessaly to oppose Scipio, but no battle took place between them, according to the statement of Caesar (B. C. iii. 36—38), although a different account is given by other writers. (Dion Cass. xli. 51; Appian, B. C. ii. 60.) At all events Scipio was unable to join Pompey till Caesar's repulse at Dyrrhachium obliged Calvinus to unite his forces with those of Caesar. Scipio thereupon took possession of Larissa, and shortly after joined Pompey, who divided the command of the army with him. Confident of success, the nobles in Pompey's camp began to quarrel with one another respecting the division of the spoil; and Scipio had a violent altercation, which descended to personal abuse, with Domitius Ahenobarbus and Lentulus Spinther, respecting the office of pontifex maximus, which Caesar then held. The battle of Pharsalia annihilated these prospects. In this battle Scipio commanded the centre of the Pompeian troops, and was opposed by his old adversary, Domitius Calvinus.

After the loss of the battle of Pharsalia, Metellus fled, first to Corcyra and then to Africa, where it was hoped that the army of Attius Varus and the assistance of Juba, king of Numidia, might restore the fallen fortunes of the Pompeian party. Through the influence of Cato, Scipio obtained the supreme command, as being of consular rank, much to the chagrin of Varus, who laid claim to it. As soon as Scipio had received the command, he attempted to destroy the important town of Utica, in order to gratify Juba, and it was with difficulty that Cato prevented him from doing it. His conduct in Africa seems to have been as oppressive as it had been in Syria; in every direction he plundered the inhabitants and laid waste the country. At length Caesar landed in Africa, at the end of December, B. C. 47, and in the month of April in the following year, B. C. 46, he defeated Scipio and Juba at the decisive battle of Thapsus. Scipio immediately fled to the sea, and with a small squadron of ships steered first for Utica; but, learning from Cato that there would be no security for him there, he put out to sea, intending to sail over to Spain. Contrary winds, however, obliged him to put back to Hippo Regius, where he fell in with the fleet of P. Sittius, who fought on Caesar's side. His small squadron was overpowered; and, as he saw that escape was impossible, he stabbed himself and leaped into the sea.

Scipio never exhibited any proofs of striking abilities either in war or in peace; and the prominent part which he played in these stormy times was chiefly owing to his high connections, being a Scipio by birth, a Metellus by adoption, and, by the marriage of his daughter, the father-in-law of Pompey. The love of country and the freedom of the republic (the watchwords with which he fought against Caesar) were a mere sham; he was only anxious to obtain for himself and his party the exclusive possession of the offices of the state and of the provinces, that they might realise fortunes to gratify their love of luxury and pomp. In public, Scipio showed himself cruel, vindictive, and oppressive; in private, he was mean, avaricious, and licentious, even beyond most of his contemporaries. A striking instance of his profligacy is given in the tale related by Valerius Maximus, which has already been referred to. (Plut. Cic. 15; Dion Cass. xl. 51, xliii. 9; Appian, B. C. ii. 24, 25, 60, 76, 87, 95—100; Caes. B. C. i. 1—4, iii. 31—33, 36, 57, 82, 83, B. Afric. passim; Plut. Pomp. 55, Caes. 30, Cat. Min. 60; Liv. Epit. 113, 114; Val. Max. ix. 5. § 3; the passages of Cicero in Orelli's Onom. Tull. vol. ii. p. 105, &c.)

The two coins annexed were struck by Metellus Scipio. On the obverse of the former is the legend Q. METEL. PIVS, but the head is uncertain; on the reverse is SCIPIO IMP., with an elephant, which refers evidently to his command in Africa. The head on the obverse of the latter is also uncertain; beneath it is an eagle's head, and the legend is METEL. PIVS SCIP. IMP.: the reverse represents a pair of scales hanging from a cornucopia, with a sella curulis beneath, on one side of which is an ear of corn, and on the other side a hand grasping something. The legend CRASS. IVN. LEG. PRO(PR). refers to Crassus Junianus, one of Scipio's legates, who served with the title legatus propraetore. [CRASSUS, No. 29, p. 882, a.]

COINS OF METELLUS SCIPIO.

23. Q. CAECILIUS METELLUS CRETICUS. His descent and that of his two brothers is quite uncertain; for he evidently could not have been the son of Metellus Macedonicus, as Florus (iii. 8. § 1) states. (Drumann, vol. ii. p. 50.) Metellus was consul B. C. 69 with Q. Hortensius, and obtained the conduct of the war against Crete, which Hortensius had declined, when the lot had given this province to him. Metellus left Italy in B. C. 68 with three legions. He was engaged two whole years in the subjugation of the island, and did not return to Rome till the third. The difficulty of the conquest was much increased by the unwarrantable interference of Pompey; for after Cydonia, Cnossus, and many other towns had fallen into the hands of Metellus, and the war seemed almost at an end, the Cretans sent to offer their submission to Pompey, from whom they hoped to obtain more favourable terms than from Metellus. By the Gabinian law, passed in B. C. 67, which gave to Pompey the conduct of the war against the pirates, the supreme command in the whole of the Mediterranean was also assigned to him; he therefore had a pretext for interfering in the affairs of Crete, but it was clearly never intended that he should supersede Metellus. His emissaries had probably persuaded the Cretans to make this offer; but however this may be, he immediately complied with their request, and sent his legate L. Octavius to receive the surrender of their towns, and shortly afterwards another of his legates, Cornelius Sisenna, came to the island from Greece with the command of some troops. Metellus, however, refused to take any notice of their claims, and continued to attack and subdue the towns, although the inhabitants were encouraged in their resistance to him by the legates of Pompey. Eleuthera and Luppa fell into his hands; and in the capture of the latter town Octavius was made prisoner, but dismissed by Metellus with contempt. Cornelius Sisenna had meantime died, and hitherto Octavius had not ventured to use force against Metellus, but now he employed the troops of Sisenna to fight on the side of the Cretans. But as these troops shortly afterwards withdrew from the island, for some reason unknown to us, Octavius took refuge with Aristion in Hierapytna, from which, however, he fled at the approach of Metellus, leaving the Cretans to their fate. Thereupon Lasthenes and Panares, the chief leaders of the Cretans, made their submission to him, and the war was brought to a close.

In B. C. 66 Metellus returned to Rome, but he was prevented from obtaining a triumph by the partisans of Pompey. Metellus, however, could not relinquish his claim to a triumph, and accordingly resolved to wait in the neighbourhood of the city till more favourable circumstances. His patience was as great as his desire for the honour; for he was still waiting before the city in B. C. 63, when the conspiracy of Catiline broke out. He was sent into Apulia to prevent an apprehended rising of the slaves; and in the following year, B. C. 62, after the death of Catiline, he was at length permitted to make his triumphal entrance into Rome, and received the surname of Creticus. He was robbed, however, of the chief ornaments of his triumph, Lasthenes and Panares, whom a tribune of the plebs compelled him to surrender to Pompey.

Metellus, as was naturally to be expected, joined Lucullus and the other leaders of the aristocracy in their opposition to Pompey, and succeeded in preventing the latter from obtaining the ratification of his acts in Asia. In B. C. 60 Metellus was sent by the senate with two others to investigate the state of Gaul, where a rising of the people was apprehended. He is mentioned by Cicero, in B. C. 57, as one of the pontiffs before whom he spoke respecting his house, and he probably died soon afterwards. (Liv. Epit. 98—100; Flor. iii. 7, iv. 2; Eutrop. vi. 11; Oros. vi. 4; Vell. Pat. ii. 34, 38; Justin. xxxix. 5; Appian, Sic. 6; Dion Cass. Frag. 178, xxxvi. 1, 2; Plut. Pomp. 29; Sall. Cat. 30; Cic. Verr. i. 9, pro Flacc. 3, 13, 40, in Pison. 24, ad Att. i. 19, de Har. Resp. 6.)

24. L. CAECILIUS METELLUS, brother of the preceding [No. 23], was praetor B. C. 71, and as propraetor succeeded Verres in the government of Sicily in B. C. 70. He defeated the pirates, who had conquered the Roman fleet and taken possession of the harbour of Syracuse, and compelled them to leave the island. His administration is praised by Cicero for restoring peace and security to the inhabitants, after the frightful scenes which had been enacted there by Verres; but he nevertheless attempted, in conjunction with his brothers, to shield Verres from injustice, and tried to prevent the Sicilians from bringing forward their testimony and complaints against him. He was consul B. C. 68 with Q. Marcius Rex, but died at the beginning of his year. (Liv. Epit. 98; Oros. vi. 3; Cic. Verr. Act. i. 9, Accus. ii. 4, iii. 16, ii. 28, 56, 67, iii. 53, in Pis. 4; Dion Cass. xxxv. 4.)

25. M. CAECILIUS METELLUS, brother of the two preceding [Nos. 23, 24], was praetor B. C. 69, in the same year that his eldest brother was consul. The lot gave him the presidency in the court de pecuniis repetundis, and Verres was very anxious that his trial should come on before Metellus. (Cic. Verr. Act. i. 8, 9, 10.) Since he did not obtain the consulship, Drumann conjectures (vol. ii. p. 57) that the gladiators of M. Metellus, whom Cicero mentions in B. C. 60 (ad Att. ii. 1. § 1), may have belonged to the son of the praetor, and were exhibited by him in honour of his father, who would therefore have died about this time.

26. Q. CAECILIUS METELLUS CRETICUS, is conjectured by Drumann (vol. ii. p. 57) to have been the son of No. 23, and to have been the quaestor with C. Trebonius, who supported the adoption of Clodius into a plebeian family, when Trebonius opposed it. (Cic. ad Fam. xv. 21. § 2.) This is, however, mere conjecture, for the name of the colleague of Trebonius is not even mentioned in the passage of Cicero referred to above. Cicero speaks (ad Att. iv. 7. § 2), in B. C. 56, soon after his return from exile, of a Metellus who had lately died, and who had always acted badly towards him. As this Metellus cannot be any of the celebrated persons of that name, Drumann supposes him to have been the colleague of Trebonius.

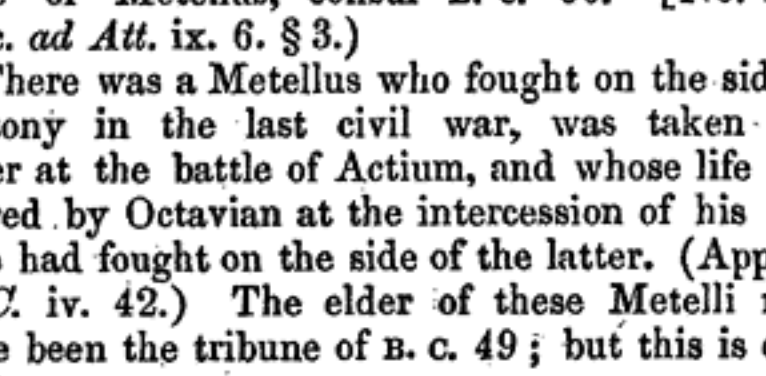
27. L. CAECILIUS METELLUS CRETICUS, a son probably of No. 24 (comp. Cic. Verr. iii. 68), was tribune of the plebs, B. C. 49, and, true to the hereditary principles of his family, distinguished himself by his warm support of the aristocracy. He did not fly from Rome on the approach of Caesar with Pompey and the rest of his party, but remained behind in the city. He also showed his courage in attempting to prevent Caesar from taking possession of the sacred treasury, and only gave way upon being threatened with death. (Plut. Caes. 35, Pomp. 62; Dion Cass. xli. 17; Appian, B. C. ii. 41; Caes. B. C. i. 33; Lucan, iii. 114, &c.; Cic. ad Att. x. 4, 8.) He soon afterwards left Rome, and was at Capua at the beginning of March, when Pompey was on the point of leaving Italy. Cicero mentions Clodia as his mother-in-law, who may perhaps have been the wife of Metellus, consul B. C. 60. [No. 20.] (Cic. ad Att. ix. 6. § 3.)

There was a Metellus who fought on the side of Antony in the last civil war, was taken prisoner at the battle of Actium, and whose life was spared by Octavian at the intercession of his son, who had fought on the side of the latter. (Appian, B. C. iv. 42.) The elder of these Metelli may have been the tribune of B. C. 49; but this is only conjecture.

28. M. CAECILIUS METELLUS, son probably of No. 25, is mentioned by Cicero in B. C. 60 (ad Att. ii. 1. § 1). See No. 25.

29. Q. CAECILIUS METELLUS CRETICUS, consul A. D. 7 with A. Licinius Nerva, was probably grandson of No. 23, and son of No. 26, if the latter ever existed. (Dion Cass. lv. 30; Fasti.)

30. L. (CAECILIUS) METELLUS, a triumvir of the mint, whose name is only known from coins, a specimen of which is annexed. The obverse has the head of Apollo, with (L.) METEL. A. ALB. S. F.: the reverse, a man sitting on shields, whom Victory is crowning from behind, with C. MAL., and beneath, ROMA. It thus appears that the colleagues of this Metellus were A. Albinus and C. Malleolus. (Eckhel, vol. v. p. 279.)



COIN OF L. METELLUS.

METHAPUS (Μέθαπος), an Athenian who is said to have introduced at Thebes the worship of the Cabeiri. He was much skilled in all kinds of mysteries and orgies, and made several alterations in the mysteries at Andania. (Paus. iv. 1. § 5; Welcker, Die Aeschyl. Tril. p. 270.) [L. S.]

METHARME (Μεθάρμη), a daughter of king Pygmalion, and wife of Cinyras. (Apollod. iii. 14. § 3; comp. CINYRAS.) [L. S.]

METHO'DIUS (Μεθόδιος). 1. Surnamed the APOSTLE of Bohemia, enjoys great reputation in the history of the church as well as of the fine arts. He lived in the ninth century of our era, was a native of Thessalonica, and went to Constantinople, where he entered a convent of the order of St. Basilius Cyrillus. For some time he lived in Rome, and devoted himself to painting, in which he rose to such celebrity that, after his return to Constantinople, he received an invitation from Bogoris, king of Bulgaria, to repair to his court at Nicopolis. The king being fond of pictures representing battles and the like bloody subjects, requested him to execute something more terrible for him than he had ever seen before; and upon this suggestion, Methodius painted the Last Judgment with such effect, that Bogoris, whose mind had already a turn for the Christian religion, entreated the skilful monk to baptize him forthwith, and thus enable him to find pardon with God on the day of the last judgment. This was exactly what Methodius had in view when he chose that subject. The conversion of the king was followed by that of the army; and in a short time the whole nation adopted the Christian religion. At that period Christianity was daily losing ground in Asia, where the influence of Mohammedanism became overwhelming; but the losses in the South were more than balanced by the victories of the Cross in the North, obtained through the noble zeal of the Greek clergy, among whom our Methodius and (his brother?) Cyrillus, were then the most luminous stars. Shortly after the conversion of the Bulgarians, which took place in 853 and the following years (perhaps only in 861), Methodius was sent into the countries north of the Danube, where he displayed the greatest activity among the Slavonian population of Pannonia and the adjacent countries: he resided there in the quality of archbishop of Pannonia, and he repaired thither as early as 859, or at least not later than 863. He is said to have assisted Cyrillus in inventing the Slavonian alphabet, which is the parent of the present Russian and Servian alphabets; and he was active in translating the whole of the Bible and several liturgical books into the Slavonian languages. In 878 he was summoned by pope John VIII. to come to Rome, and to show cause why he should not be punished for having translated the mass into Slavonian, and introduced it in that form into the churches of his diocese; but it appears he did not obey the summons. About 890 Methodius converted duke Borziwoi of Bohemia, who soon afterwards became king of Magna Moravia, to the Christian religion; and now all the Bohemians and Moravians, many millions in number, submitted likewise to the rite of baptism. There are, however, doubts as to the conversion of Bohemia by Methodius, respecting which the reader will find more information in the sources quoted below. The time of the death of Methodius is not exactly known, but thus much is certain, that he died after 893, and perhaps in the beginning of the tenth century, at a very advanced age. In later years he was canonised. The Greeks and Slavonians celebrate him on the 11th of May; but in the Martyrologium the day is the 9th of March. As to his proficiency in painting, Le Beau (Hist. du Bas Empire, vol. xiv. p. 362) calls him the most eminent painter of his time. It is, however, well known that his contemporaries, Modalulph in France, Tutilo in Germany, and Lazarus in Constantinople, enjoyed also a first-rate reputation as painters. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vii. p. 272 ; Cedren. p. 489, &c. ; Simeon Metaphr. Annal. p. 412, &c. ; Zonar. vol. ii. p. 135, &c., in the Paris edition ; Bolland, Vitae Cyrilli et Methodii ; J. G. Stredowsky, Vita Method. in Sacra Moraviae Hist. Sulzbach, 1710, 4to. ; Chr. Sam. Schmidt, Ward das Christenthum in Böhmen von Methud (Methodius), &c. eingeführt ? Leipzig, 1789, 8vo.)

2. Confessor, patriarch of Constantinople, was called Ὁμολογέτα, or Confessor, on account of his firm adherence to the worship of images. He was a native of Syracuse, where he was born towards the close of the eighth century of our era, but went to Constantinople and took holy orders, after giving his property to the church and the poor. For some time he lived in a convent in the island of Chios. The severe measures of the emperor Leo Armenus induced him to take refuge among the orthodox in Rome, but he returned to Greece after the death of Leo, in 820. Shortly afterwards he was sent by Nicephorus, patriarch of Constantinople, as ambassador to pope Pashalis, who entrusted him with a letter to Michael, in order to persuade the emperor to behave less harshly against the orthodox. For this service poor Methodius paid very dearly. Michael, offended by the pope's letter, ordered seven hundred lashes to be inflicted upon the back of Methodius, who, half dead, was thrown into an awful dungeon in one of the islands of the Propontis, where he would have perished from want of food had not a poor fisherman accidentally discovered him, and kept him alive by occasional supplies of bread and fish. He remained there several years ; but being a man of great talents and acknowledged skill in administrative affairs, he was recalled by Theophilus, son and successor of Michael, who gave him suitable apartments in his own palace. In a short time Methodius obtained great influence at the court; but his orthodox principle caused him a second flogging and a second imprisonment in his former dungeon. Again released, he returned to Constantinople and was compelled to accompany Theophilus in his campaigns against the Arabs, the emperor being in want of his talents, although he did not trust him sufficiently to leave him in the capital. His life, however, was far from being agreeable, several plots having been made to ruin him : among other charges brought forth against him was that of having committed fornication with a reputed courtisan, who declared she was pregnant by the pious bishop ; but Methodius cleared himself of this imputed misdemeanour. Theophilus died in 842. He was succeeded by his widow, Theodora, who reigned for her infant son, Michael III.; and being a professed friend of images, she bestowed her powerful protection upon Methodius, and caused him to be chosen patriarch of Constantinople in the very year of his accession (842). This high office Methodius held till his death, on the 14th of June, 846, displaying constantly the greatest activity in suppressing the iconoclasts, and restoring the worship of images. Methodius was a very learned man, and wrote a considerable number of works on divinity, of which several have come down to us, and have been found well worthy of publication. The most important are :—1. Encomium S. Dionysii Areopagitae. Editions : the Greek text, Florence, 1516, 8vo. ; Paris, 1562, 8vo. ; Graece et Latine, in the second volume of "Opera S. Dionysii Areop.," Antwerp, 1634, fol. The question whether, in composing this work, Methodius was guilty of plagiarism by stealing from the monk Hilduinus, who wrote on the same subject, caused a literary feud, which is largely discussed in Fabricius, to whom we refer the reader. 2. Oratio in eos qui dicunt : Quid profuit Filius Dei Crucifixus? Graece et Latine, by Gretserus, in the second volume of his work, De Cruce. 3. De Occursu Simeonis et Annae in Templo, et de Deipara ; and 4. In Ramos Palmarum, two orations, Graece et Latine, in Combéfis's edition of the works of Methodius Patarensis, Paris, 1644, fol. 5. Encomium S. Agathae Virginis et Martyris, a Latin version in Combéfis's Bibl. Patr. ; the text, incomplete, with a Latin version, in Leo Allatius, Diatriba de Methodiis. 6. Canones Poenitentiales, &c., published with a Latin version by Gentianus Herretus. 7. Constitutio de iis qui diverso Modo, &c., ad fidem Christianam revertantur, Graece et Latine, with notes, by Jac. Goar in Euchолog. Graecor. 8. Tres versus Iambici ad Theodorum et Theophanem graptos, tribus illis quos ad ipsum miserant Responsorii, in Lambecii Commentarii ; also ad Calcem Const. Manassae in the Paris edition. (Leo Allatius, Diatriba de Methodiis ; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vii. p. 273 ; Cave, Hist. Lit. p. 451, &c., ed. Geneva ; Baronius, Annal. ad annum 842 ; Theophan. Contin. ii. 8, iii. 24, iv. 3, 6, 10 ; Simeon Metaphrasta, Theophil. c. 23, Michael et Theodora, c. 3 ; Georg. Monach. Michael et Theodora, c. 1.)

3. Patriarch of Constantinople in 1240, is probably the author of De Revelatione, which some attribute to Methodius Patarensis. [See No. 6.] The Greek text, with a Latin version, is contained in the first volume of the Graecia Orthodoxa, as well as in some of the Biblioth. Patr. He also wrote Aenigmata, in iambic tristichons, extant in MS. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vii. p. 275 ; Cave, p. 662, ed. Geneva.)

4. Eubulius or Eubulus. [No. 6.]

5. Monachus, lived in Constantinople during the middle and latter part of the thirteenth century. About this time the Byzantine capital was much disturbed by the coincident election of Josephus and Arsenius to the patriarchal see of Constantinople, each of them being proclaimed by his partisans as the sole legitimate patriarch. On this occasion Methodius wrote a valuable treatise, entitled Συλλογὴ συνοπτική, Sylloga Compendiosa, showing that orthodox people ought not to secede from their spiritual leaders even in case their predecessor had been illegally deposed. It was published by Leo Allatius in his Diatriba de Methodiis, with a Latin translation. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vii. p. 275 ; Cave, Hist. Lit. p. 642, ed. Geneva.)

6. Surnamed Patarensis, and sometimes, Eubulus or Eubulius, lived in the third, and died in the beginning of the fourth century of our era. He held successively the sees of Olympus and Patara in Lycia (whence Patarensis) and Tyrus in Phoenicia. He was a Christian ; and Suidas says that he died the death of a martyr, at Chalcis Ἀνατολῆς (one of the two Chalcis in

Syria), during the reign of Decius (A. D. 249—251) and Valerianus. The addition of the latter name seems to be spurious, since Valerian did not reign with, but after Decius. However the original text of Suidas may be, he was wrong with regard to the time assigned by him to the death of Methodius; for there seems to be no doubt that this divine was a contemporary of Porphyry, and perhaps outlived him; and if he therefore died during one of the later persecutions of the Christians, as is asserted, it might have been in 303, as Cave thinks, or in 311, according to Fabricius. Methodius was a man of great learning and exemplary piety, who enjoyed the general esteem of his contemporaries. He wrote several works, the principal of which are: 1. Περὶ Ἀναστάσεως, De Resurrectione, against Origen, which was divided into two or perhaps three parts. Fragments of it are given by Epiphanius in his Panarium; in Photius, Bibliotheca; a few are contained in the works of Damascenus; 2. Περὶ τῶν γενετῶν, De Creatis, in Photius; 3. Περὶ Αὐτεξουσίου καὶ πόθεν τὰ κακά, De Libro Arbitrio. Leo Allatius had the complete text with a Latin version, but the work, as contained in the edition of Methodius by Combéfis, is not quite complete. 4. Περὶ τῆς ἀγγελομιμήτου παρθενείας καὶ ἁγνείας, De Angelica Virginitate et Castitate, written in the form of a dialogue. Leo Allatius published this work, Gr. et Lat., in his Diatriba de Methodiis, at Rome, 1656, 8vo. and dedicated it to Pope Alexander VII. At the same time Petrus Possinus obtained the Greek text of this work from Lucas Holsten, at Rome; and having prepared a copy for the press, sent it, together with a Latin version, to Paris, where it was published in the following year, 1657, fol. Possinus, strangely enough, dedicated his edition to the same pope, not knowing that Leo Allatius was doing, or had just done, the same thing; nor was Allatius at all aware of Possinus being engaged in the same work at the same time as he was. It is also contained in Combéfis, Auctuar. Biblioth. Patr. Paris, 1672. Photius, quoted below, says that the work had been adulterated, and contained especially several passages tending to Arianism, of which no trace is to be found in the later editions, so that his MS. was decidedly different from those perused by Allatius and Possinus. 5. Oratio de Simeone et Anna, seu In Festum Occursus et Purificationis B. Mariae, ed. Petrus Plantinus, Antwerp, 1598. This work is said to be the production of a later Methodius, but Allatius vindicates the authorship of Methodius Patarensis. 6. Λόγος περὶ Μαρτύρων, Sermo de Martyribus. 7. Εἰς τὰ Βαΐα, In Ramos Palmarum, an oration, of which Photius has extracts. The authorship of Methodius is doubtful. 8. Libri adversus Porphyrium, of which there are fragments in Damascenus. 9. De Pythonissa contra Origenem, lost. 10. Commentarii in Cantica Canticorum, fragments. 11. Ξένων, lost, &c. This Methodius is said to have written a work, De Revelatione, which, however, is more justly attributed to a later Methodius. [No. 3.] The principal works of Methodius, viz., De Libro Arbitrio, De Resurrectione, De Angelica Virginitate et Castitate, two homilies, and the extracts given by Photius were published by Combéfis, Graece et Latine, cum notis, Paris, 1644, fol., together with the works of Amphilochus and Andreas Cretensis. (Phot. Cod. 234, 235, 236, 237; Cave, Hist. Lit. p. 96, sc. ed. Geneva; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vii. p. 260, &c. This Methodius stands in the index to Fabricius as Methodius Patarensis, which is correct; but the passage where the reader finds most information on him (vol. vii. p. 260, &c.) is omitted. (Hankius, Script. Byzant.) [W. P.]

METHON (Μέθων), a kinsman of Orpheus, from whom the Thracian town of Methone was believed to have derived its name. (Plut. Quaest. Graec. 11.) [L. S.]

METHYMNA (Μήθυμνα), a daughter of Macar and wife of Lesbus, from whom the town of Methymna, in Lesbos, derived its name. (Diod. v. 81; Steph. Byz. s. v.) [L. S.]

METHYMNAEUS (Μηθυμναῖος), a surname of Dionysus, derived, according to some, from Methymna, rich in vines. (Hesych. s. v.; Virg. Georg. ii. 20.) Others derived it from μέθυ (sweet or wine), as Plutarch (Sympos. iii. 2) and Athenaeus (viii. p. 363). [L. S.]

METIADU'SA (Μητιάδουσα), a daughter of Eupalamus, and wife of king Cecrops, by whom she became the mother of Pandion. (Apollod. iii. 15. § 5; Paus. i. 5. § 3.) [L. S.]

METI'LIA GENS, an Alban house, which, on the destruction of Alba Longa, migrated to Rome. (Dionys. iii. 29.) Since the Metilii were immediately admitted into the Roman senate, they must at the time of their migration have been of patrician rank. In history, however, they occur only as plebeians. Pliny (H. N. xxxv. 17) mentions a lex Metilia de Fullonibus in B. C. 220. [W. B. D.]

METI'LIUS. 1. Sp. Metilius, tribune of the plebs in B. C. 416. He brought forward a rogation for fresh assignments of the public land to the commons, but was foiled in his attempt by his colleagues in the tribunate. (Liv. iv. 48.)

2. M. Metilius, tribune of the plebs in B. C. 401, when he impeached two of the consular tribunes of the preceding year, and resisted the levying of the war-tax (tributum) because the patricians usurped the rents of the demesne-land. (Liv. v. 11, 12.)

3. M. Metilius, tribune of the plebs in B. C. 217, brought forward a rogation to deprive Q. Fabius Maximus, then dictator, of the sole control of the legions, and to admit the master of the horse, Q. Minucius Thermus, to an equal share of the command. Metilius was legatus, in B. C. 212, from the senate to the consuls, after some reverses, in the seventh year of the second Punic war. (Liv. xxii. 25, xxv. 22.)

4. T. Metilius Croto, legatus, in B. C. 215, from the praetor Appius Claudius Pulcher to the legions in Sicily. (Liv. xxiii. 31.) [W. B. D.]

ME'TIOCHE. [Menippe.] A second person of the name was a Trojan woman, who was painted by Polygnotus in the Lesche at Delphi. (Paus. x. 26. § 1.) [L. S.]

ME'TIOCHUS (Μητίοχος), an Athenian orator, a contemporary and friend of Pericles, for whom he often spoke in the assembly at Athens. (Plut. Praecept. Pol. 15; Bekker, Anecdot. p. 309; Schömann, De Sortit. Jud. p. 40, &c.) [L. S.]

ME'TION (Μητίων), a son of Erechtheus and Praxithea, and husband of Alcippe. His sons, the Metionidae, expelled their cousin Pandion from his kingdom of Athens, but were themselves afterwards expelled by the sons of Pandion (Apollod. iii. 15. §§ 1, 5, 6, 8; Paus. i. 5. § 3). Diodorus (iv. 76) calls Daedalus one of the sons of Metion, and Metion himself a son of Eupalamus and grandson of Erechtheus (comp. Plat. Ion, p. 533, a.; Paus. vii. 4. § 5). Apollodorus (iii. 15. § 8) on the other hand, calls Eupalamus a son of Metion and father of Daedalus. According to a Sicyonian legend, Sicyon also was a son of Metion and a grandson of Erechtheus. (Paus. ii. 6. § 3; comp. Schol. ad Soph. Oed. Col. 468, who calls the wife of Metion Iphinoë.) [L. S.]

METIS (Μῆτις). 1. The personification of prudence, is described as a daughter of Oceanus and Thetys. At the instigation of Zeus, she gave to Cronos a vomitive, whereupon he brought back his children whom he had devoured (Apollod. i. 2. § 1, &c.; Hes. Theog. 471). She was the first love and wife of Zeus, from whom she had at first endeavoured to withdraw by metamorphosing herself in various ways. She prophesied to him that she would give birth first to a girl and afterwards to a boy, to whom the rule of the world was destined by fate. For this reason Zeus devoured her, when she was pregnant with Athena, and afterwards he himself gave birth to a daughter, who issued from his head (Apollod. i. 3. § 6; Hes. Theog. 886). Plato (Sympos. p. 203, b.) speaks of Porus as a son of Metis, and according to Hesiod, Zeus devoured Metis on the advice of Uranus and Ge, who also revealed to him the destiny of his son. (Comp. Welcker, Die Aeschyl. Tril. p. 278.)

2. A male being, a mystic personification of the power of generation among the so-called Orphics, similar to Phanes and Ericapaeus. (Orph. Fragm. vi. 19, viii. 2.) [L. S.]

METIUS. [METTIUS.]

METOCHI'TA, GEO'RGIUS (Γεώργιος ὁ Μετοχίτης), magnus diaconus in Constantinople, lived in the thirteenth century. He was an intimate friend and staunch adherent of the emperor Andronicus the Elder, and one of those few Greek divines who advocated the re-union of the Greek and Latin churches. For both these reasons he was deposed and exiled, about 1283, by the emperor Andronicus the Younger. He died in exile, but the year of his death is not known. Some say that he was the father of the following Theodore Metochita, with whom several modern writers have confounded him. He wrote different works of no small importance for the history of the time: his style is abominable, but full of expressive strength and barbarous vigour. 1. Ἀντίῤῥησις, &c., or Refutatio trium Capitum Maximi Planudis; 2. Ἀντίῤῥησις, &c., or, Responsio ad ea quae Manuel Nepos Cretensis publicavit, both published together, Greek and Latin, by Leo Allatius, in the second volume of Graecia Orthodox. 3. Fragmentum ex Oratione de Unione Ecclesiarum, published by the same in his diatribe Contra Hottinger.; 4. Fragm. ex Oratione de Dissidio Ecclesiar., ibid.; 5. Tractatus de Processione Spiritus Sancti Patrumque hâc in re Sententiis, divided into five parts or books; a fragment of the fourth was published by Combéfis in the second volume of Nova Biblioth. Patr. and a fragment of the fifth by Leo Allatius in De Purgatorio and Contra Hottinger., who gives some information on the whole work in his De Consensu utriusque Ecclesiae, p. 771; 6. Oratio Antirrhetica contra Georgium Cyprium Patriarcham. 7. Oratio de Sacris Mysteriis; 8. Explicatio Regularum S. Nicephori, &c., and other minor productions, most of which were known to Leo Allatius. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. x. p. 412, not.; Cave, Hist. Lit. ad ann. 1276, p. 645, ed. Geneva.) [W. P.]

METOCHI'TA, THEODO'RUS (Θεόδωρος ὁ Μετοχίτης), the intimate friend and adherent of the unfortunate emperor Andronicus the Elder (A. D. 1282—1328), was a man of extraordinary learning and great literary activity, although much of his time was taken up by the duties he had to discharge as Magnus Logotheta Ecclesiae Constant., and the various commissions with which he was entrusted by his imperial friend. No sooner had Andronicus the Younger usurped the throne, in 1328, than he deposed Metochita and sent him into exile. The learned priest, however, was soon recalled, but, disgusted with the world, he retired into a convent in Constantinople, where he died in 1332. It is said that he was the son of the preceding Georgius Metochita, with whom he has often been confounded. Nicephorus Gregoras, the writer, delivered the funeral oration at the interment of Th. Metochita, and wrote an epitaph which is given in Fabricius. Many details referring to the life of this distinguished divine are contained in the works of Nicephorus Gregoras and John Cantacuzenus. Metochita wrote a great number of works on various subjects; the principal are:—1. Παράφρασις, being commentaries on various works of Aristotle's, especially Physica, De Anima, De Coelo, De Ortu et Interitu, De Memoria et Reminiscentia, De Somno et Vigilia, and others. The Greek text has never been published. A Latin version by Gentianus Hervetus appeared at Basel, 1559, 4to; reprinted, Ravenna, 1614, 4to; 2. Χρονικόν, a Roman history from Julius Caesar to Constantine the Great; the Greek text, with a Latin version, by John Meursius, Leyden, 1618, 4to. Regarding the doubts on Metochita's authorship of this work, compare Fabricius; 3. Ὑπομνηματισμοὶ καὶ Σημειώσεις γνωμικαί, various commentaries, essays, sentences, &c., published under the title Specimina Operum Theod. Metochitae, by Janus Bloch, Copenhagen, 1790, 8vo. The following are still unpublished:—4. Περὶ Νεωτερικῆς κακοηθείας, De mala recentiorum Consuetudine, treats on the corruption of the church, especially of the anti-Christian changes introduced into the rites. Arcadius made a Latin version of this work, which, however, seems not to have been published. 5. Λόγοι, eight books on ecclesiastical history, two of which are extant in MS. 6. Capita Philosophica et Historica Miscellanea CXX., of which Fabricius gives the titles. Their great variety allows us to infer the extensive learning and the speculative genius of Metochita. 7. Michaelis Palaeologi et Irenes Augustae Epitaphium. 8. Astronomica. Metochita was one of the best astronomers of his time. 9. Commentarii in Ptolemaei Magnam Syntaxin, said to be extant in MS. in Spain. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. x. p. 412, &c.; Cave, Hist. Lit. ad ann. 1276, and Wharton, in Append. to Cave, ad ann. 1301; Thomas Magister, Προσφωνευτικόν (ad Metochitam) and Epistola (to the same), ed. Graec. et Lat., together with other letters of the same Thomas, Laurentius Normann, Upsala, 1693, 4to.) [W. P.]

METON (Μέτων), a citizen of Tarentum, who, when the decree was proposed for calling in the assistance of Pyrrhus, came into the assembly of the people, in the garb of a reveller, and accompanied by a flute-player, as if just come from a banquet. When the people laughed at him, and called out to him to sing them a song, he answered, "You are right to encourage men to sing and make merry now while they can, for when Pyrrhus is arrived we shall have to lead a very different sort of life." By this artifice he produced a great effect upon the assembly; but the decree was nevertheless carried. (Plut. Pyrrh. 13; Dion Cass. Fr. Vat. 45, p. 169, ed. Mai; Dionys. xvii. 13, 14.) [E. H. B.]

METON (Μέτων). With the name of Meton we join those of PHAEINUS (Φαεινός) and EUCTEMON (Εὐκτήμων), all of Athens, contemporaries, and, as to the little which is known of them, inseparable.

As to Phaeinus, he appears nowhere except in a passage of Theophrastus, who says (de Signis Tempest. sub init.) that he observed the solar tropics at Athens on Lycabettus; from which Meton learnt the mode of constructing the cycle of nineteen years. Salmasius has a conjecture which we only mention here because it suggested a reverse conjecture. There is in Aratus the following line (at the beginning of the Diosemeia) :—

Ἐννεακαίδεκα κύκλα φαεινοῦ ἠελίοιο.

This, says Salmasius, should be Φαεινοῦ Ἠλείοιο, or the shining sun here mentioned is Phaeinus of Elea. The conjecture has been rejected with scorn by Petavius, Weidler, &c. May we not go further, and ask whether it ought not to be the other way? Did any Phaeinus give information upon tropics to Meton (a known observer of them) other than Φαεινὸς Ἥλιος, Apollo himself? It is worth noting that Phaeinus is a strange adjective, and a strange form of it, for a proper name; and that a slight mistake of Theophrastus (no astronomer, as far as is known), or of some one whom he copied, might easily have converted the old epithet of the Sun into an astronomer. And there is another astronomer, Philip, contemporary with Meton, to whom (with Euctemon) Geminus attributes the cycle of nineteen years, to the exclusion of Meton. Here is one confusion in which Philip bears a part, and there might easily have been another.

Much emendation has often been found necessary when an ancient writer enumerates those who have written on subjects which he had not studied himself: witness the passage in Vitruvius (ix. 7), in which the older texts and versions join Hipparchus and Aratus with Eudaemon, Callistus, and Melo, for which we must read Euctemon, Callippus, and Meton.

As to Meton, the son of Pausanias, and (on either supposition) the follower of Phaeinus, Suidas calls him Λυκονιεύς (some read Λευκονιεύς). Ptolemy (de Apparent.) says he observed at Athens, in the Cyclades, in Macedonia, and in Thrace; unless indeed he meant one or two of these places to be stated of Euctemon. A verse of Phrynichus (preserved by Suidas) describes him as κρήνας ἄγων, whence his skill in hydraulics has been inferred. The discovery of the cycle of nineteen years (CALLIPPUS, and Dict. of Antiq., s. v. "Calendar, Greek") is referred to by Aelian (Var. Hist. x. 7), Censorinus (c. 18), Diodorus (xii. 36), Ptolemy (Synt. iii. 2), all of whom note or refer to a column or table erected by Meton at Athens, setting forth this cycle and the observations of the solstices which were made shortly before the epoch of commencement of the cycle.

From Ptolemy's words it appears that the date of these observations of the solstices made by Meton and Euctemon is thus to be determined (Halma, i. 163):—"It is said that this observation was made at Athens when Apseudes was archon, on the 21st of the month Phamenoth, in the morning. Now, from this solstice to that which was observed by Aristarchus in the fiftieth year of the first period of Calippus, there have elapsed, as Hipparchus says, 152 years. And since this fiftieth year, which was the forty-fourth after the death of Alexander, to the four hundred and sixty-third, which is that of my observation, there have elapsed 419 years." Such are the data from which, and from the presumed meaning of a passage in Diodorus, Meton's solstice, the acknowledged epoch of commencement of the period, has been placed B. C. 432. But we are far from seeing how it has been made out. Delambre gives no opinion, but quotes Cassini's, which he would not have done on any point in which care or research could have given him one of his own. But though the particular date of this epoch is not fixed to a year or two, the general era of Meton is well fixed, as well by the data above mentioned as by Aelian (Var. Hist. xiii. 12), who states that he feigned insanity to avoid sailing for Sicily in the ill-fated expedition of which he is stated to have had an evil presentiment.

The length of the year, according to Meton, is stated by Ptolemy as $365\frac{1}{4}$ days and $\frac{1}{76}$ of a day. This is more than half an hour too long. But then it should be remembered that this length of the year is that deduced from assuming that Meton held his own period to be exact. Now it by no means follows that in stating the cycle he meant to assert that it was mathematically true. Whether he was himself the inventor of this remarkable period, or whether he found it elsewhere, cannot now be known.

The number of different persons to whom this astronomical period has been attributed (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iii. p. 9), may furnish some presumption that Meton only brought forward and made popular a piece of knowledge which he and others had derived from an oriental source: a thing by no means unlikely in itself.

Of Euctemon, independently of his astronomical partnership with Meton, nothing is known. Geminus and Ptolemy both frequently refer to him on the rising and setting of stars, on which is to be inferred he had left some work. (Ptolemy, Geminus, Weidler, Hist. Astron.; Delambre, Astron. Anc.; Petavius, Uranolog. &c.) [A. De M.]

METO'PE (Μετώπη). 1. A daughter of the Arcadian river-god Ladon, was married to Asopus, and the mother of Thebe. (Apollod. iii. 12. § 6; Pind. Ol. vi. 144, with the Schol.)

2. A daughter of the river-god Asopus. (Schol. ad Pind. Isthm. viii. 37.)

3. The wife of the river-god Sangarius and mother of Hecabe, the wife of Priam. (Apollod. iii. 12. § 5.) [L. S.]

METO'PUS (Μέτωπος), a Pythagorean, a native of Metapontum. A fragment of a work of his on virtue is still extant. (Stob. Serm. i. p. 7; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. i. p. 852.) [C. P. M.]

METRO'BIUS (Μητρόβιος). 1. One of the numerous Greek writers on the art of cookery, quoted by Athenaeus, was the author of a work entitled Πλακουντοποιϊκὸν σύγγραμμα. (Athen. xiv. p. 643, e. f.)

2. An actor, who played women's parts (λυσιῳ-δός), was a great favourite of the dictator Sulla. (Plut. Sull. 2, 36.)

METROCLES (Μήτροκλῆς), of Maroneia, a brother of Hipparchia, was at first a disciple of Theophrastus, but afterwards he entered the school of Crates, and became a cynic. He seems to have been a man of great ability, and having reached an advanced age, he drowned himself. He wrote several works, all of which he is said to have burnt; one of them bore the title of Χρεῖαι, of which a line is preserved in Diogenes Laërtius (vi. 6; comp. vi. 33, ii. 102; Stob. Serm. tit. 116. 48). [L. S.]

METRODO'RUS (Μητρόδωρος), an officer of Philip V. of Macedon, with whom, in B. C. 202, the Thasians capitulated on condition that they should not be required to receive a garrison, nor to pay tribute, that they should have no soldiers billeted on them, and should retain their own laws. Philip, however, broke this agreement and reduced them to slavery. (Polyb. xv. 24.) We learn from a fragment of Polybius that Metrodorus greatly excited Philip's displeasure, but by what conduct, or on what occasion, does not appear. (Polyb. Fragm. Hist. xxxii.; Suid. s. v. Ἀνατάσεις.) It was perhaps the same Metrodorus who is mentioned by Polybius as an ambassador from Perseus to the Rhodians, in B. C. 168. (Polyb. xxix. 3, 5.) [E. E.]

METRODO'RUS (Μητρόδωρος), literary. 1. Of Cos, the son of Epicharmus, and grandson of Thyrsus. Like several of that family he addicted himself partly to the study of the Pythagorean philosophy, partly to the science of medicine. He wrote a treatise upon the works of Epicharmus, in which, on the authority of Epicharmus and Pythagoras himself, he maintained that the Doric was the proper dialect of the Orphic hymns. Metrodorus flourished about B. C. 460. (Iamblich. Vit. Pyth. c. 34. p. 467, ed. Kiessling; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. i. p. 852; Bode, Gesch. der Hellen. Dichtkunst, vol. i. p. 190.)

2. Of Lampsacus, a contemporary and friend of Anaxagoras. He wrote on Homer, the leading feature of his system of interpretation being that the deities and stories in Homer were to be understood as allegorical modes of representing physical powers and phenomena. He died B. C. 464. (Plat. Ion, c. 2. p. 530, c; Diog. Laërt. ii. 11; Tatian. Adv. in orat. Πρὸς Ἕλληνας, p. 160, b; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. i. p. 517; Voss. de Hist. Graecis, p. 180, ed. West.)

3. Of Chios, a disciple of Democritus, or, according to other accounts, of Nessus of Chios. He flourished about B. C. 330. He was a philosopher of considerable reputation, and professed the doctrine of the sceptics in their fullest sense. Cicero (Acad. ii. 23. § 73) gives us a translation of the first sentence of his work Περὶ φύσεως: "Nego scire nos sciamusne aliquid an nihil sciamus: ne id ipsum quidem nescire aut scire; nec omnino sitne aliquid, an nihil sit." The commencement of the same work is quoted in Eusebius (Praep. Evang. xiv. p. 765). Athenaeus (iv. p. 184, a) quotes from a work by Metrodorus, entitled Τρωϊκά. A work, Περὶ ἱστορίας, is cited by the scholiast on Apollonius (iv. 834) as the production of a man named Metrodorus; but we have no means of determining which of the name is referred to. Metrodorus did not confine himself to philosophy, but studied, at least, if he did not practise, medicine, on which he wrote a good deal. It is probably he who is quoted more than once by Pliny. He was the instructor of Hippocrates and Anaxarchus. (Diog. Laërt. ix. 58; Suidas, s. vv. Δημόκριτος, Πύρρων; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. p. 660; Voss. de Hist. Graecis, pp. 54, 470, ed. West.)

4. A distinguished Greek philosopher, a native, according to some accounts (Strab. xiii. p. 589; Cic. Tusc. Disp. v. 37. § 109), of Lampsacus; according to others (Diog. Laërt. x. 22, though the text in that passage seems to be corrupt), of Athens. This is to some extent confirmed by the fact that his brother, Timocrates, was an Athenian citizen of the deme Potamus, in the tribe Leontis [Timocrates]; but the former account seems to be supported by the best authority. Metrodorus was the most distinguished of the disciples of Epicurus, with whom he lived on terms of the closest friendship, never having left him since he became acquainted with him, except for six months on one occasion, when he paid a visit to his home. He died in B. C. 277, in the 53d year of his age, seven years before Epicurus, who would have appointed him his successor had he survived him. He left behind him a son named Epicurus, and a daughter, whom Epicurus, in his will, entrusted to the guardianship of Amynomachus and Timocrates, to be brought up under the joint care of themselves and Hermachus, and provided for out of the property which he left behind him. In a letter also which he wrote upon his death-bed, Epicurus commended the children to the care of Idomeneus, who had married Batis, the sister of Metrodorus. The 20th of each month was kept by the disciples of Epicurus as a festive day in honour of their master and Metrodorus. Leontium is spoken of as the wife or mistress of Metrodorus.

The philosophy of Metrodorus appears to have been of a more grossly sensual kind than that of Epicurus. (Cic. de Nat. Deor. i. 40, Tusc. Disp. v. 9, de Fin. ii. 28. § 92, 30. § 99, 31. § 101.) Perfect happiness, according to Cicero's account, he made to consist in having a well-constituted body, and knowing that it would always remain so. He found fault with his brother for not admitting that the belly was the test and measure of every thing that pertained to a happy life. Of the writings of Metrodorus Diogenes Laërtius mentions the following: 1. Πρὸς τοὺς ἰατρούς, in three books; 2. Περὶ αἰσθήσεων, addressed to Timocrates (Cic. de Nat. Deor. i. 40); 3. Περὶ μεγαλοψυχίας; 4. Περὶ τῆς Ἐπικούρου ἀῤῥωστίας; 5. Πρὸς τοὺς διαλεκτικούς; 6. Πρὸς τοὺς σοφίστας, in nine books; 7. Περὶ τῆς ἐπὶ σοφίαν πορείας; 8. Περὶ τῆς μεταβολῆς; 9. Περὶ πλούτου; 10. Πρὸς Δημόκριτον; 11. Περὶ εὐγενείας. But besides these, Metrodorus wrote: 12. Περὶ Ποιητῶν, in which he attacked Homer. (Plut. Moral. p. 1087, a. 1094, d.) 13. Πρὸς Τίμαρχον (Plut. adv. Colot. p. 1117, b); and 14. Περὶ συνηθείας (Athen. ix. p. 391, d.) Athenaeus (xii. p. 546, f.) also mentions his letters, and quotes a passage from one addressed to Timocrates. These letters may possibly consist of or include some of the treatises above enumerated. The passage which Athenaeus quotes is similar in import to what Cicero refers to (de Nat. Deor. i. 40). The treatise Περὶ φιλοσοφίας, mentioned by Plutarch (adv. Colot. extr.), is perhaps the same as the seventh in the preceding list. (Diog. Laërt. x. 22, &c., with the notes of Menagius; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iii. p. 606; Bode, Gesch. der Hellen. Dichtkunst, vol. i. p. 11.)

5. Surnamed ὁ Θεωρηματικός, a disciple first of Theophrastus, afterwards of Stilpo, is mentioned only by Diogenes Laërtius (ii. 113).

6. Of SCEPSIS, a contemporary and friend of Demetrius of Scepsis, to whom he was indebted for his advancement, when he abandoned philosophy, and betook himself to politics. He was originally poor, but gained distinction by his writings, the style of which was peculiar and new, and married a wealthy Carthaginian lady. He attached himself to Mithridates Eupator, accompanied him into Pontus, and was raised to a position of great influence and trust, being appointed supreme judge, without appeal even to the king. Subsequently, however, he was led to desert his allegiance, when sent by Mithridates on an embassy to Tigranes, king of Armenia: Tigranes sent him back to Mithridates, but he died on the road. According to some accounts he was despatched by order of the king; according to others he died of disease (Strab. xiii. pp. 609, 610). Methodorus is frequently mentioned by Cicero; he seems to have been particularly celebrated for his powers of memory (Cic. de Orat. ii. 88. § 360). This is also mentioned by Pliny (H. N. vii. 24). In consequence of his hostility to the Romans he was surnamed the Roman-hater (Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 7 or 16). He was a contemporary of L. Crassus, the orator, who heard him when in Asia (Cic. de Orat. iii. 20. § 75). Athenaeus (xii. p. 552, c.) quotes a work by this Metrodorus, Περὶ ἀλειπτικῆς. We also find mention of a Metrodorus as the author of a Περιήγησις (Placidus Lutatius on Statius, iii. 478). Notices which might very well have been derived from a work of that kind, are given by Pliny (H. N. v. 31. s. 38, viii. 14), on the authority of a Metrodorus; and as similar notices (H. N. iii. 16. s. 20, xxviii. 7. s. 23, xxxvii. 4. s. 15) are taken by him from Metrodorus of Scepsis, the latter was very probably the author of the Περιήγησις in question. Strabo also (xi. p. 504) quotes from Metrodorus of Scepsis a geographical notice respecting the Amazons. (Voss. de Hist. Graecis, p. 180, ed. West.)

7. Of STRATONICE in Caria. He was at first a disciple of the school of Epicurus, but afterwards attached himself to Carneades. Cicero speaks of him as an orator of great fire and volubility (de Orat. i. 11. § 45). He flourished about B. C. 110. (Diog. Laërt. x. 9; Cic. Acad. ii. 6. § 16, 24. § 78; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iii. p. 607.)

8. A distinguished grammarian, the brother of Anthemius of Tralles [ANTHEMIUS], mentioned by Agathias, v. 6. (Voss. de Hist. Graecis, p. 470.)

9. A native apparently of Alexandria or Egypt, mentioned by Photius (Cod. 115, 116) as the author of a cycle for the calculation of the time of Easter. He lived after the time of Diocletian, but nothing more exact is known respecting him. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. x. p. 712; Noris. Dissert. de Cyclo Pasch. Ravenn. c. 3, p. 183.) [C. P. M.]

METRODO'RUS (Μητρόδορος), the author of two epigrams in the Greek Anthology. (Brunck, Anal. vol. ii. p. 476; Jacobs, Anth. Graec. vol. iii. p. 180.) His age is very uncertain, and it is even doubtful whether both the epigrams ought to be ascribed to the same poet. (Jacobs, Anth. Graec. vol. xiii. pp. 917, 918; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iv. p. 482.) [P. S.]

METRODO'RUS, of Athens, a painter and philosopher, of such distinction, that when Aemilius Paullus, after his victory over Perseus (B. C. 168), requested the Athenians to send him their most approved philosopher, to educate his children, and their best painter, to represent his triumph, they selected Metrodorus as the most competent man for both offices; and Paullus concurred in their opinion. (Plin. H. N. xxxv. 11. s. 40. § 30.) [P. S.]

METRODO'RUS (Μητρόδωρος), the name of several physicians.

1. A pupil of Chrysippus of Cnidos, and tutor to Erasistratus, who lived in the fourth and third centuries B. C. He was the third husband of Pythias, the daughter of Aristotle, by whom he had a son named after her celebrated father. (Sext. Empir. Cont. Mathem. i. 12, p. 271. ed. Fabric.)

2. A pupil of Sabinus, in the first and second centuries after Christ, is mentioned by Galen as one of those who had commented on part of the Hippocratic Collection (Comment. in Hippocr. "Epid. III." i. 4, "Epid. VI." i. 29, vol. xvii. pt. i. pp. 508, 877), and is probably the physician who was one of the followers of Asclepiades. (Galen, De Simpl. Medicam. Temper. ac Facult. i. 29, 35, vol. xi. pp. 432, 442.)

3. The author of the work quoted by Pliny (H. N. xx. 81), and entitled Ἐπιτομὴ τῶν Ῥιζοτομουμένων, appears to have been a different person (though sometimes reckoned as the same), and may be supposed to have been a contemporary of Cratevas in the first century B.C. (Plin. H. N. xxv. 4.)

4. The physician mentioned by Cicero (Ep. ad Famil. xvi. 20) as attending on his freedman Tiro, B. C. 46.

One of the above (perhaps the third) is quoted by Marbodus (De Gemmis), and called by him "maximus auctor." (See Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. xiii. p. 337, ed. vet.) [W. A. G.]

METRO'PHANES (Μητροφάνης), a general of Mithridates the Great, who sent him with an army into Greece, to support Archelaus, B. C. 87. He reduced Euboea, as well as Demetrias and Magnesia in Thessaly, but was defeated by the Roman general Bruttius Sura. (Appian, Mithr. 29.) He is again mentioned in B. C. 73, as commanding, together with the Roman exile L. Fannius, a detachment of the army of Mithridates, which was defeated by Mamercus during the siege of Cyzicus. (Oros. vi. 2; comp. Sall. Hist. lib. iii. p. 217, ed. Gerlach. min.) [E. H. B.]

METRO'PHANES (Μητροφάνης), the name of three later Greek writers, mentioned by Suidas (s. v.).

1. Of Eucarpia, in Phrygia (comp. Steph. Byz. s. v. Εὐκαρπία), wrote a work on Phrygia, and also the following treatises on rhetoric:—Περὶ ἰδεῶν λόγου, Περὶ στάσεων, and commentaries on Hermogenes and Aristides, in consequence of which he is regarded by some as the author of the Scholia on Aristides. (Westermann, Gesch. der Griech. Beredtsamkeit, § 104, n. 15.)

2. Of Lebadeia, in Boeotia, the son of the rhetorician Cornelianus, was the author of the following works:—Περὶ τῶν χαρακτήρων of Plato, Xenophon, Nicostratus, and Philostratus, Μελέται, and Λόγοι πανηγυρικοί.

3. A descendant of the sophist Lachares, against whom the sophist Superianus wrote a book. This Metrophanes is mentioned by Damascius in his life of Isidorus (ap. Phot. cod. p. 342 a. b. ed. Bekker).

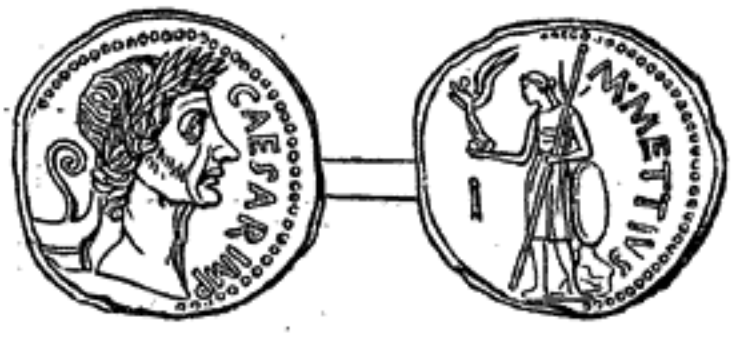
METRO'PHANES (Μητροφάνης), bishop of Smyrna, is renowned in ecclesiastical history for his obstinate opposition to the famous patriarch Photius. He was the son of the woman who was enveigled to entice Methodius, patriarch of Constantinople, but he was not the son of Methodius. The patriarch Ignatius having been deposed by the emperor Michael III., in 858, and Photius chosen in his stead, Metrophanes, who was then bishop of Smyrna, recognised Photius, although he was a friend of Ignatius. But he soon altered his opinion, declared publicly for the deposed patriarch, and so violently attacked Photius, that he was deprived of his see and thrown into a prison. When Photius was deposed in his turn, and Ignatius reestablished in the patriarchate by the emperor Basil I., Metrophanes recovered his see of Smyrna, and, in the council held in Constantinople in 869, showed himself one of the most zealous opponents of Photius. But in 879 Photius became once more patriarch on the death of Ignatius, and now Metrophanes was again deposed. He nevertheless continued to speak and to write against Photius, so that in 880 the patriarch and the emperor contrived his excommunication. Metrophanes died in an obscure retirement, but the year of his death is not known. He wrote besides other works:—1. Epistola ad Manuelem Patricium de Rebus in Causa Photii ab anno 858 ad 870 gestis, one of the most valuable documents bearing on the history of that turbulent patriarch. A Latin version by Melius, in Baronius, Annal. ad ann. 870, Greek and Latin, in the 8th vol. of Labbe, Concilia, and in Acta Concilii CP. quarti, by M. Raderus, Ingolstadt. 1604, 4to. 2. Ἐπιστολὴ Μητροφάνους Μητροπολίτου πρὸς Μανουὴλ Πατρίκιον καὶ Λογοθέτην τοῦ δρόμου, divided into four parts, a very remarkable and important document. The three first parts treat on Manichaeism, and the fourth on the Mystery of the Holy Ghost: it is very doubtful whether Metrophanes is the author of this work, which is now generally attributed to Photius. 3. De Spiritu Sancto, of which a fragment is extant in a Vienna codex. 4. Expositio Fidei, in a Paris codex. 5. Liber Canonum Triadicorum, in a Venetian codex, according to Leo Allatius. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. xi. p. 700; Baronius, Annal. ad ann. 870, &c.; Hankius, Script. Byzant. xvii. 1, &c., xviii. 66.) [W. P.]

ME'TTIUS or ME'TIUS, an old Italian name, in use both among the Sabines and Latins. It is doubtful whether Mettius or Metius is the better orthography, as we sometimes find one and sometimes the other in the best MSS. For the sake of uniformity, however, we have adopted the form Mettius in all the following names, though some of them occur with only one t.

ME'TTIUS. 1. P. Mettius, a partisan of Saturninus and Glaucia in B. C. 100, assassinated C. Memmius, one of the consular candidates in that year. (Oros. v. 17.)

2. M. Mettius, was sent by Caesar at the opening of the Gallic war, in B. C. 58, as legatus to Ariovistus, king of the German league, and was detained prisoner by him, but subsequently rescued by Caesar. (Caes. B. G. i. 47, 53.) The annexed coin, which bears the legend M. Mettius, and has on the obverse the head of Caesar, probably refers to this Mettius. [W. B. D.]



COIN OF M. METTIUS.

ME'TTIUS CU'RTIUS. [Curtius Mettius, No. 1.]

ME'TTIUS CARUS. [Carus.]

ME'TTIUS FUFFE'TIUS, was praetor or dictator of Alba in the reign of Tullus Hostilius, third king of Rome. After the combat between the Horatii and Curiatii had determined the supremacy of the Romans, Mettius was summoned to aid them in a war with Fidenae and the Veientines. On the field of battle, from cowardice or treachery, Mettius drew off his Albans to the hills, and awaited the issue of the battle. The Etruscans, mistaking his movement for a design upon their flank, took to flight, and Mettius fell upon them in their disorder, intending probably to regain the confidence of his Roman allies. But on the following day the Albans were all deprived of their arms, and Mettius himself, as the punishment of his treachery, was torn asunder by chariots driven in opposite directions. (Dionys. iii. 5, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 22, 23, 24, 26, 27, 28. 29, 30; Liv. i. 23, 26, 27, 28; Varr. Fr. p. 240, Bip. ed.; Flor. i. 3. § 8; Val. Max. vii. 4. § 1; Frontin. Strat. ii. 7. § 1; Polyaen. Strat. viii. 5.) [W. B. D.]

ME'TTIUS GEMI'NIUS, or GEMINUS, was commander of the cavalry of Tusculum in the last war between Rome and the Latin league, B. C. 340. He challenged T. Manlius, son of the consul T. Manlius Torquatus, and was slain by him in the combat. (Liv. viii. 7; Val. Max. ii. 7. § 6.) [W. B. D.]

ME'TTIUS POMPOSIA'NUS, a senator in Vespasian's reign, whom the emperor raised to the consulate, although Mettius was reported to have a royal nativity. Domitian afterwards banished and put him to death. (Suet. Vesp. 14, Dom. 10, 20; Dion Cass. lxvii. 12; Victor, Ep. 9.) [W. B. D.]

MEZE'NTIUS (Μεσέντιος), a mythical king of the Tyrrhenians or Etruscans, at Caere or Agylla, and father of Lausus. When he was expelled by his subjects on account of his cruelty he took refuge with Turnus, king of the Rutulians, and assisted him in his war against Aeneas and the Trojans. Aeneas wounded him, but Mezentius escaped under the protection of his son. When, however, Lausus had fallen, Mezentius returned to the battle on horseback, and was slain by Aeneas (Virg. Aen. viii. 480, &c., x. 689, &c., 785, 800, &c.). The story about the alliance between Mezentius and the Rutulians is also mentioned by Livy and Dionysius, but they say nothing about his expulsion from Caere or Agylla. According to them Aeneas disappeared during the battle against the Rutulians and Etruscans at Lanuvium, and Ascanius was besieged by Mezentius and Lausus. In a sally at night the besieged defeated the enemy, slew Lausus, and then concluded a peace with Mezentius, who henceforth remained their ally. (Liv. i. 2, 3; Dionys. i. 64, &c.) According to Servius (ad Aen. iv. 620, vi. 760, ix. 745) Mezentius was slain by Ascanius. During the siege of Ascanius, Mezentius, when he was asked to conclude a peace, demanded among other things, that the Latins should give up to him every year the whole produce of their vintage; and in commemoration of this, it was said, the Romans in later times celebrated the festival of the Vinalia, on the twenty-third of April, when the new wine was tasted, and a libation made in front of the temple of Venus, and a sacrifice offered to Jupiter. (Plut. Quaest. Rom. 45; Ov. Fast. iv. 881, &c.; Macrob. Sat. iii. 5; comp. Dict. of Ant. s. v. Vinalia.) [L. S.]

MEZETULUS, a Numidian, who, after the death of Oesalces, king of the Massylians, revolted against Capusa, the eldest son of the late king, who had succeeded him on the throne; and defeated him in a great battle, in which Capusa himself was killed. Mezetulus, however, did not assume the sovereignty himself, but placed on the throne Lacumaces, the youngest son of Oesalus, a mere child, in whose name he designed to govern the kingdom. But the return of Masinissa from Spain disconcerted his plans: he quickly raised a large army, with which he opposed this new adversary in the field, but was defeated, and compelled to seek refuge in the dominions of Syphax. From thence, however, he was induced to return, and take up his residence at the court of Masinissa, from whom he received a free pardon and the restitution of all his property. (Liv. xxix. 29, 30.) It is probably the same person who is called by Appian Mesotulus (Μεσότυλος), and is mentioned as joining Hannibal with a force of 1000 horsemen shortly before the battle of Zama. (Appian, Pun. 33.) [E.H.B.]

MI'CCIADES, a sculptor of Chios, was the son of Malas, the father of Anthermus (or Archennus), and the grandfather of Bupalus and Athenis. He must have flourished about Ol. 42 or 45. (Plin. H. N. xxxvi. 5. s. 4. § 2.) [P. S.]

MICCION (Μικκίων), a painter mentioned by Lucian as a disciple of Zeuxis. (Luc. Zeux. 7. vol. i. p. 845, Wetst.) [P. S.]

MICHAEL I. RHANGA'BE, or RHAGA'BE (Μιχαὴλ ὁ Ῥαγγάβη, or Ῥαγαβή), emperor of Constantinople from A. D. 811 to 813, was the son of Theophylactus, one of the high functionaries who, together with Stauracius, conspired against the emperor Constantine VI., and the grandson of one Rhangabe, from whom he derived his surname. Michael was at once honest, handsome, and gifted with many talents, but he was of a weak character, and his amiability could not always efface the unfavourable impression which his want of energy made upon persons of stouter hearts than his. He stood in great favour with the emperor Nicephorus I. (802—811), who, by creating him master of the palace, raised him to the highest rank in the empire after the emperor and his family, and finally gave him his daughter Procopia in marriage. Stauracius, however, the son and successor of Nicephorus, was far from sharing the sentiments of his father towards the master of the palace, and feeling himself dying from the effects of a wound, received some months previously on the battle-field where his father was slain by the Bulgarians, he gave orders to blind Michael, in order that his wife Theophano, to whom he intended to bequeath the throne, might find no obstacles at her succession. One Stephanus was charged with executing the emperor's order. He wisely refrained from doing so, and informed Michael of it. They immediately assembled the chief officers of the state, and being all willing to support Michael, they proclaimed him emperor while Stauracius was still alive (2nd of October, 811). The dying emperor implored and obtained mercy from his brother-in-law, and went to expire in a convent. The accession of Michael caused great joy among the people, though little in the army: the soldiers, however, were soon satisfied by the liberal use which the new emperor made of the rich treasures hoarded up by the late Nicephorus. Michael, a peaceful man, began his reign by restoring peace to the disturbed church, and recalling from exile Leo Armenus, a celebrated general, who now enjoyed the emperor's full confidence, for which he afterwards rewarded him by hurling his benefactor from his throne. In the spring of 812, Crum, the king of the Bulgarians, again invaded the territories of the empire. Michael set out at the head of his army to meet him, but committed the imprudence of allowing the empress Procopia to accompany him. A general discontent and symptoms of sedition among the troops were the consequences of his thoughtlessness; a woman with more than seeming authority in the camp being then an unheard of thing. Distrusting the army, the emperor hastened back to the capital, followed by a host of reckless barbarians who laid the country waste with fire and sword. At their approach, multitudes of people, mostly iconoclasts, fled before them; and a sedition in consequence broke out among the numerous iconoclasts in Constantinople, which was quelled, not without difficulty, by Leo Armenus: their leader Nicolaus was confined in a convent; and they were finally all driven out of the city and dispersed in the provinces, by order of the emperor. About the same time great numbers of Christians of all sects took refuge within the empire, flying from the dominions of the khalifs, which were then filled with commotion and civil wars. Crum, meanwhile, pursued his victorious course, and laid siege to Mesembria, whereupon he made offers of peace, which, on account of their moderation, the emperor was inclined to accept, but his councillors were for further resistance. Mesembria was now taken by assault, and the danger from the Bulgarians grew daily more alarming. In February 813, Michael once more set out to meet them, again accompanied by his wife Procopia. Her presence in the camp had the same consequences as before. Leo Armenus secretly fomented the discontent of the troops, and carried on those intrigues which led to the loss of the battle of Adrianople (22d of June, 813), the flight of Michael to Constantinople, and his deposition by the successful rebel, as is related in the life of Leo V. The deposed Michael retired into a convent, where he led an obscure, but quiet and happy life, during more than thirty years. Leo succeeded him on the throne. MI'CHAEL II. BALBUS (Μιχαὴλ ὁ Τραυλός), or the "Stammerer," emperor of Constantinople, A. D. 820—829. This prince was of low origin; he was born at Amorium, and spent his earlier youth as a groom, in different stables of his native town. He afterwards entered the army, and although he was ignorant and illiterate, he met with success in his new profession, owing to his bold character and uncommon impudence. One of his superior officers esteemed him so much that he gave him his daughter Thecla in marriage. Having made the acquaintance of the celebrated Bardanes, he found numerous opportunities of distinguishing himself under the eyes of that eminent general, who accordingly promoted him, and in spite of a defect of his speech, whence his surname ὁ Τραυλός, he became conspicuous as one of the best Greek generals. The emperor Leo V. owed the fortunate issue of his conspiracy against Michael I. in a great measure to the assistance of Michael the Stammerer, and accordingly raised the latter to the highest dignities in the empire. But Michael wanted prudence, and having often severely censured the conduct of Leo, incurred the displeasure of his master. In order to get rid of him, Leo sent him into Asia as dux Orientis, but soon recalled him for fear he should kindle a rebellion. Nothing the wiser for so many apparent proofs of Leo's displeasure, Michael continued to abuse both the emperor and the empress. Vexed at being perpetually thwarted, censured, and libelled by this troublesome officer, Leo once more ordered him to proceed to Asia and inspect the troops. This time Michael refused to comply with the order, and openly joined a number of disaffected persons, who made secret preparations for depriving Leo of his crown. The plot was discovered through the zealous honesty of Hexabulus, and Michael was arraigned of high treason. Sentenced to be burnt alive in a furnace, Michael escaped death, and was raised to the throne in an almost miraculous way, as is related in the life of Leo V. (Christmas, 820). Immediately after the assassination of Leo, Michael was released from his prison, and such was the haste of his friends to proclaim him emperor and show him to the public, that they did not even wait until his fetters were taken off, but hurried him, loaded with irons, to the hippodrome, where a trembling crowd saluted him with shouts of satisfaction.

The first act of the new emperor was to castrate the four sons of Leo, but no sooner was this infamous crime committed, than the perpetrator had to defend himself against a formidable avenger of the death of Leo and the disgrace of his sons. This was Thomas, commander-in-chief of the troops in Asia, whose revolt was one of the most dangerous that ever threatened the rulers of Constantinople. A few months after raising the standard of rebellion, Thomas was master of the whole of the Byzantine possessions in Asia. He concluded an alliance with the Arabs, and was then proclaimed emperor at Antioch (821). He pretended to be the emperor Constantine VI., who was said to have survived his excaecation, and he styled himself so, though he was not blind; but he was originally a run-away slave who had risen to eminence in the army. Having no children, he adopted an unknown youth, who was created Augustus, and then marched at the head of an army of 80,000 men, against Constantinople. His adopted son was slain in the neighbourhood of the Hellespont, and Thomas adopted another, a former monk, to whom he gave the name of Anastasius. Upon this Thomas crossed the Hellespont, and laid siege to Constantinople. Michael awaited the danger with undaunted courage. Unable to take the field against superior forces, he adopted measures to render the capital impregnable, and a bloody defeat, which Thomas suffered in 822 while leading his men to a general assault, proved that Michael had not lost all chances of success. Thomas retired into Thrace, but renewed the siege in 823, by sea and land. His fleet obtained a victory over the imperial navy. Gregorius Pterotes, an old friend of Leo V., and a general of great experience and influence, whom Michael had banished to Samos, now left his exile, and joined the rebel; but the emperor having meanwhile obtained several advantages, and the motley army of Thomas, which was composed of specimens of all the different nations of Hither Asia, betraying symptoms of disaffection Pterotes resolved to desert to the emperor. Afraid to appear there alone, he seduced many of the rebels to join him, and with them secretly left the camp of Thomas. But Thomas had watched him, and the two-fold traitor was stopped on his flight, defeated, and put to death. Proud of his success, Thomas endeavoured to force the Golden Horn with a fleet of 350 vessels, but Michael fell upon him with such vigour as not only to repel him, but to destroy the greater portion of his fleet. Thomas was no more successful in his assaults by land, the capital being gallantly defended by Michael, his son Theophilus, Olbienus, Catacylus, and other generals of renown; yet in spite of their valour, they could not dislodge Thomas from his lines around Constantinople, and there was just fear lest hunger should achieve what the sword was unable to accomplish. In this extremity Michael received an offer from Mortagon, king of the Bulgarians, to join him against the rebel. Michael declined the proposition, and this act shows that he was no ordinary man: he would rather stand his own chance than make common cause with an ally who would have turned against him in case of defeat, and asked for an exorbitant reward in case of success. Mortagon, however, came on his own account, and fell upon the besieging army, not so much because he wanted to help Michael as because he was desirous of plundering some one. Being defeated by the Bulgarians, Thomas raised the siege and retreated into Thrace. Michael now sallied forth, followed his enemy closely, and at last brought him to a stand. Thomas was entirely defeated; one-half of the army went over to the victor's side; and he shut himself up in Adrianople. Michael soon followed him thither, and made preparations for forcing the city to surrender through famine, which so frightened the inhabitants that they seized the rebel and dragged him to the emperor. Thomas had his hands and feet cut off, and in this state was put on an ass and paraded through the streets. Michael joined the procession, according to the barbarous custom of the time. "If you are really emperor," cried the fainting man, "have mercy on a wretch, and take my life at once!" Michael urged him to confess whether he had any accomplices at the court, and to name them. Had Thomas done so, many an innocent man might have suffered death together with as many guilty, but John Hexabulus, whose name was always prominent among the straightforward and the honest, stopped the emperor, crying out, "Will you give credit to an enemy against your own friends?" Michael felt the reproach, and desisted from further inquiries of Thomas, who was subsequently thrown on a dung-heap, where he expired several days after (October, 823). The chief partizans of Thomas met with severe punishment. Thus ended a revolt, during which Michael proved he was worthy of his throne.

In 824 Michael renewed the friendly intercourse which had subsisted between his predecessors and the Western or Frankish emperors: he sent an embassy to Louis the Pious, and also wrote a letter to him, which his ambassadors presented to Louis at Rouen. It is known that the Byzantine emperors would never recognise the imperial title of the Frankish kings, and afterwards those of Germany. In the above-mentioned letter Michael consequently called Louis only "Ludovicus qui vocatus est Francorum et Longobardorum Imperator," and this the Byzantine historians consider as a great condescension. The letter is contained in Thegan's Vie de Louis le Débonnaire, and in the works of other historians. In the same year, 824, a band of Spanish Arabs, commanded by one Abuhafiz, made a descent upon Crete and conquered the island, which was henceforth called Candia, from Candax, its new capital, which was founded by the Arabs: Michael was unable to dislodge them, and the island was lost for ever. A colony of Arabs, the descendants of the followers of Abuhafiz, still inhabits a portion of Candia. Michael lost likewise the province of Dalmatia, which was taken from him by the Servians, but the greatest loss he had to suffer was that of Sicily. Euphemius governed the island for the emperor, and having met with some disappointment at the court, invited Ziadet-Allah, the third khalif of the Aglabites in Africa, to take possession of the country. Ziadet-Allah accordingly went to Sicily in 827, with a powerful fleet, and the island soon became a prey to the Arabs, and remained in their possession for upwards of two hundred years. Michael died a natural death on the first of October, 829, and was succeeded by his son Theophilus. MICHAEL III. (Μιχαήλ), emperor of Constantinople from A. D. 842 to 867, was the son and successor of the emperor Theophilus, and the grandson of Michael II. the Stammerer. He ascended the throne at the age of three, and reigned under the guardianship of his talented mother Theodora. This active princess began by re-establishing the worship of images, an undertaking in which she had to encounter intrigues of a most dangerous nature [PHOTIUS]. Her armies were less successful; they were beaten in the Caucasus and in Asia Minor, and an expedition fitted out for the recovery of Crete from the Arabs was totally discomfited. She despatched a fleet of 300 ships with a view of conquering Egypt, but the capture and temporary possession of Damietta was the only result of it. On the other hand, she continued to be fortunate in her exertions for the orthodox church and the Christian religion in general: the Khazars were converted in 847, and a few years afterwards the Bulgarians, those hereditary enemies of Byzantium, adopted likewise the religion of Christ [METROPHANES]. But her zeal for images caused a most dangerous revolt of the Paulicians (848), who entered into an alliance with the Arabs, and baffled the efforts of the imperial armies to reduce them to obedience. Meanwhile, Michael grew up and gave proof of his wicked propensities. At the boyish age of fifteen he already led an immoral life with Eudoxia, a noble young lady, the daughter of one Ingerius, who belonged to the great family of the Martinacii; and his mother preferring under these circumstances to give him a lawful wife, he accepted with the greatest indifference Eudoxia, the daughter of Decapolita, continuing all the while his licentious intercourse with the other Eudoxia, his mistress. The principal person at the court was Theoctistus, a celebrated, though not always successful general, who incurred the jealousy of Bardas, the brother of the empress, and the displeasure of the young emperor. Michael and Bardas consequently formed a plot to make away with Theoctistus, and carried their design into effect, Michael being the first to raise his hand against his unfortunate minister. Bardas was appointed Magnus Logotheta in his stead, and he soon seized the uncontrolled direction of public affairs. The murder of Theoctistus so afflicted Theodora that she laid down her functions as regent and retired into private life (854). Michael now abandoned himself to a life of almost unparalleled profligacy, for a description of which we must refer to the graphic pen of Gibbon (vol. ix. p. 45, &c. ed. 1815).

In 856 Bardas was made Caesar; and his power being now unlimited, he caused the empress Theodora, with her daughter, to be confined in a convent. On the whole, however, Bardas was no despicable man, though his ambition was boundless. Full of talents, learning, and an enthusiastic love of the fine arts, he was zealous in promoting the arts, science and literature, which had been greatly neglected during the reign of the father and grandfather of Michael. The philosopher Leo was his principal assistant in attaining these laudable objects. Owing to the irresistible influence of Bardas, the patriarch Ignatius was deposed in 857, and the famous Photius succeeded him. In 858 the empire was involved in a great war with the Arabs. Leo commanded against them, and obtained more glory than the unworthy emperor deserved. He defeated the Arabs in several pitched battles, drove them beyond the Euphrates, crossed that river, and made several successful incursions on the eastern side of the Tigris, penetrating to the neighbourhood of Baghdad. During this time, however, the Arab general, 'Omar, laid Pontus waste. Thinking success on the battle-field an easy thing, Michael resolved to put himself at the head of his army, and marched against 'Omar; but the Arabs had been reinforced by a strong body of incensed Paulicians, and under the walls of Samosata the emperor received a severe lesson for his folly. Upwards of 6000 Greeks were taken prisoners, and among them the gallant Leo, whom the Arabs would never restore to liberty in spite of the brilliant ransom offered them. In 860 Michael paid as dearly for a second lesson in Cappadocia; and 'Omar now carried destruction over Cappadocia, Pontus, and Cilicia, whence he carried 70,000 prisoners into perpetual captivity. (862.) Either good sense or the want of his accustomed revels in the capital, or the advice of Bardas, induced Michael to put his younger brother, Petronas, then governor of Lydia and Ionia, at the head of the army; and Petronas chose for his lieutenant Nazar, governor of Galatia, whose maxim was, that a small, but good army, was better than a large, but bad one. Near Amasia they fell in with the main army of the Arabs, commanded by 'Omar. The Greeks obtained a splendid victory; 'Omar was slain; and his head was carried to Constantinople by Petronas, to whom his brother allowed the honour of a triumphal entrance. In order to commemorate the glory of his armies, and with a view of handing his name down to posterity, Michael ordered a hippodrome to be built, which surpassed everything of the kind in magnificence. Jealous of Petronas, the emperor set out in 864 for the purpose of taking the command. He had scarcely arrived in Asia when he was recalled, because a Russian fleet of 200 large barges had suddenly made its appearance in the Bosporus, and was attacking the Golden Horn. Michael hardly escaped being taken prisoner whilst crossing the Hellespont, but he was soon released from his fear, in consequence of the Russian fleet being destroyed by storm. This was the first blockade of Constantinople by the Russians, or, more correctly speaking, by the Norman nobles, who had just made themselves masters of Western Russia. By this time Michael had grown tired of the ascendancy of Bardas, and felt deeply offended at being exhorted by him to lead a better life. Whether Bardas meant this in reality or not is a matter of doubt, for he certainly wished to establish his own elevation on the ruin of Michael. Bardas was thus gradually superseded in the favour of his master by Basil the Macedonian, afterwards emperor, who married Michael's mistress, Eudoxia, in exchange for whom he surrendered his sister, Thecla, who became the emperor's mistress. Michael formed a plot with Basil to assassinate Bardas; and soon afterwards the Caesar was treacherously killed by Michael, Basil, and a band of assassins hired for the purpose (866). Thereupon Basil rose to eminence, and was proclaimed Caesar. In the same year (866) the patriarch Photius proclaimed the deposition of pope Nicholas I. The conduct of Michael continued to be so disgusting, that Basil, in his turn, remonstrated with him, and soon incurred the hatred of his master, who began to look out for some daring men who would help him in despatching the Macedonian. Of this Basil became informed, and very naturally resolved to anticipate the emperor's designs. He persuaded him to accept a supper in the house of his mother, Theodora, who, utterly unacquainted with the intention of Basil, had consented to invite her son, as a means of restoring a good understanding between the rulers. As the supper degenerated into an orgy, Theodora and her daughter retired, leaving her son alone with Basil and a few more guests, who soon made the emperor so drunk, that he was obliged to lie down on a bed. In this helpless state he was murdered by a band of assassins who had been secretly introduced into Theodora's dwelling. (24th of September, 867.) Basil followed him on the throne. The reign of Michael III., however disgusting the part which he played, is one of the most interesting in Byzantine history: it is rich in events worthy of the attention of the scholar, the philosopher, the historian, the soldier, and the divine; and whoever feels more than superficial sympathy for the fate of the later Greeks will be amply rewarded by turning from this imperfect sketch to the sources from which it is taken. (Cedren. p. 533, &c.; Zonar. vol. ii. p. 152, &c.; Leo Gram., p. 457, &c.; Symeon Metaphrast., p. 428, &c.; Theophan. Contin. p. 92, &c.; Genes. p. 37, &c.; Joel, p. 179, &c.; Const. Manass. p. 100.) [W. P.]

MICHAEL IV. PA'PHLAGO (Μιχαὴλ ὁ Παφλαγών), emperor of Constantinople from A. D. 1034 to 1041, was one of the younger brothers of John the Eunuch, first minister under Romanus III. and his predecessor, Constantine IX. Among the four brothers of John, who had once been a monk, Michael and Nicetas were originally money-changers, Constantine and George eunuchs and mountebanks by profession; Stephanus, their brother-in-law, whose name will appear hereafter, was a ship's calker. When John rose to eminence he promoted Michael to the office of chamberlain to Romanus III., a post for which he was well fit, for he was stupid and handsome. Having further the advantage of being young, he pleased the empress Zoe so much, that she admitted him to her bed. The fact was reported to Romanus, who would not believe it, because he knew that Michael was subject to epileptic fits; but Zoe and her lover were afraid that he would believe it one day or other, and consequently contrived the assassination of Romanus. The day after his murder Zoe announced to the senate that she had chosen Michael for her husband, and wished him to be acknowledged as emperor. John the Eunuch being the secret promoter of these transactions, the wishes of the empress were complied with, and Michael and Zoe were proclaimed on the 11th of April, 1034. No sooner was this done than John removed Zoe from the administration of the state, by keeping her a prisoner in her palace; and as Michael was unfit to reign, he seized the supreme power without aspiring to the name. The beginning of Michael's reign was signalised by a general famine and a terrible earthquake at Jerusalem, which lasted forty days with scarcely any interruption. Upon this the barbarians invaded the territory of the empire on all sides, while the fleets of the Arabs in Sicily and Africa covered the Archipelago, and plundered the islands. John, however, succeeded in making peace with them on tolerable conditions. He also brought the Servians to submission, made peace with the Arabs in Egypt, and had the satisfaction of seeing the Arabs of Baghdad defeated under the walls of Edessa, which they had invested in 1037. About this time a civil war among the Arabs in Sicily afforded a good opportunity of bringing back that island to the imperial sway; and Leon Opus, the governor of the Greek dominions in Southern Italy, was consequently sent over into Sicily. He defeated the Arabs several times, and returned with many captives, besides 15,000 Christian prisoners of war, which he had taken from the Mohammedans. In 1039 John equipped a powerful fleet and an appropriate army, the fleet being commanded by Stephanus, the brother-in-law of John and the emperor; and the whole expedition by Maniaces, who was the best general in the Greek army. The Greeks were joined by a small, but gallant body of Norman auxiliaries, commanded by three sons of the chivalrous Tancred. Messina and Syracuse were taken by the Greeks, and the Arabs sustained such losses that their brethren in Africa were in great alarm. They consequently came to their relief with 50,000 men; but few of these ever returned to their native country, and thirteen towns and cities surrendered to the victorious Greeks. In 1040 a fresh army arrived from Africa, which was still more numerous than the preceding; but in a pitched battle with the Greeks and Normans, they were utterly defeated, leaving 50,000 either dead on the field, or prisoners in the hands of the victor. Sicily once more obeyed the Greek sceptre, when a base intrigue caused the loss of what had been so fairly won. Owing to the negligence of Stephanus, the Arab commander-in-chief found means to escape, with a few followers, to Africa; and Maniaces was so vexed at his flight, that in reproaching Stephanus for it, he probably forgot the degree of deference which he owed to the brother-in-law of the powerful eunuch. In order to avenge himself for the insult, Stephanus calumniated his chief at the court, and caused a warrant to be sent to Sicily for his arrest. After Maniaces had left the island, the negligence of his successors in the command, Stephanus, Doceanus, and Basilius Pediatites, caused one loss after another; and in dividing the booty of their former victories with the Normans, they behaved so unfairly, that their gallant allies not only withdrew, but attacked the Greek dominions on the continent of Italy. The Arabs suffered one more defeat at Messina; but after that met with continual success, and before the end of 1040 Sicily had again ceased to be a Byzantine province, and in Italy the Greek power was expiring under the sword of the Normans. About the same time the Bulgarians endeavoured to throw off the Greek yoke, and overran Thrace and Macedonia. Michael, forced to fly suddenly from Thessalonica, where he then held his court, left his treasury under the care of one Ibazas, a Bulgarian in the Greek service, who availed himself of the opportunity, and with his trust joined his countrymen.

Constantinople was in the greatest danger of falling into the hands of the barbarians, when, to the surprise and wonder of the whole empire, the apathetic emperor, who was besides suffering from an incurable dropsy, declared his intention of putting himself at the head of his army. In vain his friends and the empress endeavoured to persuade him to abandon his purpose: "If I have made no conquests," said he, "I will at least do my utmost to prevent losses." He was so weak that he was obliged to be raised on his horse, and every morning the troops expected that he would not see the evening; but he held bravely out, and the moral effect of his appearance upon his soldiers as well as his enemies was so great, that the former fought with the utmost bravery, while the Bulgarians were confounded before they had been defeated. After driving out the barbarians from Thrace and Macedonia, Michael penetrated into Bulgaria; and in the course of one campaign brought back that extensive country to its allegiance to the Greek emperors. The war being thus finished with glory, Michael celebrated a triumphal entry into Constantinople, and soon afterwards died, on the 10th of December, 1041. This enterprise does great credit to Michael, whose conduct gives proof of a great moral truth, that there is no man so bad but there is still something good left in him, which, under proper circumstances, will shine forth, and cause the man to do actions which, though they cannot obliterate his former conduct, will yet entitle him to our forbearance and compassion. Shortly before his end Michael chose his nephew, Michael, his future successor, who consequently succeeded him on the throne. (Cedren. p. 734, &c.; Zonar. vol. ii. p. 235, &c.; Manass. p. 124; Joel, p. 183; Glyc. p. 314, &c.) [W. P.]

MICHAEL V. CALAPHA'TES (Μιχαὴλ ὁ Καλαφάτης), or the "CALKER," emperor of Constantinople from December, A. D. 1041, to April, 1042, was the son of Stephanus, the brother-in-law of Michael IV., who had once followed the trade of a ship's calker, whence the surname of his son. He was adopted by Michael IV. and the empress Zoe; but as he was a profligate fellow, the emperor would soon have excluded him from the throne had death left him time. The people detested Michael V., and persuaded Zoe to reign in his stead; but a few days were sufficient to make Zoe repent her ambition, and she quietly resigned in favour of her adopted son. Michael began by banishing Zoe and the eunuch John, his uncle, and committed several other imprudent acts, the consequence of which was, that the people of Constantinople rose in rebellion. A fierce battle was fought between them and the adherents of Michael, which ended in the storm of the imperial palace, and in the flight of the young emperor and his brother Constantine to the convent of Studa, where they both took the monastic habit, and continued to live many years in a quiet obscurity. Zoe and her sister Theodora were proclaimed co-empresses by the people, 21st of April, 1042. (Cedren. p. 749; Zonar. vol. ii. p. 242; Manass. p. 125; Glyc. p. 316; Joel, p. 183.) [W. P.]

MICHAEL VI. STRATIO'TICUS (Μιχαὴλ ὁ Στρατιωτικός), emperor of Constantinople from A. D. 1056 to 1057, was chosen by the empress Theodora for her successor shortly before she died; and he succeeded accordingly on the 22d of August, 1056. His surname, "the warrior," indicates his military merits; but at the time of his elevation he was broken down by age, and his character had lost all its former energy. Theodora, a woman, had a manly spirit, but Michael the warlike had the spirit of a woman. Michael was scarcely seated on the throne when Theodosius, a cousin of the late emperor Constantine X. Monomachus, rose in revolt; but after a fierce struggle, which filled the streets of Constantinople with blood, the rebel was compelled to lay down his arms, and was fortunate to escape with mere banishment. The famous general, Catacalon, was recalled from his post as governor of Antioch, and Michael, a cousin of the emperor, was placed in his stead. Catacalon returned to the capital with disaffection in his heart, and there met a great number of his colleagues, whom the emperor had rewarded with fine speeches instead of giving more solid proofs of his gratitude for their former achievements, and all of whom shared the disaffection of Catacalon. A military conspiracy was the consequence, and a deputation was sent by the malcontents to Isaac Comnenus, who resided at Castamone, in Asia Minor, requesting him to accept the crown, which he did, after some hesitation. Michael tried to check the progress of his rival at once by intrigues and weapons, but his duplicity availed him nothing, and his arms were defeated in the battle of Hades by Isaac and Catacalon, whereupon he resigned (31st of August), and retired into a convent. (Cedren. p. 792, &c.; Zonar. vol. ii. p. 262, &c.; Manass. p. 128, 129; Glyc. p. 132.) [W. P.]

son of the emperor Constantine XI., Ducas, who died in 1059, shortly after appointing his three sons, Michael, Andronicus, and Constantine, to succeed him in joint possession of the crown. On account of their tender age, their mother, Eudoxia, reigned for them; and having married Romanus Diogenes, this distinguished general enjoyed the imperial title and power till he was made a prisoner by Alp Arslan, the sultan of the Seljuks, in August, 1071. When his captivity became known at Constantinople, Joannes Caesar caused his nephew, Michael, to be proclaimed emperor, with a view of reigning under his name. Soon afterwards Romanus returned from his captivity, but he came too late to retrieve his fate: he was seized and blinded, and died from the operation in October, 1071. Eudoxia was confined in a prison; and these atrocities were committed without Michael taking the least step to prevent them.

John, archbishop of Sida, in Pamphylia, John the Caesar, Nicephorizus, and other ministers, now governed the empire for Michael. Enraged that the ransom for which he had restored the late Romanus to liberty was not paid by Michael, sultan Alp Arslan invaded the empire in 1072. Isaac and Alexis Comnenus commanded the Greek army against him. Owing to the want of discipline of his troops, Isaac lost a battle and his liberty, but was soon ransomed by Alexis. The two brothers prepared for taking revenge, when affairs received a different turn, through the daring ambition of one Ursel, a kinsman of the kings of Scotland, and the commander of a body of European auxiliaries in the Greek service. Having made himself master of most of the strongholds and mountain passes in the anti-Taurus and portions of Armenia and Lazica, he ceased at once to fight against the Turks and to help the Greeks, intending to make himself independent in those parts. For this purpose he intrigued with John the Caesar, who joined him, and was proclaimed emperor of the Greeks by the Frankish auxiliaries. Both the Greeks and Turks looked at these proceedings with wonder, when the latter, impatient to come to blows, fell upon John and Ursel, defeated them, and made them both prisoners. Ursel soon redeemed himself, and retired into Pontus, whither he was followed by Nicephorus Palaeologus, who gained a decisive battle over him. On his flight, Ursel was again taken by the Turks. Alexis Comnenus, wishing to obtain possession of this dangerous adventurer, offered a large bribe to the Turks for his person; and having attained his ends, sent him to Constantinople (1073), where he was kept in prison.

In 1074 the Bulgarians, exasperated by the insatiable avarice of the minister Nicephorizus, attempted to throw off the Greek yoke, and offered the crown to Bodinus, the grandson of Michael, king of Servia, who accepted it, and came to their assistance with a body of his countrymen. Bulgaria was then governed by Nicephorus Carentenus, a very competent man, who had taken proper measures for quelling the revolt, when he was prevented from carrying them out by the arrival of Damianus Dalassenus, who was sent to supersede him as governor. Dalassenus owed his promotion to some court intrigue, and six weeks after his appointment had the satisfaction of seeing himself a prisoner of the Bulgarians, and his army flying through the country. Bryennius, who had been created Caesar after the captivity of John, retrieved the fortune of the Greeks. Bodinus lost several battles, and fell into the hands of Bryennius, who, on the order of Michael, sent him as a state prisoner to some fortress in Syria, whence, however, the young prince escaped and returned to Servia, over which he became king after the death of his father. Bryennius likewise compelled the Servians to sue for peace; purged the Adriatic and the Ionian sea of the Norman pirates; and quelled a dangerous mutiny of some of his barbarian auxiliaries, who were headed by Nestor, the commander-in-chief of the army of observation on the Danube. His success deserved reward, but earning disgrace instead, he listened to the persuasive wishes of his numerous friends, raised the standard of rebellion, and was proclaimed emperor under the walls of Adrianople. He despatched his brother John to lay siege to Constantinople, while he continued to consolidate his authority in Thrace and Macedonia. The capital was gallantly defended by Constantine Ducas, Alexis Comnenus, and Ursel, who was restored to liberty on condition of employing his great military talents for the defence of the emperor. Meanwhile, another rebellion broke out in the East. Only ten days after Bryennius had assumed the imperial title his example was followed by Nicephorus Botaniates in Asia Minor, who advanced with an army mostly composed of Turks, and soon penetrated as far as Nicaea. At that time Constantinople had ceased to be besieged by John Bryennius, whose men were too licentious to hold out long against well-disciplined troops, commanded by the best generals of Greece, and he consequently withdrew to the head-quarters of his brother. The conduct of the emperor during this crisis was so contemptible that the approach of Botaniates created joy among the people, and caused great satisfaction to a crowd of disaffected generals and ambitious priests: they sent a deputatiom to him, inviting him formally to occupy the imperial throne; and he of course complied with their wishes. Michael, forsaken by all his adherents except Alexis and Isaac Comnenus, who stood with him to the last moment, abandoned all hopes of resisting so formidable an enemy, and without regret resigned the crown to Botaniates, on the 25th of March, 1078. The ensuing struggle between Botaniates and Bryennius belongs to the history of the former. Michael was allowed to retire into a convent, and Botaniates had so little fear of his harmless character that he made him Archbishop of Ephesus, a post for which the ex-emperor was decidedly more fit than for the throne of Constantinople. As weak-minded as his father, Michael had the misfortune to be put under the tutorship of the well-known Michael Psellus, a learned pedant, who, instead of making the young prince fit to rule over man, by teaching him law and history, and enlarging his mind, which was already narrow enough, instructed him chiefly in grammar and rhetoric, thus creating in the young man an artificial taste for such studies, which never left him in after life, and made his mind quite unfit for the severe business of government and legislation. While Michael was a boy Psellus was proud of him, because his pupil was more learned than other boys of his age, but when he became a man and a king, Psellus felt ashamed of him and himself, and to this feeling we must needs ascribe the circumstance that he did not extend his "history" to the reign of Michael, but left off with his accession (Zonar. vol. ii. p. 286, &c. ; Bryen. lib. ii. iii. &c. ; Scylitz. p. 850, &c. ; Glyc. p. 329, &c. ; Manass. p. 134, 135 ; Joel, p. 185.) [W. P.]

MICHAEL VIII. PALAEO'LOGUS (Μιχαὴλ ὁ Παλαιολόγος), emperor of Nicaea, and afterwards of Constantinople, from A. D. 1260 to 1282, the restorer of the Greek empire, was the son of Andronicus Palaeologus and Irene Angela, the granddaughter of the emperor Alexis Angelus. He was born in 1234. At an early age he rose to eminence, which he owed to his uncommon talents as much as to his illustrious birth, and to the same causes he was indebted for many a dangerous persecution. Without dwelling upon his earlier life, we need only mention that he was once obliged to take refuge at the court of the sultan of Iconium, and having subsequently been appointed governor of the distant town of Durazzo, the slander of his secret enemy followed him thither, and he was carried in chains to Nicaea. He justified himself, however, and the emperor Theodore II. Lascaris held him in higher esteem than he had ever done before. This emperor died in August 1259, leaving a son, John III., who was only nine years old, and over whom he had placed the patriarch Arsenius and the magnus domesticus Muzalon, as guardians. Neither of them enjoyed popularity, being both known for their friendship for the Latins. Nine days after the death of Theodore, while his obsequies were solemnizing in the cathedral of Magnesia, the imperial guard suddenly broke into the church, and Muzalon, his brothers, and many of his principal adherents fell victims to the military wrath. Michael Palaeologus, whom Theodore had lately appointed magnus dux, was chosen as guardian instead of Muzalon, and soon afterwards he received or gave himself the title and power of despot. Thence there was only a step to the throne, which Michael also took. He made himself master of the imperial treasury, bribed or gained the Varangian guard and the clergy, and was proclaimed emperor at Magnesia. Michael and the boy John were crowned together at Nicaea, on the 1st of January, 1260. His succession filled the Nicaean empire with joy and satisfaction. It was not so in Constantinople. Although Baldwin II. enjoyed little more than the name of an emperor and the shadow of an empire, the substance whereof was in the hands of the princes of Nicaea, Epeirus, and Achaia, he assumed a haughty tone towards Michael, and demanded the cession of those parts of Thrace and Macedonia which belonged to Nicaea, as a condition of acknowledging him as emperor. At first Michael treated the Latin ambassadors with ridicule, till they declared they would be satisfied with Thessalonica or even Seres. "Not a village!" replied Michael sternly, dismissing them with contempt ; and he was right in doing so, for he had already taken proper measures for driving the Latins out of Constantinople. The ambition of Michael, the despot of Epeirus, checked him for a while in his lofty career. Seeing a child on the throne of Nicaea, and a lofty but forsaken foreigner, destitute of power, on that of Constantinople, Michael of Epeirus conceived the same plan as Michael Palaeologus, and the success of the latter at first did not at all discourage him. Things growing serious, the new emperor of Nicaea made him honourable offers in order to maintain peace between them. But the despot of Epeirus reckoned upon his alliance with Manfred, the Norman king of Sicily, and William de Villehardouin, the French prince of Achaia and the Morea, and rushed boldly into the field. At Achrida he suffered a severe defeat ; Villehardouin was taken prisoner and brought to Constantinople. The Greeks in their turn were totally beaten at Tricorypha. Little moved by the disadvantageous turn of his affairs in the West, Michael Palaeologus hastened his expedition against Constantinople, and before the end of the year 1260 Baldwin II. was shut up within his capital. Michael, however, was not strong enough to reduce the city, and returned to Nicaea. Upon this he made an alliance with the Genoese, and in 1261 sent a new army beyond the Bosporus, the progress of which he watched from his favourite residence of Nymphaeum near Smyrna. Strategopulus Caesar commanded the Greek army round Constantinople, the natural strength of which offered again such obstacles to the besiegers, that the Caesar converted the siege into a blockade, informing the emperor of the bad chances he had of speedy success. While matters stood thus, one Cutrizacus, the commander of a body of voluntary auxiliaries, was informed of the existence of a subterranean passage leading from a place outside the walls into the cellar of a house within them, and which seemed to be known only to the owner of the house. Cutrizacus immediately formed a plan for surprising the garrison by means of the passage, and after concerting measures with the commander-in-chief, ventured with 50 men through the passage into the city. His plan succeeded completely. No sooner was he within than he took possession of the nearest gate, disarmed the post, opened it, and the main body of the Greeks rushed in. The stratagem was executed in the dead of night. The inhabitants, roused from their slumber, soon learned the cause of the noise, and kept quiet within their houses, or joined their daring countrymen. The Latins dispersed in various quarters were seized with a panic, and fled in all directions, while the emperor Baldwin had scarcely time to leave his palace and escape on board of a Venetian galley, which carried him immediately to Italy. On the morning of the 25th of July, 1261, Constantinople was in the undisputed possession of the Greeks, after it had borne the yoke of the Latins during 57 years 3 months and 13 days.

A private messenger brought the news of this strange revolution to Nymphaeum, and Michael at first refused to believe it till the arrival of some officers of the Caesar dispersed all doubt : as a further token of the veracity of their account, they produced the sword, the sceptre, the red bonnet, and other articles belonging to Baldwin, who had not found time to carry them with him. Michael lost no time in repairing to Constantinople, and on the 14th of August held his triumphal entrance, saluted by the people with demonstrations of the sincerest joy. Constantinople, however, was no more what it had been. During the reign of the Latins plunder, rapine, and devastation had spoiled it of its former splendour ; trade had deserted its harbour ; and thousands of opulent families had abandoned the palaces or mansions of their forefathers, in order to avoid contact with the hated foreigners. To restore, re-people, and re-adorn Constantinople was now the principal task of Michael ; and, in order to accomplish his purpose the better, he confirmed the extensive privileges which the Venetian, the Genoese, and the Pisan merchants had received from the Latin emperors. Although the Nicaean emperors considered themselves the legitimate successors of Constantine the Great, the possession of Constantinople was an event of such magnitude as to suggest to Michael the idea of a new coronation, which was accordingly solemnized in the cathedral of St. Sophia. But Michael was crowned alone, without John, an evil omen for the friends of the young emperor, whose fears were but too soon realised, for on Christmas day of the same year 1261, Michael ordered his colleague to be blinded, whereupon he was sent into exile to a distant fortress. This hateful crime caused a general indignation among the people, and might have proved the ruin of Michael had he been a man of a less energetic turn of mind. The patriarch Arsenius, co-guardian to John, was irreconcileable; he fearlessly pronounced excommunication upon the imperial criminal; and years of trouble and commotion elapsed before Michael was re-admitted into the communion of the faithful, by the second successor of Arsenius, the patriarch Joseph.

But to return to the war with the despot of Epeirus. A short time after the conquest of Constantinople the despot Michael defeated Strategopulus, and made him a prisoner. The Greeks had scarcely rallied, when a new enemy rose against them. This was Villehardouin, who had been released from his captivity on condition of ceding some of his territories, and of remaining quiet for the future. But the loss of Constantinople was such a blight to the hopes of pope Urban IV. of effecting a complete union between the Latin and the Greek churches, that he urged the European princes to undertake a crusade against the Greek schismatics, and commanded Villehardouin to commence hostilities forthwith, relieving him from the oath he had sworn, to keep peace with Michael. Villehardouin was successful by sea and land, but Michael avoided further danger by promising the pope to do his utmost in order to effect the intended union. Urban was now the first to offer himself as mediator between the belligerents, and as both the parties were tired of bloodshed, peace was soon restored (1263). In the following year the war between the emperor and Michael of Epeirus was likewise brought to an end by an honourable peace, and shortly afterwards the despot died. To Nicephorus, the eldest of his legitimate sons, who had just married Eulogia, the sister of the emperor, he left Epeirus; but the better and larger half of his kingdom, viz. Thessaly, became the share of his favourite natural son John, a warlike man, who was well fit to defend his inheritance. In 1265 Arsenius was deposed because he would not revoke the excommunication of the emperor: his adherents, the Arsenites, caused a schism which lasted till 1312. [ARSENIUS.]

In 1269 Michael was involved in a dangerous war with Charles, king of Sicily, who took up arms on pretence of restoring the fugitive Baldwin to the throne, and who was joined by John of Thessaly, the above-mentioned son of the despot Michael of Epeirus. The despot John, the emperor's brother, took the field against his namesake, but, owing to circumstances which it was not in his power to remove, that gallant commander of the Greeks suffered a terrible defeat (1271), and the prince of Thessaly, forthwith marching upon Constantinople, placed the capital in jeopardy. But the loss of Negropont and the destruction of his fleet by the Greeks compelled him to fall back. Justly afraid that the hostilities of the king of Sicily and the despot of Thessaly were only the forerunners of a general crusade of all the Latin princes against him, Michael tried to avoid the storm by at last making earnest proposals towards effecting the union of the Greek church with that of Rome. To that effect the learned Veccus, accompanied by several of the most distinguished among the Greek clergy, was sent to the council assembled at Lyon in 1274, and there the union was effected by the Greeks giving way in the much-disputed doctrine of the procession of the Holy Ghost, and submitting to the supremacy of the pope. The union, however, was desired only by a minority of the Greeks, and the orthodox majority accordingly did their utmost to prevent the measure from being carried out. Michael in his turn supported his policy with force. The patriarch Joseph was deposed, and Veccus appointed in his stead; cruel punishment was inflicted upon all those who opposed the union; and Greece was shaken by a religious commotion which forms a remarkable event in the ecclesiastical history of the East. As space forbids us to dwell longer upon these important transactions, we can only remark that the union was never effectually carried out, and fell entirely to the ground upon the death of Michael. The manifest duplicity and the cruelty with which the emperor behaved in this affair made him odious to his own subjects and contemptible to his new Latin friends, and the latter part of his reign was an uninterrupted series of domestic troubles and foreign wars. His dearly-bought friendship with the Latin, and especially the Italian powers, was brought to a very speedy end.

The emperor Baldwin having died, his son Philip assumed the imperial title, and succeeded in forming an alliance between pope Martin IV., Charles of Anjou, king of Sicily, and the Venetians, with a view of reconquering Constantinople and dividing the Greek empire. Soliman Rossi, a French knight, commanded the allied forces, and, invading the empire from the north, met at Belgrade the Greek forces commanded by the magnus domesticus Tarcaniotes. A pitched battle ensued, in which the invaders were totally routed: the magnus domesticus made a triumphant entry into Constantinople, and all danger of a second invasion was removed. Not satisfied with the glory of his arms and the material benefit he derived from his victory, Michael resolved to take terrible revenge: he paid 20,000 ounces of gold towards equipping a Catalan fleet with which king Peter of Arragon was to attack Sicily, and the "Sicilian Vespers," in which 8,000 Frenchmen were massacred, and in consequence of which Sicily was wrested from Charles of Anjou and united with Arragon, were in some degree the work of Michael's fury.

In the autumn of the same year (1282) Michael marched against John, the unruly prince of Thessaly, but, before any thing serious had been done, he fell ill, and died on the 11th of December, 1282, at the age of 58, leaving the renown of a successful but treacherous tyrant. His son Andronicus II. succeeded him. (Pachymer. lib. i.—vi.; Niceph. Gregor. lib. iv.—v.; Acropol. c. 76, &c.; Phranz. lib. i.) [W. P.]

MICHAEL IX. PALAEO'LOGUS, the son of Andronicus II., was associated with his father in the throne of Constantinople, but died in the lifetime of his father. An account of him is given under ANDRONICUS II. [W. P.]

MICHAEL (Μιχαήλ), Byzantine writers.

1. ALEXANDRINUS, patriarch of Alexandria in the middle of the ninth century, wrote in A. D. 869 or 870 De Unitate Ecclesiae, a letter addressed to the emperor Basil I., printed Graece et Latine in the 8th vol. of Labbe's Concil. and in the 5th vol. of Hardouin's Concil. (Cave, Hist. Lit. ad an. 869; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. xi. p. 189.)

2. ANCHIALUS. [ANCHIALUS.]

3. APOSTOLIUS, was one of those Greeks who contributed to the revival of learning in Italy, where he settled about 1440. He was an intimate friend of Gemistus Pletho, and an adherent of the Platonic philosophy, two circumstances which, together with his own merits, caused him to be well received by Cardinal Bessarion in Italy. The friendship, however, did not last long, and poor Michael retired to Candia, where he got a livelihood by teaching children and copying MSS. There he died, some time after 1457, for in that year he wrote a panegyric on the emperor Frederic III. His principal works are: 1. A defence of Plato against Theodore Gaza, extant in MS. in the Vienna library. 2. Menexenus, a dialogue on the Holy Trinity, investigating whether the Mohammedans and Jews are right, in believing a Mono-Deus; or the Christians, in believing a Deus Trin-unus: extant in MS., ibid. 3. Oratio consultoria ad Socerum sibi irascendum cum ad secundas transiret nuptias, extant in the Bodleian. 4. Appellatio ad Constantinum Palaeologum ultimum Imperatorem. 5. Oratio ad Ioannem Argyropulum. 6. Epistolae XLV.: these letters are extremely important for the history of the writer's time, as Lambecius asserts, who perused all or most of them, and it is to be regretted that none of them are printed. The first is addressed to Gemistus, the others to Manuel Chrysolaras, Chalcocondylas, Argyropulus, Bessarion, and other celebrated men of the time. They are extant in MS. in the Bodleian; some of them are also to be found in the Vatican and at Munich. 7. Oratio Panegyrica ad Fredericum III., written about or perhaps in 1457; it was published Graece et Latine by Freherus in the second vol. of his Rerum German. Script. 8. Oratio Funebris in Laudem Bessarionis, does credit to the heart of Michael, for it seems that the cardinal had not behaved very generously towards the poor scholar. Still it is very questionable whether our Michael is the author of it: Bessarion died in 1472; and as Michael, previously to leaving Constantinople, in or before 1440, had enjoyed, during many years, the friendship of Gemistus, whose name became conspicuous in the very beginning of the 15th century, and who was a very old man in 1441, he must have attained a very great age if he survived Bessarion. 9. Disceptatio adversus eos qui Occidentales Orientalibus superiores esse contendebant, extant in MS. in the Bodleian. 10. De Figuris Grammaticis, which Leo Allatius esteemed so highly that he intended to publish it, but was unfortunately prevented. 11. An Etymological Dictionary: doubtful whether still extant; a work of great importance. 12. Ἰωνία, Violets, a pleasing title given to a collection of sentences of celebrated persons. Arsenius of Malvasia made an extract of it, Ἀποφθέγματα, Rome, 8vo, which he dedicated to pope Leo X., who reigned from 1513 to 1522. 13. Συναγωγὴ Παροιμιῶν, containing 2027 Greek proverbs, a very remarkable little work which soon attracted the notice of the lovers of Greek literature: it was dedicated by the author to Casparus Uxama, or Osmi, a Spanish prelate, with whom Michael met at Rome. Editions: the Greek text by Hervagius, Basel, 1558, 8vo.; the text, with a Latin version and valuable notes, by P. Pantinus and A. Scholl, Leyden, 1619, 4to.; also cum Clavi Homerica, by George Perkins. (Cave, Hist. Lit. ad an. 1440; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. xi. p. 189.)

4. ATTALIATA. [ATTALIATA.]

5. BALSAMON, Magnae Ecclesiae Constantinopolitanae Magnus Chartophylax et Archidiaconus, was probably a native of Constantinople. He was one of the Greek deputies sent in 1438 to the council of Florence, discovered the secret intrigues of the Latins, and prognosticated the ultimate fate of the union of the two churches to which he subscribed reluctantly. He wrote and addressed to the emperor Joannes Palaeologus Anaphora Cleri Constantinopolitani, of which Leo Allatius gives a few fragments in his work De Consensu utriusque Ecclesiae. (Cave, Hist. Lit. ad an. 1440; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. x. p. 373, note.)

6. CERULARIUS, was chosen patriarch of Constantinople in 1043, and made himself notorious in ecclesiastical history by his violent attacks upon the Latin church. He caused so much scandal that pope Leo IX. sent Cardinals Humbert and Frederic with Peter, archbishop of Amalfi, to Constantinople in order to persuade Cerularius to a more moderate conduct. Their efforts were not only unsuccessful, but they were treated with such abuse that Humbert excommunicated the virulent patriarch. Cerularius in his turn excommunicated the three legates, and he caused the name of Pope Leo IX. to be erased from the diptychs. In 1057 he prevailed upon the emperor Michael Stratioticus to yield to his successful rival, Isaac Comnenus, whose interest he took care of for some time. Differences, however, soon broke out between them; and when he was once quarrelling with Isaac about the respective authority of the church and the state, he impudently cried out, "I have given you the crown, and I know how to take it from you again." Banishment was his due reward, and Isaac was about to remove him from his see when death removed him from the earth (1058). Cerularius wrote: 1. Decisio Synodica de Nuptiis in Septimo Gradu. 2. De Matrimonio prohibito: the former printed Greek and Latin in the third book, and fragments of the latter in the fourth book of Leunclavius, Jus Graeco-Roman. 3. Epistolae II. ad Petrum Antiochenum, Greek and Latin, in the second vol. of Cotelerius, Eccles. Graec. Monument. 4. De Sacerdotis Uxore Adulterio polluta, in Cotelerius, Patres Apostol. 5. Σημείωμα s. Edictum Synodale adversus Latinos de Pittacia seu De Excommunicatione a Latinis Legatis in ipsum ab ipso in Legatos vibrata, anno 1054, die septimo Junii factum, Graece et Latine in Leo Allatius, De Libr. Eccles. Graecis. 6. Homilia, ed. Graece et Latine by Montfaucon, under the title Epistola Synodi Nicaeanae ad Sanctam Alexandriae Ecclesiam, Paris, 1715, fol. There are, farther, extant in MS. fragments of several letters, as Contra Rebelles Abbates, Contra Armenios, De Homicidio facto in Ecclesia, De

Episcoporum Judiciis, &c. (Cave, Hist. Lit. ad an. 1043; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. xi. pp. 195, 196.)

7. EPHESIUS, archbishop of Ephesus, the author of valuable scholia to Aristotle, especially the Metaphysica, was, according to some, no other than the emperor Michael Ducas Parapinaces, who was appointed to the see of Ephesus after his forced abdication in 1078. Others pretend that the scholia ought to be ascribed to Michael Psellus. [PSELLUS.] (Leo Allatius, De Psellis, p. 40.)

8. GRAMMATICUS, perhaps the same as Michael Psellus, wrote Epigramma in Agathiam, printed in the third vol. of Brunck's Analecta Vet. Poet. Graec., in the third vol. of Jacobs' Anthologia Graeca, and in some other collections. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iv. p. 482, vol. xi. p. 204.)

9. MONACHUS, ecclesiae Constantinopolitanae presbyter and Ignatii patriarchae syncellus, wrote, 1. Encomium Ignatii Patriarchae (who died in 877), edited Greek and Latin, in a very mutilated form, by Raderus in his Acta Concilii, Ingolstadt, 1604, 4to., also in the eighth vol. of the Concilia. 2. Encomium in Angelicorum Ordinum Ductores, Michaelem et Gabrielem. 3. Encomium in gloriosum Christi Apostolum Philippum. 4. Perhaps Vita et Miracula Sti Nicolai. 5. Vita Theodori Studitae, of which Baronius gives some fragments in his Annales ad an. 795 and 826. The complete text with a Latin translation was published by Jacobus de la Baune in the fifth vol. of Opera Sirmondi, Paris, 1696, fol. The life of Theodore Studita, as well as one or two of the other productions, were perhaps written by another Michael Monachus, a contemporary and survivor of Studita who died as early as 826. The author of this life was a very incompetent writer. (Cave, Hist. Lit. ad an. 878; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. xi. p. 205.)

10. PHILE. [PHILE.]

11. PROCHIRUS, of uncertain age, the author of Dramation, Musarum et Fortunae Querimonium continens, et alia, ed. Graec. et Lat. F. Morellus, Paris, 1593, 1598, 8vo.; also in Maittaire's Miscellanea Graecor. aliquot Scriptor. Carmina, London, 1722, 4to. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. xi. p. 206.)

12. PRESBYTER, lived in the 9th century, wrote De Constructione Partium Orationis s. Methodus de Orationis Constructione, extant in MS. in Milan, and in the Escurial libraries, which is probably the same as Περὶ συντάξεως τῶν ῥημάτων, ascribed to Georgius Lecapenus, under whose name it was published, together with Theodorus Gaza, at Florence, 1515, 1520, 8vo.; with others, ibid. 1526, 8vo.; and in Grammatici Graec. Venice, 1525, 8vo. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vi. p. 133.)

13. PSELLUS. [PSELLUS.]

14. SBIRUS. [SBIRUS.]

15. SOPHIANUS. [SOPHIANUS.]

16. SYNCELLUS. [SYNCELLUS.]

17. SYNODENSIS, or more correctly SYNNADENSIS, bishop of Synnada or Synnas, in Phrygia, of uncertain age, wrote Expositio Maximorum Miraculorum SS. Archangelorum. (Leo Allatius, De Symeonibus, p. 107.)

18. THESSALONICENSIS, magister rhetorum and magnae ecclesiae protecdicus, lived about 1160, and embraced the wide-spread Bogomilian heresy, for which he suffered severe persecutions till he returned to the orthodox church. He wrote Confessio Brevis, extant in Leo Allatius's De Consensu utriusque Ecclesiae, lib. ii. c. 12. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. xi. p. 702.) [W. P.]

MI'CION (Μικίων). 1. A Macedonian officer, who made a descent upon the coast of Attica during the Lamian war (B. C. 323), but was defeated by Phocion, and fell in the action. (Plut. Phoc. 25.)

2. An Athenian orator and demagogue, who, together with Eurycleides, possessed the chief direction of affairs in his native city about B. C. 216. They were guilty of the most abject flattery towards the surrounding monarchs, but especially towards Ptolemy Philopator; and it was probably their partiality towards the latter that led Philip V., king of Macedonia, to procure their removal by poison. (Polyb. v. 106; Paus. ii. 9. § 6.) Pausanias writes the name Micon, but the authority of Polybius in favour of the form Micion is confirmed by the evidence of coins, on which the two names of Micion and Eurycleides are found associated together. [E. H. B.]

MICIPSA (Μικίψας), king of Numidia, was the eldest of the sons of Masinissa who survived their father. He is first mentioned in B. C. 150, as being sent by Masinissa, together with his brother Gulussa, ambassador to Carthage, to demand the restoration of the partisans of Masinissa who had been driven into exile: but the Carthaginians shut the gates of the city against them, and refused to listen to their proposals. (Appian, Pun. 70.) After the death of Masinissa (B. C. 148), the sovereign power was divided by Scipio between Micipsa and his two brothers, Gulussa and Mastanabal, in such a manner that the possession of Cirta, the capital of Numidia, and the treasures accumulated there, together with the financial administration of the kingdom, fell to the share of Micipsa. (Id. ibid. 106; Liv. Epit. l.; Zonar. ix. 27.) It was not long, however, before the death of both his brothers left him in possession of the undivided sovereignty of Numidia, which he held from that time without interruption till his death. But few events of his long reign have been transmitted to us. He appears indeed to have been of a peaceful disposition; and after the fall of Carthage, he had no neighbours who could excite his jealousy.

With the Romans he took care to cultivate a good understanding; and we find him sending an auxiliary force to assist them in Spain against Viriathus (B. C. 142); and again in the more arduous war against Numantia. (Appian, Hisp. 67; Sall. Jug. 7.) On the latter occasion his auxiliaries were commanded by his nephew, Jugurtha, whom he had brought up with his own sons, and whom he was even induced to adopt; but the intrigues and ambition of the young man threw a cloud over the declining years of Micipsa, and filled him with apprehensions for the future. Jugurtha, however, was prudent enough to repress his ambitious projects during the lifetime of Micipsa: and the latter died at an advanced age in B. C. 118, having, on his death-bed, urged on his two sons, Adherbal and Hiempsal, and their adopted brother, the necessity of that harmony and concord which he but too well foresaw there was little chance of their preserving. (Sall. Jug. 5—11; Liv. Epit. lxii.; Oros. v. 15; Florus, iii. 2.)

Towards the close of the reign of Micipsa, Numidia was visited by a dreadful pestilence, which broke out in B. C. 125, and is said to have carried off not less than 800,000 persons. (Oros. v. 11.) But notwithstanding this great calamity, that kingdom appears to have risen to a very flourishing condition under the mild and equitable rule of Micipsa. Diodorus calls him the most virtuous of all the kings of Africa, and tells us that he sought to attract Greek men of letters and philosophers to his court, and spent the latter part of his life chiefly in the study of philosophy. (Diod. xxxv. Exc. Vales. p. 607.) We learn also that he bestowed especial care upon the improvement of his capital city of Cirta, which rose to a high pitch of power and prosperity. He not only adorned it with many public edifices, but established there a number of Greek colonists. (Strab. xvii. p. 832.)

According to Diodorus (l. c), Micipsa left a son of his own name, but he is not mentioned by any other author. [E. H. B.]

MICON, historical. [MICION, No. 2.]

MICON (Μίκων), artists. 1. Of Athens, the son of Phanochus, was a very distinguished painter and statuary, contemporary with Polygnotus, about B. C. 460. He is mentioned, with Polygnotus, as the first who used for a colour the light Attic ochre (sil), and the black made from burnt vine twigs. (Plin. H. N. xxxiii. 13. s. 56, xxxv. 6. s. 25.) Varro mentions him as one of those ancient painters, by departing from whose conventional forms, the later artists, such as Apelles and Protogenes, attained to their great excellence. (L. L. viii. 12, ed. Müller.) The following pictures by him are mentioned:—(1.) In the Poecile, at Athens,—where, Pliny informs us (xxxv. 9. s. 35), Polygnotus painted gratuitously, but Micon for pay,—he painted the battle of Theseus and the Athenians with the Amazons. (Schol. ad Aristoph. Lysist. 679; Paus. i. 15. § 2.) (2.) According to some writers, Micon had a hand in the great picture of the battle of Marathon, in the Poecile [comp. PANAENUS and POLYGNOTUS], and was fined thirty minae for having made the barbarians larger than the Greeks. (Sopater, in Ald. Rhet. Graec. p. 340; Harpocr. s. v.) The celebrated figure, in that picture, of a dog which had followed its master to the battle, was attributed by some to Micon, by others to Polygnotus. (Aelian, N. A. vii. 38.) (3.) He painted three of the walls of the temple of Theseus. On the one wall was the battle of the Athenians and the Amazons: on another the fight between the Centaurs and the Lapithae, where Theseus had already killed a centaur (no doubt in the centre of the composition), while between the other combatants the conflict was still equal: the story represented on the third side, Pausanias was unable to make out. (Paus. i. 17. § 2.) Micon seems to have been assisted by Polygnotus in these works. (See Siebelis, ad loc.) (4.) The temple of the Dioscuri was adorned with paintings by Polygnotus and Micon: the former painted the rape of the daughters of Leucippus; the latter, the departure (or, as Böttiger supposes, the return) of Jason and the Argonauts. (Paus. i. 18. § 1.)

Micon was particularly skilful in painting horses (Aelian, N. A. iv. 50); for instance, in his picture of the Argonauts, the part on which he bestowed the greatest care was Acastus and his horses. (Paus. l. c.) The accurate knowledge, however, of Simon, who was both an artist and a writer on horsemanship, detected an error in Micon's horses; he had painted lashes on the lower eye-lids (Pollux, ii. 71): another version of the story attributes the error to Apelles. (Aelian, l. c.)

There is a tale that in one of his pictures Micon painted a certain Butes crushed beneath a rock, so that only his head was visible, and hence arose the proverb, applied to things quickly accomplished, Βούτην Μίκων ἔγραφεν, or Θᾶττον ἢ Βούτης. (Zenob. Proverb. i. 11, p. 87, Append. e Vatic. i. 12, p. 260.)

He was a statuary as well as a painter, and he made the statue of the Olympic victor Callias, who conquered in the pancratium in the 77th Olympiad. (Paus. vi. 6. § 1; comp. v. 9. § 3.) The date exactly agrees with the time of Micon, and Pausanias expressly says, Μίκων ἐποίησεν ὁ ζωγράφος. Böttiger, in the course of a valuable section on Micon, ascribes this statue to Micon of Syracuse (No. 3), to whom consequently he assigns the wrong date. (Böttiger, Arch. d. Malerei, vol. i. pp. 254—260.)

2. Pliny distinguishes, by the epithet of minor, a second painter of this name, the father of Timarete. (H. N. xxxv. 9. s. 35.)

3. A statuary of Syracuse, the son of Niceratus, made two statues of Hiero II. at Olympia, one on horseback, the other on foot. They were made after the death of Hiero, by command of his sons. (Paus. vi. 12. § 4.) The artist must therefore have flourished after B. C. 215. He may safely be assumed to be the same as the statuary of whom Pliny says, Micon athletis spectatur. (H. N. xxxiv. 8. s. 19. § 30.) [P. S.]

MI'CTIO, was a leading man at Chalcis, in Euboea, attached to the Roman, and opposed to the Aetolian party in that island during the war between Antiochus the Great and Rome, B. C. 192. He defended Chalcis by means of a league between the Chalcidians, Eretrians, and Carystians, and rejected the proposals of the Aetolians to remain neutral between Antiochus and the Romans. In B. C. 170 Mictio appeared before the senate at Rome as the chief of a deputation sent from Chalcis to complain of the cruelty and extortions of two successive praetors in Greece, C. Lucretius and L. Hortensius. Mictio, who was lame, was allowed to plead from a litter—a privilege till then unheard of—and, on his return, was conveyed to Brundisium in a carriage at the public cost. (Liv. xxxv. 38, 46, xliii. 7, 8.) [W. B. D.]

MI'CYTHUS (Μίκυθος). 1. Son of Choerus, was at first a slave in the service of Anaxilas, tyrant of Rhegium, but gradually rose to so high a place in the confidence of his master, that Anaxilas at his death (B. C. 476) left him guardian of his infant sons, with charge to hold the sovereign power in trust for them until they should attain to manhood. The administration of Micythus appears to have been both wise and vigorous, so that he conciliated the affections of his subjects, and held the government both of Rhegium and Messana, undisturbed by any popular commotions. One of the principal events of his reign was the assistance furnished by him to the Tarentines in their war against the Iapygians (B. C. 473), which was terminated by a disastrous defeat, in which 3000 of the Rhegians perished, and the fugitives were pursued by the barbarians up to the very gates of the city. But notwithstanding this blow, we find him shortly after (B. C. 471) powerful enough to found a new colony, the city of Pyxus, or Buxentum, as it was afterwards called. It was doubtless from jealousy of Micythus that Hieron, tyrant of Syracuse, who had been on friendly terms with Anaxilas, was induced to invite the sons of that monarch, who were now grown up to manhood, to his court, and there urged them to require of their guardian the surrender of the sovereign power, and an account of his administration. But on the return of the young princes (B. C. 467), Micythus immediately complied with their request; and after rendering an exact account of the period of his rule, resigned the supreme power, and departed with all his private wealth to the Peloponnese, where he settled at Tegea, and resided there the rest of his life in honour and tranquillity. He is also mentioned by Pausanias (who calls him Smicythus) as having distinguished himself by the number of statues and other offerings that he dedicated at Olympia. (Herod. vii. 170; Diod. xi. 48, 52, 59, 66; Paus. v. 26. §§ 4, 5; Strab. vi. p. 253; Macrob. Sat. i. 11. p. 259, ed. Zeun.)

2. An officer under Lyciscus, the general of Cassander, who was killed in battle against Alexander, the son of Alcetas, king of Epeirus, B. C. 312. (Diod. xix. 88.) [E. H. B.]

MIDAS (Μίδας), a son of Gordius, according to some by Cybele (Hygin. Fab. 274), a wealthy but effeminate king of Phrygia, a pupil of Orpheus, and a promoter of the worship of Dionysus (Herod. i. 14; Paus. i. 4. § 5; Aelian, V. H. iv. 17; Strab. vii. p. 304). His wealth is alluded to in a story connected with his childhood, for it is said that while yet a child, ants carried grains of wheat into his mouth to indicate that one day he should be the richest of all mortals (Cic. De Div. i. 36; Val. Max. i. 6. § 3; Aelian, V. H. xii. 45). His effeminacy is described by Philostratus (Icon. i. 22; comp. Athen. xii. p. 516). It seems probable that in this character he was introduced into the Satyric drama of the Greeks, and was represented with the ears of a satyr, which were afterwards lengthened into the ears of an ass. He is said to have built the town of Ancyra (Strab. xiii. pp. 568, 571; Paus. i. 4. § 5), and as king of Phrygia he is called Berecynthius heros (Ov. Met. xi. 106). In reference to his later life we have several legends, the first of which relates his reception of Seilenus. During the expedition of Dionysus from Thrace to Phrygia, Seilenus in a state of intoxication had gone astray, and was caught by country people in the rose gardens of Midas. He was bound in wreaths of flowers and led before the king. These gardens were in Macedonia, near Mount Bermion or Bromion, where Midas was king of the Briges, with whom he afterwards emigrated to Asia, where their name was changed into Phryges (Herod. vii. 83, viii. 138; Conon, Narrat. 1). Midas received Seilenus kindly, conversed with him (comp. Plut. Consol. ad Apoll.; Aelian, V. H. iii. 18), and after having treated him hospitably for ten days, he led him back to his divine pupil, Dionysus, who in his gratitude requested Midas to ask a favour. Midas in his folly desired that all things which he touched should be changed into gold (comp. Plut. Parall. Min. 5). The request was granted, but as even the food which he touched was changed into gold, he implored the god to take his favour back. Dionysus accordingly ordered him to bathe in the source of Pactolus near Mount Tmolus. This bath saved Midas, but the river from that time had an abundance of gold in its sand (Ov. Met. xi. 90, &c.; Hygin. Fab. 191; Virg. Eclog. vi. 13). A second story relates his capture of Satyrus. Midas, who was himself related to the race of Satyrs, once had a visit from a Satyr, who indulged in all kinds of jokes, and ridiculed the king for his Satyr's ears. Midas, who had learnt from his mother how Satyrs might be caught and brought to reason, mixed wine in a well, and when the Satyr had drunk of it, he fell asleep and was caught (Philostr. Vit. Apoll. vi. 27). This well of Midas was at different times assigned to different localities. Xenophon (Anab. i. 2. § 13) places it in the neighbourhood of Thymbrium and Tyraeum, and Pausanias (i. 4. § 5) at Ancyra (comp. Athen. ii. 45; Plut. De Fluv. 10). Once when Pan and Apollo were engaged in a musical contest on the flute and lyre, Tmolus, or according to others (Hygin. Fab. 191, who speaks of the contest between Apollo and Marsyas), Midas, was chosen to decide between them. Tmolus decided in favour of Apollo, and all agreed in it except Midas. To punish him for this, Apollo changed his ears into those of an ass. Midas contrived to conceal them under his Phrygian cap, but the servant who used to cut his hair discovered them. The secret so much harassed this man, that as he could not betray it to a human being, he dug a hole in the earth, and whispered into it, "King Midas has ass's ears." He then filled the hole up again, and his heart was released. But on the same spot a reed grew up, which in its whispers betrayed the secret to the world (Ov. Met. xi. 146, &c.; Pers. Sat. i. 121; Aristoph. Plut. 287). Midas is said to have killed himself by drinking the blood of an ox. (Strab. i. p. 61; Plut. De Superst. 7.) [L. S.]

MIDEA'TIS (Μιδεᾶτις), a surname of Alcmene, derived from the town of Midea in Argolis, where her father Electryon ruled as king. (Paus. ii. 25. § 8; Theocrit. xiii. 20, xxiv. 1.) [L. S.]

MIDEIA, or MI'DEA (Μίδεια, or Μίδεα). 1. A Phrygian woman, the mother of Licymnius and Electryon. (Apollod. ii. 4. § 5; Pind. Ol. vii. 29; comp. LICYMNIUS.)

2. A daughter of Phylas, and by Heracles the mother of Antiochus. (Paus. i. 5. § 2, x. 10. § 1.)

3. A nymph, who became the mother of Aspledon by Poseidon. (Paus. ix. 38. § 6.) [L. S.]

MI'DIAS or MEI'DIAS (Μειδίας). 1. An Athenian, of no very reputable character, to whom we find the nickname of "quail" applied in Aristophanes (Av. 1297), because,—so says the poet,—"he is like a quail with its head broken." No doubt there is also an allusion here, as we learn from the scholiast on the passage, to his propensity for the game of quail-striking (ὀρτυγοκοπία) and the gambling which accompanied it. We hear that he was satirized, too, by other comic poets (Phrynichus, Plato, and Metagenes) as a very great knave, beggarly at once and arrogant (κόβαλος καὶ πτωχαλαζών). By Plato, the philosopher (if indeed the dialogue in question be his), he is mentioned as a man who, though utterly uneducated both in mind and in character, presumed to take a part in public affairs, and made his way by dint of impudence and flattery of the people. In the Νῖκαι of Plato, the comic poet, peculation of the public money was charged against him along with his other tricks of knavery. (Plat. Alc. Prim. p. 120; Schol. ad loc.; Athen. xi. p. 506, d; Dalechamp, ad loc.; Suid. s. v. ὀρτυγοκόπος; Meineke, Fragm. Com. Graec. vol. ii. pp. 182, 644, 755; Dindorf and Brunck, ad Arist. l. c.)

2. An Athenian, of considerable wealth and influence, was a violent and bitter enemy of Demosthenes, the orator. His hostility he first displayed when he broke violently into the house of Demosthenes, with his brother Thrasylochus, to take possession of it,—Thrasylochus having offered, in the case of a trierarchy, to make an exchange of property with Demosthenes (ἀντίδοσις; see Dict. of Ant. s. v.), under a private understanding with the guardians of the latter that, if the exchange were effected, the suit then pending against them should be dropped. (Dem. c. Meid. p. 540, c. Aphob. p. 841; Böckh, Publ. Econ. of Athens, bk. iv. ch. 16.) The opposition offered by Demosthenes, though to no purpose, to the proposal for sending aid against Callias and Taurosthenes of Chalcis to Plutarchus, the tyrant of Eretria, and the friend of Meidias, no doubt further exasperated the hatred of the latter, and he not only assailed Demosthenes with a charge of neglect of military duty (λειποταξίου δίκη), but endeavoured also, with the grossest malice, to implicate him in the accusation of murdering one Nicodemus. (Aesch. c. Ctes. pp. 65, 66; Dem. De Pac. p. 58, c. Meid. pp. 547—554.) For the remainder of the transactions between Demosthenes and Meidias, see above, Vol. I. pp. 982, 983, and comp. Clint. F. H. vol. ii. sub annis 350, 348, App. ch. 20.

3. The son-in-law of Mania. [MEIDIAS.] [E.E.]

MI'DIAS, the engraver of a gem in the Royal Library at Paris. (Clarac, Descr. des Antiques du Musée Royal, p. 420; Raoul-Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorn, p. 45.) [P. S.]

MIGONI'TIS (Μιγωνῖτις), a surname of Aphrodite, derived from a place, Migonium, in or near the island of Cranne in Laconia, where the goddess had a temple. (Paus. iii. 22. § 1.) [L. S.]

MILA'NION. [MEILANION.]

MILE'TUS (Μίλητος), a son of Apollo and Areia of Crete. Being beloved by Minos and Sarpedon, he attached himself to the latter, and fled from Minos to Caria, where he built a town, which he called after his own name (Apollod. iii. 1. § 2; Paus. vii. 2. § 3; Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. i. 186). Ovid (Met. ix. 442) calls him a son of Apollo and Deïone, and hence Deïonides. A different genealogy and story about him is preserved in Antonius Liberalis (30). [L. S.]

MI'LICHUS, a freedman of Flavius Scaevinus, gave Nero the first information of Piso's conspiracy in A. D. 66. Milichus was liberally rewarded by the emperor, and assumed the surname of Soter, or the Preserver. (Tac. Ann. XV. 54, 55, 71.) [W. B. D.]

MILO, T. A'NNIUS PAPIA'NUS, was the son of C. Papius Celsus and Annia [ANNIA, No. 2]. He was born at Lanuvium, of which place he was in B. C. 53, chief magistrate—dictator. Milo derived the name of Annius from his adoption by his maternal grandfather T. Annius Luscus. But the appellation by which he is best known, was an Italiot-Greek name, common in the South of Italy, the fruitful nursery of Gladiators. Since his ancestors, neither in the Papian nor Annian families, bore this name, and Milo was notorious as a leader of mercenary swordsmen, and for his lawless and ferocious life, a by-name has probably superseded his birth-names. The year of his quaestorship is unknown. He was tribune of the plebs in B. C. 57, when his memorable and fatal contest with P. Clodius began. The history of his tribunate and of the succeeding events until the murder of Clodius in B. C. 52, is inseparable from that of his rival, and has already been related [P. CLODIUS PULCHER, No. 40]. We shall, therefore, merely recapitulate the principal features of their quarrel. Milo was deeply in debt, and a wealthy province alone could extricate him. But without eloquence or political talents, the member of a comparatively obscure family could not hope to attain the consulate, unless he identified his own interest with that of some one or other of the great leaders of the commonwealth. Milo, therefore, attached himself to Cn. Pompey, and Cicero's recall from exile was the immediate pretext of their alliance. In procuring Cicero's restoration, Milo, from his daring and unscrupulous character, was by far the most efficient of the tribunes. He combated Clodius with his own weapons. He purchased, after a faint and fruitless trial of constitutional means, a band of gladiators, and the streets of Rome were the scene of almost daily and always deadly conflict between the two leaders of these paid assassins. Cicero's return did not, however, tranquillise the city. Clodius renewed his attacks on the person and property of the great orator, and Milo twice rescued him from the hands of the Clodian mob. Pompey also had become an object of Clodius' hate, and Milo and his gladiators, who served without being expressly employed by him, were a valuable guard to one who prized the concealment of his sentiments little less than the safety of his person. The success of the combatants was nearly equal. Milo's houses in Rome, the Anniana on the Capitoline and another on the hill Germalus, were assailed by the Clodians, but Clodius was twice driven from the forum, and the last time narrowly escaped with life. Nor did the rivals restrict their warfare to the swords of their adherents. With equal justice and consistency they accused each other of a breach of the Lex Plotia de Vi, and with equal violence both eluded the results of prosecution. Clodius, however, notwithstanding Milo's repeated disruption of the comitia, succeeded in carrying his election for the curule-aedileship in B. C. 56, and was thus during his year of office exempt from impeachment. Milo, whose tribunate expired in December B. C. 57, was on the other hand open to legal proceedings, and Cicero from dread of Crassus, who favoured Clodius, refused to undertake his defence. It was, therefore, necessary for his safety that he should again hold an office of the state. But his bankrupt condition did not allow him to risk the expenses of the curule-aedileship, and there is no authentic record of his praetorship. In those convulsionary years of Rome it is indeed likely that the sequence of magistracies was not very strictly observed. Milo, however, although never aedile, exhibited aedilitian games of unusual and, according to Cicero, of insane magnificence. He was enabled to give them by the bequest of a deceased curule-aedile, whose name is lost, and he exhibited them in the year previous to his canvass for the consulship. In B. C. 53 Milo was candidate for the consulship, and Clodius for the praetorship of the ensuing year. The gladiatorial combats were revived, and Clodius upbraided Milo in the senate with his insolvency. Cicero, to whom Milo's election was of vital importance, defended him in the speech de Aere alieno Milonis, of which a few fragments are still extant. The contest, however, between the rival ruffians was brought to an end by the murder of Clodius at Bovillae on the Appian-road, January 20th, B. C. 52. The details of the meeting, the quarrel, and its catastrophe, are related in the account of Clodius [No. 40].

The immediate effect of the death of Clodius was to depress the Milonian, and to re-animate the Clodian faction. Milo at first meditated voluntary exile. But the excesses of his opponents made his presence once more possible at Rome. The tribune of the plebs, M. Caelius, attended him to the forum, and Milo addressed the assembly in the white robe of a candidate, and proceeded with his consular canvass. But a more powerful, though secret opponent had meanwhile risen up against Milo. His competitors in the comitia were P. Plautius Hypsaeus [HYPSAEUS, No. 5] and Q. Metellus Scipio. Cn. Pompey had married a daughter of Scipio, and from Hypsaeus he expected aid in gratifying the prime object of his ambition —the dictatorship. A bill for his appointment was not indeed promulgated. But the senate nominated him sole consul. Pompey immediately brought forward three laws, which, from their immediate reference to the circumstances of the times, were in fact privilegia. In the first he specially noticed the murder at Bovillae, the conflagration of the curia hostilia and the Porcian Basilica, and the attack upon the house of M. Lepidus the interrex. In the second he introduced more stringent penalties for ambitus, and in the third he increased the severity of the existing laws against sodalitia, or illegal interference with the freedom of the comitia. The time allowed for trials de Vi, Ambitu, Sodalitiis, was also much shortened, only three days being assigned to the accusation, the defence, and the examination of witnesses. M. Caelius opposed these laws on the ground that they were privilegia and retrospective. But Pompey stifled all opposition by surrounding his house and gardens with soldiers, and withdrawing himself from the senate and the forum, on pretence of dreading Milo's violence. A variety of charges and recriminations was brought forward by either faction. The slaves of Milo and Clodius were respectively required to be given up to torture, and perjury and intimidation, the forms of law, and the abuse of justice, were put in active requisition. Milo, however, was not without hope, since the higher aristocracy, from jealousy of Pompey, supported him, and Cicero undertook his defence. His trial opened on the 4th of April, B. C. 52. He was impeached by the two Clodii, nephews of the deceased, de Vi, by Q. Petulcius and L. Cornificius, de Ambitu, and by P. Fulvius Neratus, de Sodalitiis. L. Domitius Ahenobarbus, a consular, was appointed quaesitor or instigator by a special law of Pompey's, and all Rome and thousands of spectators from Italy thronged the forum and its avenues from dawn to sunset during these memorable proceedings. But Milo's chances of acquittal, faint even had justice been decorously administered, were wholly marred by the virulence of his adversaries, who insulted and obstructed the witnesses, the process, and the conductors of the defence. Cn. Pompey availed himself of these disorders to line the forum and its encompassing hills with soldiers. Cicero was intimidated and Milo was condemned. Had he even been acquitted on the first count de Vi, the two other charges of bribery and conspiracy awaited him. He therefore went into exile. Cicero, who could not deliver, re-wrote and expanded the defence of Milo—the extant oration—and sent it to him at Marseille. Milo remarked, "I am glad this was not spoken, since I must have been acquitted, and then had never known the delicate flavour of these Marseille-mullets." M. Brutus also some time afterwards composed as a rhetorical exercise a defence of Milo. He took a different and an easier view of the cause than Cicero. The murder of Clodius, according to Brutus, was a benefit to the commonwealth; according to Cicero, it was a necessary act of self-defence. Both pleas are singularly weak. However useful and merited the death of Clodius might be to the state, inflicted by a private hand it was a pernicious precedent; and although the meeting at Bovillae may have been accidental, the necessity for self-defence ceased with the flight of Clodius, and the pretence wholly fails when it is remembered that Milo's escort was much the more numerous and the better-armed.

Milo's exile was a heavy blow to his numerous creditors. His houses at Rome, his numerous villas, and his bands of fighting men were put up to auction, and Cicero did not escape suspicion of having purchased through an agent, Philotimus, some of the Annian property below its real worth. Cicero, on his return from Cilicia in B. C. 51, showed that he felt the imputation by offering to cancel the purchase or to increase the price. He however, owed no gratitude to Milo, who had espoused his cause because it suited his own interest, and his undertaking the defence of so notorious a criminal with extreme risk to himself amply discharged his real or supposed obligations. The close of Milo's life was as inglorious as his political career had been violent and disgraceful. Milo expected a recall from Caesar, when, in B. C. 49, the dictator permitted many of the exiles to return. But better times were come, and Rome neither needed nor wished for the presence of a bankrupt agitator. Milo's former friend the ex-tribune M. Caelius, praetor in B. C. 48, promulgated a bill for the adjustment of debts—a revolutionary measure for which the senate, where the Caesarian party had then a majority, expelled him from his office. Caelius, himself a man of broken fortunes, required desperate allies, and he accordingly invited Milo to Italy, as the fittest tool for his purposes. At the head of the survivors of his gladiatorial bands, reinforced by Samnite and Bruttian herdsmen, by criminals and run-away slaves, Milo appeared in Campania, and proclaimed himself a legatus of Cn. and Sextus Pompey. He found, however, no adherents, and retreated into Lucania, where he was met by the praetor Q. Pedius, and slain under the walls of an obscure fort in the district of Thurii.

Milo, in B. C. 57, married Fausta, a daughter of the dictator Sulla. She proved a faithless wife, and Sallust the historian was soundly scourged by Milo for an intrigue with her. (The authorities for Milo's life are Cicero's well-known oration and the passages in Orelli's Onom. Tull.; Plutarch's lives of Pompey, Cicero, and Caesar; Dion Cass. xxxix. 6—8, 18—21, xli, 48—55; Appian, B. C. ii. 16, 20—24, 48; Caes. B. C. iii. 21—23; see Drumann, *Gesch. MILON (Μίλων) of Crotona, son of Diotimus, an athlete, famous for his extraordinary bodily strength. He was six times victor in wrestling at the Olympic games, and as often at the Pythian; but having entered the lists at Olympia a seventh time, he was worsted by the superior agility of his adversary. By these successes he obtained great distinction among his countrymen, so that he was even appointed to command the army, with which they took the field against the Sybarites under Telys, and bore an important part in the great battle at the Crathis, B. C. 511. Diodorus even goes so far as to attribute the memorable victory of the Crotoniats on that occasion almost wholly to the personal strength and prowess of Milon, who is said to have taken the field accoutred like Hercules, and wearing the chaplet of his Olympic victory. (Diod. xii. 9.) This is the only instance in which he appears in any public capacity; but we learn from Herodotus that, so great was the reputation he enjoyed, that when the physician Democedes took refuge at Crotona, he hastened to obtain a daughter of Milon in marriage, trusting to the effect that his name would produce even upon the Persian king. (Herod. iii. 137.) Many stories are related by ancient writers of his extraordinary feats of strength, which are for the most part well known; such as his carrying a heifer of four years old on his shoulders through the stadium at Olympia, and afterwards eating the whole of it in a single day. Some of the modes by which he displayed his gigantic powers before the assembled multitude appear to have been commemorated by the attitude of his statue at Olympia, at least if we may trust the account of it given by Philostratus; but Pausanias, while he relates the same anecdotes, does not give us to understand that the statue itself was so represented. (Paus. vi. 14. §§ 6, 7; Philostr. Vit. Apoll. iv. 28.)

The mode of his death is thus related: as he was passing through a forest when enfeebled by age, he saw the trunk of a tree which had been partially split open by woodcutters, and attempted to rend it further, but the wood closed upon his hands, and thus held him fast, in which state he was attacked and devoured by wolves. (Diod. xii. 9; Paus. vi. 14, § 5—8; Athen. x. p. 412; Aelian, V. H. ii. 24; Gell. xv. 16; Val. Max. ix. 12, ext. 9; Suid. s. v. Μίλων; Schol. ad Theocr. iv. 6; Schol. ad Aristoph. Ran. 55; Tzetz. Chil. ii. 460; Cic. de Sen. 10.)

The age of Milon is clearly fixed by the passages above cited from Diodorus and Herodotus: Aulus Gellius, who states that he was victor in the 50th Olympiad, is certainly in error.

2. A general in the service of Pyrrhus king of Epeirus, who sent him forward with a body of troops to garrison the citadel of Tarentum, previous to his own arrival in Italy. (Zonar. viii. 2.) He appears to have accompanied Pyrrhus throughout his campaigns in that country, and is mentioned as urging the king to continue the war after the battle of Heracleia in opposition to the pacific counsels of Cineas. When Pyrrhus went into Sicily, B. C. 278, he left Milon to hold the command in Italy during his absence; and when he finally quitted that country and withdrew into Epeirus, he still left him in charge of the citadel of Tarentum, together with his son Helenus. According to Justin, they were both recalled by Pyrrhus himself soon afterwards; but Zonaras states that he was hard pressed by the Tarentines themselves, assisted by a Carthaginian fleet, and was in consequence induced to surrender the citadel to the Romans, on condition of being allowed to withdraw his garrison in safety. (Zonar. viii. 4, 5, 6; Justin. xxv. 3.)

3. An Epeirot, who assassinated Deïdameia, the daughter of Pyrrhus II., at the altar of Diana, to which she had fled for refuge [DEIDAMEIA]. For this sacrilege he was punished by a fit of frenzy, and put an end to his own life in a miserable manner. (Justin. xxviii. 3.)

4. Of Beroea, an officer in the army of Perseus, with which he opposed the Roman consul P. Licinius Crassus B. C. 171. (Liv. xlii. 58.) He is again mentioned as holding an important command under Perseus just before the battle of Pydna, B. C. 166. After that action he fled, with his two colleagues, Hippias and Pantauchus, to Beroea, where they were the first to set the example of defection, by surrendering that fortress into the hands of Aemilius Paullus. (Liv. xliv. 32, 45; Plut. Aemil. 16.) [E. H. B.]

MILO'NIA CAESO'NIA. [CAESONIA.]

MILTAS (Μίλτας), a Thessalian soothsayer, who accompanied Dion on his expedition against Dionysius. He was also attached to the Platonic philosophy. (Plut. Dion, p. 967, c.; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iii. p. 179.) [C. P. M.]

MILTIADES (Μιλτιάδης), a name borne by at least three of the family of the Cimonidae. [See the stemma in the article CIMON.] The family sprang from Aegina, and traced their descent to Aeacus. In the genealogy of the family given in the life of Thucydides which bears the name of Marcellinus, mention is made of a Miltiades, son of Tisander; but it is very questionable whether even the text is correct. The two following are celebrated:—1. The son of Cypselus, who was a man of considerable distinction in Athens in the time of Peisistratus. The Doloncians, a Thracian tribe dwelling in the Chersonesus, being hard pressed in war by the Absinthians, applied to the Delphic oracle for advice, and were directed to admit a colony led by the man who should be the first to entertain them after they left the temple. This was Miltiades, who, eager to escape from the rule of Peisistratus, gladly took the lead of a colony under the sanction of the oracle, and became tyrant of the Chersonese, which he fortified by a wall built across its isthmus. In a war with the people of Lampsacus he was taken prisoner, but was set at liberty on the demand of Croesus. He died without leaving any children, and his sovereignty passed into the hands of Stesagoras, the son of his half-brother Cimon. Sacrifices and games were instituted in his honour, in which no Lampsacene was suffered to take part. (Herod. vi. 34, 38, 103, 36—38.) Both Cornelius Nepos (Milt. i. 1) and Pausanias (vi. 19. § 6) confound this Miltiades with the following.

2. The son of Cimon and brother of Stesagoras, became tyrant of the Chersonesus on the death of the latter, being sent out by Peisistratus from Athens to take possession of the vacant inheritance. By a stratagem he got the chief men of the Chersonesus into his power and threw them into prison, and took a force of mercenaries into his pay. In order probably to strengthen his position still more he married Hegesipyla, the daughter of a Thracian prince named Olorus. (Herod. vi. 39.) He joined Dareius Hystaspis on his expedition against the Scythians, and was left with the other Greeks in charge of the bridge over the Danube. (Herod. iv. 137.) That when the appointed time had expired and Dareius had not returned, Miltiades recommended the Greeks to destroy the bridge and leave Dareius to his fate, is the account repeated by every writer since Herodotus; but doubts have been raised respecting its truth which it is not easy to set aside. If true it could not have remained unknown to Dareius, and yet Miltiades was left in quiet possession of his principality for several years, though during that period a Persian force was engaged in military operations in his neighbourhood. Bishop Thirlwall (History of Greece, vol. ii. Appendix 2) is inclined to look upon the story as a fabrication which was invented and spread after Miltiades came to Athens for the purpose of counteracting the odium with which he was at first regarded as a tyrant. Some time after the expedition of Dareius an inroad of the Scythians drove Miltiades from his possessions; but after the enemy had retired the Doloncians brought him back. (Herod. vi. 40.) It appears to have been between this period and his withdrawal to Athens that Miltiades conquered and expelled the Pelasgian inhabitants of Lemnos and Imbros and subjected the islands to the dominion of Attica. (Herod. vi. 137, 140.) The story of the origin of the enmity between the Athenians and these Pelasgians, of the promise made by the offenders in accordance with the direction of the oracle to surrender their islands to the Athenians, and the mode in which they attempted to elude it by offering to surrender them when a fleet should sail to them from Attica in one day with a north wind, and of the way in which Miltiades, setting out from the Chersonesus, which was in some sort Attic ground, fulfilled the seemingly impossible condition, and demanded the surrender which he had the power to enforce from those who resisted, will be found in Herodotus. Lemnos and Imbros belonged to the Persian dominions (Herod. v. 26), and Thirlwall has suggested that this encroachment on the Persian possessions was probably the cause which drew upon Miltiades the hostility of Dareius, and led him to fly from the Chersonesus when the Phoenician fleet approached, after the subjugation of Ionia. Miltiades reached Athens in safety, but his eldest son Metiochus fell into the hands of the Persians. (Herodot. vi. 41.) At Athens Miltiades was arraigned, as being amenable to the penalties enacted against tyranny, but was acquitted. When Attica was threatened with invasion by the Persians under Datis and Artaphernes, Miltiades was chosen one of the ten generals. According to Pausanias (iii. 12. § 7), it was by his advice that the Persian heralds who had come to demand earth and water were put to death. When the Athenians advanced against the Persians, Miltiades by his arguments induced the polemarch Callimachus to give the casting vote in favour of risking a battle with the enemy, the opinions of the ten generals being equally divided. Miltiades waited till his turn came, and then drew his army up in battle array on the ever memorable field of Marathon. For an account of the battle and of the tactics by which the victory was secured the reader is again referred to Herodotus (vi. 104, 109, &c.). After the defeat of the Persians Miltiades endeavoured to urge the Athenians to measures of retaliation, and induced them to entrust to him an armament of seventy ships, without knowing the purpose for which they were designed. He proceeded to attack the island of Paros, for the purpose of gratifying a private enmity. His attacks, however, were unsuccessful; and after receiving a dangerous hurt in the leg while penetrating into a sacred enclosure on some superstitious errand, he was compelled to raise the siege and return to Athens, where he was impeached by Xanthippus for having deceived the people. His wound had turned into a gangrene, and being unable to plead his cause in person he was brought into court on a couch, his brother Tisagoras conducting his defence for him. He was condemned, but on the ground of his services to the state the penalty was commuted to a fine of fifty talents, the cost of the equipment of the armament. Being unable to pay this he was thrown into prison, where he not long after died of his wound. The fine was afterwards paid by his son Cimon. (Herod. vi. 132—136; Plut. Cimon, p. 480, d.) After his death a separate monument was erected to his memory on the field of Marathon. (Paus. i. 15. § 3.)

3. A grandson of the preceding, the son of Cimon, of the name of Miltiades, is mentioned in the scholia on Aristides (iii. p. 515, Dindorf), and by Aeschines (de Falsa Leg. p. 301, ed. Steph.), who speaks of him as having gone as herald to the Lacedaemonians before the conclusion of the fifty years' truce. [C. P. M.]

MIMALLON (Μιμαλλών, or Μιμαλών), the Macedonian name of the Bacchantes, or, according to others, of Bacchic Amazons (Strab. x. p. 468; Plut. Alex. 2; Lycoph. 1464). The name is commonly connected with the verb μιμεῖσθαι, to imitate, because on one occasion, it is said, the Macedonians while at war with the Illyrian king Calander, added the Bacchantes to their army, in order to make it appear more numerous (Schol. ad Pers. Sat. i. 99); but the etymology is uncertain. Ovid (Ars Am. i. 541) uses the form Mimallonides for Mimallones. [L. S.]

MIMAS (Μίμας). 1. A Centaur. (Hes. Scut. Herc. 186.)

2. A giant who is said to have been killed by Ares, or by Zeus with a flash of lightning (Apollon. Rhod. iii. 1227; Eurip. Ion, 215). The island of Prochyte, near Sicily, was believed to rest upon his body. (Sil. Ital. xii. 147.)

3. A son of Aeolus, king of Aeolis, and father of Hippotes. (Diod. iv. 67.)

4. A son of Amycus and Theano, was born in the same night as Paris. He was a companion of Aeneas, and slain by Mezentius. (Virg. Aen. x. 702, &c.)

5. A Bebryx, who was slain by Castor during the expedition of the Argonauts. (Apollon. Rhod. ii. 105.) [L. S.]

MIMNERMUS (Μίμνερμος), a celebrated elegiac poet. There were various accounts as to his birthplace. Some authorities spoke of Colophon, others of Smyrna, others of Astypalaea (it is not specified which of the places of that name) as his native city. (Suidas, s. v. Μίμερμος.) He was generally called a Colophonian (Strab. xiv. p. 643); but from a fragment of his poem entitled Nanno it appears that he was descended from those Colophonians who reconquered Smyrna from the Aeolians (Strab. xiv. p. 634), and that, strictly speaking, Smyrna was his birthplace. Mimnermus flourished from about B. C. 634 to the age of the seven sages (about B. C. 600). He was a contemporary of Solon, who, in an extant fragment of one of his poems, addresses him as still living (Diog. Laërt. i. 60; Bergk, Poetae Lyrici Graeci, p. 331). No other biographical particulars respecting him have come down to us, except what is mentioned in a fragment of Hermesianax (Athen. xiii. p. 597) of his love for a flute-player named Nanno, who does not seem to have returned his affection.

The numerous compositions of Mimnermus (Suidas, who calls him Μίμερμνος, says ἔγραψε βιβλία πολλά) were preserved for several centuries, comprised in two books, until they were burnt, together with most of the other monuments of the erotic poetry of the Greeks, by the Byzantine monks. A few fragments only have come down to us; sufficient, however, when compared with the notices contained in ancient writers, to enable us to form a tolerably accurate judgment of the nature of his poetry. These fragments belong chiefly to a poem entitled Nanno, and addressed to the flute-player of that name. The compositions of Mimnermus form an epoch in the history of elegiac poetry. Before his time the elegy had been devoted chiefly either to warlike and national, or to convivial and joyous subjects. Archilochus had, indeed, occasionally employed the elegy for strains of lamentation, but Mimnermus was the first who systematically made it the vehicle for plaintive, mournful, and erotic strains. The threnetic origin of the elegy, the national temperament and social condition of the Asiatic Ionians, and the melancholy feelings with which they must have regarded their subjection to the Lydians, rendered this change easy and natural; and the elegiac poems of Mimnermus may be looked upon as a correct exponent of the general tone of feeling which marked his age and people. Though warlike themes were not altogether unnoticed by him (the war between Gyges and the Smyrnaeans was one topic of this kind which he dwelt upon), he seems to have spoken of valorous deeds more in a tone of regret, as things that had been, than with any view of rousing his countrymen to emulate them. The instability of human happiness, the helplessness of man, the cares and miseries to which life is exposed, the brief season that man has to enjoy himself in, the wretchedness of old age, are plaintively dwelt upon by him, while love is held up as the only consolation that men possess, life not being worth having when it can no longer be enjoyed. The latter topic was most frequently dwelt upon, and as an erotic poet he was held in high estimation in antiquity. (Hor. Epist. ii. 2. 100; Propert. i. 9. 11.) From the general character of his poetry he received the name Λιγυστιάδης or Λιγυαστάδης. He was a flute-player as well as a poet (Strab. iv. p. 643; Hermesianax, ap. Athen. l. c.), and, in setting his poems to music, made use of the plaintive melody called the Nomos Kradias. Since the character which Mimnermus gave to elegiac poetry remained ever after its predominant characteristic, he is sometimes erroneously spoken of as the inventor of the elegy. The passage of Hermesianax, where he says of Mimnermus, ὃς εὕρετο πολλὸν ἀνατλὰς Ἦχον καὶ μαλακοῦ πνεῦμ' ἀπὸ πενταμέτρου, which has frequently been understood as conveying the same assertion, has been more correctly interpreted, by throwing greater stress on the word μαλακοῦ, as referring to the change which Mimnermus made in the character of elegiac poetry. (Comp. Propert. i. 9. 11.) Mimnermus is the oldest poet who mentioned an eclipse of the sun, and spoke of it as a threatening and mournful sign. (Plut. De Facie in Orbe Lunae, p. 931, e.) He is also the earliest authority that we have for the mythus that the sun, after setting in the west, is carried round the earth in a golden bowl, the work of Hephaestus, by the river Oceanus back again to the east. (Athen. xi. p. 470, a.) In his account of the voyage of Jason, also, he removed the dwelling of Aeëtes to the shores of Oceanus.

The fragments of Mimnermus have been several times published, in the collections of Stephens, Brunck, Gaisford, Boissonade, and Bergk. There is a separate edition by Bach, Lips. 1826. They have been translated by Stollberg, Herder, Seckendorf, A. W. v. Schlegel, and others. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. i. p. 733; K. O. Müller, History of the Literature of Ancient Greece, p. 115, &c.; Bode, Gesch. der Hellen. Dichtkunst, vol. ii. pp. 173, 175, 247, &c.) [C. P. M.]

MINA'TIA GENS, plebeian, and of very little note. On coins we find mention of an M. Minatius Sabinus, who was a legate under Cn. Pompey, the younger, in Spain (Eckhel, vol. v. p. 253), and one of the ancestors of Velleius Paterculus was called Minatius Magius. [MAGIUS, No. 3.]

MI'NDARUS (Μίνδαρος), a Lacedaemonian, was sent out in B. C. 411, to succeed Astyochus in the office of Admiral. In the same year, having reason to believe that the Phoenician ships, promised by Tissaphernes, would never be forthcoming, he listened to the invitation of Pharnabazus, and sailed from Miletus to the territory of the latter satrap on the Hellespont, having managed to escape the notice of the Athenian fleet, which was aware of his intention and had removed from Samos to Lesbos with the view of preventing its execution. At Sestos he surprised the Athenian squadron there, which escaped with difficulty and with the loss of four ships. The Athenians, however, under Thrasyllus and Thrasybulus followed him to the north from Lesbos, and defeated him in the Hellespont, off Cynossema. After the battle, Mindarus sent to Euboea to Hegesandridas for reinforcements, and in the meantime we find him furnishing aid to the Aeolians of Antandrus in their insurrection against the garrison of Tissaphernes in their town. Soon after we hear of him offering sacrifices to Athena, at Ilium, whence he hastened to the aid of DORIEUS, who had been engaged with a superior number of Athenian ships. A battle ensued and continued doubtful, till the arrival of reinforcements under Alcibiades gave the victory to the Athenians. But the latter, having despatched a large portion of their fleet to different quarters to collect money, were left in the Hellespont with a force of no more than forty ships, and Mindarus, whose squadron now amounted to sixty, prepared to attack them; but they moved away by night from Sestos to Cardia, where they were joined by Alcibiades with five galleys, and soon after by Thrasybulus and Theramenes, each with twenty. With this force they sailed to Cyzicus (whither the Peloponnesians had removed from Abydus), and there surprised them. The latter, however, having drawn up their ships close together near the shore, made a vigorous resistance: but Alcibiades sailed round with twenty triremes to a different part of the coast, and attacked them from the land in the rear. Mindarus hereupon disembarked to meet him, but was slain in the battle, and the Athenians gained a complete victory, B.C. 410. (Thuc. viii. 85, 99—105, 107, 108; Xen. Hell. i. 1. §§ 1, 3—5, 8—18; Plut. Alc. 27, 28; Diod. xiii. 39, 45, 49—51.) [HIPPOCRATES. No. 6.] [E.E.]

MI'NDIUS MARCELLUS. [MARCELLUS.]

MINERVA, one of the great Roman divinities, whose name seems to be of the same root as mens, whence monere and promenervare (Fest. p. 205, ed. Müller). She is accordingly the thinking, calculating, and inventive power personified. Varro (ap. Aug. de Civ. Dei, vii. 28) therefore considered her as the impersonation of all ideas, or as the plan of the universe, while Jupiter, according to him, is the creator, and Juno the representative of matter. Minerva was the third in the number of the Capitoline divinities, and sometimes is said to have wielded the thunderbolts of Jupiter, her father. Tarquin, the son of Demaratus, was believed to have united the three divinities in one common temple, and hence, when repasts were prepared for the gods, these three always went together (August. de Civ. Dei, iv. 10; Val. Max. ii. 1. § 2). As Minerva was a virgin divinity, and her father the supreme god, the Romans easily identified her with the Greek Athena, and accordingly all the attributes of Athena were gradually transferred to the Roman Minerva. But we shall here confine ourselves to those which were peculiar to the Roman goddess, as far as they can be ascertained.

As she was a maiden goddess her sacrifices consisted of calves which had not borne the yoke or felt the sting (Fulgentius, p. 561, ed. Merc.; Arnob. iv. 16, vii. 22). She is said to have invented numbers, and it is added that the law respecting the driving in of the annual nail was for this reason attached to the temple of Minerva (Liv. vii. 3); but it is generally well attested that she was worshipped as the patroness of all the arts and trades, for at her festival she was particularly invoked by all those who desired to distinguish themselves in any art or craft, such as painting, poetry, the art of teaching, medicine, dyeing, spinning, weaving, and the like. (Ov. Fast. iii. 809, &c.; August. l. c. vii. 16.)

This character of the goddess may be perceived also from the proverbs "to do a thing pingui Minerva," i. e. to do a thing in an awkward or clumsy manner; and sus Minervam, of a stupid person who presumed to set right an intelligent one. Minerva, however, was the patroness, not only of females, on whom she conferred skill in sewing, spinning, weaving, &c., but she also guided men in the dangers of war, where victory is gained by cunning, prudence, courage, and perseverance. Hence she was represented with a helmet, shield, and a coat of mail; and the booty made in war was frequently dedicated to her. (Liv. xlv. 33; Virg. Aen. ii. 615.) Minerva was further believed to be the inventor of musical instruments, especially wind instruments, the use of which was very important in religious worship, and which were accordingly subjected to a sort of purification every year on the last day of the festival of Minerva. This festival lasted five days, from the 19th to the 23d of March, and was called Quinquatrus, because it began on the fifth day after the ides of the month. (Fest. pp. 149, 257, ed. Müller; Varro, De L. L. vi. 14; Ov. Fast. iii. 849.) This number of days does not seem to have been accidental, for Servius (ad Virg. Georg. i. 277) informs us that the number 5 was sacred to Minerva. (See Dict. of Ant. s. v. Quinquatrus.) The most ancient temple of Minerva at Rome was probably that on the Capitol; another existed on the Aventine (P. Vict. Reg. Urb. viii.; Ov. Fast. vi. 728); and she had a chapel at the foot of the Caelian hill, where she bore the surname of Capta. (Ov. Fast. iii. 337.) She also had the surname of Nautia, which was believed to have originated in the following manner. Diomedes had carried the Palladium from Troy; and as he found that it availed him nothing in his misfortunes, and as the oracle commanded him to restore it to the Trojans, he wanted to deliver it up to Aeneas on his wanderings through Calabria. When he came to the Trojans, he found Aeneas engaged in offering up a sacrifice, and Nautes received the Palladium instead of Aeneas. The goddess (Minerva) bestowed many favours upon him, instructed him in various arts, and chose him for her servant. The family of the Nautii afterwards retained the exclusive knowledge of the manner in which Minerva Nautia was to be worshipped. Her mysterious image was preserved in the most secret part of the temple of Vesta, and regarded as one of the safeguards of the state. (Dionys. i. 69; Virg. Aen. v. 704; Serv. ad Aen. ii. 166, iii. 407; Lucan. i. 598; comp. Hartung, Die Relig. der Römer, vol. ii. p. 78, &c.) [L. S.]

MINERVI'NA, the mother of CRISPUS CAESAR, is usually termed by historians the first wife of Constantine the Great. However, Victor (Epit. 41) and Zosimus (ii. 20), both of whom mention her name, state expressly that she was his concubine, and their account is confirmed by Zonaras (xiii. 2). To this direct testimony we can oppose nothing, except the improbability that Constantine should have marked out an illegitimate son as his successor. (Tillemont, Hist. des Empereurs, vol. iv. art. iv. p. 84, and Notes sur Constantin, note v.). [W. R.]

MINI'CIA GENS, came originally from Brixia (Brescia), in Cisalpine Gaul. Brixia was a Roman colony, but in what year it became one is unknown. (Plin. H. N. iii. 19.) The Minicii occur only under the empire. There was a C. Minicius Fundanus, one of the consules suffecti in A. D. 51; and another C. Minicius, also one of the consules suffecti in A. D. 103. For this gens see Labus, Epigrapha nuovamente uscita dalle escavazioni Bresciana, Milan, 1830. [W. B. D.]

MINI'DIUS, L., was a Roman merchant or banker, established at Elis in B. C. 46, with whose heirs Cicero had some pecuniary transactions. He was brother of L. Mescinius Rufus, quaestor in Achaia [RUFUS], and married an Oppia. (Cic. ad Fam. xiii. 26, 28.) [W. B. D.]

MINI'DIUS or MI'NDIUS, M., brother and heir of L. Minidius, and also a Roman merchant. Cicero was engaged in a law-suit with him. (Cic. ad Fam. v. 20, xiii. 26.) [W. B. D.]

MI'NIO. 1. Was the confidential friend and counsellor of Antiochus the Great, and his representative at the conference with the Roman envoys at Ephesus in B. C. 193. Minio commanded a portion of Antiochus' centre at the battle of Magnesia in B. C. 190. (Liv. xxxv. 15, 16, xxxvii. 40, 42.)

2. Q. MYNNIO (Μυννίων), was a native of Smyrna, who, conspiring against Mithridates VI.

king of Pontus, in B. C. 86, was betrayed by one of his confederates, and put to death. (Appian, Mithr. 48.) [W. B. D.]

MI'NIUS CERRI'NIUS, a Campanian, the son of Minia Paculla, was appointed by her one of the two hierophants of the Bacchanalia at Rome in B. C. 186. On the discovery of these orgies [HISPALA FECENIA, HERENNIUS CERRINIUS], Minius was arrested; and, having confessed before the senate the impure and atrocious character of the rites over which he presided, was placed in close custody at Ardea. His final sentence is unknown. (Liv. xxxix. 13, 17, 19.) [W. B. D.]

MINOS (Μίνως). 1. The son of Zeus and Europa, brother of Rhadamanthus, and king of Crete, where he is said to have given many and useful laws. After his death he became one of the judges of the shades in Hades. (Hom. Il. xiii. 450, xiv. 322, Od. xi. 321, 567, xvii. 523, xix. 178; comp. MILETUS.) He was the father of Deucalion and Ariadne; and, according to Apollodorus (iii. 1. § 1, &c.), Sarpedon also was a brother of his. Diodorus (iv. 60; comp. Strab. x. p. 476, &c.) relates the following story about him. Tectamus, a son of Dorus, and a great-grandson of Deucalion, came to Crete with an Aeolian and Pelasgian colony; and as king of the island, he became the father of Asterius, by a daughter of Cretheus. In the reign of Asterius, Zeus came to Crete with Europa, and became by her the father of Minos, Sarpedon and Rhadamanthus. Asterius afterwards married Europa; and having no issue by her, he adopted her three sons. Thus Minos succeeded Asterius, and married Itone, daughter of Lyctius, by whom he had a son, Lycastus. The latter became, by Ida, the daughter of Corybas, the father of another Minos, whom, however, some also called a son of Zeus. It should be observed, that Homer and Hesiod know only of one Minos, the ruler of Cnossus, and the son and friend of Zeus; and of this one they on the whole relate the same things, which later traditions assign to a second Minos, the grandson of the former; for here, as in many other mythical traditions of Greece and other countries, a rationalistic criticism attempted to solve contradictions and difficulties in the stories about a person, by the assumption that the contradictory accounts must refer to two different personages.

2. A grandson of No. 1, and a son of Lycastus and Ida, was likewise a king and law-giver of Crete. He is described as possessed of a powerful navy, as the husband of Pasiphaë, a daughter of Helios, and as the father of Catreus, Deucalion, Glaucus, Androgeus, Acalle, Xenodice, Ariadne, and Phaedra. (Apollod. ii. 1. § 3.) He is said to have been killed in Sicily by king Cocalus, when he had gone thither in pursuit of Daedalus. (Herod. vii. 170; Strab. vi. pp. 273, 279; Paus. vii. 4. § 5.) But the scholiast on Callimachus (Hymn. in Jov. 8) speaks of his tomb in Crete. The detail of his history is related as follows. After the death of Asterius, Minos aimed at the supremacy of Crete, and declared that it was destined to him by the gods; in proof of it, he said that any thing he prayed for was done. Accordingly, as he was offering up a sacrifice to Poseidon, he prayed that a bull might come forth from the sea, and promised to sacrifice the animal. The bull appeared, and Minos became king of Crete. Others say that Minos disputed the government with his brother, Sarpedon, and conquered. (Herod. i. 173.) But Minos, who admired the beauty of the bull, did not sacrifice him, and substituted another in his place. Poseidon therefore rendered the bull furious, and made Pasiphaë conceive a love for the animal. Pasiphaë concealed herself in an artificial cow made by Daedalus, and thus she became by the bull the mother of the Minotaurus, a monster which had the body of a man, but the head of a bull. Minos shut the monster up in the labyrinth. (Apollod. iii. 1. § 3, &c.; comp. DAEDALUS.) Minos is further said to have divided Crete into three parts, each of which contained a capital, and to have ruled nine years. (Hom. Od. xix. 178; Strab. x. pp. 476, 479.) The Cretans traced their legal and political institutions to Minos, and he is said to have been instructed in the art of law-giving by Zeus himself; and the Spartan, Lycurgus, was believed to have taken the legislation of Minos as his model. (Paus. iii. 4. § 2; comp. Plat. Min. p. 319, b.; Plut. De ser. Num. Vind. 4; Val. Max. i. 2. § 1; Athen. xiii. p. 601.) In his time Crete was a powerful maritime state; and Minos not only checked the piratical pursuits of his contemporaries, but made himself master of the Greek islands of the Aegean. (Thuc. i. 4; Strab. i. p. 48; Diod. l. c.) The most ancient legends describe Minos as a just and wise law-giver, whereas the later accounts represent him as an unjust and cruel tyrant. (Philostr. Vit. Apoll. iii. 25; Catull. Epithal. Pel. 75; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1699.) In order to avenge the wrong done to his son Androgeus [ANDROGEUS] at Athens, he made war against the Athenians and Megarians. He subdued Megara, and compelled the Athenians, either every year or every nine years, to send him as a tribute seven youths and seven maidens, who were devoured in the labyrinth by the Minotaurus. (Apollod. iii. 15. § 8; Paus. i. 27. § 9, 44. § 5; Plut. Thes. 15; Diod. iv. 61; Ov. Met. vii. 456, &c.; comp. ANDROGEUS, THESEUS.) [L. S.]

MINOTAURUS (Μινώταυρος), a monster with a human body and a bull's head, or, according to others, with the body of an ox and a human head; is said to have been the offspring of the intercourse of Pasiphaë with the bull sent from the sea to Minos, who shut him up in the Cnossian labyrinth, and fed him with the bodies of the youths and maidens whom the Athenians at fixed times were obliged to send to Minos as tribute. The monster was slain by Theseus. It was often represented by ancient artists either alone in the labyrinth, or engaged in the struggle with Theseus. (Paus. i. 24. § 2, 27, in fin. iii. 18. § 7; Apollod. iii. 1. § 4, 15. § 8.) [L. S.]

MINTA'NOR, the author of a lost treatise on music. (Fulgent. Mythol. i. 1; Schol. ad Stat. Theb. iii. 661.) [C. P. M.]

MINTHA or MENTHA (Μίνθη), a Cocythian nymph, and beloved by Hades, was metamorphosed by Demeter or Persephone into a plant called after her μίνθη, or mint, or, according to others, she was changed into dust, from which Hades caused the mint plant to grow forth. In the neighbourhood of Pylos there was a hill called after her, and at its foot there was a temple of Pluto, and a grove of Demeter. (Strab. viii. p. 344; Ov. Met. x. 729; Oppian, Hal. iii. 486; Schol. ad Nicand. Alex. 374.) [L. S.]

MINU'CIA, one of the Vestal priestesses in B. C. 337. Her passion for gay attire made her conduct suspected. On inquiry, suspicion was justified, and Minucia was buried alive. (Liv. viii. 15.) [W. B. D.]

MINU'CIA GENS was originally, in some of its branches at least, patrician [AUGURINUS]; but more frequently occurs in history as a plebeian house. Its principal cognomens were AUGURINUS, BASILUS, RUFUS, and THERMUS. Minicius and Municius are frequently confounded with Minucius. The following coin of the Minucia gens bears on the obverse the head of Pallas, and on the reverse Jupiter in a chariot hurling a thunder-bolt, with the legend L. Minucius. Who this L. Minucius was is unknown. [W. B. D.]

COIN OF MINUCIA GENS.

MINUCIA'NUS (Μινουκιανός). 1. A Greek rhetorician, was a contemporary of the celebrated rhetorician Hermogenes of Tarsus (fl. A. D. 170), with whom he was at variance. This we learn from the Scholiast on Hermogenes, and thus the difficulty which Fabricius experienced (Bibl. Graec. vol. vi. p. 107), is removed, as it is evident that this Minucianus was a different person from the one following. (Schol. ad Hermog. pp. 26, 48, 49, 71, 77, 99, 177, 179, 180, 181, 200, 287; comp. Schol. ad Aphthon. p. 226, Spengel; Westermann, Geschichte der Griech. Beredtsamkeit, § 95, n. 10.)

2. An Athenian, the son of Nicagoras, was also a Greek rhetorician, and lived in the reign of Gallienus (A. D. 260—268). Suidas (s. v.) tells us that Minucianus was the author of Τέχνη ῥητορική, Προγυμνάσματα, and Λογοί διάφοροι. The Τεχνή was commented on by the sophist Pancratius (Suidas, s. v. Παγκρ.; Eudoc. p. 301), and is also referred to by Tzetzes (Chil. iv. 693, vi. 739, xii. 570), but, as Westermann suggests, it may have been written by the elder Minucianus [No. 1]. A portion of this work, entitled Περὶ ἐπιχειρημάτων, is extant, and bears the title Μινουκιανοῦ ἢ Νικαγόρου. It was published along with Alexander Numenius and Phoebammon, accompanied with a Latin version, by L. Normann, Upsal. 1690, 8vo., and is also printed in the Aldine collection of Greek rhetoricians, pp. 731—734, and in the ninth volume of Walz's Rhetores Graeci. The work of Minucianus, entitled Προγυμνάσματα, was commented on by Menander of Laodiceia (Suidas, s. v. Μενανδ.). The eloquence of Minucianus is praised by Himerius. (Ecl. vii. p. 166, Or. xxiii. p. 802, ed. Wernsdorf.; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vi. pp. 107, 108; Westermann, Ibid, § 98, n. 15.)

MINUCIA'NUS, CORNE'LIUS, a friend and neighbour of the younger Pliny, who calls him "ornamentum regionis meae, seu dignitate, seu moribus," and speaks of him in other very laudatory terms in a letter addressed to Falco, in which he requests the latter to confer the rank of military tribune upon Minucianus (Ep. vii. 22). Three of Pliny's letters (iii. 9, iv. 11, viii. 12) are addressed to this Minucianus.

MINU'CIUS. 1. M. MINUCIUS, tribune of the plebs in B. C. 401, when he impeached two of the consular tribunes of the preceding year for misconduct in the war with Veii. (Liv. v. 11, 12.)

2. M. MINUCIUS FESSUS, one of the first augurs elected from the plebs after the extension of the law de Sacerdotiis in B. C. 300, by the tribunes Q. and Cn. Ogulnius. (Liv. x. 9.)

3. Q. MINUCIUS, was legatus to the consul, M. Claudius Marcellus, during the siege of Capua, B. C. 210. (Liv. xxvi. 33.)

4. P. and Q. MINUCII, legionary tribunes in the war of Rome with the Boian Gauls in B. C. 193. (Liv. xxxv. 5.)

5. L. MINUCIUS, legatus of the praetor Q. Fulvius Flaccus in the nearer Spain, B. C. 180. His evidence as to the state of the province when examined by the senate differed from the account given by the praetor. (Liv. xl. 35, 36.)

6. TIB. MINUCIUS, praetor peregrinus in B. C. 180, died early in his official year. (Liv. xl. 35, 37.)

7. — MINUCIUS, died intestate before the city-praetorship of C. Verres, in B. C. 75—74. His property therefore belonged to his gens; but Verres issued a special edict regarding it, which Cicero held up to ridicule (in Verr. i. 45. § 115).

8. CN. MINUCIUS, a person about whose political opinions Cicero wrote to Cornificius in B. C. 43 (ad Fam. xii. 25). [W. B. D.]

MINU'CIUS FELIX. [FELIX.]

MINU'CIUS NATA'LIS. [NATALIS.]

MINU'CIUS PACA'TUS. [IRENAEUS, No. 3.]

MI'NYAE (Μινύαι), an ancient race of heroes at Orchomenos, Iolcos, and other places. Their ancestral hero, Minyas, is said to have migrated from Thessaly into the northern parts of Boeotia, and there to have established the powerful race of the Minyans, with the capital of Orchomenos. As the greater part of the Argonauts were descended from the Minyans, they are themselves called Minyae; and the descendants of the Argonauts founded a colony in Lemnos, which was called Minyae. Thence they proceeded to Elis Triphylia, and to the island of Thera. (Herod. i. 146, iv. 145; Pind. Ol. xiv. 4, Pyth. iv. 69; Apollon. Rhod. i. 229; Strab. ix. pp. 404, 414, viii. pp. 337, 347; Paus. vii. 2. § 2, ix. 36; comp. Müller, Orchom. u. die Minyer.) [L. S.]

MI'NYAS (Μινύας), a son of Chryses, and the ancestral hero of the race of the Minyans; but the accounts of his genealogy vary very much in the different traditions, for some call him a son of Orchomenus or Eteocles, others of Poseidon, Aleus, Ares, Sisyphus, or Halmus. He is further called the husband of Tritogeneia, Clytodora, or Phanosyra. Orchomenus, Presbon, Athamas, Diochthondas, Eteoclymene, Periclymene, Leucippe, Arsinoë, and Alcithoë, are mentioned as his children. (Paus. ix. 36. § 3, &c., 38. § 2; Schol. ad Apollon Rhod. i. 230, ad Pind. Ol. xiv. 5, Pyth. iv. 120; Tzetz. ad Lyc. 875.) He is said to have built the first treasury, of which ruins are said to be still extant. (Paus. ix. 38. § 2.) His tomb was shown at Orchomenos in Boeotia (ix. 38. § 3). [L. S.]

MISA (Μίσα), a mystic being in the Orphic mysteries, perhaps the same as Cybele, or an attribute of her. (Orph. Hymn. 41; Hesych. s. v. Μισατίς.) [L. S.]

MISA'GENES, a Numidian, son of Masinissa, was appointed by his father to command the forces which he sent to the assistance of the Romans in the war against Perseus, B. C. 171. He appears to have continued in this position throughout the four years of the war, and to have rendered important services to his allies. After the close of the war (B. C. 168) he was sent back by Aemilius Paullus to Africa; but the ships in which his troops were embarked were dispersed by a storm, many of them wrecked, and he himself compelled to take refuge at Brundusium. Here he was received with the utmost distinction, the quaestor, L. Stertinius, being immediately despatched by the senate to bear him magnificent presents, and to provide both him and his troops with all that they required. (Liv. xlii. 29, 35, xlv. 14; Val. Max. v. 1. § 1, who writes the name Musicanes.) He probably died before his father, as we hear nothing of him after the death of Masinissa. [E. H. B.]

MISE'NUS (Μισηνός). 1. A companion of Odysseus. (Strab. i. p. 26, v. p. 245.)

2. A steersman of Aeneas (Vict. De Orig. Gent. Rom. 9), and, according to Virgil, at first a companion of Hector, and afterwards trumpeter of Aeneas; he died at Cumae, where Cape Misenum derived its name from him. (Virg. Aen. vi. 162, &c. 235.) His being called Aeolides arose from the legendary connection between the Aeolian and Campanian Cumae. [L. S.]

MISITHEUS, called TIMESICLES (Τιμησικλῆς) by Zosimus (i. 16, 17), apparently a Greek, by extraction at least, was distinguished for learning, eloquence, and virtue, and his daughter Sabinia Tranquillina became the wife of the third Gordian. That amiable prince appointed his father-in-law praefect of the praetorians, and acting in obedience to his wise counsels, effected many important reforms in the royal household, more especially by discarding the eunuchs, who, since the days of Elagabalus, had exercised most foul and corrupt influence in the palace, being notoriously in the habit of disposing of all the highest appointments, both civil and military, to the best bidder. The admirable arrangements for the support of the imperial troops on the exposed frontiers, the judicious regulations introduced with regard to various details in the service, and the success which attended the operations in the East against Sapor, until Misitheus was cut off by disease, or by the treachery of his successor Philippus, seem to indicate that he must have been trained as a soldier and accustomed to important commands, but we know nothing positively of his early history. Even his name, as it stands repeatedly in Capitolinus, is a matter of doubt, for scholars have, not without reason, hesitated to believe that such an ill-omened appellation (God-hater) could ever have been borne by any individual of eminence, in an age when superstition upon such points was so strong. The inscription (Gruter, ccccxxxix. 4) quoted to uphold the text of the Augustan historian, but which seems in reality to have been copied from his pages, is open to strong suspicion, in addition to which Zosimus, as we have marked above, twice terms this personage Τιμησικλῆς. Among various conjectures, the substitution of Timesitheus, a name found both in Herodotus and Xenophon, and, under its Doric form, Timasitheus, in Livy and Valerius Maximus, seems to be the most probable. (Capitolin. Gordian. Tres, 23, &c.; GORDIANUS III.; PHILIPPUS I.) [W. R.]

MITHAECUS (Μίθαικος), the author of some treatises on cookery, quoted by Athenaeus (vii. p. 325, xii. p. 516, iii. p. 112), entitled Ὀψαρτυτικός and Ὀψοποιία Σικελική. The latter is also referred to by Plato (Gorg. p. 518, b.). [C. P. M.]

MITHRAS (Μίθρας), the god of the sun among the Persians. (Xenoph. Cyrop. vii. 5. § 53; Strab. xv. p. 732.) About the time of the Roman emperors his worship was introduced at Rome, and thence spread over all parts of the empire. The god is commonly represented as a handsome youth, wearing the Phrygian cap and attire, and kneeling on a bull which is thrown on the ground, and whose throat he is cutting. The bull is at the same time attacked by a dog, a serpent, and a scorpion. This group appears frequently among ancient works of art, and a fine specimen is preserved in the British Museum. [L. S.]

MITHRE'NES (Μιθρήνης) or MITHRI'NES (Μιθρίνης), commander of the Persian force which garrisoned the citadel of Sardes. After the battle of the Granicus (B. C. 334) Mithrines surrendered voluntarily to Alexander, and was treated by him with great distinction. After the battle of Gaugamela (B. C. 331) Alexander appointed him satrap of Armenia. (Arrian, i. 17, iii. 16.) [C. P. M.]

MITHRIDA'TES or MITHRADA'TES (Μιθριδάτης or Μιθραδάτης), a common name among the Medes and Persians, appears to have been derived from Mitra or Mithra, the Persian name for the sun, and the root da, signifying "to give," which occurs in most of the Indo-Germanic languages. It therefore signifies "given by the sun," and corresponds to a large class of names in different languages of the Indo-Germanic family. Thus in Sanskrit we find the names, Devadatta, Haradatta, Indradatta, Somadatta, &c. (i. e. given by the gods, by Hara or Siva, by Indra, by Soma or the moon, &c.); in Greek, the names Theodotus, Diodotus, Zenodotus, Herodotus, &c.; and in Persian, the names, Hormisdates, "given by Ormuzd," Pherendates, "given by Behram," &c.

The name of Mithridates is written in several ways. Mithridates is the form usually found in the Greek historians; but on coins, and sometimes in writers, we find Mithradates, which is probably the more correct form. We also meet with Mitradates (Μιτραδάτης, Herod. i. 110), and in Tacitus (Ann. xii. 10) a corrupted form Meherdates. (Pott, Etymologische Forschungen, vol. i. p. xlvii. &c.; Rosen, in Journal of Education, vol. ix. pp. 334, 335.)

MITHRIDA'TES (Μιθριδάτης). 1. An eunuch who was one of the personal attendants of Xerxes, and enjoyed a high place in the favour of that monarch, but joined with Artabanus in the conspiracy to assassinate him (B. C. 465), and enabled the latter to effect his purpose by giving him admission into the king's bedroom. (Diod. xi. 69.)

2. A Persian of high rank, who accompanied the younger Cyrus on his expedition against Artaxerxes. He is termed by Xenophon one of the most attached friends of that prince; but after the death of Cyrus he went over together with Ariaeus, to the Persian king. He was one of those who presented themselves to the Greeks after the arrest and death of their generals, and endeavoured to prevail on them to surrender their arms. He again made his appearance just as they were preparing to set out on their march, and held a private conference with their leaders, but failed in the attempt to induce them to abandon their project. The next day he consequently attacked them on their march and caused them some loss; but was repulsed in a subsequent attack, and from this time suffered them to proceed unmolested. (Xen. Anab. ii. 5. § 35, iii. 3. §§ 1—10, 4. §§ 1—5).

3. Satrap of Lycaonia and Cappadocia at the time of the expedition of the younger Cyrus (Xen. Anab. vii. 8. § 25). This may perhaps be the same person with the preceding, whom Eckhel also conceives to be the same as is commonly termed Mithridates I., king of Pontus.

4. A son of Antiochus the Great, who is mentioned by Livy as one of the commanders of his father's land forces during the war with Ptolemy, B. C. 197. (Liv. xxxiii. 19.)

5. A Persian of high rank, and son-in-law of Dareius Codomannus, who was slain by Alexander with his own hand, at the battle of the Granicus, B. C. 334. (Arrian, Anab. i. 15. § 10, 16. § 5.)

6. A nephew of Antiochus the Great, being a son of one of his sisters. (Polyb. viii. 25.)

7. A son of Ariarathes IV., king of Cappadocia, who succeeded his father on the throne, and assumed the name of Ariarathes V. [E. H. B.]

MITHRIDA'TES, king of ARMENIA. [ARSACIDAE, Vol. I. p. 362, b.]

COIN OF MITHRIDATES, KING OF ARMENIA.

MITHRIDA'TES, king of the BOSPORUS, which sovereignty he obtained by the favour of the emperor Claudius, who appointed him to replace Polemon II., A. D. 41. (Dion Cass. lx. 8.) He was a descendant of the great Mithridates, but we have no account of his more immediate parentage. Nor do we know any thing of the circumstances which led to his subsequent expulsion by the Romans, who placed his younger brother Cotys on the throne in his stead; for these events were related by Tacitus in one of the books of the Annals now lost. But Mithridates, though a fugitive from his kingdom, did not abandon all hope: he collected a body of irregular troops, with which he expelled the king of the Dandarians; and, as soon as the main body of the Roman troops were withdrawn from the Bosporus, he prepared to invade that kingdom. He was however defeated by the Roman lieutenant Julius Aquila, supported by Eunones, king of the Scythian tribe of the Adorsi, and ultimately compelled to surrender to Eunones, by whom he was given up to the Romans, but with a promise that his life should be spared. (Tac. Ann. xii. 15—21; Plin. vi. 5.) [E. H. B.]

MITHRIDA'TES, kings of COMMAGENE. There were two kings of Commagene of this name, of whom very little is known. The first (Mithridates I.) must have succeeded Antiochus I. on the throne of that petty kingdom at some time previous to B. C. 31, as he is mentioned by Plutarch in that year among the allies of Antony. (Plut. Ant. 61.)

Mithridates II. was made king of Commagene by Augustus, B. C. 20, when a mere boy. Dion Cassius tells us that his father had been put to death by the previous king: hence it seems probable that he was a son of the preceding. (Dion Cass. liv. 9. See, however, Clinton, F. H. vol. iii. p. 343, not. h, who has brought together the few facts that are known concerning these kings of Commagene.) [E. H. B.]

MITHRIDA'TES, king of MEDIA (by which we are probably to understand Media Atropatene), was the son-in-law of Tigranes I., king of Armenia, whom he supported in his war against the Romans. His name indeed is only once mentioned in the last campaign against Lucullus, B. C. 67 (Dion Cass. xxxv. 14), but there can be little doubt that he is the third monarch alluded to by Plutarch, as present together with Mithridates the Great and Tigranes, when they were defeated by Lucullus at the river Arsanias in the preceding year. (Plut. Lucull. 31.) [E. H. B.]

MITHRIDA'TES I. II. III., kings of Parthia. [ARSACES VI. IX. XIII. Vol. I. pp. 354—356.]

MITHRIDA'TES (Μιθριδάτης) of PERGAMUS, was the son of Menodotus, a citizen of that place, by a daughter of Adobogion, a descendant of the tetrarchs of Galatia, but his mother having had an amour with Mithridates the Great, he was generally looked upon as in reality the son of that monarch. To this supposition the king himself lent some countenance by the care he bestowed on his education, having taken him into his own court and camp, where the young man was trained in all kinds of military exercises and studies. (Strab. xiii. p. 625; Hirt. de B. Alex. 78.) His natural abilities, united to his illustrious birth, raised him to a high place in the estimation of his countrymen, and he appears as early as B. C. 64 to have exercised the chief control over the affairs of his native city. (Cic. pro Flacc. 7; Schol. Bob. ad loc.) At a subsequent period he was fortunate enough to obtain the favour and even personal friendship of Caesar, who, at the commencement of the Alexandrian war (B. C. 48), sent him into Syria and Cilicia to raise auxiliary forces. This service he performed with zeal and alacrity, and having assembled a large body of troops advanced by land upon Egypt, and by a sudden attack made himself master of Pelusium, though that important fortress had been strongly garrisoned by Achillas. But he was opposed at the passage of the Nile by the Egyptian army commanded by Ptolemy in person, and compelled to apply to Caesar for assistance. The dictator hastened to his support by sea, and, landing at the mouth of the Nile, united his forces with those of Mithridates, and immediately afterwards totally defeated the Egyptian king in a decisive action which put an end to the war. (Hirt. de B. Alex. 26—32; Dion Cass. xlii. 41—43; Joseph. Ant. xiv. 8. § 1—3, B. J. i. 9. § 3—5.) It is probable that he afterwards accompanied Caesar on his campaign against Pharnaces, as immediately after the defeat of that monarch, Caesar bestowed his kingdom of the Bosporus upon Mithridates, on whom he conferred at the same time the tetrarchy of the Galatians that had been previously held by Deïotarus, to which he had an hereditary claim. (Hirt. de B. Alex. 78; Strab. xiii. p. 625; Dion Cass. xlii. 48; Appian, Mithr. 121; Cic. Phil. ii. 37, de Divin. ii. 37.) But the kingdom of the Bosporus still remained to be won, the title being all that it was really in the power of Caesar to bestow, for Asander, who had revolted against Pharnaces and put him to death on his return to his own dominions, was in fact master of the whole country, and Mithridates having soon after attempted to establish himself in his new sovereignty and expel Asander, was defeated and slain. (Strab. l. c.; Dion Cass. xlii. 48, xlvii. 26.) [E. H. B.]

MITHRIDA'TES, kings of PONTUS. The first of these, however, was not really an independent monarch, but merely a satrap under the Persian king; and it would be more correct to omit him in the enumeration, and reckon the one who comes next in order as Mithridates I.; but the ordinary practice has been here followed for convenience. The kings of Pontus claimed to be lineally descended from one of the seven Persians who had conspired against the Magi, and who was subsequently established by Dareius Hystaspes in the government of the countries bordering on the Euxine Sea. (Polyb. v. 43; Diod. xix. 40; Aur. Vict. de Vir. Illust. 76.) They also asserted their descent from the royal house of the Achaemenides, to which the kings of Persia belonged, but we know not how they made out this part of their pedigree. Very little is known of their history until after the fall of the Persian empire.

MITHRIDATES I., son of Ariobarzanes (probably of the first prince of that name), is mentioned by Xenophon (Cyr. viii. 8. § 4) as having betrayed his father, aud the same circumstance is alluded to by Aristotle (Pol. v. 10). Eckhel supposes him to be the same with the Mithridates who accompanied the younger Cyrus, but there is certainly no proof of this. He may, however, be the same with the Mithridates mentioned by Xenophon (Anab. vii. 8. § 25) as satrap of Cappadocia and Lycaonia. It appears that he was dead before B. C. 363, when Ariobarzanes II. made himself master of the countries which had been subject to his rule. (Diod. xv. 90.)

MITHRIDATES II., son of Ariobarzanes II., whom he succeeded on the throne in B. C. 337. (Diod. xvi. 90.) He is frequently called ὁ κτιστής, as having been the founder of the independent kingdom of Pontus, and ought certainly to be distingished as Mithridates I. According to Appian (Mithr. 112) he was eighth in descent from the first satrap of Pontus under Dareius Hystaspes, and sixth in ascending order from Mithridates the Great. (Ibid. 9; see Clinton, F. H. vol. iii. p. 423.) Diodorus assigns him a reign of thirty-five years, but it appears certain that he did not hold uninterrupted possession of the sovereignty during that period. What circumstances led to his expulsion or subjection we know not; indeed we meet with no farther notice of him from the date of his accession already mentioned until some time after the death of Alexander, when we find him attending, apparently in a private, or at least subordinate, capacity, upon the court and camp of Antigonus. Probably he had been compelled to submit to the Macedonian yoke at the time that Cappadocia was conquered by Perdiccas, B. C. 322. He seems to have enjoyed a high place in the favour and confidence of Antigonus, until that potentate, alarmed at a dream he had had, foretelling the future greatness of Mithridates, was induced to form the project of putting him to death. Mithridates, however, received from Demetrius timely notice of his father's intentions, and fled with a few followers to Paphlagonia, where he occupied a strong fortress, called Cimiata, and being joined by numerous bodies of troops from different quarters, gradually extended his dominion over the neighbouring countries, and thus became the founder of the kingdom of Pontus. (Appian, Mithr. 9; Strab. xii. p. 562; Plut. Demetr. 4.) The period of the flight of Mithridates is uncertain, but it must have taken place as early as 318, as we find him at the close of 317 supporting Eumenes in the war against Antigonus. (Diod. xix. 40.) From this time we hear no more of him till his death in B. C. 302, but it appears that he had submitted again to at least a nominal subjection to Antigonus, who now procured his assassination, to prevent him from joining the league of Cassander and his confederates. He seems, however, to have before this established himself firmly in his kingdom, in which he was succeeded without opposition by his son Mithridates. (Diod. xx. 111; Appian, Mithr. 9.) According to Lucian (Macrob. 13), he was not less than eighty-four years of age at the time of his death, which renders it not improbable, as suggested by Clinton (F. H. iii. p. 422), that he is the same as the Mithridates, son of Ariobarzanes, who in his youth circumvented and put to death Datames. [DATAMES.] Plutarch is clearly in error when he calls him a young man at the time of his flight, and a contemporary of Demetrius. (See Clinton, l. c., and Droysen, Hellenism. tom. i. p. 44, 298.)

MITHRIDATES III., son of the preceding, whom he succeeded on the throne in B. C. 302. He is said to have added largely to the dominions inherited from his father, by the acquisition of great part of Cappadocia and Paphlagonia, but whether by conquest or by the cession of the Macedonian rulers of Asia does not appear. (Diod. xx. 111.) In B. C. 281 we find him concluding an alliance with the Heracleans, to protect them against Seleucus (Memnon, c. 11, ed. Orell.); and at a subsequent period, availing himself of the services of the Gauls, then lately settled in Asia, to overthrow a force sent against him by Ptolemy, king of Egypt. (Steph. Byz. v. Ἄγκυρα.) These are the only events recorded of his reign, which lasted thirty-six years. He was succeeded by his son Ariobarzanes III.

MITHRIDATES IV., grandson of the preceding, was the son and successor of Ariobarzanes III. He was a minor at the death of his father, but the period of his accession cannot be determined. Clinton places it as low as 242 or 240 B. C., while Droysen (Hellenism. vol. ii. p. 355) carries it back nearly to 258. It seems probable that it must be placed considerably before 240, as Memnon tells us that he was a child at his father's death, and he had a daughter of marriageable age in 222. Shortly after his accession his kingdom was invaded by the Gauls, who were, however, repulsed. (Memnon, c. 24, ed. Orell.) After he had attained to manhood he married a sister of Seleucus Callinicus, with whom he is said to have received the province of Phrygia as a dowry. (Euseb. Arm. p. 164; Justin. xxxviii. 5.) But notwithstanding this alliance, we find him, during the war between Seleucus and Antiochus Hierax, taking part against the former, whom he defeated in a great battle, in which Seleucus lost 20,000 of his troops, and narrowly escaped with his own life. (Euseb. Arm. p. 165.) In B. C. 222, Mithridates gave his daughter Laodice in marriage to Antiochus III.: another of his daughters, also named Laodice, was married about the same time to Achaeus, the cousin of Antiochus. (Polyb. v. 43, 74, viii. 22.) In B. C. 220 Mithridates made war upon the wealthy and powerful city of Sinope, but it appears that he was unable to reduce it, and it did not fall into the power of the kings of Pontus until long afterwards. (Id. iv. 56.) At an earlier period we find him vying with the other monarchs of Asia in sending magnificent presents to the Rhodians, after the subversion of their city by an earthquake. (Id. v. 90.) The date of his death is unknown, but Clinton assigns it conjecturally to about B. C. 190. He was succeeded by his son Pharnaces. [PHARNACES I.]

MITHRIDATES V., surnamed EUERGETES, was the son of Pharnaces I.. and grandson of the preceding. (Justin. xxxviii. 5; Clinton. F. H. vol. iii. p. 426.) The period of his accession is wholly uncertain; we only know that he was on the throne in B. C. 154, when he is mentioned as sending an auxiliary force to the assistance of Attalus II. against Prusias, king of Bithynia. (Polyb. xxxiii. 10.) But as much as twenty-five years before (B. C. 179), his name is associated with that of his father in the treaty concluded by Pharnaces with Eumenes, in a manner that would lead one to suppose he was already admitted to some share in the sovereign power. (Polyb. xxvi. 6.) He was the first of the kings of Pontus who entered into a regular alliance with the Romans, whom he supported with some ships and a small auxiliary force during the third Punic war. (Appian, Mithr. 10.) At a subsequent period he rendered them more efficient assistance in the war against Aristonicus (B. C. 131—129), and for his services on this occasion was rewarded by the consul M'. Aquillius with the province of Phrygia. The acts of Aquillius were rescinded by the senate on the ground of bribery, but it appears that Mithridates continued in possession of Phrygia till his death. (Just. xxxvii. 1, xxxviii. 5; Appian, Mithr. 12, 56, 57; Oros. v. 10; Eutrop. iv. 20, who, however, confounds him with his son.) The close of his reign can only be determined approximately, from the statements concerning the accession of his son, which assign it to the year 120. He was assassinated at Sinope by a conspiracy among his own immediate attendants. (Strab. x. p. 477.)

MITHRIDATES VI., surnamed EUPATOR, and also DIONYSUS, but more commonly known by the name of THE GREAT (a title which is not, however, bestowed on him by any ancient historian), was the son and successor of the preceding. We have no precise statement of the year of his birth, and great discrepancies occur in those concerning his age and the duration of his reign. Strabo, who was likely to be well informed in regard to the history of his native country, affirms that he was eleven years old at the period of his accession (x. p. 477), and this statement agrees with the account of Appian, that he was sixty-eight or sixty-nine years old at the time of his death, of which he had reigned fifty-seven. Memnon, on the other hand (c. 30, ed. Orell.), makes him thirteen at the time when he ascended the throne, and Dion Cassius (xxxv. 9) calls him above seventy years old in B. C. 68, which would make him at least seventy-five at his death, but this last account is certainly erroneous. If Appian's statement concerning the length of his reign be correct, we may place his accession in B. C. 120.

We have very imperfect information concerning the earlier years of his reign, as indeed during the whole period which preceded his wars with the Romans; and much of what has been transmitted to us wears a very suspicious, if not fabulous, aspect. According to Justin, unfortunately our chief authority for the events of this period, both the year of his birth and that of his accession were marked by the appearance of comets of portentous magnitude. The same author tells us that immediately on ascending the throne he found himself assailed by the designs of his guardians (perhaps some of those who had conspired against his father's life), but that he succeeded in eluding all their machinations, partly by displaying a courage and address in warlike exercises beyond his years, partly by the use of antidotes against poison, to which he began thus early to accustom himself. In order to evade the designs formed against his life, he also devoted much of his time to hunting, and took refuge in the remotest and most unfrequented regions, under pretence of pursuing the pleasures of the chase. (Justin. xxxvii. 2.) Whatever truth there may be in these accounts, it is certain that when he attained to manhood, and assumed in person the administration of his kingdom, he was not only endowed with consummate skill in all martial exercises, and possessed of a bodily frame inured to all hardships, as well as a spirit to brave every danger, but his naturally vigorous intellect had been improved by careful culture. As a boy he had been brought up at Sinope, where he had probably received the elements of a Greek education; and so powerful was his memory, that he is said to have learnt not less than twenty-five languages, and to have been able in the days of his greatest power to transact business with the deputies of every tribe subject to his rule in their own peculiar dialect. (Justin. l. c.; Plin. H. N. xxv. 2; A. Gell. xvii. 17; Val. Max. viii. 7, ext. 16; Strab. xii. p. 545.)

The first steps of his career, like those of most Eastern despots, were marked by blood. He is said to have established himself in the possession of the sovereign power by the death of his mother, to whom a share in the royal authority had been left by Mithridates Euergetes; and this was followed by the assassination of his brother. (Memnon, c. 30; Appian, Mithr. 112.) As soon as he had by these means established himself firmly on the throne of Pontus (under which name was comprised also a part of Cappadocia and Paphlagonia), he began to turn his arms against the neighbouring nations. On the West, however, his progress was hemmed in by the power of Rome, and the minor sovereigns of Bithynia and Cappadocia enjoyed the all-powerful protection of that republic. But on the East his ambition found free scope. He subdued the barbarian tribes in the interior, between the Euxine and the confines of Armenia, including the whole of Colchis and the province called Lesser Armenia (which was ceded to him by its ruler Antipater), and even extended his conquests beyond the Caucasus, where he reduced to subjection some of the wild Scythian tribes that bordered on the Tanaïs. The fame of his arms and the great extension of his power led Parisades, king of the Bosporus, as well as the Greek cities of Chersonesus and Olbia, to place themselves under his protection, in order to obtain his assistance against the barbarians of the North—the Sarmatians and Roxolani. Mithridates entrusted the conduct of this war to his generals Diophantus and Neoptolemus, whose efforts were crowned with complete success: they carried their victorious arms from the Tanaïs to the Tyras, totally defeated the Roxolani, and rendered the whole of the Tauric Chersonese tributary to the kingdom of Pontus. A fortress called the tower of Neoptolemus, at the mouth of the river Tyras (Dniester), probably marks the extreme limit of his conquests in that direction; but he is said to have entered into friendly relations with and possessed much influence over the Getae and other wild tribes, as far as the borders of Thrace and Macedonia. After the death of Parisades, the kingdom of Bosporus itself was incorporated with his dominions. (Strab. vii. p. 306, 307, 309—312, xi. p. 499, xii. p. 540, 541, 555; Appian, Mithr. 15; Memnon, c. 30; Justin. xxxvii. 3; Niebuhr, Kl. Schrift. p. 388—390.)

While he was thus extending his own sovereignty, he did not neglect to strengthen himself by forming alliances with his more powerful neighbours, especially with Tigranes, king of Armenia, to whom he gave his daughter Cleopatra in marriage, as well as with the warlike nations of the Parthians and Iberians. He thus found himself in possession of such great power and extensive resources, that he began to deem himself equal to a contest with Rome itself. Many causes of dissension had already arisen between them, and the Romans had given abundant proofs of the jealousy with which they regarded the rising greatness of Mithridates, but that monarch had hitherto avoided an open rupture with the republic. Shortly after his accession they had taken advantage of his minority to wrest from him the province of Phrygia, which had been bestowed by Aquillius upon his father. (Justin. xxxviii. 5; Appian, Mithr. ii. 57.) At a subsequent period also they had interposed to prevent him from making himself master of Paphlagonia, to which kingdom he claimed to be entitled by the will of the last monarch. (Justin. xxxvii. 4.) On both these occasions Mithridates submitted to the imperious mandates of Rome; but he was far from disposed to acquiesce permanently in the arrangements thus forced upon him for a time; and it can hardly be doubted that he was already aiming at the conquest of the neighbouring states which enjoyed the protection of the Roman republic, with a view to make himself master of the whole of Asia. Cappadocia above all appears to have been the constant object of his ambition, as it had indeed been that of the kings of Pontus from a very early period. Ariarathes VI., king of that country, had married Laodice, the sister of Mithridates, notwithstanding which, the latter procured his assassination, through the agency of one Gordius. His design was probably to remove his infant nephews also, and unite Cappadocia to his own dominions; but Laodice having thrown herself upon the protection of Nicomedes, king of Bithynia, he turned his arms against that monarch, whom he expelled from Cappadocia, and set up Ariarathes, one of the sons of Laodice, and his own nephew, as king of the country. But it was not long before he found a cause of quarrel with the young man whom he had thus established, in consequence of which he invaded his dominions with a large army, and having invited him to a conference, assassinated him with his own hand. He now placed an infant son of his own, on whom he had bestowed the name of Ariarathes, upon the throne of Cappadocia, but the people rose in rebellion, and set up the second son of Ariarathes VI. as their sovereign. Mithridates hereupon invaded Cappadocia again, and drove out this new competitor, who died shortly after. But the Roman senate now interfered, and appointed a Cappadocian named Ariobarzanes to be king of that country (B. C. 93). Mithridates did not venture openly to oppose this nomination, but he secretly instigated Tigranes, king of Armenia, to invade Cappadocia, and expel Ariobarzanes. The latter, being wholly unable to cope with the power of Tigranes, immediately fled to Rome; and Sulla, who was at the time praetor in Cilicia, was appointed to reinstate him, B. C. 92. Mithridates took no part in preventing this; and clearly as all things were in fact tending to a rupture between him and Rome, he still continued nominally to enjoy the friendship and alliance of the Roman people which had been bestowed by treaty upon his father. (Justin. xxxviii. 1—3; Appian, Mithr. 10, 12, 14; Memnon, c. 30; Plut. Sull. 5.) But this state of things did not last long; and the death of Nicomedes II., king of Bithynia, by opening a new field to the ambition of Mithridates, at length brought matters to a crisis. That monarch was succeeded by his eldest son Nicomedes III., but Mithridates took the opportunity, on what pretext we know not, to set up a rival claimant in the person of Socrates, a younger brother of Nicomedes, whose pretensions he supported with an army, and quickly drove Nicomedes out of Bithynia, B. C. 90. It appears to have been about the same time that he openly invaded Cappadocia, and for the second time expelled Ariobarzanes from his kingdom, establishing his own son Ariarathes in his place. Both the fugitive princes had recourse to Rome, where they found ready support: a decree was passed that Nicomedes and Ariobarzanes should be restored to their respective kingdoms, and the execution of it was confided to two consular legates, the chief of whom was M'. Aquillius, while L. Cassius, who commanded in the Roman province of Asia, was ordered to support them with what forces he had at his disposal. (Appian, Mithr. 10, 11, 13; Justin. xxxviii. 3, 5; Memnon, c. 30; Liv. Epit. lxxiv.)

It is not very easy to understand or account for the conduct of Mithridates at this period, as related to us in the very imperfect accounts which we possess. It seems probable that he was emboldened to make these direct attacks upon the allies of Rome by the knowledge that the arms of the republic were sufficiently occupied at home by the Social War, which was now devastating Italy. But, although that war did in fact prevent the Romans from rendering any efficient support to the monarchs whose cause they had espoused, Mithridates offered no opposition to their proceedings, but yielded once more, as it would seem, to the very name of Rome, and allowed the consular legates and L. Cassius, at the head of a few cohorts only, to reinstate both Nicomedes and Ariobarzanes. He even went so far as to put to death Socrates, whom he had himself incited to lay claim to the throne of Bithynia, and who now, when expelled by the Romans, naturally sought refuge at his court. (Appian, Mithr. 11; Justin. xxxviii. 5.) Yet about this time we are told, that ambassadors having been sent to him by the Italian allies that were in arms against Rome to court his alliance, he promised to co-operate with them, when he had first expelled the Romans from Asia. (Diod.

xxxvii. Exc. Phot. p. 540.) It is difficult to judge whether he was really meditating a war with Rome, but did not yet consider his preparations sufficiently advanced to commence the contest, or was desirous by a show of moderation to throw upon the Romans the odium of forcing on the war. If the latter were his object, his measures were certainly not ill chosen; for it is clear even from the accounts transmitted to us, that whatever may have been the secret designs of Mithridates, the immediate occasion of the war arose from acts of aggression and injustice on the part of the Romans and their allies.

No sooner was Nicomedes replaced on the throne of Bithynia than he was urged by the Roman legates to invade the territories of Mithridates, into which he made a predatory incursion as far as Amastris. Mithridates offered no resistance, but sent Pelopidas to the Romans to demand satisfaction, and it was not until his ambassador was sent away with an evasive answer that he prepared for immediate hostilities, B. C. 88. (Appian, Mithr. 11—15.) His first step was to invade Cappadocia, from which he easily expelled Ariobarzanes for the third time. Shortly afterwards his two generals, Neoptolemus and Archelaus, advanced against Bithynia with an army of 250,000 foot and 40,000 horse. They were met by Nicomedes, supported by the presence of the Roman legate Aquillius and Mancinus, with such forces as they had been able to raise in Asia, but with very few Roman troops, on the banks of the river Amneius in Paphlagonia, when a great battle ensued, which terminated in the complete victory of the generals of Mithridates. Nicomedes fled from the field, and, abandoning Bithynia without another blow, took refuge at Pergamus. Aquillius was closely pursued by Neoptolemus, compelled to fight at disadvantage, and again defeated; and Mithridates, following up his advantage, not only made himself master of Phrygia and Galatia, but invaded the Roman province of Asia. Here the universal discontent of the inhabitants, caused by the oppression of the Roman governors, enabled him to overrun the whole province almost without opposition: the Roman officers, who had imprudently brought this danger upon themselves, were unable to collect any forces to oppose the progress of Mithridates, and two of them, Q. Oppius and Aquillius himself, the chief author of the war, fell into the hands of the king of Pontus. (Appian, Mithr. 15—21; Memnon, 31; Justin. xxxviii. 3; Liv. Epit. lxxvi. lxxvii. lxxviii.; Oros. vi. 2; Eutrop. v. 5; Flor. iii. 6; Strab. xii. p. 562.)

These events took place in the summer and autumn of B. C. 88; before the close of that year they were known at Rome, and Sulla was appointed to take the command in the war which was now inevitable. Meanwhile, Mithridates continued his military operations in Asia, with a view to make himself master of the whole of that country before the Romans were prepared to attack him. All the cities of the main land except Magnesia and some of those of Lycia had opened their gates to him; but the important islands of Cos and Rhodes still held out; and against them Mithridates now directed his arms. Cos was quickly subdued; but the Rhodians were well prepared for defence, and possessed a powerful fleet; so that Mithridates, though he commanded his fleet and army in person, and exerted the most strenuous efforts, was ultimately compelled to abandon the siege. After this he made a fruitless attempt upon the city of Patara in Lycia; and then resigning the command of the war in that quarter to his general, Pelopidas, took up his winter-quarters at Pergamus, where he gave himself up to luxury and enjoyment, especially to the society of his newly-married wife Monima, a Greek of Stratoniceia. (Appian, Mithr. 21, 23—27.) It was in the midst of these revelries that he issued the sanguinary order to all the cities of Asia to put to death on the same day all the Roman and Italian citizens who were to be found within their walls. So hateful had the Romans rendered themselves during the short period of their dominion, that these commands were obeyed with alacrity by almost all the cities of Asia, who found the opportunity of gratifying their own vengeance at the same time that they earned the favour of Mithridates, by carrying into effect the royal mandate with the most unsparing cruelty. The number of those who perished in this fearful massacre is stated by Memnon and Valerius Maximus at eighty thousand persons, while Plutarch increases the amount to a hundred and fifty thousand. (Appian, Mithr. 22, 23; Memnon, 31, Plut. Sull. 24; Liv. Epit. lxxviii.; Dion Cass. Fr. 115; Eutrop. v. 5; Oros. vi. 2; Flor. iii. 5; Cic. p. Leg. Manil. 3, pro Flacc. 24, 25; Tac. Ann. iv. 14; Val. Max. ix. 2. ext. 3.)

But while he thus created an apparently insuperable barrier to all hopes of reconciliation with Rome, Mithridates did not neglect to prepare for the approaching contest; and though he remained inactive himself at Pergamus, he was busily employed in raising troops and collecting ships, so that in the spring of B. C. 87 he was able to send Archelaus to Greece with a powerful fleet and army. During the subsequent operations of that general [ARCHELAUS], Mithridates was continually sending fresh reinforcements both by land and sea to his support; besides which he entrusted the command of a second army to his son Arcathias, with orders to advance through Thrace and Macedonia, to co-operate in the war against Sulla. The intended diversion was prevented by the death of Arcathias; but the following year (B. C. 86) Taxiles followed the same route with an army of 110,000 men; and succeeded in uniting his forces with those of Archelaus. Their combined armies were totally defeated by Sulla at Chaeronea; but Mithridates, on receiving the news of this great disaster, immediately set about raising fresh levies, and was soon able to send another army of 80,000 men, under Dorylaus to Euboea. Meanwhile, his severities in Asia, coupled with the disasters of his arms in Greece, seem to have produced a general spirit of disaffection; the cities of Chios, Ephesus, and Tralles, besides others of less note, drove out his governors and openly revolted: and the assassination of the tetrarchs of Galatia, whom he put to death from suspicions of their fidelity, led to the loss of that important province. (Appian, Mithr. 27, 29, 35, 41—49; Plut. Sull. 11, 15, 20; Memnon, 32, 33.) He now also found himself threatened with danger from a new and unexpected quarter. While Sulla was still occupied in Greece, the party of Marius at Rome had sent a fresh army to Asia under L. Flaccus, to carry on the war at once against their foreign and domestic enemies; and Fimbria, who had obtained the command of this force by the assassination of Flaccus [FIMBRIA], now advanced through Bithynia to assail Mithridates, B. C. 85. The king opposed to him a powerful army, under the command of his son, Mithridates, seconded by three of his generals; but this was totally defeated by Fimbria, who quickly followed up his advantage, and laid siege to Pergamus itself: from hence, however, Mithridates fled to Pitane, where he was closely blockaded by Fimbria; and had Lucullus, the quaestor of Sulla, who commanded the Roman fleet in the Aegaean, been willing to co-operate with the Marian general, it would have been impossible for the king to avoid falling into the hands of his enemies. But the dissensions of the Romans proved the means of safety to Mithridates, who made his escape by sea to Mitylene. (Appian, Mithr. 51, 52; Plut. Lucull. 3; Memnon, 34; Oros. vi. 2; Liv. Epit. lxxxii. lxxxiii.) It was not long afterwards that he received the tidings of the complete destruction of his armies in Greece, near Orchomenus; and the news of this disaster, coupled with the progress of Fimbria in Asia, now made Mithridates desirous to treat for peace, which he justly hoped to obtain on more favourable terms than he could otherwise have expected, in consequence of the divided state of his enemies. He accordingly commissioned Archelaus, who was still in Euboea, to open negotiations with Sulla, which led to the conclusion of a preliminary treaty: but on the conditions of this being reported to the king, he positively refused to consent to the surrender of his fleet. Sulla hereupon prepared to renew hostilities, and in the spring of the following year (B. C. 84) crossed the Hellespont; but Archelaus succeeded in bringing about an interview between the Roman general and Mithridates at Dardanus, in the Troad, at which the terms of peace were definitively settled. Mithridates consented to abandon all his conquests in Asia, and restrict himself to the dominions which he held before the commencement of the war; besides which he was to pay a sum of 2000 talents for the expences of the war, and surrender to the Romans a fleet of 70 ships fully equipped. Thus terminated the first Mithridatic war. The king withdrew to Pontus, while Sulla turned his arms against Fimbria, whom he quickly defeated; and then proceeded to settle the affairs of Asia, and re-establish Nicomedes and Ariobarzanes in their respective kingdoms; after which he returned to Rome, leaving L. Murena, with two legions, to hold the command in Asia. (Appian, Mithr. 54—63; Plut. Sull. 22—25, Lucull. 4; Memnon, 35; Dion Cass. Frag. 174—176; Liv. Epit. lxxxiii.; Oros. vi. 2.)

The attention of Mithridates was now attracted towards his own more remote provinces of Colchis and the Bosporus, where symptoms of disaffection had begun to manifest themselves: the Colchians, however, submitted immediately on the king appointing his son Mithridates to be their governor, with the title of king, and even received their new ruler with such demonstrations of favour as to excite the jealousy of Mithridates, who, in consequence, recalled his son, and placed him in confinement. He now assembled a large force both military and naval, for the reduction of the revolted provinces; and so great were his preparations for this purpose, that they aroused the suspicions of the Romans, who pretended that they must be in fact designed against them. Murena, who had been left in command by Sulla, was eager for some opportunity of earning the honour of a triumph, and he now (B. C. 83), under the flimsy pretext that Mithridates had not yet evacuated the whole of Cappadocia, marched into that country, and not only made himself master of the wealthy city of Comana, but even crossed the Halys, and laid waste the plains of Pontus itself. To this flagrant breach of the treaty so lately concluded, the Roman general was in great measure instigated by Archelaus, who, finding himself regarded with suspicion by Mithridates, had consulted his safety by flight, and was received with the utmost honours by the Romans. Mithridates, who had evidently been wholly unprepared to renew the contest with Rome, offered no opposition to the progress of Murena; but finding that general disregard his remonstrances, he sent to Rome to complain of his aggression. But when in the following spring (B. C. 82) he found Murena preparing to renew his hostile incursions, notwithstanding the arrival of a Roman legate, who nominally commanded him to desist, he at once determined to oppose him by force, and assembled a large army, with which he met the Roman general on the banks of the Halys. The action that ensued terminated in the complete victory of the king; and Murena, with difficulty, effected his retreat into Phrygia, leaving Cappadocia at the mercy of Mithridates, who quickly overran the whole province. But shortly afterwards A. Gabinius arrived in Asia, bringing peremptory orders from Sulla to Murena to desist from hostilities; whereupon Mithridates once more consented to evacuate Cappadocia. (Appian, Mithr. 64—66, 67; Memnon, 36.)

He was now at leisure to complete the reduction of the Bosporus, which he successfully accomplished, and established Machares, one of his sons, as king of that country. But he suffered heavy losses in an expedition which he subsequently undertook against the Achaeans, a warlike tribe who dwelt at the foot of Mount Caucasus. (Appian, ib. 67.) Meanwhile, he could not for a moment doubt that, notwithstanding the interposition of Sulla, the peace between him and Rome was in fact a mere suspension of hostilities; and that that haughty republic would never suffer the massacre of her citizens in Asia to remain ultimately unpunished. (See Cic. pro L. Manil. 3.) Hence all his efforts were directed towards the formation of an army capable of contending not only in numbers, but in discipline, with those of Rome; and with this view he armed his barbarian troops after the Roman fashion, and endeavoured to train them up in that discipline of which he had so strongly felt the effect in the preceding contest. (Plut. Lucull. 7.) In these attempts he was doubtless assisted by the refugees of the Marian party, L. Magius and L. Fannius, who had accompanied Fimbria into Asia; and on the defeat of that general by Sulla, had taken refuge with the king of Pontus. At their instigation also Mithridates sent an embassy to Sertorius, who was still maintaining his ground in Spain, and concluded an alliance with him against their common enemies. (Appian, Mithr. 68; Oros. vi. 2; Pseud. Ascon. ad Cic. Verr. i. 34, p. 183, ed. Orell.) It is remarkable that no formal treaty seems ever to have been concluded between Mithridates and the Roman senate; and the king had in vain endeavoured to obtain the ratification of the terms agreed on between him and Sulla. (Appian, ib. 67.) Hence, on the death of the latter, B. C. 78, Mithridates abandoned all thoughts of peace; and while he concluded the alliance with Sertorius on the one hand, he instigated Tigranes on the other to invade Cappadocia, and sweep away the inhabitants of that country, to people his newly-founded city of Tigranocerta. But it was the death of Nicomedes III., king of Bithynia, at the beginning of the year B. C. 74, that brought matters to a crisis, and became the immediate occasion of the war which both parties had long felt to be inevitable. That monarch left his dominions by will to the Roman people; and Bithynia was accordingly declared a Roman province: but Mithridates asserted that the late king had left a legitimate son by his wife Nysa, whose pretensions he immediately prepared to support by his arms. (Eutrop. vi. 6; Liv. Epit. xciii.; Appian, Mithr. 71; Epist. Mithrid. ap. Sallust. Hist. iv. p. 239, ed. Gerlach; Vell. Pat. ii. 4, 39.)

It was evident that the contest in which both parties were now about to engage would be a struggle for life or death, which could be terminated only by the complete overthrow of Mithridates, or by his establishment as undisputed monarch of Asia. The forces with which he was now prepared to take the field were such as might inspire him with no unreasonable confidence of victory. He had assembled an army of 120,000 foot soldiers, armed and disciplined in the Roman manner, and sixteen thousand horse, besides an hundred scythed chariots: but, in addition to this regular army, he was supported by a vast number of auxiliaries from the barbarian tribes of the Chalybes, Achaeans, Armenians, and even the Scythians and Sarmatians. His fleet also was so far superior to any that the Romans could oppose to him, as to give him the almost undisputed command of the sea. These preparations, however, appear to have delayed him so long that the season was far advanced before he was able to take the field, and both the Roman consuls, Lucullus and Cotta, had arrived in Asia. Neither of them, however, was able to oppose his first irruption; he traversed almost the whole of Bithynia without encountering any resistance; and when at length Cotta ventured to give him battle under the walls of Chalcedon, he was totally defeated both by sea and land, and compelled to take refuge within the city. Here Mithridates at first prepared to besiege him, but soon changed his intention, and moved with his whole army to Cyzicus, to which important city he proceeded to lay siege, both by sea and land. His military engines and works were managed by a Greek named Niconides, who displayed the utmost skill and science in this department; while the attacks of the besieging forces were unremitting. But the Roman general Lucullus, who had advanced from Phrygia to the relief of Cotta, and followed Mithridates to Cyzicus, had been allowed, by the negligence of the king, or the treachery, as it was said, of the Roman L. Magius, who enjoyed a high place in his confidence, to occupy an advantageous position near the camp of Mithridates, where he almost entirely cut him off from receiving supplies by land, while the storms of the winter prevented him from depending on those by sea. Hence it was not long before famine began to make itself felt in the camp of Mithridates, and all his assaults upon the city having been foiled by the courage and resolution of the besieged, he was at length compelled (early in the year 73) to abandon the enterprise and raise the siege. But a large detachment of his army, which he at first sent off into Bithynia, was intercepted and cut to pieces by Lucullus; and when at length he broke up his camp, his main body, as it moved along the coast towards the westward, was repeatedly attacked by the Roman general, and suffered very heavy loss at the passage of the Aesepus and Granicus. The king himself proceeded by sea to Parium, where he collected the shattered remnants of his forces, and leaving a part of his fleet under Varius to maintain possession of the Hellespont and the Aegaean, withdrew himself with the rest, after a fruitless attempt upon Perinthus, to Nicomedia. Here he was soon threatened by the advance of three Roman armies under Cotta and the two lieutenants of Lucullus, Triarius and Voconius Barba. These generals had made themselves masters in succession of Prusias and Nicaea, and were preparing to besiege Mithridates himself at Nicomedia, when the king received intelligence of the defeat of his fleet under Varius at Tenedos, and becoming in consequence apprehensive for the safety of his communications by sea, hastened to set sail for Pontus. On his voyage he encountered a violent storm, by which he lost many of his ships, and was himself compelled to make his escape in the light galley of a pirate captain. He obtained, however, an important advantage by the surprise of the free city of Heracleia, which had hitherto remained neutral, but was now compelled to receive a Pontic garrison. Afrer this he returned to Sinope. (Appian, Mithr. 69—78; Plut. Lucull. 7—13; Memnon, 37—42; Liv. Epit. xciii. xcv.; Eutrop. vi. 6.)

The great army with which Mithridates had commenced the war was now annihilated; and he was not only compelled to retire into his own dominions, but was without the means of opposing the advance of Lucullus into the heart of Pontus itself. But he now again set to work with indefatigable activity to raise a fresh army; and while he left the whole of the sea-coast of Pontus open to the invaders, he established himself in the interior at Cabeira, where he soon gathered a numerous force around his standard, while he sent to his son Machares and his son-in-law Tigranes, to request succours and auxiliaries. Lucullus, having in vain tried to allure him to the relief of Amisus, the siege of which he continued throughout the winter, on the approach of spring (B. C. 72) advanced into the interior, and took up a position opposite to him at Cabeira. Mithridates was superior in cavalry, on which account the Roman general avoided an action in the plains, and the campaign was chiefly occupied with mutual attempts to cut off each other's convoys of provisions, which led to repeated partial engagements, with various vicissitudes of fortune. At length a large detachment of the king's army was entirely cut off, and Mithridates hereupon determined to remove his camp: but the orders to this effect by some mismanagement gave rise to a panic in the undisciplined multitudes which composed his army; great confusion arose, and Lucullus having sent his cavalry to take advantage of this, a general rout was the consequence. Mithridates himself with difficulty made his way through the tumult, and must have fallen into the hands of the Romans, had not the cupidity of some of his pursuers, who stopped to plunder a mule laden with gold, given him time to effect his escape. He fled to Comana, where he was again able to assemble a body of 2000 horse, but he despaired of opposing the farther progress of Lucullus, and accordingly sent his faithful eunuch Bacchides to put to death his wives and sisters whom he had left at Pharnacia, while he himself took refuge in the dominions of his son-in-law Tigranes. It appears that these events took place before the close of the year B. C. 72. (Plut. Lucull. 14—18; Appian, Mithr. 78—82; Memnon, 43, 44; concerning the chronology see LUCULLUS, Vol. II. p. 834, note.)

Tigranes was at this moment the most powerful monarch of Asia [TIGRANES]; but though he had previously promised assistance to Mithridates, he appears to have been unwilling to engage openly in war with Rome; and on this account, while he received the fugitive monarch in a friendly manner, and assigned him all that was requisite for maintaining his royal dignity, he refused to admit him to his presence, and showed no disposition to attempt his restoration. But the arrogance of the Romans brought about a change in his policy; and Tigranes, offended at the haughty conduct of Appius Claudius, whom Lucullus had sent to demand the surrender of Mithridates, not only refused this request, but determined at once to prepare for war with the Romans. Community of interests now led to a complete reconciliation between the two monarchs; and Mithridates, who had spent a year and eight months in the dominions of his son-in-law without being admitted to a personal interview, was now made to participate in all the councils of Tigranes, and appointed to levy an army to unite in the war. But it was in vain that in the ensuing campaign (B. C. 69) he urged upon his son-in-law the lessons of his own experience, and advised him to shun a regular action with Lucullus: Tigranes, confident in the multitude of his forces, gave battle at Tigranocerta and was defeated, before Mithridates had been able to join him. But this disaster, so precisely in accordance with the warnings of Mithridates, served to raise the latter so high in the estimation of Tigranes, that from this time forward the whole conduct of the war was entrusted to the direction of the king of Pontus.

During the ensuing winter both monarchs were busily engaged in raising a fresh army, into which Mithridates endeavoured to introduce some discipline, as well as to arm a large body of them after the Roman fashion. They at the same time endeavoured to procure the important assistance of the Parthian king, to whom Mithridates addressed a letter, urging him to consult his true interest by espousing their cause before it was too late, and not to wait until the Romans attacked him in his turn. Whether the epistle to this effect preserved among the fragments of Sallust really bears any resemblance to that composed by the king of Pontus we have unfortunately no means of determining. (Plut. Lucull. 19, 21—23, 25—30; Appian, Mithr. 84—87; Memnon, 46, 55—58; Dion Cass. Fr. 178, xxxv. 1—3; Liv. Epit. xcviii.; Oros. vi. 3; Eutrop. vi. 8, 9; Epist. Mithr. ad Arsacem, ap. Sall. Hist. iv. p. 238, ed. Gerlach.)

But the Parthian king still wavered, and in the following summer (B. C. 68), Lucullus crossed the Taurus, penetrated into the heart of Armenia, and again defeated the allied monarchs near the city of Artaxata. But the early severity of the season, and the discontent of his own troops, checked the farther advance of the Roman general, who turned aside into Mesopotamia. Here Mithridates left him to lay siege to the fortress of Nisibis, which was supposed impregnable, while he himself took advantage of his absence to invade Pontus, at the head of a large army, and endeavour to regain possession of his former dominions. The defence of Pontus was confided to Fabius, one of the lieutenants of Lucullus; but the oppressions of the Romans had excited a general spirit of disaffection, and the people crowded around the standard of Mithridates. Even the Thracian mercenaries in the army of Fabius turned against their general, who was totally defeated by Mithridates, and compelled to shut himself up in the fortress of Cabeira. Triarius, another of the Roman generals, now advanced to his support with a fresh army, and the king retreated before this new adversary, and withdrew to Comana, where he took up his winter-quarters. But the following spring (B. C. 67) hostilities were resumed on both sides; and Triarius, who was anxious to engage Mithridates before Lucullus himself should arrive, allowed himself to be attacked at disadvantage, and was totally defeated. The destruction of the Roman army would have been complete had not the king himself been wounded in the pursuit, which was in consequence checked for a time; but even thus the blow was one of the severest which the Roman arms had sustained for a long period: 7000 of their troops fell, among which was an unprecedented number of officers; and their camp itself was taken. (Dion Cass. xxxv. 4—6, 8—13; Appian, Mithr. 87—89; Plut. Lucull. 31, 32, 35; Cic. pro Leg. Manil. 9.)

The advance of Lucullus himself from Mesopotamia prevented Mithridates from following up his advantage, and he withdrew into Lesser Armenia, where he took up a strong position near Talaura, to await the approach of Tigranes. He doubtless expected that the Roman general would quickly resume the offensive; but the farther proceedings of Lucullus were paralysed by the mutinous and disaffected spirit of his own soldiers; and on the arrival of Tigranes the two monarchs found themselves able to overrun almost the whole of Pontus and Cappadocia without opposition. Before the close of the year 67 Mithridates saw himself once more in possession of the greater part of his hereditary dominions. (Plut. Lucull. 35; Appian, Mithr. 90; Dion Cass. xxxv. 14, 17; Cic. pro Leg. Manil. 3.)

But early in the following year (66) the conduct of the war was entrusted by the Romans to the general whose fame was at this moment eclipsing all others—the illustrious Pompey, and one of the first measures of the new commander was to secure the friendship and alliance of the Parthian king Phraates III., a step by which he not only deprived Mithridates of all hopes of the co-operation of that monarch, but precluded him from the support of Tigranes also, by compelling the Armenian king to look to the defence of his own dominions against the Parthian. Thus thrown back upon his own resources, Mithridates made overtures for peace; but Pompey would listen to no terms except those of unqualified submission and the surrender of all Roman deserters, and these conditions the king of Pontus rejected with scorn. He still found himself at the head of an army of 30,000 foot and 2000 horse, with which, however, he did not venture to meet the enemy in the field, and avoided an action with Pompey, while he protracted the campaign, and gradually withdrew towards the frontiers of Armenia. But he was no match for the generalship of his adversary, who attacked him during a night march through a narrow pass which had been previously occupied by the Roman troops: the greater part of the army of Mithridates was cut to pieces, and the king himself escaped with only a few horsemen and his concubine Hypsicratea, the faithful companion of all his fortunes, to the frontier fortress of Synoria. Here he once more assembled a considerable force, with which he prepared to withdraw into Armenia; but Tigranes, who suspected him of fomenting the intrigues of his son against him, now refused to admit him into his dominions, and no choice remained for Mithridates but to plunge with his small army into the heart of Colchis, and thence make his way to the Palus Maeotis and the Cimmerian Bosporus. Arduous as this enterprise appeared it was successfully accomplished. After crossing the Phasis he deemed himself secure from the pursuit of Pompey, and took up his quarters for the winter at Dioscurias (the extreme eastern limit of the Greek settlements in this part of the Euxine), where he levied additional troops and also assembled a small fleet. With these combined forces he resumed his progress in the following year (65), and succeeded in effecting his passage, partly by force, partly by persuasion, through all the various barbarian tribes that occupied the country between the Caucasus and the Euxine, and reached in safety the city of Phanagoria on the Bosporus. His son Machares, to whom he had confided the government of these regions, but who had long before made his submission to Lucullus, fled on learning his approach, and soon after put an end to his own life. Mithridates, in consequence, established himself without opposition at Panticapaeum, the capital of the kingdom of Bosporus. (Appian, Mithr. 97—102, 107; Dion Cass. xxxvi. 28—33; Plut. Pomp. 32, 34, 35; Liv. Epit. ci.; Oros. vi. 4; Strab. xi. pp. 496, 497, xii. p. 555.)

He had now nothing to fear from the pursuit of Pompey, who appears to have at once abandoned all thoughts of following the fugitive monarch into the wild and inaccessible regions beyond the Phasis, and turned his arms first against Tigranes, and afterwards against Syria. It was probably this sense of security that emboldened him in the year 64 to send ambassadors to Pompey to sue for peace, offering to submit on terms similar to those which had been lately granted to Tigranes, namely, that he should be allowed to retain possession of his hereditary dominions, as a tributary to Rome. Pompey, however, insisted that the king should come in person to make his submission, and this Mithridates resolutely refused. The negotiations were in consequence broken off; and while Pompey regulated the affairs of Pontus, which he reduced to the condition of a Roman province, Mithridates on his part commenced the most extensive preparations for a renewal of the contest. Far from contenting himself with the possession of the remote province of the Bosporus, in which, from its inaccessible position, he might defy the arms of Rome, he now conceived the daring project of marching round the north and west coasts of the Euxine, through the wild tribes of the Sarmatians and Getae, which had been in part already visited by his generals Neoptolemus and Diophantus, and having gathered around his standard all these barbarian nations, of whose hostility towards Rome there could be no question, to throw himself with these accumulated masses upon the frontiers of the Roman state, and perhaps penetrate even into Italy itself. With these views, he was busily engaged in assembling such a fleet and army as would be sufficient for an enterprise of this magnitude. But his proceedings were much delayed at first by a violent earthquake, which overthrew whole towns and villages, and subsequently by a long and painful illness, which incapacitated him for any personal exertion. At length, however, his preparations were completed, and he found himself at the head of an army of 36,000 men and a considerable fleet. But during his illness, while he lived in complete seclusion, visible to none but a few chosen eunuchs, disaffection had made rapid progress among his followers. The full extent of his schemes was probably communicated to few; but enough had transpired to alarm the multitude, and neither the soldiers nor their leaders were disposed to follow their aged monarch on an enterprise which they might well regard as little less than desperate. In this state of things an act of private revenge led to the revolt of the important town of Phanagoria, where the sons of Mithridates, who held the citadel, were compelled to surrender to the insurgents, and the flame of insurrection quickly spread to several other cities of the Tauric Chersonese. Still the spirit of the old king was unbroken: he endeavoured to renew his alliances with the neighbouring Scythian chieftains, and sent some of his daughters to them as brides, under the escort of some confidential eunuchs, who, however, followed the general example, and betrayed their charge into the hands of the Romans. A more formidable conspiracy was now organised by Pharnaces, the favourite son of Mithridates, and whom he had declared heir to his crown. The designs of the young man were discovered, and his accomplices put to death, but Mithridates was persuaded to spare his son's life, and Pharnaces immediately availed himself of his impunity to break out into open insurrection. He was quickly joined both by the whole army and the citizens of Panticapaeum, who unanimously proclaimed him king; and Mithridates, who had taken refuge in a strong tower, after many fruitless messages and embassies to his son, saw that no choice remained to him but death or captivity. Hereupon he took poison, which he constantly carried with him; but his constitution had been so long inured to antidotes, that it did not produce the desired effect, and he was compelled to call in the assistance of one of his Gaulish mercenaries to despatch him with his sword. (Appian, Mithr. 107—111; Dion Cass. xxxvii. 3, 11—13; Plut. Pomp. 41; Oros. vi. 5; Eutrop. vi. 12; Liv. Epit. cii.; Flor. iii. 6; Joseph. Ant. xiv. 3. § 4; Val. Max. ix. 2, ext. 3; Gell. xvii. 16; Aur. Vict. de Vir. Illust. 76, 77; Vell. Pat. ii. 40.)

The death of Mithridates took place in the year 63 B.C. (Dion Cass. xxxvii. 10.) The dread that his name still inspired at Rome is strongly displayed in a passage of Cicero's speech on the Agrarian laws, delivered early in that very year (De Leg. Agrar. ii. 19), and we may thus readily credit the statement of Plutarch, that his death was regarded by the army as equal to a great victory.

His body was sent by Pharnaces to Pompey at Amisus, as a token of his submission; but the conqueror caused it to be interred with regal honours in the sepulchre of his forefathers at Sinope. (Plut. Pomp. 42; App. Mithr. 113; Dion Cass. xxxvii. 14.) According to the statement of Appian already cited, he was sixty-eight or sixty-nine years old at the time of his death, and had reigned fifty-seven years, of which twenty-five had been occupied, with only a few brief intervals, in one continued struggle against the Roman power. The estimation in which he was held by his adversaries is the strongest testimony to his great abilities: Cicero calls him the greatest of all kings after Alexander (Acad. pr. ii. 1), and in another passage says that he was a more formidable opponent than any other monarch whom the Roman arms had yet encountered (pro Muren. 15; see also Vell. Pat. ii. 18). Nor can we doubt the truth of these eulogiums, when we contemplate the circumstances in which he was placed, and the instruments with which he had to work. The numerous defeats of Mithridates are a proof not so much of his own deficiency as a general, as of the inferiority of his troops to those which were opposed to him. This was the radical defect, which he was unable to cure. After the unsuccessful issue of his war with Sulla, all his efforts were directed, as we have already seen, to the training up a disciplined army, capable of contending with the Roman legions; and even after the failure of this first experiment he still seems to have formed armies, comparatively small in numbers, but well organised, instead of the unwieldy and undisciplined multitudes of Tigranes. But he latterly became convinced of the impossibility of coping with the Romans in the field, and on all occasions sought to avoid a pitched battle, and draw his enemies into positions where he might cut them off from their supplies, or take advantage of the rugged and difficult nature of the country in which he had involved them. If he was frequently foiled in these projects, we must remember that he was opposed to generals such as Lucullus and Pompey. But whatever opinion may be entertained of the skill and ability of Mithridates as a general in conducting his campaigns, there can be no question as to the undaunted spirit and energy with which he rose superior to all his defeats, and was ever ready to recommence the unequal contest.

What little we know of his character in other respects is far from favourable; and notwithstanding his Greek education and habits, presents all the characteristics of a genuine Eastern despot. His unreasonable suspicions of those around him, which lost him the province of Galatia and the services of Archelaus; the reliance placed on eunuchs for all confidential purposes; the barbarous execution of several of his numerous sons for various and often trivial causes; and the truly Oriental jealousy which led him to order the death of his wives and sisters, when he found himself compelled to fly from his kingdom—not to speak of the severe punishment inflicted on the people of Chios for a trifling and apparently involuntary offence (App. Mithr. 47); and the general massacre of the Roman citizens throughout Asia—are sufficient evidence that neither his great abilities nor his superior education had produced in him any tendency to real enlightenment or humanity. Yet he was not without a love of the fine arts; and among the vast treasures accumulated in his treasuries at Cabeira and elsewhere were many valuable pictures and statues, and a splendid collection of engraved gems or precious stones. (Strab. xii. p. 556; Plin. xxxiii. 12. § 54, xxxvii. 2. § 5; Manil. Astron. v. 510.)

Of his numerous wives or concubines, the names of a few only have been preserved to us: among the most conspicuous of which are: Laodice, put to death early in his reign; Berenice and Monima, both of whom were put to death at Pharnacia [Monima], Stratonice and Hypsicratea, the last of whom is said to have accompanied him on all his campaigns, and shared with him every danger and privation. (Plut. Pomp. 32; Val. Max. iv. 6. ext. § 2.) By these various wives he was the father of a numerous progeny, many of whom, however, perished before him. Of his sons, Arcathias died in Greece, Mithridates and Xiphares were put to death by his orders, and Machares only escaped the same fate by a voluntary death; five others, named Artaphernes, Cyrus, Dareius, Xerxes, and Oxathres, had fallen into the hands of Pompey, and served to adorn his triumph (App. Mithr. 117); while Pharnaces succeeded to the throne of the Bosporus. Of his daughters the following are mentioned in history: 1. Cleopatra, married to Tigranes, king of Armenia; 2. Drypetine, put to death by the eunuch Menophilus; 3. Another Cleopatra, present with her father at the Bosporus (App. Mithr. 108); 4. Mithridatis; and 5. Nyssa, who poisoned themselves at the same time with their father (ib. iii.); and 6 and 7. Orsabaris and Eupatra, who were taken prisoners by Pompey (ib. 117).

The portrait of Mithridates which appears on his coins is remarkable for the fire and energy of his countenance, which accords well with all we know of his character; while the beautiful execution of the coins themselves, both in gold and silver, bears testimony to his patronage of the arts. They usually bear a date, which refers to an era commencing with the year B. C. 297, and which continued to be used by the kings of Bosporus long afterwards, though its origin is unknown.

COIN OF MITHRIDATES VI. KING OF PONTUS.

Mithridates, a son of the preceding, who was appointed by his father to take the command of the army which he opposed to the Roman general, Fimbria, in B. C. 85. Though supported by Taxiles, Diophantus, and Menander, three of the ablest generals of Mithridates, he was totally defeated by Fimbria, who surprised his camp, and cut to pieces the greater part of his forces; he himself made his escape to Pergamus, where he joined his father. (Memnon, 34; Appian, Mithr. 52.) After the termination of the war with Sulla, he was appointed by his father to the government of Colchis, with the title of king. The Colchians, who were previously in a state of revolt, immediately submitted to the young prince, and received him with such demonstrations of favour as excited the jealousy of the elder Mithridates, who, in consequence, recalled him; and after keeping him some time in captivity, ultimately put him to death. (App. Mithr. 64.) [E. H. B.]

MITHRIDA'TIS (Μιθριδάτις), a daughter of Mithridates the Great, who had been at one time betrothed to Ptolemy, king of Egypt; but the marriage never took place, and she shared the fortunes of her father to the last. She and her sister Nyssa were present with Mithridates just before his death, and voluntarily took poison, that they might share his fate. (Appian, Mithr. 111.) [E. H. B.]

MITHRI'NES. [MITHRENES.]

MITHROBARZA'NES (Μιθροβαρζάνης). 1. Father-in-law of Datames, with whom he joined in his revolt from the Persian king [DATAMES]; but afterwards despairing of his cause, went over to Artabazus, the Persian general, with all the cavalry under his command. Datames, however, on learning his desertion, followed him so closely that he attacked the enemy at the very moment that Mithrobarzanes had joined them. The Persians in consequence distrusted their new confederate, and refused to receive them, so that Mithrobarzanes and his followers found themselves hemmed in between two armies, and were quickly cut to pieces. (Diod. xv. 91; Corn. Nep. Datam. 6; comp. Polyaen. vii. 21. § 7.)

2. General of the Cappadocian forces, which formed part of the Persian army at the passage of the Granicus: he was killed in the battle (Arrian, Anab. i. 16. § 5; Diod. xvii. 21). His name is written in many of the MSS. both of Diodorus and Arrian, Mithrobuzanes, but analogy is certainly in favour of the other form.

3. King or ruler of the district of Sophene, in the possession of which he was established by Ariarathes V., king of Cappadocia, notwithstanding the opposition of Artaxias, king of Armenia, who in vain endeavoured to induce Ariarathes to put the young prince to death, and divide his dominions between them. (Diod. xxxi. Exc. Vales. p. 584.)

4. A general of Tigranes I., king of Armenia, who was the first of the king's friends and courtiers that ventured to apprise him of the near approach of Lucullus. Hereupon he was despatched by that monarch with a force of 3000 horse and a numerous body of infantry, with orders to crush the Roman army, and bring the general away prisoner. Mithrobarzanes, though he does not seem to have shared in this foolish confidence, advanced to meet Lucullus, but was encountered by the advanced guard of the Romans under Sextilius, and cut to pieces, with the greater part of his troops. (Plut. Lucull. 25; Appian, Mithr. 84.) [E. H. B.]

MITROBA'TES (Μιτροβάτης), a Persian, governor of Dascyleium, is said by Herodotus to have taunted Oroetes, satrap of Sardis, with his allowing Samos to continue free from the Persian yoke. During the disturbed period which followed the death of Cambyses and the usurpation of the Magi (B. C. 521), Oroetes put Mitrobates and his son Cranaspes to death. (Herod. iii. 120, 126, 127.) [E. E.]

MIXOPA'RTHENOS (Μιξοπάρθενος), i. e. half maiden, a surname of the Erinnyes or Furies. (Lycophr. 669; comp. Herod. iv. 9.) [L. S.]

MNASALCAS (Μνασάλκας), an epigrammatic poet, a native of a village or township in the territory of Sicyon called Plataeae (Strab. ix. p. 412). Eighteen of his epigrams are given in Brunck's Anal. i. p. 190. The time when he flourished is uncertain. Reiske (Not. p. 245, &c.) is somewhat disposed to consider him a contemporary of Alexander the Great. Schneider (Anal. p. 6) places him a century later. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iv. p. 483; Athen. iv. p. 163.) [C. P. M.]

MNA'SEAS (Μνασέας). 1. A Phocian, who, on the death of Phayllus, B. C. 353, was appointed guardian to the young Phalaecus, the son of Onomarchus, and the successor of Phayllus in the supreme command of the Phocians in the Sacred War. Mnaseas was soon after slain in a night-battle with the Thebans. He was perhaps the same person whose private quarrel with one Euthycrates about an heiress had, according to Aristotle, given occasion to the war. (Diod. xvi. 38; comp. Paus. x. 2; Arist. Polit. v. 4, ed. Bekk.)

2. An Argive, mentioned by Demosthenes (de Cor. p. 324) as one of those who betrayed their country to Philip. Polybius (xvii. 14) blames Demosthenes for what he calls his reckless and sweeping accusation against so many distinguished men. (Comp. Dem. de Cor. p. 245, de Chers. p. 105; Diod. xvi. 38, 69.) [E. E.]

MNA'SEAS (Μνασέας), literary. 1. Of PATARA, in Lycia, the most celebrated literary person of this name. He is sometimes called ὁ Παταρεύς, and at other times ὁ Πατρεύς: the former would make him a native of Patara in Lycia; the latter, of Patrae in Achaia. Clinton calls him (F. H. vol. iii. p. 534) Mnaseas of Patrae; but it appears more probable that Πατρεύς is a corruption of Παταρεύς than the contrary; and we know that Asia Minor produced many literary persons from the time that literature flourished at Alexandria. From a passage in Suidas (s. v. Ἐρατοσθένης), Vossius, Clinton, and others have supposed that Mnaseas was a disciple of Aristarchus; but the words may also mean that he was a pupil of Eratosthenes; and that this is their real meaning, Preller has shown, from another source, in the essay referred to below. (Comp. Epimerism. Hom. p. 277, 29; Welcker, Epische Cyclus, p. 459.) Mnaseas belonged to the period when the school of Callimachus and Eratosthenes was prosecuting literary and grammatical studies; but when likewise a very large number were devoting themselves to a description of lands and places, with an account of their local traditions, monuments, and antiquities. Such were Polemon of Ilion, Neanthes of Cyzicus, Philostephanus of Cyrene, and many others, who were contemporary with Mnaseas, and who were called by the general name of Periegetae (Περιηγηταί). To these Mnaseas belonged, and was one of the worst of his class. It is true that he was diligent and learned, and that he travelled in Europe, Africa, and Asia, for the purpose of collecting materials for his work; but he was singularly destitute both of taste and judgment, and belonged to that class of Alexandrine compilers who placed more value upon the quantity of their materials than their quality or arrangement, and who recorded more diligently all extraordinary and fabulous tales in history and nature than events and occurrences of real interest and importance. He was also a follower of the rationalistic school of Evemerus, and resolved many of the ancient legends into ordinary natural occurrences, quite in accordance with the principles of the school. [EVEMERUS.]

Mnaseas was the author of two works, one of a chorographical description, and the other a collection of oracles given at Delphi. These works seem to have had extensive circulation in antiquity, and to have been preserved for a considerable time. The oldest writer by whom they are referred to is Lysimachus, who wrote Περὶ νοστῶν (Athen. iv. p. 158, d.), and they were extant in the time of Athenaeus, who frequently refers to them.

I. Περίπλους is the name given to the former of Mnaseas's two works by Athenaeus (viii. p. 331, e.), Photius, and Suidas (s. v. πύθου χελιδόνος), and seems to be its correct title. Stephanus of Byzantium (s. v. Ἐγγειᾶνες) calls it, The Three Books of Periegeseis (γ' τῶν περιηγήσεων), where the plural probably refers to the work being divided into three sections, each of which was again subdivided into several books. Periplus was thus the general title; but the three sections, which treated of Europe, Asia, and Africa respectively, are frequently referred to as distinct works.

1. Εὐρώπη, or Εὐρωπιακά, was divided into three books: at least we have a quotation from the third book of this section. The first book appears to have treated of the history of inventions, and consequently of the civilisation of Europe; and the second and third to have been devoted to a description of the coasts of the various parts of Europe. (Athen. iv. p. 158, d., vii. p. 296, b., xii. p. 530, c.; Harpocrat. s. v. Ἱππία; Bekker, Anecd. Graec. p. 350, 26; Schol. ad Theocr. i. 64; Ammon. s. v. Νηρεῖδες; Phot. and Suid. s. v. Πραξιδίκη; Schol. ad Germanic. Prognost. apud Arat. vol. ii. p. 111, ed. Buhl; Fulgent. Mythol. ii. 19.)

2. Ασία, was also divided into several books, of which the first and second are quoted. (Schol. ad Apollon. i. 1128; Eudocia, p. 103; Athen. viii. p. 346, d. e.)

3. Λιβύη, likewise contained several books (Μνασέας ἐν τοῖς περὶ Λιβύης), but their number is not mentioned. (Hesych. s. v. Βαρκαίοις ὄχοις; Plin. H. N. xxxvii. 11. s. 38.)

II. Δελφικῶν χρησμῶν συναγωγή, is the name of the other work of Mnaseas on the Delphic oracles. (Schol. ad Hes. Theog. 117.) Sometimes it is simply called Περὶ χρησμῶν. (Schol. ad Pind. Ol. ii. 70.) The following passages, in which Mnaseas is quoted, seem to be taken from this collection of Delphic oracles:—Zenob. v. 74; Schol. ad Eurip. Phoen. 411; Phot. and Suid. s. v. ὑμεῖς ὦ Μεγαρεῖς; Tzetz. Chil. ix. 871—894.

(Vossius, de Hist. Graec. p. 178, ed. Westermann; Clinton, F. H. vol. iii. p. 534; Jahn, de Palamede, p. 31; and more especially Preller, in the Zeitschrift für die Alterthumswissenschaft, 1846, pp. 673—688, from whom the preceding account is chiefly taken.)

2. An Agricultural writer, who translated into Greek the works of the Carthaginians Mago and Hamilcar on this subject. (Varro, R. R. i. 1; Colum. xii. 4.)

3. Of Berytus, a rhetorician, who, according to Suidas (s. v.), wrote a τέχνη ῥητορική, and περὶ Ἀττικῶν ὀνομάτων.

4. Of Locri or Colophon, a poet, who left behind him a collection of Παίγνια. (Athen. vii. p. 321, f.; Eustath. p. 1163, 14.)

5. A disciple of the great grammarian Aristarchus (Suid. s. v. Ἐρατοσθένης). He is mentioned also in the Venetian scholia on the Iliad. (Villcison, Prolegom. p. xxx.)

MNA'SEAS (Μνασέας), or MNASAEUS (Μνασαῖος), a physician, who belonged to the ancient sect of the Methodici (Gal. Introd. c. 4. vol. xiv. p. 684), and lived probably in the first century after Christ. He wrote some medical works, which are not now extant; and he is quoted by Galen (De Compos. Medicam. sec. Gen. i. 4, 17, vii. 5, vol. xiii. pp. 392, 445, 962, 963, 965), Soranus (De Arte Obstetr. pp. 21, 23, 279, 289, ed. Dietz), Caelius Aurelianus (De Morb. Acut. ii. 5, 29, De Morb. Chron. i. 5, ii. 1, 7, pp. 81, 142, 329, 348, 380), Aëtius (ii. 2. 18, 89, pp. 258, 290), Paulus Aegineta (vii. 17, p. 676), and Alexander Tralianus (iii. 7, vii. 1, pp. 187, 213). [W. A. G.]

MNASICLES (Μνασικλῆς), a Cretan officer of mercenaries, who joined Thimbron the Lacedaemonian, in his expedition against Cyrene; but quickly deserted him, and went over to the Cyrenaeans, by whom he was ultimately appointed general, and carried on the war against Thimbron. (Diod. xviii. 20, 21.) [E. H. B.]

MNASI'LOCHUS (Μνασίλοχος), was a chief of the Acarnanians, who, in B. C. 191, was bribed by Antiochus the Great, and, in return, persuaded or fraudulently compelled a diet of his countrymen to embrace the Syrian instead of the Roman alliance. In all the preliminaries of peace between Rome and Antiochus, after the defeat of the latter at Magnesia in B. C. 190, one article was the surrender of Mnasilochus to the Romans. (Polyb. xxi. 14. § 7, xxii. 26. § 11; Liv. xxxvi. 11, 12, xxxvii. 45, xxxviii. 38.) [W. B. D.]

MNASINUS (Μνασίνους), a brother of Anaxis, and a son of one of the Dioscuri; he and his brother were represented on the throne of Apollo at Amyclae. (Paus. ii. 22. § 6, iii. 18. § 7.) [L. S.]

MNASIPPUS (Μνάσιππος), a Lacedaemonian, was appointed to the command of the armament which was sent to Corcyra, in B. C. 373, to recover the island from the Athenians. Having landed there, he ravaged the country, and, blockading the city by sea and land, reduced the Corcyraeans to the greatest extremities. Imagining, however, that success was now within his grasp, he dismissed some of his mercenaries and kept the pay of the rest in arrear. It would appear, too, that discipline was less strictly preserved among his men than heretofore; for we read that the several posts of the besiegers were now imperfectly guarded, and that their soldiers were dispersed in straggling parties throughout the country. The Corcyraeans, observing this, made a sally, in which they slew some, and made some prisoners. Mnasippus proceeded in haste against them, ordering his officers to lead out the mercenaries; and, when they represented to him that they could not answer for the obedience of the men while they remained unpaid, he met their remonstrances with blows—an exhibition of coarse arrogance by no means uncommon with Spartans in power. It may well be conceived that the spirit which animated his troops was not one of alacrity or of attachment to his person. In the battle which ensued close to the gates of the town, the Corcyraeans were victorious and Mnasippus was slain. According to Diodorus, these successful operations were conducted under the command of Ctesicles (doubtless the Stesicles of Xenophon), whom the Athenians had sent to the aid of Corcyra with a body of 500 or 600 tar-geteers. (Xen. Hell. vi. 2. §§ 4—23; Diod. xv. 46, 47; Wesseling, ad loc.; Schneider, ad Xen. Hell. vi. 2. § 10; Rehdantz, Vitae Iphicratis, Chabriae, Timothei, iv. § 3. Berol. 1845. [E. E.]

MNASI'THEUS. [MNESITHEUS.]

MNASITI'MUS. [MNESITIMUS.]

MNASON (Μνάσων). 1. A Phocian, a friend and disciple of Aristotle. He seems to have incurred considerable odium on account of the large number of domestic slaves whom he kept. (Athen. vi. p. 264, d. 272, b.) Whether it was this Mnason who came on an embassy to Athens, and was appealed to as a witness by Aeschines (de Falsa Leg. p. 47, ed. Steph.), we are not informed.

2. Tyrant of Elatea. He seems to have distinguished himself by his liberal patronage of the fine arts. For a picture painted by Aristeides he paid 1000 minae; and for pictures of the twelve gods by Asclepiodorus 300 minae for each. (Plin. H. N. xxxv. 36. § 18, 21.) [C. P. M.]

MNEMARCHUS (Μνήμαρχος), is the name sometimes given to the father of Pythagoras; but his proper name is Mnesarchus. [MNESARCHUS, No. 1.] [C. P. M.]

MNEME (Μνήμη), i. e. memory, was one of the three Muses that were in early times worshipped at Ascra in Boeotia. (Paus. ix. 29. § 2.) But there seems to have also been a tradition that Mneme was the mother of the Muses, for Ovid (Met. v. 268) calls them Mnemonides; unless this be only an abridged form for the daughters of Mnemosyne. [Comp. MUSAE.] [L. S.]

MNEMON (Μνήμων), a physician of Side, in Pamphylia, who was a follower of Cleophantus, and lived in the third century B. C. (Galen, Comment. in Hippocr. "Epid. III." ii. 4, iii. 71, vol. xvii. pt. i. pp. 603, 606, 731). He is known only as one of the individuals whose name occurs in connection with the marks or characters (χαρακτῆρες) appended to certain medical cases in the third book of Hippocrates, "De Morbis Popularibus," of which Mnemon was by some persons (but probably without sufficient reason) supposed to be the author. (See Littré's Hippocrates, vol. i. p. 274.) [W. A. G.]

MNEMO'SYNE (Μνημοσύνη), i. e. memory, a daughter of Uranus, and one of the Titanides, became by Zeus the mother of the Muses. (Hom. Hymn. in Merc. 429; Hes. Theog. 54, 915; Diod. v. 67; Orph. Hymn. 76; Cic. De Nat. Deor. iii. 21.) Pausanias (i. 2. § 4) mentions a statue of Mnemosyne at Athens; and near the oracle of Trophonius she had a sacred well and a throne. (Paus. ix. 39. § 4, &c.) [L. S.]

MNESAECHMUS (Μνήσαιχμος), an Athenian orator of the time of Demosthenes, is also called Menesaechmus. [MENESAECHMUS.]

MNESARCHUS (Μνήσαρχος). 1. The son of Euphron or Euthyphron, and father of Pythagoras. He was generally believed to be not of purely Greek origin. According to some accounts, he belonged to the Tyrrhenians of Lemnos and Imbros, and is said to have been an engraver of rings. (Clemens Alex. Strom. i. p. 300; Schol. ad Plat. Rep. p. 420, ed. Bekk.; Diog. Laërt. viii. 1; Porphyr. Vit. Pyth. 1, 2.) According to other accounts, the name of the father of Pythagoras was Marmacus, whose father Hippasus came from Phlius. (Paus. ii. 13; Diog. Laërt. viii. 1.)

2. Grandson of the preceding, and son of Pythagoras and Theano. According to some accounts he succeeded Aristaeus [ARISTAEUS] as president of the Pythagorean school. (Suid. s. v. Θεανώ; Iamblich. Vit. Pyth. c. 36.) According to a notice in Photius (Cod. 259, p. 438, b. ed. Bekker), he died young.

3. A Stoic philosopher, a disciple of Panaetius. He flourished about B. C. 110, and appears to have been one of the most distinguished of his sect. He taught at Athens. Among his pupils was Antiochus of Ascalon. [ANTIOCHUS.] (Cic. de Fin. i. 2, de Orat. i. 11, Acad. ii. 22; Euseb. Praep. Evang. xiv. p. 739.) [C. P. M.]

MNE'SICLES (Μνησικλῆς), one of the great Athenian artists of the age of Pericles, was the architect of the Propylaea of the Acropolis, the building of which occupied five years, B. C. 437—433. It is said that, during the progress of the work, he fell from the summit of the building, and was supposed to be mortally injured, but was cured by an herb which Athena showed to Pericles in a dream. (Philoch. Frag. p. 55; Plut. Peric. 13.) Pliny relates the same story of a slave (verna) of Pericles, and mentions a celebrated statue of the same slave by Stipax, which, from its attitude, was called Splanchnoptes. (Plin. H. N. xxii. 17. s. 20, xxxiv. 8. s. 19. § 21.) [P. S.]

MNESI'LOCHUS (Μνησίλοχος), one of the thirty tyrants at Athens. (Xen. Hellen. ii. 3. § 2.)

2. The father of Choerine or Choerilla, the first wife of Euripides [EURIPIDES]. He is introduced by Aristophanes as one of the dramatis personae in the Thesmophoriazusae. Teleclides (as quoted by the author of the life of Euripides, published by Elmsley in his edition of the Bacchae) asserted that Mnesilochus assisted Euripides in the composition of some of his plays. (Suidas s. v. Εὐριπίδης.)

3. Son of Euripides by his wife Choerilla. He was an actor. (Eurip. Vit.) [C. P. M.]

MNESI'MACHE (Μνησιμάχη), is the name given by Apollodorus (ii. 5. § 5) to the daughter of Dexamenus, more usually called Deïaneira. [DEXAMENUS.] [L. S.]

MNESI'MACHUS (Μνησίμαχος). 1. A comic poet of the Middle Comedy, according to Suidas (s. v.) and Athenaeus (vii. p. 329, d.). This is also confirmed by the titles of his pieces. Eudocia (p. 303) calls him a poet of the New Comedy. Nothing further is known respecting him. The following plays of his are mentioned:—1. Βούσιρις (Athen. x. p. 417, e.; Suid.). 2. Δύσκολος (Athen. viii. p. 359, c.). 3. Ἱπποτρόφος (Suidas and Athen. vii. p. 301, d. 322, e. and ix. p. 402, f. where a passage of considerable length is quoted). 4. Φίλιππος. 5. Ἀλκμαίων (Diog. Laërt. viii. 37). The Alcmaeon referred to in this play is supposed by Meineke to have been the Pythagorean philosopher of that name [ALCMAEON], from the tenor of the lines quoted by Diogenes Laërtius. 6. Ἰσθμιονίκη (Aelian, H. A. xiii. 4). 7. Φαρμακοπώλη (Schol. Arist. Aves, 471; according to the correction of Menagius on Diog. Laërt. ii. 18.) (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. ii. 470; Meineke, Hist. Crit. Com. Graec. p. 423.)

2. An historical writer, a native of Phaselis, the author of a work entitled Διάκοσμοι, quoted by the scholiast on Apollonius Rhodius, iv. 1412. The first book, which treated of the Scythians, is also referred to by the Schol. on ii. 1015. (Vossius, de Hist. Graec. p. 471, ed. Westermann; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. ii. 470.) [C. P. M.]

MNESI'PHILUS (Μνησίφιλος), an Athenian, who pointed out to Themistocles, B. C. 480, the extreme impolicy of the measure which had been agreed on by the Greek generals, viz. to withdraw the fleet from Salamis and fight the Persians at the isthmus of Corinth. Hereupon Themistocles persuaded Eurybiades to call another council, and therein with much difficulty prevailed on the generals to maintain their position at Salamis. According to Plutarch, Themistocles had, in a great measure, formed himself on the model of Mnesiphilus, who, he tells us, was addicted neither to the arts of rhetoric nor to the speculations of physical philosophy ; but was a man of sound, strong, practical, good sense. With nothing of the sophist about him, he applied himself entirely to politics, and was a good specimen of an Athenian statesman of the old school of Solon. This intellectual connection of his with the great legislator is, by a bold fiction of chronology, converted into one of personal friendship, in the Banquet of the Seven Sages, ascribed to Plutarch. (Herod. viii. 57, &c.; Plut. Them. 2, 11, de Herod. Malign. 37, Conv. Sept. Sap. 11.) [E. E.]

MNESIPTO'LEMUS (Μνησιπτόλεμος), an historical writer, who was in great favour with Antiochus the Great. (Athen. xv. p. 697, d.) He was satirised by the comic poet Epinicus. (Athen. x. p. 432, b.) [C. P. M.]

MNESI'STRATUS. 1. An astronomer mentioned by Censorinus (de Die Nat. c. 18). He was the author of a modification of the cycle, called ὀκταετηρίς.

2. A native of Thasos, a disciple of Plato. (Diog. Laërt. iii. 47.)

There was a sect of philosophers called Mnesistrateans, but who their founder was is not known. (Athen. vii. p. 279.) [C. P. M.]

MNESI'THEUS or MNASI'THEUS, a Sicyonian painter of some note. (Plin. H. N. xxxv. 11. s. 40. § 42.) [P. S.]

MNESI'THEUS (Μνησίθεος), a physician, who was a native of Athens, and lived probably in the fourth century B. C., as he is quoted by the comic poet Alexis (ap. Athen. Deipnos. x. § 14. p. 419). He belonged to the medical sect of the Dogmatici (Galen, Introd. c. 4, vol. xiv. p. 683, De Venae Sect. adv. Erasistr. c. 5. vol. xi. p. 163). He enjoyed a great reputation, and was particularly celebrated for his classification of diseases (Id. ad Glauc. de Meth. Med. i. 1, vol. xi. p. 3). He wrote a work "On Diet," Περὶ Ἐδεστῶν, or, according to Galen (De Alim. Facult. ii. 61, vol. vi. p. 645), Περὶ Ἐδεσμάτων, which is several times quoted by Athenaeus (ii. 54, 57, iii. 80, 92, 96, 106, 121, viii. 357, &c.). He wrote another work, Περὶ Κωθωνισμοῦ, "On Tippling" (Id. Ibid. xi. 483), in which he recommended this practice. He is frequently mentioned by Galen, and generally in favourable terms ; as also by Rufus Ephesius, A. Gellius (xiii. 30), Soranus (De Arte Obstetr. pp. 184, 201), Pliny (H. N. xxi. 9), Plutarch (Quaest. Nat. c. 26, vol. v. p. 334, ed. Tauchn.), and Oribasius (Coll. Medic. viii. 9, 38, pp. 342, 357). See also Dietz's Scholia in Hippocr. et Gal. vol. i. pp. 239, 240, 241 ; and Matthaei's Collection, entitled "XXI. Vet. et Clar. Medicor. Graec. Opusc." His tomb was still existing in Attica in the time of Pausanias (Att. c. 37. § 3).

2. A physician of Cyzicus in Mysia, quoted by Oribasius (Coll. Medic. iv. 4, p. 251). See also Matthaei's Collection quoted above. [W. A. G.]

MNESITI'MUS or MNASITI'MUS, a painter of some note, was the son and disciple of Aristonides. (Plin. H. N. xxxv. 11. s. 40. § 42.) [P. S.]

MNESTER (Μνήστηρ). 1. A celebrated pantomime actor in the reigns of Caligula and Claudius. The former emperor prized Mnester's acting so highly, that he used to kiss him before the audience, and once chastised with his own hands an eques who had made some disturbance during his performance. It was accounted among the portents of Caligula's death that on the morning of his assassination Mnester played a character which the tragedian Neoptolemus, centuries before, had acted on the day of Philip of Macedon's murder by Pausanias, B. C. 336. Under Claudius Mnester retained his popularity and his favour at court. He was among the many lovers of Poppaea Sabina, the mother of Nero's empress, and of Messalina, the wife of Claudius. [MESSALINA.] At first, through dread of the emperor, Mnester rejected Messalina's advances. But she had the art to persuade her imbecile husband to command the reluctant player to be compliant to her in all things ; and, till supplanted by C. Silius, he remained her favourite. That she might have his society without interruption, she compelled him to abandon the stage, and thereby nearly occasioned a serious riot at Rome, for the people resented the sacrifice of their pleasures to those of the empress. The tumult was in some measure appeased by a foolish excuse which Claudius assigned for Mnester's absence : he told the people that "Mnester belonged to his wife—he had no power to make him act." On the triumph for the campaign in Britain, A. D. 44, the brass money issued in Caligula's reign was called in and melted down, and part of the metal cast into statues of Mnester. He was involved in Messalina's ruin, and was put to death pleading the emperor's own order of compliance to her will. (Suet. Cal. 36, 55, 57 ; Tac. Ann. xi. 4, 36 ; Sen. Mort. Claud. ed. Bipont. p. 256 ; Dion Cass. lx. 22, 28, 31.)

2. A freedman of Agrippina, the mother of Nero, who, after her death, either from grief for his patroness, or from dread of exile, slew himself on her tomb, near Misenum, A. D. 60. (Tac. Ann. xiv. 9.) [W. B. D.]

MNESTHEUS, a Trojan, who accompanied Aeneas to Italy, and is described by Virgil as the ancestral hero of the Memmii. (Virg. Aen. v. 117, &c.) [L. S.]

MOA'GETES, tyrant of the Cibyrates, in Upper Phrygia, had made himself conspicuous by his enmity to Rome during the war with Antiochus the Great. In B. C. 189, the consul Cn. Manlius Vulso, condemned Moagetes to pay a fine of 100 talents and to furnish 10,000 medimni of wheat for the use of the legions. (Polyb. xxii. 17; Liv. xxxviii. 14.) [W. B. D.]

MOCHUS (Μωχός) a native of Phoenicia, the author of a work on Phoenician history quoted by Athenaeus (iii. p. 126, a). Strabo (xvi. p. 757) speaks of one Mochus or Moschus (the reading varies) of Sidon, as the author of the atomic theory, and says that he was more ancient than the Trojan war. This statement he gives on the authority of Posidonius. It is impossible, of course, to tell from such a scanty notice whether he refers to the same person, or whether he really lived so early.

It has generally been supposed that the Ochus mentioned by Diogenes Laërtius (i. 1) is the same person as the Mochus referred to by Athenaeus. Suidas also calls him Ochus; but he has evidently only copied the passage in Diogenes Laërtius. But the mistake, if it is one, may easily have crept into the MSS. before his time. Josephus (Ant. Jud. i. 8. s. 5) refers to Mochus, as do also Tatianus (adv. Gent. p. 217) and Eusebius (Praep. Evang. x. p. 289). (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. i. p. 226, vol. iii. p. 807; Vossius, de Hist. Graec. p. 471, ed. Westermann.) [C. P. M.]

MOCILLA, L. JU'LIUS, a man of praetorian rank, who espoused the republican party after the death of Julius Caesar, and fought in the army of Cassius and Brutus at the battle of Philippi (B. C. 42). After the loss of that battle he fled to Samothrace, with his son and others of his party, and their wants were supplied by Pomponius Atticus, who sent from Epeirus every thing that they needed. (Corn. Nep. Attic. 11.)

MODERA'TUS, a native of Gades, a distinguished follower of the Pythagorean system, who flourished in the time of the emperor Nero. He wrote a work on the dogmas of his sect. He was a man of considerable eloquence, and was to some extent imitated by Iamblichus. (Porphyr. p. 32; Suidas, s. v. Γάδειρα.) A fragment of his is preserved in Stobaeus (Eclog. p. 3). [C. P. M.]

MODESTI'NUS, HERE'NNIUS, a Roman jurist, and a pupil of Ulpian, whom Modestinus cites in terms of high commendation. (Dig. 26. tit. 6. s. 2.) His name, Herennius, is mentioned in a passage of Ulpian (Dig. 47. tit. 2. s. 53. § 20), if the Herennius Modestinus there mentioned is the jurist, which we assume to be the fact. The words of Ulpian, "Herennio Modestino studioso meo de Dalmatia consulenti rescripsi," are ambiguous: some take them to mean that Modestinus was a native of Dalmatia, which cannot be the meaning of the words; others more probably take the words to mean that Modestinus was then in Dalmatia. But the assumption that he was proconsul of Dalmatia is not proved by the words of Ulpian, who would hardly have omitted his title if Modestinus held that rank. All that we can conclude from the words of Ulpian is that Modestinus asked his advice about Dalmatia. Zimmern says that "he may have been the person who in the year 979 (A. D. 226), as proconsul of Dalmatia, decided an eighteen years' suit;" and this decision, he says, is mentioned in an inscription in Fabretti (p. 278). This is one of the strangest blunders ever made. The matter is stated correctly by Puchta. (Cursus, vol. i. p. 489.) The name of Herennius Modestinus occurs in an inscription, which inscription also states that the first decision in the matter referred to by the inscription was made by Aelius Florianus; it was confirmed by Herennius Modestinus, and again confirmed by Faltonius Restitutianus, praefectus vigilum. This inscription was found at Rome, and it contains nothing about Dalmatia; and yet the conclusion of Zimmern is that the passage in Ulpian, which was probably written in the time of Caracalla, and this inscription, which records a judgment in the time of Alexander Severus, establish the fact of Modestinus being governor of Dalmatia.

Modestinus was writing under Alexander Severus, as appears from the terms in which he mentions the emperor (Dig. 48. tit. 10. s. 29); and he was one of his consiliarii. He also taught law to the younger Maximinus. (Capitol. Maximin. Jun. 1.) In a rescript of Gordian (A. D. 239) mention is made of a Responsum which Modestinus had given to the person to whom the rescript is directed. (Cod. 3. tit. 42. s. 5.) Modestinus often cites Ulpian, and he is cited by Aurelius Arcadius Charisius.

Though Modestinus is the latest of the great Roman jurists, he ranks among the most distinguished. There are 345 excerpts in the Digest from his writings, the titles of which show the extent and variety of his labours.

Modestinus wrote both in Greek and Latin. From the six books of Excusationes, which were written in Greek, an extract, which contains the beginning of the work, is preserved in the Digest (27. tit. 1). There are also excerpts from the nine books of Differentiae, ten books of Regulae, nineteen books of Responsa, twelve books of Pandectae, from which there are many extracts, four books on Poenae, and the single treatises De Enucleatis Casibus, De Eurematicis or Heurematicis, De Inofficioso Testamento, De Manumissionibus, and De Praescriptionibus. This last work must be distinguished from another of the same name, which is not mentioned in the Florentine Index, and which consisted of four books at least. (Dig. 45. tit. 1. s. 101.) Other works were, De Ritu Nuptiarum, De Differentia Dotis, and the single treatises De Legatis et Fideicommissis, and De Testamentis, which are mentioned in the Florentine Index.

The Florentine Index does not mention the Libri ad Quintum Mucium, though there are two excerpts from this work in the Digest, from the fourteenth and thirty-first books respectively. (Dig. 41. tit. 1. s. 53, 54.)

A rescript of the emperors Septimius Severus and Antoninus Caracalla, A. D. 204 (Cod. 4. tit. 2. s. 1), can hardly have been directed to this Modestinus, who lived to the time of Gordian; for it is dated thirty-five years before the time of Gordian, and, besides this, the demand of Modestinus is characterised as neither equitable nor usual. (G. Grotius, Vitae Jurisconsultorum, &c.; Puchta, Cursus der Institutionen, vol. i. p. 459; Zimmern, Geschichte des Röm. Privatrechts, p. 383; Fabretti, Inscript. Antiq., Romae, 1699, p. 278.) [G. L.]

MODESTUS. 1. The author of a Libellus de Vocabulis Rei Militaris, addressed to the emperor Tacitus. It contains an explanation of some common terms, and an outline of the system pursued at that period in classifying and disciplining soldiers. It is very brief, and presents no features of interest or importance. The compiler has been most unjustly charged with copying Vegetius, who flourished nearly a century later under Valentinianus.

Modestus first appeared in a 4to volume without date and without name of place or printer, but which, according to the best bibliographical authorities, was printed at Rome by Jo. Schurener de Bopardia about 1474, and contains also Pomponius Laetus de Magistratibus Urbis. The tract was subsequently included in all the chief collections of Scriptores de Re Militari, and appears under its best form in the edition of that Corpus published with the notes of Stevechius, Modius, and Schriverius at Wesel (Vesalia Clivorum), 8vo. 1680.

2. The name of Modestus is prefixed to three elegiac distichs in the Latin Anthology, the words of the dying Lucretia. The verses are very bad, and we know nothing of the author. (Burmann, Anthol. Lat. ii. 171, No. 557, Meyer.) [W. R.]

MODESTUS, JU'LIUS, a freedman of Julius Hyginus, who was himself a freedman of the emperor Augustus [HYGINUS], followed in the footsteps of his patron, and like him became distinguished as a Roman grammarian. He wrote a work entitled Quaestiones Confusae, in at least two books, containing, as it would seem, discussions on various grammatical and antiquarian subjects. (Suet. de Illustr. Gramm. 20; Gell. iii. 9; Macrob. Saturn. i. 4, 10, 16.)

MO'DIUS, a Roman name, which rarely occurs. Varro (de Re Rust. ii. 7) speaks of a Q. Modius Equiculus, and Cicero (Verr. ii. 48) of a M. Modius. Juvenal (iii. 130) also mentions a rich Roman matron of the name of Modia.

MOERA'GENES (Μοιραγένης), one of the royal body-guards at the Egyptian court, was suspected by the profligate Agathocles, who had been minister of Ptolemy Philopater, and was now guardian of the young Epiphanes, of being leagued with Tlepolemus and others in a conspiracy against him. Agathocles accordingly ordered Nicostratus, his secretary, to examine Moeragenes with torture. When the latter had been stripped for this purpose, a servant entered and whispered something in the ear of Nicostratus, who immediately left the room in great agitation. The attendants, who were to have administered the torture, gazed at one another in wonder for some time, and then one by one withdrew. Moeragenes, thus left alone, fled forth, naked as he was, to a tent near the palace, where a party of soldiers were taking their mid-day meal, and by his exhortations incited them to raise the tumult which ended in the murder of Agathocles and his family, B. C. 202. (Polyb. xv. 27, &c.) [AGATHOCLEA.] [E. E.]

MOERIS or MYRIS (Μοῖρις, Μύρις), a king of Egypt, who, Herodotus tells us, reigned some 900 years before his own visit to that country, which seems to have been about B. C. 450. According to Diodorus, he was twelve generations after Uchoreus, the founder of Memphis. We hear of Moeris that he erected the northern gateway of the temple of Hephaestus at Memphis, and that he formed the lake known by his name and joined it by a canal to the Nile, in order to receive the waters of the river when they were superabundant, and to supply the defect when they did not rise sufficiently. In the lake he built two pyramids, on each of which was a stone statue, seated on a throne, and intended to represent himself and his wife. The revenue from the fishing of the lake was very large, and was given to the queen for her personal expences in dress and perfumes. According to a statement of Anticleides, quoted by Diogenes Laërtius, Moeris was the discoverer of the elements of geometry. (Herod. ii. 13, 101, 149; Diod. i. 52; Plin. H. N. v. 9, xxxvi. 13; Strab. xvii. pp. 789, 809, 810; Diog. Laërt. viii. 11; comp. Menag. ad loc.; Plat. Phaedr. p. 274; Bunsen, Aegyptens Stelle in der Weltgeschichte, vol. ii. p. 198, &c.) [E. E.]

MOERIS (Μοῖρις), commonly called MOERIS ATTI'CISTA, a distinguished grammarian, the author of a work which is still extant, entitled Μοίριδος Ἀττικιστοῦ λέξεις Ἀττικῶν καὶ Ἑλλήνων κατὰ στοιχεῖον, though the title varies somewhat in different manuscripts. Photius (Cod. 157) gives Ἀττικιστής as the name of the treatise itself. In some manuscripts the name of the author is given as Eumoeris or Eumoerides. Of the personal history of the author nothing is known. He is conjectured to have lived about the end of the second century after Christ. His treatise is a sort of comparison of the Attic with other Greek dialects; consisting of a list of Attic words and expressions, which are illustrated or explained by those of other dialects, especially the common Greek. Though various manuscripts had been referred to by different scholars, the work was first published in 1712, at Oxford, edited by Hudson. A better edition is that by Pierson. More recent editions have appeared in Germany by Koch and Jacobitz. [C. P. M.]

MOERO (Μοιρώ), or MYRO (Μυρώ), a Byzantine poetess, the wife of Andromachus surnamed Philologus, and mother of the grammarian and tragic poet Homerus [HOMERUS]. She wrote epic, elegiac, and lyric poems. Athenaeus (xi. p. 490, e.) quotes a passage from a poem written by her, named Μνημοσύνη. Eustathius (ad Il. ii. p. 247) mentions a hymn to Poseidon, the production of Myro, who is probably identical with Moero, who is called Myro by Suidas. One of her epigrams is contained in the Anthology (iv. 1). Other fragments are given in Brunck's Anal. vol. i. p. 202. (Suidas, s. v. Μυρώ, with Küster's note; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. p. 131, &c.; Groddeck, Initia Hist. Graec. Lit. ii. p. 4.) [C. P. M.]

MOEROCLES (Μοιροκλῆς), an Athenian orator, a native of Salamis. He was a contemporary of Demosthenes, and like him an opponent of Philip and Alexander, and was one of the anti-Macedonian orators whom Alexander demanded to have given up to him after the destruction of Thebes, though he subsequently withdrew his demand on the mediation of Demades. (Arrian, i. 10. § 7.) We find mention of him as the advocate of Theocrines [THEOCRINES], and in the oration against Theocrines, which is usually placed among those of Demosthenes (p. 1339, ed. Reiske), he is spoken of as the author of a decree in accordance with which the Athenians and their allies joined their forces for the suppression of piracy. On one occasion he was prosecuted by Eubulus for an act of extortion practised upon those who rented the silver mines (Dem. de Falsa Leg. c. 81, p. 435), and Timocles, the comic poet (ap. Athen. viii. p. 341) speaks of him as having received bribes from Harpalus. At one period of his life he had been imprisoned, though we do not know on what charge. He was afterwards the accuser of the sons of Lycurgus, according to Demosthenes (Epist. 3, p. 1478). According to Plutarch, however, it was Menesaechmus on whose charge they were imprisoned (Vit. X. Orat. p. 8428). Moerocles is mentioned by Aristotle (Rhet. iii. 10). [C. P. M.]

MOIRA (Μοῖρα) properly signifies "a share," and as a personification "the deity who assigns to every man his fate or his share," or the Fates. Homer usually speaks of only one Moira, and only once mentions the Μοῖραι in the plural. (Il. xxiv. 29.) In his poems Moira is fate personified, which, at the birth of man, spins out the thread of his future life (Il. xxiv. 209), follows his steps, and directs the consequences of his actions according to the counsel of the gods. (Il. v. 613; xx. 5.) Homer thus, when he personifies Fate, conceives her as spinning, an act by which also the power of other gods over the life of man is expressed. (Il. xxiv. 525, Od. i. 17, iii. 208, iv. 208.) But the personification of his Moira is not complete, for he mentions no particular appearance of the goddess, no attributes, and no parentage; and his Moira is therefore quite synonymous with Αἶσα. (Il. xx. 127, xxiv. 209.) If in Od. vii. 197, the Κατακλῶθες are the Moirae, and not the Eileithyiae, as some suppose, Αἶσα and Moira would indeed be two distinct beings, but still beings performing entirely the same functions.

The Homeric Moira is not, as some have thought, an inflexible fate, to which the gods themselves must bow; but, on the contrary, Zeus, as the father of gods and men, weighs out their fate to them (Il. viii. 69, xxii. 209; comp. xix. 108); and if he chooses, he has the power of saving even those who are already on the point of being seized by their fate (Il. xvi. 434, 441, 443); nay, as Fate does not abruptly interfere in human affairs, but avails herself of intermediate causes, and determines the lot of mortals not absolutely, but only conditionally, even man himself, in his freedom, is allowed to exercise a certain influence upon her. (Od. i. 34, Il. ix. 411, xvi. 685.) As man's fate terminates at his death, the goddess of fate at the close of life becomes the goddess of death, μοῖρα θανάτοιο (Od. xxiv. 29, ii. 100, iii. 238), and is mentioned along with death itself, and with Apollo, the bringer of death. (Il. iii. 101, v. 83, xvi. 434, 853, xx. 477, xxi. 101, xxiv. 132.)

Hesiod (Theog. 217, &c., 904; comp. Apollod. i. 3. § 1) has the personification of the Moirae complete; for he calls them, together with the Keres, daughters of Night; and distinguishes three, viz. Clotho, or the spinning fate; Lachesis, or the one who assigns to man his fate; and Atropos, or the fate that cannot be avoided. According to this genealogy, the Moirae must be considered as in a state of dependence upon their father, and as agreeing with his counsels. Hence he is called Μοιραγέτης, i. e. the guide or leader of the Moirae (Paus. v. 15. § 4), and hence also they were represented along with their father in temples and works of art, as at Megara (Paus. i. 40. § 3), in the temple of Despoena in Arcadia (viii. 37. § 1), and at Delphi (x. 24. § 4; comp. viii. 42. § 2). They are further described as engraving on indestructible tables the decrees of their father Zeus. (Claudian, xv. 202; comp. Ov. Met. xv. 808, &c.) Later writers differ in their genealogy of the Moirae from that of Hesiod; thus they are called children of Erebus and Night (Cic. De Nat. Deor. iii. 17), of Cronos and Night (Tzetz. ad Lyc. 406), of Ge and Oceanus (Athenag. 15; Lycoph. 144), or lastly of Ananke or Necessity. (Plat. De Re Publ. p. 617, d.)

It cannot be surprising to find that the character and nature of the Moirae were conceived differently at different times and by different authors. Sometimes they appear as divinities of fate in the strict sense of the term, and sometimes only as allegorical divinities of the duration of human life. In the former character they are independent, at the helm of necessity, direct fate, and watch that the fate assigned to every being by eternal laws may take its course without obstruction (Aeschyl. Prom. 511, 515); and Zeus, as well as the other gods and men, must submit to them. (Herod. i. 91; Lactant. Institut. i. 11, 13; Stob. Eclog. i. pp. 152, 170.) They assign to the Erinnyes, who inflict the punishment for evil deeds, their proper functions; and with them they direct fate according to the laws of necessity, whence they are sometimes called the sisters of the Erinnyes. (Aeschyl. Eum. 335, 962, Prom. 516, 696, 895; Tzetz. ad Lyc. 406.) Later poets also conceive the Moirae in the same character. (Virg. Aen. v. 798, xii. 147; Tibull. i. 8. 2; Ov. Trist. v. 3. 17, Met. xv. 781; Horat. Carm. Saec. 25, &c.) These grave and mighty goddesses were represented by the earliest artists with staffs or sceptres, the symbol of dominion; and Plato (De Re Pub. p. 617) even mentions their crowns. (Mus. Pio-Clem. tom. vi. tab. B.)

The Moirae, as the divinities of the duration of human life, which is determined by the two points of birth and of death, are conceived either as goddesses of birth or as goddesses of death, and hence their number was two, as at Delphi. (Paus. x. 24. § 4; Plut. de Tranq. An. 15, de Ei ap. Delph. 2.) From this circumstance we may perhaps infer that originally the Greeks conceived of only one Moira, and that subsequently a consideration of her nature and attributes led to the belief in two, and ultimately in three Moirae; though a distribution of the functions among the three was not strictly observed, for in Ovid, for example (ad Liv. 239), and Tibullus (i. 8. 1.), all three are described as spinning, although this should be the function of Clotho alone, who is, in fact, often mentioned alone as the representative of all. (Pind. Ol. i. 40; Ov. ad Liv. 164, Fast. vi. 757, Ex Pont. iv. 15. 36.) As goddesses of birth, who spin the thread of beginning life, and even prophesy the fate of the newly born, they are mentioned along with Eileithyia, who is called their companion and πάρεδρος. (Paus. viii. 21. § 2; Plat. Sympos. p. 206, d.; Pind. Ol. vi. 70, Nem. vii. 1; Anton. Lib. 29; comp. Eurip. Iphig. Taur. 207.) In a similar capacity they are also joined with Prometheus, the former, or creator of the human race in general. (Hygin. Poet. Astr. ii. 15.) The symbol with which they, or rather Clotho alone, are represented to indicate this function, is a spindle, and the idea implied in it was carried out so far, that sometimes we read of their breaking or cutting off the thread when life is to end. (Ov. Am. ii. 6. 46; Plat. de Re Publ. p. 616.) Being goddesses of fate, they must necessarily know the future, which at times they reveal, and thus become prophetic divinities. (Ov. Met. viii. 454, Trist. v. 3. 25; Tibull. i. 8. 1, iv. 5. 3; Catull. 64. 307.) As goddesses of death, they appear together with the Keres (Hes. Scut. Herc. 258) and the infernal Erinnyes, with whom they are even confounded, and in the neighbourhood of Sicyon the annual sacrifices offered to them were the same as those offered to the Erinnyes. (Paus. ii. 11. § 4; comp. Schol. ad Aesch. Agam. 70; Aelian, H. A. x. 33; Serv. ad Aen. i. 86.) It belongs to the same character that, along with the Charites, they lead Persephone out of the lower world into the regions of light, and are mentioned along with Pluto and Charon. (Orph. Hymn. 428; Ov. Fast. vi. 157; comp. Aristoph. Ran. 453.) The various epithets which poets apply to the Moirae generally refer to the severity, inflexibility, and sternness of fate.

They had sanctuaries in many parts of Greece, such as Corinth (Paus. ii. 4. § 7), Sparta (iii. 11. § 8), Olympia (v. 15. § 4), Thebes (ix. 25. § 4), and elsewhere. The poets sometimes describe them as aged and hideous women, and even as lame, to indicate the slow march of fate (Catull. 64, 306 ; Ov. Met. xv. 781 ; Tzetz. ad Lyc. 584) ; but in works of art they are represented as grave maidens, with different attributes, viz., Clotho with a spindle or a roll (the book of fate) ; Lachesis pointing with a staff to the horoscope on the globe ; and Atropos with a pair of scales, or a sun-dial, or a cutting instrument. It is worthy of remark that the Muse Urania was sometimes represented with the same attributes as Lachesis, and that Aphrodite Urania at Athens, according to an inscription on a Hermes-pillar, was called the oldest of the Moirae. (Paus. i. 19. § 2 ; comp. Welcker, Zeitschrift für alt. Kunst, p. 197, &c. ; Blümner, Ueber die Idee des Schicksals, p. 115, &c. ; Hirt. Mytholog. Bilderb. p. 200.)

Moira also occurs as the proper name of a daughter of Cinyras, who is more commonly called Smyrna. (Schol. ad Theocrit. i. 109.) [L. S.]

MOIRA'GETES (Μοιραγέτης), the guide or leader of fate, occurs as a surname of Zeus and Apollo at Delphi. (Paus. x. 24. § 4.) [L. S.]

MOLAE, Roman divinities, are called daughters of Mars. (Gell. xiii. 22.) Hartung (Die Relig. d. Röm. vol. i. p. 130) is inclined to consider their name to be identical with Μῶαι and Μοῦσαι, and accordingly thinks that they were the same as the Camenae ; but in another passage (vol. ii. p. 172) he admits the probability that, as their name plainly indicates, they were in some way connected with the pounding or grinding of grain. [L. S.]

MO'LION (Μολίων). 1. One of the sons of Eurytus who were slain by Heracles along with their father. (Diod. iv. 37 ; comp. EURYTUS.)

2. A Trojan, the charioteer of Thymbraeus. (Hom. Il. xi. 322.) [L. S.]

MO'LIONE. [MOLIONES.]

MO'LIONES or MOLIO'NIDAE (Μολίονες, Μολιονίδαι), a patronymic name by which Eurytus and Cteatus, the sons of Actor, or Poseidon, by Molione, are often designated. They were nephews of Augeas, king of the Epeians. As sons of Actor, they are also called Actoridae, or Ἀκτορίωνε. (Hom. Il. xxiii. 638 ; Ov. Met. viii. 308.) According to a late tradition, they were born out of an egg (Athen. ii. p. 58) ; and it is further stated, that the two brothers were grown together, so that they had only one body, but two heads, four arms, and four legs. (Athen. l. c. ; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 882 ; Pherecyd. Fragm. 47, ed. Sturz ; Plut. De frat. am. 1.) Homer mentions none of these extraordinary circumstances ; and, according to him, the Moliones, when yet boys, took part in an expedition of the Epeians against Neleus and the Pylians. (Il. xi. 709, 750.) When Heracles marched against Augeas to chastise him for refusing to give the reward he had promised, he entrusted the conduct of the war to the Moliones ; but Heracles, who, in the mean time was taken ill and concluded peace with Augeas, was then himself attacked and beaten by them. In order to take vengeance, he afterwards slew them near Cleonae, on the frontiers of Argolis, as they had been sent from Elis to sacrifice at the Isthmian games, on behalf of the town. (Apollod. ii. 7. § 2 ; Pind. Ol. xi. 33, &c., with the Schol. ; Paus. viii. 14. § 6.) The Eleians demanded of the Argives to atone for this murder ; but as the latter refused, and were not excluded from the Isthmian games, Molione cursed the Eleians who should ever take part again in those games. (Paus. v. 2. § 1.) Heracles, on the other hand, dedicated, on account of his victory, six altars at Olympia, and instituted special honours at Nemea for the 360 Cleonaeans who had assisted him, but had fallen in the contest. (Schol. ad Pind. Ol. xi. 29 ; Aelian, V. H. iv. 5.) The Moliones are also mentioned as conquerors of Nestor in the chariot race, and as having taken part in the Calydonian hunt. (Athen. l. c. ; Hom. Il. xxiii. 638, &c. ; Ov. Met. viii. 308.) Cteatus was the father of Amphimachus by Theronice ; and Eurytus, of Thalpius by Theraphone. (Hom. Il. ii. 620 ; Paus. v. 3. § 4.) Their tomb was shown in later times at Cleonae. (Paus. ii. 15. § 1 ; comp. TARAXIPPUS.) [L. S.]

MOLLI'CULUS, MINU'CIUS. [AUGURINUS, No. 9.]

MOLON (Μόλων), a general of Antiochus the Great, who held the satrapy of Media at the accession of that monarch (B. C. 223) ; in addition to which, Antiochus conferred upon him and his brother Alexander the government of all the upper provinces of his empire. But their hatred to Hermeias, the chief minister of Antiochus, soon led them both to revolt : the two generals at first sent against them by the king were unable to oppose their progress, and Molon found himself at the head of a large army, and master of the whole country to the east of the Tigris. He was, however, foiled in his attempts to pass that river ; but Xenoetas, the general of Antiochus, who was now sent against him with a large force, having ventured to cross it in his turn, was surprised by Molon, and his whole army cut to pieces. The rebel satrap now crossed the Tigris, and made himself master of the city of Seleuceia together with the whole of Babylonia and Mesopotamia. But the formidable character which the insurrection had thus assumed, at length determined Antiochus to march in person against the rebels. After wintering at Nisibis, he crossed the Tigris, B. C. 220, and advanced southwards against Molon, who marched from Babylon to meet him. A pitched battle ensued, in which the desertion of the left wing of the rebel army at once decided the victory in favour of the king. Molon himself put an end to his own life, to avoid falling into the hands of the enemy : but his body was crucified by order of Antiochus, or rather of his minister Hermeias. (Polyb. v. 40—54 ; Trog. Pomp. Prol. xxx.) [E. H. B.]

MOLON (Μόλων). 1. A tragic actor of the time of Aristophanes. (Aristoph. Ran. 55.) According to the scholiast, Aristophanes in the passage referred to is speaking ironically, for Molon was a very large man. The scholiast also informs us that Molon had a contemporary of the same name, who was a notorious thief.

2. A surname of Apollonius, the rhetorician of Rhodes. [APOLLONIUS, No. 3.] [C. P. M.]

MOLORCHUS (Μόλορχος), the mythical founder of Molorchia, near Nemea, was a poor man of Cleonae, who hospitably received Heracles when he went out to slay the Nemean lion. (Stephan. Byzant. s. v. Μολορχία ; Apollod. ii. 5. § 1.) [L. S.]

MOLOSSUS (Μολοσσός), a son of Pyrrhus, or Neoptolemus, and Andromache, from whom the country of Molossia was believed to have derived its name. (Paus. i. 11. § 1 ; Schol. ad Pind. Nem. vii. 56 ; Serv. ad Aen. iii. 297.) [L. S.]

MOLPA'DIA (Μολπαδία), an Amazon, who was said to have killed Antiope, another Amazon, and was afterwards slain herself by Theseus. Her tomb was shown at Athens. (Plut. Thes. 27; Paus. i. 2. § 1.) [L. S.]

MOLPA'GORAS (Μολπαγόρας), a demagogue of Cios, in Bithynia, who, by the usual arts of his class, raised himself to absolute power in his state. To the imprudence of the men of Cios, in placing confidence in him and in persons like him, Polybius ascribes mainly the capture of their city by Philip V. of Macedon, in B. C. 202. (Polyb. xv. 21; comp. Liv. xxxii. 33, 34.) [E. E.]

MOLPIS (Μόλπις), a Laconian, the author of a work on the constitution and customs of the Lacedaemonians, entitled Λακεδαιμονίων πολιτεία, quoted by Athenaeus (iv. p. 140, xiv. p. 664). [C. P. M.]

MOLPIS (Μόλπις), a Greek surgeon mentioned by Heracleides of Tarentum (ap. Gal. Comment. in Hippocr. "De Artic." iv. 40, vol. xviii. pt. i. p. 736), who must therefore have lived in or before the third century B. C. He wrote apparently on fractures and luxations. [W. A. G.]

MOLUS (Μῶλος or Μόλος). 1. A son of Ares and Demonice, and a brother of Thestius. (Apollod. i. 7. § 7. DEMONICE.)

2. A son of Deucalion, and father of Meriones. (Hom. Il. x. 269, xiii. 279; Apollod. iii. 3. § 1; Diod. v. 79; Hygin. Fab. 97; comp. MERIONES.) According to a Cretan legend, he was a son of Minos, and a brother of Deucalion (Diod. l. c.); and it was said, that as he had attempted to violate a nymph, he was afterwards found without a head; for at a certain festival in Crete they showed the image of a man without a head, who was called Molus. (Plut. De Def. Orac. 13.) [L. S.]

MOMUS (Μῶμος), a son of Nyx, is a personification of mockery and censure. (Hes. Theog. 214.) Thus he is said to have censured in the man formed by Hephaestus, that a little door had not been left in his breast, so as to enable one to look into his secret thoughts. (Lucian, Hermotim. 20.) Aphrodite alone was, according to him, blameless. (Philostr. Ep. 21.) [L. S.]

MONAESES (Μοναίσης). 1. One of the most distinguished men in Parthia in the time of Antony, the triumvir, is spoken of in Vol. I. p. 357, a.

2. A general of the Parthian king, Vologeses I. [See Vol. I. p. 358, b.]

MONE'TA, a surname of Juno among the Romans, by which she was characterised as the protectress of money. Under this name she had a temple on the Capitoline, in which there was at the same time the mint, just as the public treasury was in the temple of Saturn. The temple had been vowed by the dictator L. Furius in a battle against the Aurunci, and was erected on the spot where the house of M. Manlius Capitolinus had stood. (Liv. iv. 7, 20, vi. 20, vii. 28, xlii. 1; Ov. Fast. i. 638, vi. 183.) Moneta signifies the mint, and such a surname cannot be surprising, as we learn from St. Augustin (De Civ. Dei, vii. 11), that Jupiter bore the surname of Pecunia; but some writers found such a meaning too plain, and Livius Andronicus, in the beginning of his translation of the Odyssey, used Moneta as a translation of Μνημοσύνη, and thus made her the mother of the Muses or Camenae. (Comp. Hygin. Fab. Praef.) Cicero (de Div. i. 45, ii. 32) relates an etymological tale. During an earthquake, he says, a voice was heard issuing from the temple of Juno on the Capitol, and admonishing (monens) that a pregnant sow should be sacrificed. A somewhat more probable reason for the name is given by Suidas (s. v. Μονῆτα), though he assigns it to too late a time. In the war with Pyrrhus and the Tarentines, he says, the Romans being in want of money, prayed to Juno, and were told by the goddess, that money would not be wanting to them, so long as they would fight with the arms of justice. As the Romans by experience found the truth of the words of Juno, they called her Juno Moneta. Her festival was celebrated on the first of June. (Ov. Fast. vi. 183, &c.; Macrob. Sat. i. 12.) [L. S.]

MO'NIMA (Μονίμη), daughter of Philopoemen, a citizen of Stratoniceia, in Ionia, or according to Plutarch, of Miletus. At the capture of her native city by Mithridates, in B. C. 88, her beauty made a great impression on the conqueror, but she had the courage to refuse all his offers, until he consented to marry her, and bestow on her the rank and title of queen. She at first exercised great influence over her husband, but this did not last long, and she soon found but too much reason to repent her elevation, which had the effect of removing her from Greek civilisation and consigning her to a splendid imprisonment. When Mithridates was compelled to abandon his own dominions and take refuge in Armenia, B. C. 72, Monima was put to death at Pharnacia, together with the other wives and sisters of the fugitive monarch. Her correspondence with Mithridates, which was of a licentious character, fell into the hands of Pompey at the capture of the fortress of Caenon Phrourion. (Appian, Mithr. 21, 27, 48; Plut. Lucull. 18, Pomp. 37.) [E. H. B.]

MO'NIMUS (Μόνιμος), son of Pythion, a Macedonian officer, who espoused the cause of Olympias in her final struggle with Cassander, and was one of the last who remained faithful to her; but finding himself unable to relieve her at Pydna, he withdrew to Pella, which city he held for a time, but surrendered it to Cassander after the fall of Pydna, B. C. 316. (Diod. xix. 50.) From an anecdote related by Phylarchus (ap. Athen. xiii. p. 609, b), it appears that he had been attached to the court of Olympias for some time. [E. H. B.]

MO'NIUS. [MONUNIUS.]

MONOBA'ZUS (Μονόβαζος), was king or tetrarch of Adiabene in A. D. 63, when Tigranes, king of Armenia, invaded his kingdom. Monobazus applied for aid to Vologeses, the Parthian monarch; and the troops of Adiabene and Parthia entered Armenia, and invested its capital, Tigranocerta. Monobazus afterwards accompanied Vologeses to the camp of Corbulo [CORBULO] at Randeia, to negotiate a truce between Parthia and Rome. The sons of Monobazus were in the suite of Tiridates on his visit to Nero in A. D. 66. (Tac. Ann. xv. 1, 14; Dion Cass. lxii. 20, 23, lxiii. 1.) [W. B. D.]

MONOECUS (Μόνοικος), a surname of Heracles, signifying the god who lives solitary, perhaps because he alone was worshipped in the temples dedicated to him. (Strab. iv. p. 202; Virg. Aen. vi. 831; Plut. Quaest. Rom. 87.) In Liguria there was a temple called Monoecus (now Monaco; Strab. Virg. ll. cc.; Tacit. Hist. iii. 42; Steph. Byz. s. v.). [L. S.]

MONTA'NUS, ALPI'NUS. [ALPINUS.]

MONTA'NUS, ATTICI'NUS, legatus in Trajan's reign to Lustricus Bruttianus (Mart. iv. 22), was accused by him of various misdemeanours, and of destroying the evidence which had been collected to prove them. Montanus brought against his accuser a counter-charge of malversation in his province. But it completely failed, and Trajan, who presided in person at the trial, condemned Montanus to banishment. (Plin. Ep. vi. 22.) [W.B.D.]

MONTA'NUS, CU'RTIUS, was accused by Eprius Marcellus in A. D. 67 of libelling Nero. The charge was disproved, but Montanus was exiled. At his father's petition, however, he was shortly afterwards recalled, on condition of abstaining from all public employments. In A. D. 71 Montanus was present in the senate, and, on Domitian's moving the restoration of Galba's titles and statues, he proposed that the decree against Piso also should be rescinded. At the same time Montanus vehemently attacked the notorious delator, Aquilius Regulus. (Tac. Ann. xvi. 28, 29, 33, Hist. iv. 40, 42, 43.) If the same person with the Curtius Montanus satirised by Juvenal (iv. 107, 131, xi. 34), Montanus in later life sullied the fair reputation he enjoyed in youth. (Tac. Ann. xvi. 28.) For Juvenal (ll. cc.) describes him as a corpulent epicure, a parasite of Domitian, and a hacknied declaimer. Pliny the Younger addressed two letters to Curtius Montanus (vii. 29, viii. 6.) [W. B. D.]

MONTA'NUS, JU'LIUS, a versifier of some repute in the reign of Tiberius, and one of the emperor's private friends. He is cited by Seneca the rhetorician (Contr. 16), and by Seneca the philosopher (Ep. 122). (Ovid. Ep. ex Pont. iv. 16. 11.) [W. B. D.]

MONTA'NUS, JU'LIUS, was of senatorian rank, but had borne no office when unluckily meeting Nero on one of his drunken nocturnal frolics, he defended himself and beat the emperor. The assault might have been overlooked, but Montanus recognised his assailant, and begged forgiveness. Nero then compelled Montanus to commit suicide, that he might not afterwards boast of the encounter. (Tac. Ann. xiii. 25; comp. Dion Cass. lxi. 9; Suet. Ner. 26.) [W. B. D.]

MONTA'NUS, SP. TARPEIUS CAPITOLI'NUS. [CAPITOLINUS, p. 606.]

MONTA'NUS, VOTIE'NUS, was an orator and declaimer in the reign of Tiberius. From his propensity to refine upon thought and diction, he was named the "Ovid" of the rhetorical schools. Seneca the rhetorician describes the eloquence of Montanus (Contr. Prooem. iv., excerpt. ix. 5), and cites him (Contr. 18, 20, 24, 25, 27, 28, 29, 31, 32). Montanus was convicted on a charge of majestas, and died an exile in the Balearic islands A. D. 25. (Tac. Ann. iv. 42; Euseb. Chron. a. 778.) [W. B. D]

MONU'NIUS (Μονούνιος), a chief of the Illyrian tribe of the Dardanians, whose daughter Etuta was married to the Illyrian king Gentius. (Liv. xliv. 30; Athen. x. p. 440, a.) The name is corruptly written in our editions of Livy Honunius; in those of Athenaeus, Menunius: the true orthography is learnt only from his coins, from which also it appears that he was master of the important Greek city of Dyrrhachium. (Eckhel, vol. ii. p. 157.) Probably MONIUS, which appears at an earlier period as the name of an Illyrian prince at war with Ptolemy Ceraunus (Trog. Pomp. Prolog. xxiv), is only another corruption of the same name, perhaps that of an ancestor of the preceding. (See Droysen, Hellenism. vol. ii. p. 171.) [E. H. B.]

MO'NYCHUS, a centaur who is mentioned by Ovid (Met. xii. 499) and Valerius Flaccus (i. 145). [L. S.]

MOPSUS (Μόψος). 1. A son of Ampyx or Ampycus by the nymph Chloris; and, because he was a seer, he is also called a son of Apollo by Himantis. (Hes. Scut. Herc. 181; Val. Flac. i. 384; Stat. Theb. iii. 521; comp. Orph. Arg. 127.) He was one of the Lapithae of Oechalia or Titaeron (Thessaly), and one of the Calydonian hunters. He is also mentioned among the combatants at the wedding of Peirithous, and was a famous prophet among the Argonauts. He was represented on the chest of Cypselus. (Pind. Pyth. iv. 336; Apollon. Rhod. i. 65; Hygin. Fab. 14; Ov. Met. viii. 316, xii. 456; Paus. v. 17. § 4; Strab. ix. p. 443.) He is said to have died in Libya by the bite of a snake, and to have been buried there by the Argonauts. He was afterwards worshipped as an oracular hero. (Apollon. Rhod. i. 80, iv. 1518, &c.; Tzetz. ad Lyc. 881.)

2. A son of Apollo (or according to Paus. vii. 3. § 2, of Rhacius) and Manto, the daughter of Teiresias. He was believed to be the founder of Mallos in Asia Minor, where his oracle existed as late as the time of Strabo (xiv. p. 675; comp. Plut. de Def. Orac. 45; Conon, Narrat. 6). [L. S.]

MORCUS (Μόρκος), an Illyrian, who, in B C. 168, was sent by Gentius, king of the Illyrians, to receive the hostages and the money which Perseus, king of Macedonia, had engaged to give him as the conditions of his aid against Rome. [GENTIUS.] Morcus proceeded from the court of Perseus to Rhodes, where he was lodged in the Prytaneium, and persuaded the Rhodians to declare themselves neutral for the remainder of the war between Macedon, Illyricum, and Rome. (Polyb. xxix. 2. § 9, 5 § 1; Liv. xliv, 23.) [W. B. D.]

MO'RIUS (Μόριος), that is, the protector of the sacred olive trees, occurs as a surname of Zeus. (Soph. Oed. Col. 705; comp. Liddell and Scott, Gr. Lex. s. v. Μορία.) [L. S.]

MORMO (Μορμώ), a female spectre, with which the Greeks used to frighten little children. (Aristoph. Acharn. 582, Pax, 474.) Mormo was one of the same class of bugbears as Empusa and Lamia. [L. S.]

MORMO'LYCE or MORMOLYCEION (Μορμολύκη, Μορμολυκεῖον), the same phantom or bugbear as Mormo, and also used for the same purpose. (Philostr. Vit. Apollon. iv. 25; Menandr. Reliq. p. 145, ed. Meineke; Aristoph. Thesm. 417; Strab. i. p. 19; Stob. Eclog. p. 1010.) [L. S.]

MORPHEUS (Μορφεύς), the son of Sleep, and the god of dreams. The name signifies the fashioner or moulder, because he shaped or formed the dreams which appeared to the sleeper. (Ov. Met. xi. 635; Hirt, Mythol. Bilderb. p. 199.) [L. S.]

MORPHO (Μορφώ), or the fair shaped, occurs as a surname of Aphrodite at Sparta. She was represented in a sitting posture, with her head covered, and her feet fettered. (Paus. iii. 15. § 8; Lycoph. 449.) [L. S.]

MO'RSIMUS (Μόρσιμος), a tragic poet, the son of Philocles [PHILOCLES], and father of Astydamas. He is attacked and ridiculed more than once by Aristophanes, who classes with villains of the deepest dye in Hades any one who ever copied out a speech of Morsimus. Besides his profession as a poet, he seems to have practised as a physician and oculist, in which departments, according to all accounts (Schol. ad Arist. Equit. 401; Hesychius, s. v. Κλύμενος), he was not much more successful. (Ran. 151; comp. Equit. 401, Pax, 776, with the scholia on those passages.) Frigidity seems to have been the predominant characteristic of his poetry. (Suidas, s. v.; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. p. 311; Meineke, Fragmenta Com. Graec. vol. ii. part ii. p. 659.) [C. P. M.]

MO'RYCHUS (Μόρυχος), a tragic poet, a contemporary of Aristophanes, noted especially for his gluttony and effeminacy. (Aristoph. Acharn. 887, Vesp. 504, 1137, Pax, 1008, with the note of the scholiast.) There was a proverb: Μορύχου εὐηθέστερος, More foolish than Morychus; but whether it had reference to the tragic poet of that name, or not, we do not know. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. p. 311; Bode, Gesch. der Hellen. Dichtkunst, vol. iii. part i. p. 548.) [C. P. M.]

MORZES, or, according to Polybius, MO'RZIAS (Μορζίας), a king of Paphlagonia, who fought against the Romans in the Gallo-Graecian war, B.C. 189. Morzes had been conquered by Pharnaces, king of Pontus, and was indemnified in the treaty of peace imposed on the latter prince by Eumenes II. king of Pergamus, in B.C. 189—188. (Polyb. xxvi. 6. § 9; Liv. xxxviii. 26; Strab. xii. p. 562.) [W. B. D.]

MOSCHAMPAR, GEO'RGIUS (Γεώργιος ὁ Μοσχάμπαρ), chartophylax magnae ecclesiae at Constantinople, was a friend and contemporary of George of Cyprus, patriarch of Constantinople A. D. 1283—1289 [GEORGIUS, literary, No. 20]. He took a leading part in opposition to the doctrine of the Latin church on the procession of the Holy Spirit, and to the distinguished advocate of that church, Joannes Beccus or Veccus. He seems, however, to have had little weight even with his own party. He published several treatises in opposition to Veccus, to which the latter ably replied; but neither the attacks of the one nor the answers of the other seem to be preserved. There is a letter of Moschampar to his friend George of Cyprus, printed in the life of the latter, which was published by J. F. Bernard de Rubeis, Venice, 1753. (Pachymer. Hist. i. 8; Allatius, Graec. Orthodox. vol. ii. pp. 3, 9, 10; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. xii. pp. 46, 47, comp. vol. viii. pp. 53, 54.)

MOSCHION (Μοσχίων). 1. A tragic and comic poet, mentioned more than once by Stobaeus, who has preserved the names of three of his plays. 1. Θεμιστοκλῆς. 2. Τήλεφος. 3. Φεραῖοι. (Stobaeus, Ecl. Phys. i. 38; Clem. Alex. Strom. vi. p. 623; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. p. 311.)

2. A Greek writer, who drew up an account of the construction of the enormous ship which was built by command of Hieron, under the direction of the celebrated Archimedes. [HIERON; ARCHIMEDES.] Moschion's account is quoted at length by Athenaeus (v. p. 206, d, 209, e).

3. A celebrated cook, who was purchased by Demetrius Phalereus, and speedily realised a large fortune from the perquisites allowed him by his extravagant master. (Athen. xii. p. 542.) A parasite of the same name seems to have enjoyed sufficient notoriety to be mentioned in more than one passage quoted by Athenaeus (vi. p. 246, b, c, ix. p. 382, d). [C. P. M.]

MOSCHION (Μοσχίων), the author of a short Greek treatise, Περὶ τῶν Γυναικείων Παθῶν, De Mulierum Passionibus, who is supposed to have lived in the beginning of the second century after Christ, as he mentions Soranus (c. 151). Nothing is known of the writer's personal history, nor can it be determined with certainty whether he is the same person as either of the physicians mentioned below. The work is composed in the form of question and answer, and is an interesting little book, containing much useful and valuable matter. It is supposed to have been written originally in Latin, and to have been translated into Greek by some late author: this Greek text is all that now remains. It was first published in Casp. Wolf's Collection of Writers on Female Diseases, Basil. 1566, 4to., and in the two subsequent editions of that work. These editions contain eleven chapters at the end which are supposed to be spurious, and omit the author's preface. Probably the latest and best edition is that by F. O. Dewez, 8vo. Vienn. 1793, Greek and Latin. (See Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. xii. p. 702, ed. vet.; Choulant, Handb. der Bücherkunde für die Aeltere Medicin.)

2. A physician quoted by Soranus (ap. Gal. De Compos. Medicam. sec. Loc. i. 2, vol. xii. p. 416), Andromachus (ibid. vii. 2, vol. xiii. p. 30), and Asclepiades Pharmacion (ap. Gal. De Compos. Medicam. sec. Gen. iii. 9, vol. xiii. p. 646), and who lived, therefore, in or before the first century after Christ. He may perhaps be the same person who was called Διορθωτής, Corrector, because, though he was one of the followers of Asclepiades of Bithynia, he ventured to controvert his opinions on some points. (Galen, De Differ. Puls. iv. 16, vol. viii. p. 758).

A physician of the same name is mentioned also by Soranus (De Arte Obstetr. p. 184), Plutarch (Sympos. iii. 10. § 2), Alexander Trallianus (i. 15, p. 156), Aëtius (iv. 3, § 13, p. 755), Pliny (H. N. xix. 26, § 4), and Tertullian (De Anima, c. 15). [W. A. G.]

MOSCHION (Μοσχίων), the son of Adamas, an Athenian sculptor, made, in conjunction with his brothers Dionysodorus and Ladamas, a statue of Isis in the island of Delos. The names of the artists are preserved by an inscription on the statue, which is now at Venice. (Winckelmann, Gesch. d. Kunst, bk. ix. c. 2. § 10.) [P. S.]

MOSCHOPU'LUS, MA'NUEL or EMA'NUEL (Μανουὴλ s. Ἐμανουὴλ Μοσχόπουλος), a Greek grammarian of the later period of the Byzantine empire. There are few writers whose works have had so extensive a circulation whose time and history are so uncertain. According to the account generally current among the historians of literature, there were two Moschopuli, both bearing the name of Manuel, uncle and nephew; the uncle, a native of Crete, who lived in the time of the emperor Andronicus Palaeologus the Elder, about A. D. 1392; the nephew, a native of Constantinople, who, on the capture of that city by the Turks, A. D. 1453, fled into Italy. Of his fortunes, connections, or place of residence in that country, nothing appears to have been known, nor do we find any record or notice of his death. (Comp. Walder. Praef. ad Moschopuli Grammat. Artis Method., A. D. 1540; Burton, Ling. Graec. Historia, p. 57, 12mo. Lond. 1657; Scherpezeelius, Praef. ad Moschopuli Scholia ad Iliad. Hardwick, A. D. 1702; Fabric. Bibl.

Graec. vol. i. p. 407, note gg, and vol. vi. pp. 190, 322, &c.; Saxius, Onomasticon, vol. ii. pp. 387, 445, 591; Montucla, Hist. des Mathem. pt. i. liv. v. § 10, vol. i. p. 333, note b, ed. Paris, 1759; or § 11, vol. i. p. 346, ed. 1799—1802; Bandini, Catal. Codd. Graec. Laur. Medic. vol. ii. col. 553; Harles. Introd. in Hist. Ling. Graec. vol. ii. p. 544.) Hody (De Graecis Illustribus, p. 314, &c.) was disposed to identify the younger Moschopulus with Emanuel Adramyttenus, a Cretan, who was preceptor of the celebrated Joannes Picus, count of Mirandola, and is mentioned with the highest praises for his erudition in the letters of Aldus Manutius and Angelus Politianus.

Of the above scanty account some of the particulars are evidently incorrect, others rest on no sure foundation. An ancient Greek MS. of the Sylloge Dictionum Atticarum, quoted by Ducange (Glossar. Med. et Inf. Graecitatis Notae, col. 29) states it to be a work of Moschopulus "a Byzantine (or native of Constantinople), nephew of the Cretan;" and may be considered as establishing the facts that there were two Moschopuli, an uncle and a nephew; that the uncle was a Cretan, and a man of such reputation that relationship to him was a thing to be recorded; and that the nephew was a native of Constantinople, and a writer on grammatical subjects. The date at which the elder is said, in the account given above, to have lived, appears to have been derived from a passage in the Turco-Graecia of Crusius, who states (in Histor. Politicam. CPoleos Annotat. p. 44) that he had a MS. of the Erotemata s. Quaestiones of Moschopulus, to which the owner had appended a note that it was given him by the priest Clubes, A. D. 1392; and then Crusius states his opinion that Moschopulus flourished in the reign of the Byzantine emperor Andronicus the Elder, about A. D. 1300. A careless reader, confounding the date of the gift with that of the writer, brought down the reign of Andronicus to the latter part of the 14th century; and this gross anachronism appears to have passed unnoticed. If the author of the Quaestiones, whether he was the uncle or the nephew, lived in the time of the elder Andronicus, who reigned from A. D. 1282 to 1328, neither of the Moschopuli could have lived so late as the capture of Constantinople by the Turks (A. D. 1453), so that the story of the nephew's flight into Italy, consequent on that event, must be rejected. Hody's identification of the tutor of Joannes Picus with the younger Moschopulus must, of course, be rejected also: it appears indeed never to have had any other foundation than the common name of Manuel and the fact of the preceptor being a Cretan; which latter circumstance furnishes an argument, as Hody evidently felt, not for but against the identity; the nephew, who is said to have fled into Italy, having been a Constantinopolitan; to say nothing of the diversity of the surnames Adramyttenus and Moschopulus.

The date assigned by Crusius, A. D. 1300, to the elder Moschopulus is perhaps a little too late: he can hardly have long survived the accession of Andronicus, A. D. 1282, if indeed he lived till then. Crusius founded his calculation on an historical notice given in illustration of the use of the preposition κατά in his MS. of the Erotemata; but this notice does not appear in the printed editions of that work, and was perhaps added by the transcriber of the MS., and if so, it furnishes no clue to the age of the author. Even if genuine, we are disposed to understand it as referring to the rupture of the union of the churches, A. D. 1282, so that it does not support the date given by Crusius. Another historical notice given in the Nova Grammatices Epitome (p. 49, ed. Titze), as illustrating the ten categories, seems to fix the composition of that work to the time (A. D. 1273 to 1282) when Andronicus reigned in conjunction with his father; but this notice has so little connection with the context, that it is, like the preceding, liable to the suspicion of being interpolated. It is conjectured that Moschopulus the Cretan, who wrote a commentary upon Hesiod, is one of the commentators referred to by Georgius Pachymeres (De Andronic. Palaeol. iv. 15, where see Possin's note): this conjecture, which, however, separately regarded, rests on very slight ground, would render it probable that Pachymeres, who was born in or about A. D. 1240, studied in his boyhood under Moschopulus. In a MS. ascribed by Montfaucon (Biblioth. Coislin. p. 455) to the fourteenth century, are some Ἐπιστολαί, Epistolae, of Manuel Moschopulus, addressed "to Acropolita the great Logotheta," "to the Logotheta Metochita," "to his uncle the Cretan" (τῷ θείῳ αὐτοῦ τῷ Κρήτης, perhaps an error for τῷ Κρητί), from which it appears that the nephew was contemporary with Georgius Acropolita (who died about A. D. 1282) or his son Constantinus Acropolita, and with Theodorus Metochita, who was Logotheta in A. D. 1294, and perhaps earlier. (Niceph. Gregoras, Hist. Byzant. vi. 8.) A work of Georgius Metochita, published in the Graecia Orthodoxa of Allatius, vol. ii. p. 959, is entitled Ἀντίῤῥησις τῶν ὧν συνεγράψατο Μανουὴλ ὁ τοῦ Κρήτης ἀνεψιὸς, i. e. "A reply to certain writings of Manuel, the nephew of the Cretan." These notices, together with the existence in manuscript, in the library of St. Mark at Venice (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vi. p. 323, note pp), of a work of Moschopulus, Contra Latinos, combine to show that the younger Moschopulus was contemporary with and was engaged in the religious dissensions occasioned by the attempt begun by the emperor Michael Palaeologus (A. D. 1260), and abandoned by his son the elder Andronicus, a short time after his accession (A. D. 1282), to unite the Greek and Latin churches; and that he survived the appointment to the office of Logotheta of Theodorus Metochita, who held that office in perhaps A. D. 1294. These dates are consistent with the supposition that his uncle the Cretan was one of the teachers of Pachymeres, and afford some probability to the conjecture that Pachymer refers to him. These scanty notices have been industriously gleaned by Titze in his Diatribe Literaria de Moschopulis, which we have chiefly followed.

The works ascribed to the Moschopuli are numerous; the greater part of them are on grammatical subjects, and are usually ascribed to the nephew; but in most cases without evidence. Lascaris indeed (Epitome Ling. Graec. lib. iii. Epilog.) speaks of the grammatical works of Moschopulus, as if only one of the name had written upon that subject; and Titze infers from this that they were all written by the uncle, and that the nephew wrote only on theology. The MSS. in a few cases speak of their respective authors determinately, as "the Cretan," "the nephew of the Cretan," or the "Byzantine;" but are in most cases indeterminate, the author being described as "Moschopulus," "Manuel Moschopulus," or "Manuel Grammaticus." We believe that it is in most cases vain to attempt to assign them to one or the other, and therefore give in one list the whole of those which have been printed. 1. Scholia ad Homeri Iliados Librum I. et II., published by Jo. Scherpezeelius, 8vo. Harderwyk (in Guelderland), 1702, and re-issued, with a new title-page and an additional preface, at Utrecht, 1719. In the title-page Moschopulus is termed Byzantinus, but whether on MS. authority is not clear: in the work itself, at the head of the Scholia, they are described as Ἐμανουήλου τοῦ Μοσχοπούλου τεχνολογία καὶ ἀνάπτυξις τῶν λέξεων. They are chiefly or wholly grammatical. A Paraphrasis of Homer by Moschopulus, different from these scholia, is said to be extant in the Vatican library (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. i. p. 401; but comp. Scherpezeelius, Praef. in Moschopuli Scholia in Homerum). 2. Τοῦ σοφωτάτου καὶ λογιωτάτου κυρίου Μανουὴλ τοῦ Μοσχοπούλου ἀνεψιοῦ τοῦ Κρήτης ἐξήγησις τῶν ἔργων καὶ ἡμερων Ἡσίοδου, Sapientissimi Doctissimique Manuelis Moschopuli Cretensis Patruelis Interpretatio Operum et Dierum Hesiodi. These scholia are included wholly or in part in the editions of Hesiod, 4to. Venice, 1537, and Basel, 1544, and in the edition of Heinsius, 4to. Leyden, 1603. 3. Scholia in Euripidis Tragoedias, employed by Arsenius, archbishop of Monembasia, in his collection of Scholia in Septem Euripidis Tragoedias, 8vo. Ven. 1534. Scholia on the Odae of Pindar (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. p. 67), and perhaps on the Ajax Flagellifer and Electra of Sophocles (see Scherpezeel. ibid.), by Moschopulus, are extant in MS. 4. Grammaticae Artis Graecae Methodus; consisting of three parts, i. Erotemata s. Quaestiones; ii. Canones; iii. Declinationes s. Declinationis Paradigmata. This work was first printed with the Erotemata of Demetrius Chalcondylas, 4to. about A. D. 1493, but the copies have no note either of time or place; nor has the work of Moschopulus any general title; that which we have prefixed is from the edition of Walder, 8vo. Basel, 1540. 5. Τῶν ὀνομάτων Ἀττικῶν συλλογή, Vocum Atticarum Collectio. The words are professedly collected from the Εἰκονες, Icones s. Imagines, of Philostratus, and from the poets. This sylloge was given at the end of the Dictionarium Graecum published by Aldus, fol. Venice, 1524, and was printed again, with the similar works of Thomas Magister and Phrynicus, 8vo. Paris, 1532. A MS. of this work, as already observed, expressly ascribes it to the nephew. 6. Περὶ τῶν ὀνομάτων καὶ ῥημάτων συντάξεως, De Constructione Nominum et Verborum; and 7. Περὶ προσωδιῶν, De Accentibus, both included in the little volume of grammatical treatises published by Aldus and Asulanus, Venice, 1525. The De Accentibus was reprinted with the work of Varennius on the same subject, 12mo. Paris, 1544, and again in 1559. 8. Περὶ γραμματικῆς γυμνασίας, De Grammatica Exercitatione, formerly ascribed to Basil, the Greek father, and printed in several of the older editions of his works. This work is ascribed to Moschopulus by Crusius (Turco-Graec. p. 44), and is substantially coincident with the work mentioned next. 9. Περὶ σχεδῶν s. De Ratione examinandae Orationis Libellus, 4to. Paris, 1545, and reprinted at Vienna, 1773. 10. De Vocum Passionibus, first published by G. H. Schaeffer, in the appendix to his edition of Gregorius Corinthius De Dialectis, 8vo. Leipzig, 1811 (pp. 675—681, conf. not. in pag. 908). 11. Excerpta in Agapetum, given by Fabricius, Bibl. Graec. vol. xii. p. 306, ed. vet. vol. viii. p. 41, ed. Harles. 12. Ἐπιτομὴ νέα γραμματικῆς. The first book of this was published by F. N. Titze, 8vo. Leipzig and Prague, 1822; it is a work of interest as treating of the ancient Greek pronunciation of the diphthongs. The perfect work is probably contained in MS., in the library of St. Mark, at Venice. Many other works of the Moschopuli are extant in MS. Titze prefixed to this work the valuable Diatribe de Moschopulis already quoted. He thinks that Moschopulus of Crete wrote a large work on grammar, entitled Ἐρωτήματα, Erotemata Grammatica, of which many of those extant under his name, in MS. or in print, are fragments or detached portions. One of the Moschopuli wrote a little treatise, De Quadratis Magicis, on the mathematical puzzle of arranging numbers, so that the sum of them, whether added horizontally, vertically, or diagonally, shall be the same. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. i. pp. 401, 407, vol. ii. pp. 67, 259, vol. vi. pp. 190, 298, 319, 322—324, vol. viii. p. 41, vol. ix. p. 416, and the authors cited in the body of the article.) [J. C. M.]

MOSCHUS (Μόσχος). 1. A grammarian and bucolic poet, a native of Syracuse. He lived about the close of the third century B. C., and, according to Suidas (s. v. Μόσχος), was acquainted with Aristarchus. He calls himself a pupil of Bion, in the Idyl in which he bewails the death of the latter [Bion]. But it is difficult to say whether he means more than that he imitated Bion. Of his personal history we know nothing further. Of his compositions we have extant four idyls. 1. Ἔρως δραπέτης. 2. Εὐρωπή. 3. Ἐπιτάφιος Βίωνος. 4. Μεγάρα. The last of these is written in the Ionic dialect, with but few Dorisms. Besides these larger pieces, there are three small fragments and an epigram extant. The idyls of Moschus were at first intermixed with those of Theocritus, and one or two of those ascribed to Theocritus have been, though without sufficient reason, supposed to be the productions of Moschus, as, for example, the 20th and 28th. Eudocia (p. 408) ascribes to Theocritus the third of the Idyls of Moschus. But they have since been carefully separated, on the authority of MSS. and quotations in Stobaeus. To judge from the pieces which are extant, Moschus was capable of writing with elegance and liveliness; but he is inferior to Bion, and comes still farther behind Theocritus. His style labours under an excess of polish and ornament. The idyls of Moschus have been usually edited with those of Bion. The editions are too many to be enumerated; for the best the reader is referred to Bion. The poems of Moschus have been frequently translated and imitated in English, German, French, Italian, Hungarian, and Russian. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iii. p. 805, &c.)

2. See Mochus.

3. A writer on mechanics, mentioned by Athenaeus (xiv. p. 634, b).

4. A grammarian, apparently, the author of a work entitled Ἐξήγησις Ῥοδιακῶν λέξεων, mentioned by Athenaeus (xi. p. 485, e). [C. P. M.]

MOSCHUS, JOANNES, or, as Photius calls him, Joannes the son of Moschus, surnamed Εὐκρατᾶς, or, what appears to be a corruption of that, Eviratus, was first a monk in the monastery of St. Theodosius at Jerusalem, afterwards lived among the anchorites in the desert on the banks of the Jordan, and subsequently filled the office of canonarchus in the convent of St. Saba. Bollandus gives A. D. 620 as the date of his death. After visiting a large number of the monasteries in Syria, Egypt, and the West, he applied himself to the composition of a work giving an account of the lives of the monks of that age, down to the time of Heraclius. It was addressed to Sophronius or Sophronas, his friend and pupil, who accompanied him on his travels, and became subsequently patriarch of Jerusalem. The work was entitled Λειμών or Λειμωνάριον, or Νέος παράδεισος. In the editions it is divided into 219 chapters; Photius speaks of it as consisting of 304 διηγήματα, but mentions that in other manuscripts it was divided into a larger number of chapters. In compiling it Moschus did not confine himself to giving the results of his own observations, but availed himself of the labours of predecessors in the same field. His narratives contain a plentiful sprinkling of the marvellous. He every where attacks the heresy of Severus Acephalus. The style of the work, as Photius says, is mean and unpolished. But Joannes Damascenus and Nicephorus assigned Sophronius himself as the author of the work, from which it has been supposed that it was in reality mainly his work, though the name of Joannes Moschus was allowed to stand as that of the writer. The work was first published in an Italian translation, and incorporated in several collections of lives of the saints. The Latin translation of Ambrosius Camaldulensis is in the seventh volume of Aloysius Lipomannus, Venice, 1558. It appeared in Greek and Latin in the second volume of the Auctarium Bibl. Patrum Ducaeanum, Paris, 1624, and in the Bibliotheca Patrum, Paris, 1644, 1654. (Phot. Cod. 199; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. x. p. 124; Voss. de Hist. Graec. p. 334, Westermann.) [C. P. M.]

MOSCHUS, VULCA'TIUS, was banished from Rome, and admitted as a citizen of Massilia, to which town he left his property. (Tac. Ann. iv. 43.)

MOSTIS, a king of Epeirus, known only to us from coins, a specimen of which is annexed.

COIN OF MOSTIS.

MOTHO'NE (Μοθώνη), a daughter of Oeneus, from whom the town of Mothone was believed to have derived its name. (Paus. iv. 35. § 1.) [L. S.]

MU'CIA. 1. The elder daughter of Q. Mucius Scaevola, the celebrated augur, and Laelia, daughter of C. Laelius Sapiens [LAELIA, No. 1]. She married L. Licinius Crassus, the orator, and was renowned for her conversational excellence. (Cic. Brut. 58. § 211, de Orat. iii. 12; Val. Max. viii. 8. § 1; Quint. Inst. i. 1. § 6.)

2. With the epithet TERTIA, was the daughter of Q. Mucius Scaevola, the augur, consul in B. C. 95. She was a cousin (soror) of Q. Metellus Celer, consul in B. C. 60, and of Q. Metellus Nepos, consul in B. C. 57. Mucia married Cn. Pompey, by whom she had two sons, Cneius and Sextus, and a daughter, Pompeia. She was divorced by Pompey just before his return from the Mithridatic war in B. C. 62. Mucia next married M. Aemilius Scaurus, a stepson of the dictator Sulla. In B. C. 39, Mucia, at the earnest request of the Roman people, went to Sicily to mediate between her son Sex. Pompey and Augustus. She was living at the time of the battle of Actium, B. C. 31. Augustus treated her with great respect. (Ascon. in Scaur. p. 19, Orelli; Cic. ad Fam. v. 2, ad Att. i. 12; Dion Cass. xxxvii. 49, xlviii. 16, li. 2, lvi. 38; Appian. B. C. v. 69, 72; Suet. Caes. 50; Plut. Pomp. 42; Zonar. x. 5; Hieron. in Jovin. i. 48.) Whether the Mucia mentioned by Valerius Maximus (ix. 1. § 8) be the same person is uncertain.

MU'CIA GENS, was a very ancient patrician house, ascending to the earliest aera of the republic (Dionys. v. 25; Liv. ii. 12). It existed in later times, however, only as a plebeian house. Its only cognomens are CORDUS and SCAEVOLA, under which are given all persons of the name of Mucius. [W. B. D.]

MUCIA'NUS, P. LICI'NIUS CRASSUS DIVES, was the son of P. Mucius Scaevola, consul B. C. 175, and brother of P. Mucius Scaevola, who was consul B. C. 133, in the year in which Tib. Gracchus lost his life. (Plut. Tib. Gracchus, 9.) Mucianus was adopted by P. Licinius Crassus Dives, who was the son of P. Licinius Crassus Dives, consul B. C. 205. This at least is Drumann's opinion, who thinks that it is more probable that he was adopted by the son than by the father. On being adopted he assumed, according to Roman fashion, the name of Crassus, with the addition of Mucianus, which indicated his former gens. Cicero (de Orat. i. 56) speaks of his being a candidate for the aedileship; and he gives an anecdote of Serv. Sulpicius Galba, who was a distinguished orator, pressing Crassus hard on a question of law, and of Crassus being compelled to support his legal opinion against the equitable arguments of Servius by referring to the writings of his brother, P. Mucius, and of Sext. Aelius.

Mucianus attained the dignity of pontifex maximus, and A. D. 131 he was elected consul, in which year he left Rome to conduct the war against Aristonicus in Asia, who maintained his claim to the kingdom of Pergamus against the will of Attalus III., who had bequeathed it to the Romans. Crassus was the first pontifex maximus, according to Livy (Epit. 59) who went beyond the limits of Italy; but this is not true, unless Scipio Nasica was deprived of his office, for Nasica was pontifex maximus B. C. 133, after the death of Tib. Gracchus, and retired to Asia, where he soon died. (Plut. Tib. Gracchus, 21.) Crassus succeeded Nasica in the pontificate. Crassus was unsuccessful in the war. He was attacked at the siege of Leucae by Aristonicus, and defeated. Between Elaea and Smyrna he was overtaken by the Thracian body-guard of Aristonicus; and to avoid being made prisoner, he provoked one of the Thracians to kill him. His head was carried to Aristonicus.

The historian Sempronius Asellio (Gellius, i. 13) says that Crassus possessed five things, which of all good things are the greatest and the chief. He was most wealthy, noble, eloquent, most learned in the law, and pontifex maximus. The same historian records an instance of the unreasonable severity with which he punished at the siege of Leucae a deviation from the strict letter of his orders. Crassus had two daughters; the elder Licinia, was the wife of C. Sulpicius Galba, the son of Serv. Sulpicius Galba, consul B. C. 144. (Cic. Brut. 26, 33.) The younger Licinia was the wife of C. Sempronius Gracchus (Plut. Tib. Gracchus, 21; Dig. 24. tit. 3. s. 66), according to Plutarch, whose opinion is supported by the passage in the Digest.

Crassus was both an orator and a lawyer. As an orator, however, he is considered by Cicero to have been inferior to his contemporary P. Sulpicius Galba. He was, however, a distinguished speaker, an eminent jurist (Cic. de Orat. i. 37, 56, Brut. 26), and a man of exemplary industry, which is shown by the fact of his mastering the various dialects of Greek, when he was in Asia, so completely, as to be able to make his decrees in the dialect which the suitor had adopted. (Val. Max. viii. 7. § 6.) No legal work of his is mentioned.

Crassus is mentioned by Pomponius (Dig. 1. tit. 2. s. 2. § 40, &c.) in the following terms: — "Etiam Lucius Crassus, frater Publii Mucii, qui Mucianus dictus est. Hunc Cicero ait jurisconsultorum disertissimum." Grotius considers the words "frater . . . dictus est," to be an interpolation, and that the L. Crassus is not Mucianus, because he is called Lucius, and because the description does not suit him. But it is remarked by Zimmern that Cicero calls Mucianus "in numero disertissimorum" (De Orat. i. 56), and he says the same in substance in another passage (Brut. 26). Besides this, L. Crassus, who must be taken to be Crassus the orator, if the reading of Grotius is right, was not a jurist. The criticism of Grotius is therefore groundless. The authorities for the life of Mucianus are contained in Drumann, Geschichte Roms, Licinii Crassi, No. 21. [G. L.]

MUCIA'NUS, LICI'NIUS, three times consul in A. D. 52, 70, and 75 respectively, must have passed by adoption from the Mucian to the Licinian gens. His character is drawn in a few strokes by the masterly hand of Tacitus. (Hist. i. 10.) He was alike distinguished for good and for evil, for luxurious indulgence and energetic work, for affability and haughtiness; when he had nothing to attend to, he revelled in excessive pleasures; but when business required his attention, he displayed great abilities. Thus his public conduct deserved praise, his private condemnation. As a youth, he courted with assiduity the favour of the powerful, and succeeded in obtaining the consulship in the reign of Claudius, A. D. 52; but having squandered his property, and becoming likewise an object of suspicion to Claudius, he went into retirement in Asia, and there lived, says Tacitus, as near to the condition of an exile as afterwards to that of an emperor. We gather from Pliny (H. N. xii. 1. s. 5) that the place of his retirement was Lycia, into which he was sent as legatus by Claudius, as a kind of honourable banishment. Under Nero he was again received into the favour of the imperial court; and at the death of that emperor, A. D. 68, he had the command of the province of Syria, with four legions, while Vespasian was in the neighbouring country of Judaea, at the head of three. Up to Nero's death Mucianus and Vespasian had not been on good terms; but after that event they were induced, by the interposition of friends, to become reconciled to one another, and to act together for their mutual advantage; and their reconciliation was rendered real and lasting by the mediation of Titus, to whom Mucianus became much attached. Mucianus and Vespasian both took the oath of allegiance to Otho; but when the civil war broke out between him and Vitellius, Vespasian resolved to seize the imperial throne. In this resolution he was warmly encouraged by Mucianus, who hoped to have a great share in the exercise of the imperial power while Vespasian bore the name. When Vespasian at length, after great hesitation, assumed the imperial title, Mucianus immediately administered to his own soldiers the oath of allegiance to the new emperor; and it was resolved that he should march into Europe against Vitellius, while Vespasian and Titus remained behind in Asia. Mucianus used great efforts to provide his army with everything that was necessary; he liberally contributed from his own purse, and unmercifully plundered the provincials to obtain a sufficient supply of money. However, there was little occasion for his services, for the Vitellians were entirely defeated by Antonius Primus [PRIMUS], of whom, in consequence, Mucianus became very jealous. Mucianus marched through Phrygia and Cappadocia, and arrived in Europe just in time to repress a rising of the Dacians, who had seized both banks of the Danube. Primus had entered Rome before Mucianus; but on the arrival of the latter he had to surrender all the power into his hands. Domitian, the son of Vespasian, was nominally at the head of affairs; but Mucianus was the real sovereign, and lived in almost regal splendour. Still, although he boasted haughtily of the services he had rendered to Vespasian, his fidelity never seems to have wavered; and all his various measures were calculated to support and strengthen the new dynasty. When Vespasian was on his way to Italy, Mucianus went to Brundisium to meet him, accompanied by the principal Roman nobles. The services of Mucianus had been so great, that Vespasian continued to show him his favour, although his patience was not a little tried by the arrogance of his subject. The last circumstance recorded of Mucianus is that he persuaded Vespasian to banish the philosophers from Rome. He seems to have died in the reign of Vespasian, as his name does not occur either under Titus or Domitian.

Mucianus was not only a general and a statesman, but an orator and an historian. His powers of oratory are greatly praised by Tacitus, who tells us that Mucianus could address an auditory even in Greek with great effect. He made a collection of the speeches of the republican period, which he arranged and published in eleven books of Acta and three of Epistolae. The subject of his history is not mentioned; but, judging from the references which Pliny makes to it, it appears to have treated chiefly of the East, and to have contained considerable information on all geographical subjects. (Tac. Hist. i. 10, 76, ii. 4, 5, 76—84, iii. 8, 46, 53, 78, iv. 4, 11, 39, 80, 85; Suet. Vesp. 6, 13; Dion Cass. lxv. 8, 9, 22, lxvi. 2, 9, 13; Joseph. B. J. iv. 10, 11; Plin. H. N. xii. 1. s. 5, xxviii. 2. s. 5, xxxiv. 7. s. 17, et passim; Vossius, De Hist. Lat. i. 27, p. 140, Lug. Bat. 1651; Westermann, Gesch. d. Römischen Beredtsamkeit, § 82, n. 19.)

MUCIA'NUS, M. NO'NIUS A'RRIUS, consul A. D. 201, in the reign of Septimius Severus. (Fasti.)

MUCIA'NUS or MUTIA'NUS, surnamed SCHOLA'STICUS, lived in the middle of the sixth century of our aera, and translated into Latin, at the request of Cassiodorus, the thirty-four homilies of St. Chrysostom on the Epistle to the Hebrews. He had also previously made a Latin translation of the treatise of Gaudentius on Music [GAUDENTIUS], as we learn from Cassiodorus, who calls Mucianus "vir disertissimus." (Cassiod. Divin. Lect. 8.) The translation of the above-mentioned homilies of Chrysostom is still extant, and has been highly praised by Savil and the other editors of and commentators on Chrysostom. It was first printed at Cologne, 1530, 8vo., and subsequently appeared in the Latin editions of the works of this father, in which Mucianus is erroneously called Mutius. In the Greek editions of the Homilies the translation of Hervetus is usually given; but Montfaucon has also printed in the twelfth volume of his edition the version of Mucianus. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. viii. pp. 558, 559.)

MUGILLA'NUS, the name of a family of the Gens Papiria at Rome. The Mugillani were a Latin family from Mugilla. (Dionys. viii. 36.)

1. L. PAPIRIUS L. F. MUGILLANUS, was consul for the first time in B. C. 444, and for the second in B. C. 427. No remarkable event signalised either of his consulates, but Mugillanus was one of the original pair of Censors. (Liv. iv. 7, 8, 30; Dionys. xi. 62; Fasti.)

2. L. PAPIRIUS L. F. L. N. MUGILLANUS son probably of the preceding, was consular tribune in B. C. 422. As interrex for holding the plebeians comitia in the following year, Mugillanus was the author of a law directing the quaestors to be chosen indifferently from the patricians and the plebeians (Liv. iv. 44). He was censor in B. C. 418 (Fasti).

3. M. PAPIRIUS L. F. MUGILLANUS was consular tribune in B. C. 418, and again in 416, and consul in 411 (Liv. iv. 45, 47; Fasti). Livy, however, in 411 gives Atratinus, not Mugillanus, as the cognomen of the Papirius consul in that year. (Ib. 52.)

4. L. PAPIRIUS MUGILLANUS was consul in B. C. 326 (Liv. viii. 23; Fasti). It is doubtful, however, whether for Mugillanus should not be read Cursor, as the surname of the consul. [W. B. D.]

MU'LCIBER, a surname of Vulcan, which seems to have been given to the god as a euphemism, and for the sake of a good omen, that he might not consume by ravaging fire the habitations and property of men, but might kindly and benevolently aid men in their pursuits. It occurs very frequently in the Latin poets. (Ov. Met. ii. 5; Ars Am. ii. 562.) [L. S.]

MU'LIUS (Μούλιος). 1. The son-in-law of Augeas, and husband of Agamede, was slain by Nestor. (Hom. Il. xi. 738.)

2. Two Trojans, one of whom was killed by Patroclus, and the other by Achilles. (Hom. Il. xvi. 696, xx. 472.)

3. A servant and herald from Dulichium, in the house of Odysseus. (Hom. Od. xviii. 422.) [L.S.]

MU'MMIA ACHAICA, grand-daughter of Q. Lutatius Catulus [CATULUS, No. 4], and great grand-daughter of L. Mummius Achaicus [MUMMIUS, No. 3], was the wife of Serv. Galba, and mother of the emperor Galba and his brother Caius. (Sueton. Galb. 3.) [W. B. D.]

MU'MMIUS. 1. L. MUMMIUS was tribune of the plebs in B. C. 187. He opposed the bill of M. Porcius Cato for inquiring into the amount of monies paid by Antiochus the Great, king of Syria, as the price of peace in B. C 188, to the brothers P. and L. Scipiones. Mummius, intimidated by Cato, withdrew his opposition, and the bill was passed. He was praetor in B. C. 177, and obtained Sardinia for his province. In his praetorship Mummius was instructed by the senate to put in force a decree for dismissing to their respective cities all residents at Rome, who were possessed merely of the Jus Latii. (Liv. xxxvii. 54, xli. 8.)

2. Q. MUMMIUS, brother of the preceding, was his colleague in the tribunate of B. C. 187. (Liv. xxxvii. 54.)

3. L. MUMMIUS L. F. L. N. ACHAICUS, son of No. 1, was praetor in B. C. 154. His province was the further Spain, where, after some serious reverses, he finally retrieved his reputation by victories over the Lusitanians and Blasto-Phoenicians, and triumphed De Lusitaneis in the following year. (Appian, Hispan. 56—57; Eutrop. iv. 9; Fasti.) Mummius was consul in B. C. 146, when he won for himself the surname of Achaicus, by the destruction of Corinth, the conquest of Greece, and the establishment of the Roman province of Achaia. His surname was the more remarkable from the circumstance that Mummius was the first self-raised man—novus homo—who attained a national appellation from military service. From the double name of his descendant, Mummia Achaica, the surname appears to have been perpetuated in the Mummian family. The Achaean league, under its weak and rash leaders, the praetors Critoläus and Diaeus, had been for some time inspired by a warlike spirit alien to their interests and the sounder policy of earlier years. Q. Caecilius Metellus Macedonicus, praetor in B. C. 148, had humbled Greece by his victories; but his leniency deceived the Achaean chiefs, and they persuaded themselves that Rome was unable to complete its conquest. They had assembled an army in the Isthmus shortly before the arrival of Mummius. He promptly dismissed his predecessor, Metellus, defeated the army of the league, whose hasty levies were no match for the discipline of the legions, and entered Corinth without opposition, since the garrison and principal inhabitants had abandoned it, and the spirit of Greece was at length completely broken. The city was burnt, rased, and given up to pillage: the native Corinthians were sold for slaves, and the rarest specimens of Grecian art, which the luxury and opulence of centuries had accumulated, were given up to the rapacity of an ignorant conqueror. Polybius the historian, who, on the fall of Corinth, had come from Africa to mitigate, if possible, the calamities of his countrymen, saw Roman soldiers playing at draughts upon the far-famed picture of Dionysus by Aristides; and Mummius himself was so unconscious of the real value of his prize, that he sold the rarer works of painting, sculpture, and carving, to the king of Pergamus, and exacted securities from the masters of vessels who conveyed the remainder to Italy, to replace by equivalents any picture or statue lost or injured in the passage. But although ignorant, Mummius was more scrupulous in his selection of the spoils than the Roman generals of later times, or even than some of his contemporaries. He appropriated secular or private property alone, and religiously abstained from all that had been consecrated to religious uses. Mummius remained in Greece during the greater part of B. C. 146—145, in the latter year with the title of proconsul. He arranged the fiscal and municipal constitution of the newly acquired province, and won the confidence and esteem of the provincials by his integrity, justice, and equanimity. Mummius was one of the few Roman commanders in the republican aera who did homage to the religion of the Hellenic race. He dedicated a brazen statue of Zeus at Olympia, and surrounded the shrine of the god with gilt bucklers of brass. The Corinthian bronze, so celebrated in the later art of the ancient world, was an accidental discovery, resulting from the burning of the city. The metallic ornaments of its sumptuous temples, basilicae, and private dwellings, formed the rich and solid amalgam which was employed afterwards in the fusile department of sculpture. Mummius triumphed in B. C. 145. His procession formed an epoch in the history of Roman art and cultivation. Trains of waggons laden with the works of the purest ages moved along the Via Sacra to the Capitoline Hill: yet the spectator of the triumph, who had seen them in their original sites and number, must have mourned many an irreparable loss. The fire had destroyed many, the sea had engulfed many; and the royal connoisseurs, the princes of Pergamus, had carried off many for their galleries and temples. Mummius, with a modesty uncommon in conquerors, refused to inscribe the spoils with his name. He viewed them as the property of the state, and he lent them liberally to adorn the triumphs, the buildings, and even the private houses of others, while in his own villa he retained the severe simplicity of early Rome. Mummius was censor in B. C. 142. His colleague was Cornelius Scipio, better known as the younger Africanus; and no colleagues ever disagreed more heartily. The polished Scipio was rigid to excess; the rustic Mummius culpably lenient. On laying down his office, Scipio declared that 'he should have discharged his functions well, had he been paired with a different colleague, or with none at all." Mummius, however, in private life, was not exempt from the prevailing immorality of the times, to which his conquest of Corinth, by causing a sudden influx of wealth into Rome, contributed. He was a respectable orator; and, as his government of Achaia showed, possessed administrative talents. His political opinions inclined to the popular side. Though he brought so much wealth into the state-coffers, Mummius died poor, and the commonwealth furnished a marriage portion to his daughter. (Polyb. iii. 32, xl. 7, 8, 11; Liv. Ep. 52; Appian, Pun. 135; Dion Cass. 81; Flor. ii. 16; Eutrop. iv. 14; Val. Max. vi. 4. § 2, vii. 5. § 4; Cic. in Verr. i. 21, iii. 4, iv. 2, pro Muraen. 14, de Leg. Agrar. i. 2, de Orat. ii. 6, Orat. 70, Brut. 22, de Off. ii. 22, ad Att. xiii. 4, 5, 6, 30, 32, 33, Parad. v. 2, Cornel. ii. fr. 8; Pseudo-Ascon. *in Cic. Ann. xiv. 21; Pausan. vii. 12; Strabo, viii. p. 381; Athen. iv. 1; Zonar. ix. 20—23.)

4. Sp. Mummius, brother of the preceding, and his legatus at Corinth in B. C. 146—145, was an intimate friend of the younger Scipio Africanus. In political opinions Spurius was opposed to his brother Lucius, and was a high aristocrat. He was one of the opponents of the establishment of rhetorical schools at Rome. Mummius composed ethical and satirical epistles, which were extant in Cicero's age, and were probably in the style which Horace afterwards cultivated so successfully. (Cic. de Rep. i. 12, iii. 35, v. 9, de Amic. 19, 27, ad Att. xiii. 5, 6, 30.)

5. Sp. Mummius, grandson of the preceding, died shortly before B. C. 46. He had preserved and used to recite to Cicero the epistles of his grandfather, Sp. Mummius [No. 4.] (Cic. ad Att. xiii. 6.)

6. M. Mummius, was praetor in B. C. 70, and presided at the trial of Verres in that year. (Cic. in Verr. iii. 52.)

7. Mummius, a legatus of M. Crassus in the servile war, B. C. 73, was defeated by the gladiator Spartacus. (Plut. Crass. 10.)

8. Mummius, was a writer of farces, Atellanae, after the year B. C. 90. He is mentioned by Charisius (p. 118) and Priscian (x. 9, p. 514, ed. Krehle). In Macrobius (Sat. i. 10) and Gellius (xix. 9) he is called Memmius. [W. B. D.]

MU'MMIUS LUPERCUS. [Lupercus.]

MUNA'TIA GENS, plebeian, unknown before the second century B. C. Its usual cognomens are Flaccus, Gratus, Plancus, and Rufus. A few Munatii occur without a surname. [W. B. D.]

MUNA'TIUS. 1. C. Munatius, was commissioner for allotting lands in Liguria and Cisalpine Gaul, B. C. 173. (Liv. xlii. 4.)

2. P. Munatius, was imprisoned, in what year is uncertain, by the triumviri capitales, for taking a crown from the statue of Marsyas in the forum (Hor. Sat. i. 6. 120; Serv. ad Aen. iv. 58), and placing it on his own head. The tribunes of the plebs refused to take cognizance of his appeal to them. (Plin. H. N. xxi. 6.)

3. Munatius, a ruined spendthrift, who engaged in Catiline's plot. He remained at Rome while his leader organised the insurrection in Etruria. Cicero derides the insignificance and ignobility of Munatius. (Cat. ii. 2.)

4. C. Munatius, C. F., was in some official situation in a province when Cicero commended to him L. Livinius Trypho, a freedman of L. Regulus (ad Fam. xiii. 60).

5. T. Munatius, was a kinsman of L. Munatius Plancus [Plancus], proconsul in Narbonne, B. C. 44. Munatius received reports from his kinsman of the movements in his province, one of which, addressed to the senate, he previously imparted to Cicero. Munatius subsequently joined M. Antonius. (Cic. ad Fam. x. 12.) [W. B. D.]

MUNA'TIUS, of Tralles, surnamed ὁ κριτικός, is mentioned as one of the teachers of Herodes Atticus. (Philostr. Herod. 14, Polemon, 7.)

MUNA'TIUS FLACCUS. [Flaccus.]

MUNY'CHIA (Μουνυχία), a surname of Artemis, derived from the Attic port-town of Munychia, where she had a temple. Her festival was celebrated at Athens in the month of Munychion. (Paus. i. 1. § 4; Strab. xiii. p. 639; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 331.) [L. S.]

MU'RCIA, MU'RTEA, or MU'RTIA, a surname of Venus at Rome, where she had a chapel in the circus, with a statue. (Fest. p. 148, ed. Müller; Apul. Met. vi. 395; Tertull. De Spect. 8; Varro, De Ling. Lat. v. 154; August. De Civ. Dei, iv. 16; Liv. i. 33; Serv. ad Aen. viii. 636.) This surname, which is said to be the same as Myrtea (from myrtus, a myrtle), was believed to indicate the fondness of the goddess for the myrtle tree, and in ancient times there is said to have been a myrtle grove in the front of her chapel at the foot of the Aventine. (Plin. H. N. xv. 36; Serv. ad Aen. i. 724; Plut. Quaest. Rom. 20.) Some of the ecclesiastical writers preferred the derivation from murcus, i. e. stupid or awkward. (August. De Civ. Dei, iv. 16; Arnob. adv. Gent. iv. 9.) Others again derived the name from the Syracusan word μυκρός, tender. (Salmas. ad Solin. p. 637.) [L. S.]

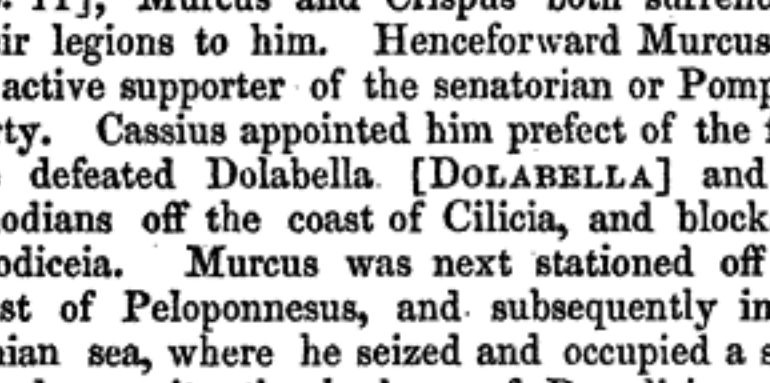
MURCUS, L. STA'TIUS, was Caesar's legatus in B. C. 48, and one of three commissioners appointed by him to treat with the Pompeians at Oricum (Caes. B. C. iii. 15). Murcus was one of the praetors in B. C. 45—44, and went into Syria after his year of office expired, with the title of proconsul, and as successor to Sextus Caesar, slain by his own soldiers in Apameia, at the instigation of Caecilius Bassus [CAESAR, No. 24; BASSUS]. With the aid of Marcius Crispus, proconsul of Bithynia [CRISPUS], Murcus besieged Bassus in Apameia, and compelled him to surrender. But on the arrival of C. Cassius Longinus [LONGINUS, No. 11], Murcus and Crispus both surrendered their legions to him. Henceforward Murcus was an active supporter of the senatorian or Pompeian party. Cassius appointed him prefect of the fleet. He defeated Dolabella [DOLABELLA] and the Rhodians off the coast of Cilicia, and blockaded Laodiceia. Murcus was next stationed off the coast of Peloponnesus, and subsequently in the Ionian sea, where he seized and occupied a small island opposite the harbour of Brundisium, and prevented M. Antony for some time from transporting his forces to Illyricum and the main-land of Greece. After the ruin of the republican party at Philippi, in B. C. 42, Murcus carried his fleet over to Sextus Pompey in Sicily. But his past services to the Pompeians were ill-requited by their present leader; for at the instigation of his freedmen Menas and Menodorus, to whom Murcus had borne himself loftily, Sextus caused him to be assassinated, and promulgated a report that he had been murdered by his own slaves. (Cic. Phil. xi. 12, ad Att. xii. 2, ad Fam. xii. 11; Pseudo-Brut. ad Cic. ii. 5; Vell. ii. 69, 72, 77; Joseph. Antiq. xiv. 11. §§ 1, 3, 4, B. J. i. 10. § 4; Appian, B. C. ii. 119, iii. 77, 78, iv. 58, 59, 74, 82, 86, 100, 108, 115—117, v. 2, 15, 50, 70; Dion Cass. xlvii. 27, 28, 30, 35, 36, 47, xlviii. 19.) [W. B. D.]



COIN OF STATIUS MURCUS.

MURE'NA, the name of a family of the Licinia gens, which was originally from Lanuvium, now Città Lavigna, an old Latin town near the Via Appia. The name Murena, which is the proper way of writing the word, not Muraena, is said to have been given in consequence of one of the family having a great liking for the lamprey (murena), and building tanks (vivaria) for them. (Plin. H. N. ix. 54, ed. Hard.; Macrob. Saturn. ii. 11.)

1. P. LICINIUS was praetor, but in what year is unknown.

2. P. LICINIUS MURENA, the son of P. Licinius, attained the rank of praetor, and was a contemporary of the orator L. Crassus. He was the first of the family who had the cognomen Murena.

3. P. LICINIUS MURENA, the son of the preceding, was a man of moderate talent, but he paid great attention to the study of antiquity, and was a man of some literary knowledge. (Cic. Brut. 54.) He lost his life in the wars of Marius and Sulla (B. C. 82); for his death is mentioned by Cicero as taking place at the same time with the murder of Q. Mucius Scaevola, the jurist and Pontifex Maximus, or shortly after; and Cicero seems to mean that he died a violent death; and if so, he must have perished by the hands of the Marian faction, though there is no direct authority for that statement, which is made by Drumann. (Cic. Brut. 90; Drumann, Geschichte Roms, vol. iv. p. 184.)

4. L. LICINIUS MURENA, the brother of the preceding, was praetor probably before he served under Sulla in Greece. He was in the battle of Chaeroneia, B. C. 86, in which Sulla defeated Archelaus, the general of Mithridates. Murena had the command of the left wing, and was opposed to Taxiles. (Plut. Sulla, 17, &c.) Murena accompanied Sulla into the Troad, where peace was made with Mithridates (B. C. 84), and Murena was left as propraetor in Asia, with the command of the two legions of Fimbria which had deserted their commander and come over to Sulla (Appian, Mithrid. 64). Murena, who wished to have a triumph, sought a quarrel with Mithridates, took Comana in Cappadocia, and robbed the rich temple. His answer to Mithridates, who complained of the infraction of the treaty, was that he could see no treaty; and, in fact, there was no written treaty between Sulla and Mithridates. Mithridates sent to Rome to complain, and in the mean time Murena crossed the swollen Halys, ravaged the country of Mithridates, and returned into Galatia and Phrygia loaded with booty. Calidius, who had been sent by the Roman senate, gave him verbal orders to stop hostilities, but he brought no written instructions with him, and Murena again commenced his ravages. Mithridates now sent Gordius against Murena, and soon joined Gordius with a larger force. A fierce battle was fought on the river, which was probably the Halys, though Appian (Mithrid. 65) mentions no name, in which Murena was defeated with great loss, and he made his retreat over the mountains into Phrygia. In the early part of B. C. 81 Sulla sent A. Gabinius with strict orders to Murena to stop hostilities, and with instructions to reconcile Mithridates and Ariobarzanes. Murena returned to Rome, and had a triumph in B. C. 81, which he did not deserve. He probably died soon after. His wife lived to see her son consul. (Cic. pro Muren. 41.)

5. L. LICINIUS MURENA, the son of No. 4, served under his father (B. C. 83) in the war against Mithridates. He was quaestor at Rome with the jurist Serv. Sulpicius, who was afterwards his opponent in the canvas for the consulship. In his aedileship Murena adorned the walls of the Comitium with Lacedaemonian stone (Plin. H. N. xxxv. 14). In the third Mithridatic war, which began B. C. 74, he served under L. Lucullus (Plut. Lucull. 15, &c.), and was left by him to direct the siege of Amisus, while Lucullus advanced against Mithridates. At the capture of Amisus (B. C. 71), Tyrannio was made prisoner, and he was given to Murena at his request, who thereupon made him free, by which act it was implied that he had been a slave. Plutarch (Lucull. 19) blames Murena for his conduct in this matter, and adds that it was not in this instance only that Murena showed himself far inferior to his general in honourable feeling and conduct. Murena followed Tigranes in his retreat from Tigranocerta to the Taurus, and took all his baggage, and he was left to maintain the siege of Tigranocerta while Lucullus marched from before that city to check Tigranes, who was again in sight of Tigranocerta with a large army. He returned to Rome before the end of the war, and was one of ten commissioners who were sent out to settle affairs in the countries conquered by Lucullus. (Cic. ad Att. xiii. 6.) In B. C. 65, he was praetor with Serv. Sulpicius, and had the jurisdictio, while Sulpicius had the unpopular function of presiding at the quaestio peculatus (Cic. pro Muren. 20). Murena expended considerable sums on the public exhibitions (ludi Apollinares), which he had to superintend during his office. (Plin. H. N. xxxiii. 3; Cic. pro Muren. 18, 19.) After his praetorship (B. C. 64) he was propraetor of Gallia Cisalpina, where his brother Caius served under him, and he settled the disputes between debtor and creditor in a satisfactory and equitable way, as Cicero says.

In B.C. 63 he was a candidate for the consulship, and was elected with D. Junius Silanus. Serv. Sulpicius, an unsuccessful candidate, instituted a prosecution against Murena for bribery (ambitus), and he was supported in the matter by M. Porcius Cato, Cn. Postumius, and Serv. Sulpicius the younger (Plut. Cat. Min. 21, Cic. 35, and the oration of Cicero for Murena). Murena was defended by Q. Hortensius, M. Tullius Cicero, who was then consul, and M. Licinius Crassus. The speech of Cicero, which is extant, is of the same class as his later speech in defence of Cn. Plancius, who was also tried for ambitus. The time when the speech for Murena was delivered is shown by the fact that Catiline had then left the city, but the conspirators who remained behind had not been punished: it was therefore delivered in the latter part of November of the unreformed calendar. The orator handled his subject skilfully, by making merry with the formulae and the practice of the lawyers, to which class Sulpicius belonged, and with the paradoxes of the Stoics, to which sect Cato had attached himself. Yet he did not attack the character and motives of either Sulpicius or Cato, which would have been injurious to his client, for both the prosecutors were men above suspicion. But he defended the private character of Murena against the imputations that had been cast on him, and he represents him as a man of merit in his public and private capacity, and with more virtues than we can readily give him credit for. As in the oration for Cn. Plancius he says comparatively little on the main charge, which, indeed, it was the business of the prosecutors to prove; and he rather labours to show that there were sufficient reasons for his election without supposing that he had purchased votes. He shows that under present circumstances, with Catiline at the head of an army in the field, and his associates in the city, it was necessary to have a vigorous consul to protect the state in the coming year. Murena was acquitted. (Plut. Cat. Min. 21.)

Early in the month of December following Cicero moved in the senate the question of punishing the conspirators who had been seized. Silanus, who was first asked his opinion, was for putting them to death, and Murena ultimately voted the same way (Cic. ad Att. xii. 21). The consulship of Silanus and Murena was a stormy period, owing to the agitation of Q. Metellus Nepos, who wished for the return of Pompeius to oppose the party of the Optimates. The disturbances in Rome grew so high that the senate empowered the consuls in the usual form to preserve the safety of the commonwealth. Cato, who was a colleague of Metellus, was opposed to the consuls, but Murena protected him in an affray (Plut. Cat. Min. 28). In this consulship was passed the Lex Licinia Junia, which enacted that a lex should be promulgated for three nundinae before the people voted upon it. There is no mention of Murena having a province after his consulship, and nothing more is said about him.

His stepson, L. Natta, was the son of Murena's wife by a previous husband, probably one Pinarius Natta, as Drumann shows (vol. ii. p. 370).

6. C. LICINIUS MURENA, the brother of No. 5, and his legatus in Cisalpine Gallia, which he administered in the year after his brother's administration, and seized some of the band of Catiline (Sall. B. C. 42), before the defeat and death of their leader.

7. A. TERENTIUS VARRO MURENA, was adopted by A. Terentius Varro, whose name he took, according to the custom in such cases. Drumann conjectures that he was the son of the consul, which seems probable. In the civil wars he is said to have lost his property, and that C. Proculeius, a Roman eques, gave him a share of his own property. This Proculeius is called the brother of Varro, but, if we take the words of Horace literally (Carm. ii. 2), Proculeius had more than one brother. Drumann conjectures that this Proculeius was a son of C. Licinius Murena, the brother of the consul, who had been adopted by one Proculeius. This would make Proculeius the cousin of Varro. It was common enough among the Romans to call cousins by the name of brothers (frater patruelis, and frater).

Murena was sent by Augustus, in B. C. 25, to attack the Salassi in the Alps: he reduced the people to obedience, sold the male prisoners for slaves, and the chief part of the territory was distributed among Praetorian soldiers, who founded the town of Augusta, now Aosta, in the province of Aosta, one of the eight divisions of the continental dominion of the king of Sardinia (Dion Cass. liii. 25; Strab. p. 206, ed. Casaub.). Murena was named consul suffectus for B. C. 23. In B. C. 22 he was involved in the conspiracy of Fannius Caepio, and was condemned to death and executed, notwithstanding the intercession of Proculeius and Terentia, the sister of Murena. Dion Cassius (liv. 3), when speaking of the death of Murena, calls him Licinius Murena, though he had already (liii. 25) called him Terentius Varro. Such confusion is common enough with the Roman writers, when they are speaking of adopted persons. Horace (Carm. ii. 10) addresses Murena by the name of Licinius, and probably intended to give him some advice as to being more cautious in his speech and conduct.

The authorities for the Licinii Murenae are given by Drumann, Geschichte Roms, vol. iv. p. 183, &c. [G. L.]

MURE'NA, ABLA'VIUS, praefectus praetorio in the reign of Valerian (A. D. 253—260), who addressed Ablavius a letter respecting Claudius, afterwards emperor. (Trebell. Poll. Claud. 15.)

MURRHE'DIUS, a rhetorician, frequently mentioned by the elder Seneca. (Suas. 2, Controv. 2, 4, 17; &c.)

MUS, the name of a family of the plebeian Decia gens, which was renowned in early Roman history for two of its members devoting themselves to death in order to save the republic.

1. P. DECIUS MUS, is first mentioned in B. C. 352, when he was appointed one of the quinqueviri mensarii for the purpose of liquidating in some measure the debts of the citizens. In B. C. 343 he served as tribune of the soldiers under M. Valerius Corvus Arvina, in the Samnite war, and by his heroism saved the Roman army from the most imminent danger. While marching through the mountain passes of Samnium, the consul had allowed his army to be surrounded in a valley by the enemy: destruction seemed inevitable; when Decius offered, with the hastati and principes of the legion, in all sixteen hundred men, to seize a height which commanded the way by which the Samnites were hastening down to attack the Roman army. Here he maintained himself, notwithstanding the efforts of the Samnites to dislodge him, while the Roman army gained the summit of the mountain. In the ensuing night he broke through the Samnites who were encamped around him and joined the Roman consul, whom he forthwith persuaded to make an immediate attack upon the enemy. The result was a brilliant victory and the capture of the enemy's camp. The consul rewarded Decius with a golden crown, a hundred oxen, and a magnificent white bull with gilt horns, the army with a crown of twisted grass, an honour bestowed upon the soldier who had delivered an army from an enemy, and his comrades gave him a similar crown. (Liv. vii. 21, 34—37; Frontin. Strateg. i. 5. § 14, iv. 5. § 9; Aurel. Vic. de Vir. Ill. 26; Appian, Samn. 1; Cic. de Div. i. 24; Plin. H. N. xvi. 4. s. 5, xxii. 5.)

In B. C. 340 Decius was consul with T. Manlius Torquatus, and he and his colleague had the conduct of the great Latin war. The two consuls marched into the field, and when they were encamped opposite the enemy near Capua a vision in the night appeared to each consul, announcing that the general of one side and the army of the other were devoted to the gods of the dead and the mother earth. They thereupon agreed that the one whose wing first began to waver should devote himself and the army of the enemy to destruction. The decisive battle took place at the foot of Vesuvius; and when the troops of Decius, who commanded the left wing, began to give way, he resolved to fulfil his vow. He called for the pontifex maximus, M. Valerius, and repeated after him the form of words by which he devoted himself and the enemy to the gods of death, with his toga wrapt around his head and standing upon a weapon: he then jumped upon his horse, wearing the cinctus gabinus or sacrificial dress, rushed into the thickest of the enemy, and was slain, leaving the victory to the Romans. Such is the common story of his death; but other accounts relate it somewhat differently. Zonaras (vii. 26) says that he was killed as a devoted victim by a Roman soldier. (Liv. viii. 3, 6, 9, 10; Val. Max. i. 7. § 3, v. 6. § 5; Flor. i. 14; Frontin. Strateg. iv. 5. § 15; Oros. iii. 9; Aurel. Vict. l. c.; Cic. in Orelli's Onom. Tull. p. 210; Niebuhr, Hist. of Rome, vol. iii. pp. 121, &c. 136, &c.)

2. P. DECIUS MUS, the son of the preceding, was consul B. C. 312, with M. Valerius Maximus. Livy relates that Decius remained in Rome in consequence of illness, while his colleague prosecuted the war against the Samnites, and that he nominated a dictator at the wish of the senate, in consequence of the apprehension of a war with the Etruscans; but Aurelius Victor, on the contrary, tells us that Decius gained a triumph over the Samnites in his first consulship, and dedicated to Ceres the booty he had obtained in the war. An inscription recording the victory of Decius in his first consulship has been supposed by some to be genuine, but it is evidently a forgery concocted from the words of Aurelius Victor. (Liv. ix. 28, 29; Diod. xix. 105; Aurel. Vict. de Vir. Ill. 27; Orelli, Inscript. No. 546.)

In B. C. 309 Decius served as legate under the dictator L. Papirius Cursor, in the war with the Samnites; and in the following year, B. C. 308, he was consul a second time with Q. Fabius Maximus. While his colleague marched against the Samnites, Decius had the conduct of the war against the Etruscans, which he prosecuted with so much vigour that the Etruscans were contented to purchase a year's truce by paying and clothing the Roman army for that year. In B. C. 306 he was magister equitum to the dictator P. Cornelius Scipio Barbatus, and in B. C. 304 censor with Q. Fabius Maximus, his colleague in his second consulship, in conjunction with whom he effected the important reform in the constitution by which the libertini were confined to the four city tribes. In B. C. 300 Decius was the great advocate of the Ogulnian law for throwing open the pontificate and augurate to the plebeians, in opposition to the patrician App. Claudius Caecus; and upon the enactment of the law in this year, he was one of the first plebeians elected into the college of pontiffs.

In B. C. 297 Decius was elected consul a third time with his former colleague Q. Fabius Maximus, at the express wish of the latter. Both consuls marched into Samnium by different routes: Decius defeated the Apulians near Maleventum, and then traversed Samnium, and probably Apulia also, devastating the country in every direction. He continued in Samnium during the following year as proconsul, and took three Samnite towns; but the capture of these towns is in other accounts attributed to Fabius or the new consuls.

In B. C. 295 Decius was elected consul a fourth time with his old colleague Fabius Maximus. The republic was menaced by a formidable coalition of Etruscans, Samnites, Umbrians, and Gauls; the aged Fabius was unanimously called to the consulship in order to meet the danger, but he would not accept the dignity without having his former colleague associated with him in the honour and the peril. Decius was first posted in Samnium, but subsequently hastened into Etruria to the assistance of his colleague, and commanded the left wing of the Roman army at the decisive battle of Sentinum. Here he was opposed to the Gauls, and when his troops began to give way under the terrible attacks of the latter, he resolved to imitate the example of his father, dedicated himself and the army of the enemy to the gods of the dead, and fell as a sacrifice for his nation. (Liv. ix. 40, 41, 44, 46, x. 7—9, 14—17, 22, 24. 26—29 ; Aurel. Vict. l. c.; Zonar. viii. 1 ; Flor. i. 17 ; Val. Max. v. 6. § 6 ; Cic. in Orelli, l. c.)

3. P. Decius Mus, son of the preceding, was consul in B. C. 279, and fought with his colleague P. Sulpicius against Pyrrhus at the battle of Asculum. Before the battle alarm had been spread in the camp of Pyrrhus, by the report that the consul Decius intended, like his father and grandfather, to devote himself to death and the army of the enemy to destruction. Pyrrhus in consequence sent word to the consuls that he had given orders that Decius should not be killed but taken alive, and that he would put him to death as a malefactor. A later legend, recorded by Cicero (Tusc. i. 37, ii. 19), related that Decius sacrificed himself at this battle like his father and grandfather ; and it is not improbable, as Niebuhr has conjectured, that Cicero may have found this statement in Ennius. In other passages, however, Cicero speaks only of two Decii—Decii duo fortes viri (Cic. de Off. iii. 4, Cat. 20). As to the result of the battle of Asculum, it is differently stated by different writers. Hieronymus of Cardia related that Pyrrhus gained a victory, Dionysius represented it as a drawn battle, and the Roman annalists claimed the victory for the Romans. The last statement is certainly false, and it appears that Pyrrhus was superior in the contest, though the victory was not a very decisive one. (Zonar. viii. 5 ; Plut. Pyrrh. 21 ; Eutrop. ii. 13 ; Oros. iv. 1 ; Flor. i. 18. § 9 ; Niebuhr, Hist. of Rome, vol. iii. pp. 502—505.)

At a later time Decius, according to the account in Aurelius Victor (de Vir. Ill. 36), was sent against Volsinii, where the manumitted slaves had acquired the supreme power, and were treating their former masters with severity. He killed a great number of them, and reduced the others to slavery again. Other accounts, however, ascribe the expedition against the slaves of Volsinii to Q. Fabius Maximus Gurges, in his third consulship, B. C. 265 (Flor. i. 21 ; Zonar. viii. 7) ; but as Zonaras states that Fabius died of a wound during the siege of the town, it has been conjectured by Freinsheim that Decius may have commanded the army after the death of the consul, and may thus have obtained the credit of the victory.

MUSA, a rhetorician, frequently referred to by the elder Seneca, who calls him a man "multi ingenii, nullius cordis." (Controv. Praef. v.) Schott conjectures that this Musa may be the same person as Antonius Musa, the physician of Augustus mentioned below, but this is not very probable.

MUSA, AEMI'LIA, a rich woman, who died intestate in the reign of Tiberius, A. D. 17. Her property was claimed for the fiscus or imperial treasury, but was surrendered by the emperor to Aemilius Lepidus, to whose family she appeared to belong. Her surname Musa shows that she was a freedwoman. (Tac. Ann. ii. 48.)

MUSA, ANTO'NIUS, a celebrated physician at Rome about the beginning of the Christian era. He was brother to Euphorbus, the physician to king Juba, and was himself the physician to the emperor Augustus. He was originally, according to Dion Cassius (liii. 30, p. 517), a freedman, an assertion which some persons, who are over-jealous about the dignity of the medical profession among the Romans, have controverted. When the emperor was seriously ill, and had been made worse by a hot regimen and treatment, B. C. 23, Antonius Musa succeeded in restoring him to health by means of cold bathing and cooling drinks, for which service he received from Augustus and the senate a large sum of money and the permission to wear a gold ring, and also had a statue erected in his honour near that of Aesculapius by public subscription. (Dion Cass. l. c.; Schol. ad Horat. Epist. i. 15. 3; Sueton. August. 59, 81; Plin. H. N. xix. 38, xxv. 38, xxix. 5.) He seems to have been attached to this mode of treatment, to which Horace alludes (l. c.), but failed when he applied it to the case of M. Marcellus, who died under his care a few months after the recovery of Augustus, B. C. 23. (Dion Cass. l. c.) He is by some scholars supposed to be the person to whom one of Virgil's epigrams is inscribed (Catal. 13) ; but it is hardly likely, that, in a complimentary poem addressed to so eminent a physician, no mention whatever should be made of his medical acquirements. He has also been supposed to be the person described by Virgil in the Aeneid (xii. 390, &c.) under the name Iapis. (See Atterbury's Reflexions on the Character of Iapis, &c.) He wrote several pharmaceutical works (Galen, De Compos. Medicam. sec. Gen. ii. 1, vol. xiii. p. 463), which are frequently quoted by Galen (vol. xiii. pp. 47, 206, 263, 326, &c.), but of which nothing but a few fragments remain. There are, however, two short Latin medical works ascribed to Antonius Musa, but these are universally considered to be spurious. One of these is entitled "De Herba Betonica," which is to be found in the collection of medical writers published by Torinus, Basil. 1528, fol. ; in Ackermann's "Parabilium Medicamentorum Scriptores Antiqui," Norimb. 1788, 8vo. ; and elsewhere. The other little work is entitled "Instructio de Bona Valetudine Conservanda," and is appended to the edition of Sextus Placitus published in 1538, Norimb., 4to. Neither of these works require any particular notice here. The genuine fragments of his writings that remain were collected and published by Flor. Caldani, Bassano, 1800, 8vo. Further information respecting his life and writings may be found in J. C. G. Ackermann's work, "De Antonio Musa et Libris qui illi adscribuntur," Altorf. 1786, 4to. See also Fabricius, *Bibl. MUSA, Q. POMPO'NIUS, only known to us from coins, a specimen of which is annexed. The head on the obverse is uncertain : the figure on the reverse is one of the Muses, having reference to the cognomen of this Pomponius.

COIN OF Q. POMPONIUS MUSA.

MUSAE (Μοῦσαι). The Muses, according to the earliest writers, were the inspiring goddesses of song, and, according to later notions, divinities presiding over the different kinds of poetry, and over the arts and sciences. They were originally regarded as the nymphs of inspiring wells, near which they were worshipped, and bore different names in different places, until the Thraco-Boeotian worship of the nine Muses spread from Boeotia over other parts of Greece, and ultimately became generally established. (Respecting the Muses conceived as nymphs see Schol. ad Theocrit. vii. 92; Hesych. s. v. Νύμφη; Steph. Byz. s. v. Τόρρηβος; Serv. ad Virg. Eclog. vii. 21.)

The genealogy of the Muses is not the same in all writers. The most common notion was, that they were the daughters of Zeus and Mnemosyne, and born in Pieria, at the foot of Mount Olympus (Hes. Theog. 52, &c., 915; Hom. Il. ii. 491, Od. i. 10; Apollod. i. 3. § 1); but some call them the daughters of Uranus and Gaea (Schol. ad Pind. Nem. iii. 16; Paus. ix. 29. § 2; Diod. iv. 7; Arnob. adv. Gent. iii. 37), and others daughters of Pierus and a Pimpleian nymph, whom Cicero (De Nat. Deor. iii. 21) calls Antiope (Tzetz. ad Hes. Op. et D. p. 6; Paus. l. c.), or of Apollo, or of Zeus and Plusia, or of Zeus and Moneta, probably a mere translation of Mnemosyne or Mneme, whence they are called Mnemonides (Ov. Met. v. 268), or of Zeus and Minerva (Isid. Orig. iii. 14), or lastly of Aether and Gaea. (Hygin. Fab. Praef.) Eupheme is called the nurse of the Muses, and at the foot of Mount Helicon her statue stood beside that of Linus. (Paus. ix. 29. § 3.)

With regard to the number of the Muses, we are informed that originally three were worshipped on Mount Helicon in Boeotia, namely, Melete (meditation), Mneme (memory), and Aoede (song); and their worship and names are said to have been first introduced by Ephialtes and Otus. (Paus. ix. 29. § 1, &c.) Three were also recognised at Sicyon, where one of them bore the name of Polymatheia (Plut. Sympos. ix. 14), and at Delphi, where their names were identical with those of the lowest, middle, and highest chord of the lyre, viz. Nete, Mese, and Hypate (Plut. l. c.), or Cephisso, Apollonis, and Borysthenis, which names characterise them as the daughters of Apollo. (Tzetz. l. c.; Arnob. iii. 37; Serv. ad Virg. Eclog. vii. 21; Diod. iv. 7.) As daughters of Zeus and Plusia we find mention of four Muses, viz. Thelxinoe (the heart delighting), Aoede (song), Arche (beginning), and Melete. (Cic., Arnob., Tzetz. ll. cc.; Serv. ad Aen. i. 12.) Some accounts, again, in which they are called daughters of Pierus, mention seven Muses, viz. Neilo, Tritone, Asopo, Heptapora, Achelois, Tipoplo, and Rhodia (Tzetz. Arnob. ll. cc.), and others, lastly, mention eight, which is also said to have been the number recognised at Athens. (Arnob. l. c.; Serv. ad Aen. i. 12; Plat. De Re Publ. p. 116.) At length, however, the number nine appears to have become established in all Greece. Homer sometimes mentions Musa only in the singular, and sometimes Musae in the plural, and once only (Od. xxiv. 60) he speaks of nine Muses, though without mentioning any of their names. Hesiod (Theog. 77. &c.) is the first that states the names of all the nine, and these nine names henceforth became established. They are Cleio, Euterpe, Thaleia, Melpomene, Terpsichore, Erato, Polymnia, Urania, and Calliope. Plutarch (l. c.) states that in some places all nine were designated by the common name Mneiae, i. e. Remembrances.

If we now inquire into the notions entertained about the nature and character of the Muses, we find that, in the Homeric poems, they are the goddesses of song and poetry, and live in Olympus. (Il. ii. 484.) There they sing the festive songs at the repasts of the immortals (Il. i. 604, Hymn. in Apoll. Pyth. 11), and at the funeral of Patroclus they sing lamentations. (Od. xxiv. 60; comp. Pind. Isthm. viii. 126.) The power which we find most frequently assigned to them, is that of bringing before the mind of the mortal poet the events which he has to relate; and that of conferring upon him the gift of song, and of giving gracefulness to what he utters. (Il. ii. 484, 491, 761, Od. i. 1, viii. 63, &c., 481, 488; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 259.) There seems to be no reason for doubting that the earliest poets in their invocation of the Muse or Muses were perfectly sincere, and that they actually believed in their being inspired by the goddesses; but in later times among the Greeks and the Romans, as well as in our own days, the invocation of the Muses is a mere formal imitation of the early poets. Thamyris, who presumed to excel the Muses, was deprived by them of the gift they had bestowed on him, and punished with blindness. (Hom. Il. ii. 594, &c.; Apollod. i. 3. § 3.) The Seirens, who likewise ventured upon a contest with them, were deprived of the feathers of their wings, and the Muses themselves put them on as an ornament (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 85); and the nine daughters of Pierus, who presumed to rival the Muses, were metamorphosed into birds. (Anton. Lib. 9; Ov. Met. v. 300, &c.) As poets and bards derived their power from them, they are frequently called either their disciples or sons. (Hom. Od. viii. 481, Hymn. in Lun. 20; Hes. Theog. 22; Pind. Nem. iii. 1; Serv. ad Virg. Georg. ii. 476.) Thus Linus is called a son of Amphimarus and Urania (Paus. ix. 29. § 3), or of Apollo and Calliope, or Terpsichore (Apollod. i. 3. § 2); Hyacinthus a son of Pierus and Cleio (Apollod. i. 3. § 3); Orpheus a son of Calliope or Cleio, and Thamyris a son of Erato. These and a few others are the cases in which the Muses are described as mothers; but the more general idea was, that, like other nymphs, they were virgin divinities. Being goddesses of song, they are naturally connected with Apollo, the god of the lyre, who like them instructs the bards, and is mentioned along with them even by Homer. (Il. i. 603, Od. viii. 488.) In later times Apollo is placed in very close connection with the Muses, for he is described as the leader of the choir of the Muses by the surname Μουσαγέτης. (Diod. i. 18.) A further feature in the character of the Muses is their prophetic power, which belongs to them, partly because they were regarded as inspiring nymphs, and partly because of their connection with the prophetic god of Delphi. Hence, they instructed, for example, Aristaeus in the art of prophecy. (Apollon. Rhod. ii. 512.) That dancing, too, was one of the occupations of the Muses, may be inferred from the close connection existing among the Greeks between music, poetry, and dancing. As the inspiring nymphs loved to dwell on Mount Helicon, they were naturally associated with Dionysus and dramatic poetry, and hence they are described as the companions, playmates, or nurses of Dionysus.

The worship of the Muses points originally to Thrace and Pieria about mount Olympus, from whence it was introduced into Boeotia, in such a manner that the names of mountains, grottoes, and wells, connected with their worship, were likewise transferred from the north to the south. Near mount Helicon, Ephialtes and Otus are said to have offered the first sacrifices to them; and in the same place there was a sanctuary with their statues, the sacred wells Aganippe and Hippocrene, and on mount Leibethrion, which is connected with Helicon, there was a sacred grotto of the Muses. (Paus. ix. 29. § 1, &c., 30. § 1, 31. § 3; Strab. pp. 410, 471; Serv. ad Virg. Eclog. x. 11.) Pierus, a Macedonian, is said to have been the first who introduced the worship of the nine Muses, from Thrace to Thespiae, at the foot of mount Helicon. (Paus. ix. 29. § 2.) There they had a temple and statues, and the Thespians celebrated a solemn festival of the Muses on mount Helicon, called Μουσεῖα. (Paus. ix. 27. § 4, 31. § 3; Pind. Fragm. p. 656, ed. Boeckh; Diod. xvii. 16.) Mount Parnassus was likewise sacred to them, with the Castalian spring, near which they had a temple. (Plut. De Pyth. Orac. 17.) From Boeotia, which thus became the focus of the worship of the nine Muses, it afterwards spread into the adjacent and more distant parts of Greece. Thus we find at Athens a temple of the Muses in the Academy (Paus. i. 30. § 2); at Sparta sacrifices were offered to them before fighting a battle (iii. 17. § 5); at Troezene, where their worship had been introduced by Ardalus, sacrifices were offered to them conjointly with Hypnos, the god of sleep (Paus. iii. 31. § 4, &c.); at Corinth, Peirene, the spring of Pegasus, was sacred to them (Pers. Sat. Prol. 4; Stat. Silv. ii. 7. 1); at Rome they had an altar in common with Hercules, who was also regarded as Musagetes, and they possessed a temple at Ambracia adorned with their statues. (Plut. Quaest. Rom. 59; Plin. H. N. xxxv. 36.) The sacrifices offered to them consisted of libations of water or milk, and of honey. (Schol. ad Soph. Oed. Col. 100; Serv. ad Virg. Eclog. vii. 21.) The various surnames by which they are designated by the poets are for the most part derived from the places which were sacred to them or in which they were worshipped, while some are descriptive of the sweetness of their songs.

In the most ancient works of art we find only three Muses, and their attributes are musical instruments, such as the flute, the lyre, or the barbiton. Later artists gave to each of the nine sisters different attributes as well as different attitudes, of which we here add a brief account. 1. Calliope, the Muse of epic poetry, appears with a tablet and stylus, and sometimes with a roll of paper; 2. Cleio, the Muse of history, appears in a sitting attitude, with an open roll of paper, or an open chest of books; 3. Euterpe, the Muse of lyric poetry, with a flute; 4. Melpomene, the Muse of tragedy, with a tragic mask, the club of Heracles, or a sword, her head is surrounded with vine leaves, and she wears the cothurnus; 5. Terpsichore, the Muse of choral dance and song, appears with the lyre and the plectrum; 6. Erato, the Muse of erotic poetry and mimic imitation, sometimes, also, has the lyre; 7. Polymnia, or Polyhymnia, the Muse of the sublime hymn, usually appears without any attribute, in a pensive or meditating attitude; 8. Urania, the Muse of astronomy, with a staff pointing to a globe; 9. Thaleia, the Muse of comedy and of merry or idyllic poetry, appears with the comic mask, a shepherd's staff, or a wreath of ivy. In some representations the Muses are seen with feathers on their heads, alluding to their contest with the Seirens. (Hirt, Mythol. Bilderb. p. 203, &c.) [L. S.]

MUSAEUS (Μουσαῖος), an officer of Antiochus the Great, king of Syria. After the decisive battle of Sipylus, B. C. 190, he came as an ambassador to the Scipios, then at Sardis, to request permission for the king to send commissioners to treat of peace. (Polyb. xxi. 13; Liv. xxxvii. 45; App. Syr. 38.) In B. C. 188 Musaeus was again sent by Antiochus to Cn. Manlius Vulso, the Roman proconsul in Asia, to learn the terms on which the peace between his master and the Romans would be finally ratified. (Polyb. xxii. 24; Liv. xxxviii. 37; App. Syr. 39.) [E. E.]

MUSAEUS (Μουσαῖος), literary. 1. A semi-mythological personage, to be classed with Olen, Orpheus, and Pamphus. He was regarded as the author of various poetical compositions, especially as connected with the mystic rites of Demeter at Eleusis, over which the legend represented him as presiding in the time of Heracles. (Diod. iv. 25.) He was reputed to belong to the family of the Eumolpidae, being the son of Eumolpus and Selene. (Philochor. ap. Schol. ad Arist. Ran. 1065; Diog. Laërt. Prooem. 3.) In other variations of the myth he was less definitely called a Thracian. According to other legends he was the son of Orpheus, of whom he was generally considered as the imitator and disciple. (Diod. iv. 25; Serv. ad Virg. Aen. vi. 667.) Others made him the son of Antiphemus, or Antiophemus, and Helena. (Schol. ad Soph. Oed. Col. 1047; Suid. s. v. Μουσαῖος.) In Aristotle (Mirab. p. 711, a.) a wife Deioce is given him; while in the elegiac poem of Hermesianax, quoted by Athenaeus (xiii. p. 597), Antiope is mentioned as his wife or mistress. Suidas gives him a son Eumolpus. The scholiast on Aristophanes mentions an inscription said to have been placed on the tomb of Musaeus at Phalerus. Pausanias (i. 25. § 8) mentions a tradition that the Μουσεῖον in Peiraeus bore that name from having been the place where Musaeus was buried. We find the following poetical compositions, accounted as his among the ancients:—1. Χρησμοί, Oracles. (Aristoph. Ran. 1031; Paus. x. 9. § 11; Herod. viii. 96.) Onomacritus, in the time of the Peisistratidae, made it his business to collect and arrange the oracles that passed under the name of Musaeus, and was banished by Hipparchus for interpolating in the collection oracles of his own making. (Herod. vii. 6; Paus. i. 22. § 7.) 2. Ὑποθῆκαι, or precepts, addressed to his son Eumolpus, and extending to the length of 4000 lines (Suid. l. c.). 3. A hymn to Demeter. This composition is set down by Pausanias (i. 22. § 7) as the only genuine production of Musaeus extant in his day. 4. Ἐξακέσεις νόσων. (Aristoph. Ran. 1031; Plin. H. N. xxi. 8. s. 21.) 5. Θεογονία. (Diog. Laërt. Prooem. 3). 6. Τιτανογραφία. (Schol. ad Apoll. Rhod. iii.). 7. Σφαῖρα. (Diog. Laërt. l. c.). What this sphaera was, is not clear. 8. Παραλύσεις, Τελεταὶ and Καθαρμοί. (Schol. ad Arist. l. c.; Plat. Respubl. ii. p. 364, extr.) Aristotle (Polit. viii. 5, Hist. Anim. vi. 6) quotes some verses of Musaeus, but without specifying from what work or collection. Some have supposed the Musaeus who is spoken of as the author of the Θεογονία and Σφαῖρα, to be a different person from the old bard of that name. But there does not appear to be any evidence to support that view. The poem on the loves of Hero and Leander is by a very much later author. Nothing remains of the poems attributed to Musaeus but the few quotations in Pausanias, Plato, Clemens Alexandrinus, Philostratus, and Aristotle. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. i. p. 119.)

2. An ancient Theban lyric poet, the son of Thamyra and Philammon, who, according to Suidas (s.v.), lived considerably before the Trojan war.

3. An epic poet, a native of Ephesus, who lived probably about the middle of the second century B. C. According to Suidas, he wrote a poem entitled Περσηΐς, in ten books, dedicated to Eumenes and Attalus. What Suidas means by the expression, τῶν εἰς τοὺς Περγαμηνοὺς καὶ αὐτὸς κύκλους, it is not easy to say.

4. A grammarian, the author of the celebrated poem on the loves of Hero and Leander. Nothing is known of his personal history; and the elder Scaliger even supposed that the poem was the work of the ancient Athenian bard. But in many of the manuscripts the author is distinctly called Musaeus the grammarian; and it is now agreed on all hands that the poem is quite a late production. According to Schrader and other critics the author did not live earlier than the fifth century of our era. The general style is quite different from the simplicity of the older poets, and several individual expressions betray the lateness of its origin. The poem was first discovered in the thirteenth century. Numerous editions of it have been published. The first, with a Latin version by Marcus Musurus, without any indication of the date or place. Of the rest may be mentioned those by Kromayer, Halae Magd. 1721; by Schrader, 1742; by Heinrich, 1793; by Passow, Leipzig, 1810; and by Schaefer, Leipzig 1825. There are several translations of the poem. In English, by Marlowe, Stapylton, Stirling, &c.; in German, by Stollberg, Passow, &c.; in French, by Marot, &c.; in Italian, by Bernardo Tasso, Bettoni, &c. [C. P. M.]

MUSA'GETES. [MUSAE.]

MUSCA, a surname of the Sempronia gens. 1. T. SEMPRONIUS MUSCA, one of the five commissioners appointed in B. C. 168 to settle the disputes between the Pisani and Lunenses. (Liv. xlv. 13.)

2, 3. A. SEMPRONIUS and M. SEMPRONIUS, his brother, bore undoubtedly the surname of MUSCA, since it is related that when they embraced a certain Vargula in their canvass, the latter called out Puer abige Muscas. (Cic. de Orat. ii. 60.)

4. SEMPRONIUS MUSCA, detected C. Gallius in the act of adultery with his wife, and scourged him to death. (Val. Max. vi. 1. § 13.)

5. MUSCA, mentioned by Cicero in B. C. 45, appears to have been a freedman or steward of Atticus. (Cic. ad Att. xii. 40.)

MUSICA'NUS, the ruler of a kingdom on the banks of the Indus, the capital of which was probably near Bukkur. On the sudden approach of Alexander (B. C. 325) Musicanus, who had hitherto sent no tokens of submission to Alexander, being dismayed by his sudden appearance, hastened to meet him with humble acknowledgements of his fault and rich presents. He was graciously received by Alexander, who allowed him to retain his kingdom, with the fertility and opulence of which he was greatly struck. But when Alexander marched westwards to attack Porticanus Musicanus was induced by the Brahmins to revolt. Alexander sent a force against him under Python, who overran the country, captured the towns, which he either destroyed or garrisoned, and took Musicanus prisoner, together with his principal Brahmins. Alexander ordered them to be crucified. It has been conjectured that the name Musicanus means the khan or rajah of Moosh; but Thirlwall (History of Greece, vol. vii. p. 48) doubts whether the title khan was in use in the time of Alexander on the lower Indus. Curtius gives the name Musicani to the people. (Arrian, vi. 15—17; Curt. ix. 8.) [C. P. M.]

MUSONIA'NUS, a native of Antioch, an officer under the emperor Constantine the Great and his successors. His first name was Strategus. He was an eloquent speaker both in Greek and Latin, and first acquired the favour of Constantine by acquiring for him an acquaintance with the doctrines of the Manichaeans and other sectaries. Pleased with his diligence, the emperor gave him the name of Musonianus, and promoted his advancement in office. (Amm. Marc. xv. 13.) He is well spoken of in other respects, but is charged with avarice and the love of being flattered. He supported the Arian party, and under the Arian emperor, Constantius, attained the rank of praefectus praetorio Orientis, which he held from A. D. 354 to 358. He was employed to punish a sedition at Antioch, in A. D. 354. According to Libanius, he obeyed the emperor's orders, to act with moderation; but Ammianus (l. c.) charges him with cruelty to some poor people who were innocent, and letting the guilty rich escape, on their paying him heavy sums for his own advantage. In 355, he was too much employed in pillaging the country to defend it against the Persians, with whom he sought in vain to conclude a peace. Nothing more is known of him. (Liban. Epist. passim; Amm. Marc. ll. cc. and xvi. 9, xvii. 5; Tillemont, Hist. des Empereurs, vol. iv.) [J. C. M.]

MUSO'NIUS RUFUS. [RUFUS.]

MUSSI'DIA GENS, only occurs on coins, with the cognomen Longus. A specimen of these coins is given under LONGUS.

MUSTE'LA, was a person with whom Cicero, in B. C. 46, had some negotiations respecting the purchase of the Villa Clodiana (ad Att. xii. 5, 44, 47, xiii. 3) [W. B. D.]

MUSTE'LA, TAMI'SIUS, a native of Anagnia in the Hernican territory, was one of M. Antony's retainers in B. C. 44—3. (Cic. Phil. ii. 4, v. 6, viii. 9, xii. 6, xiii. 2, ad Att. xvi. 11.) [W.B.D.]

MU'STIUS, was a Roman eques and revenue-farmer, about the time of the praetorship of Verres, B. C. 75, who defrauded M. Junius, a ward and stepson of Mustius. He was once defended by Cicero, but the speech is lost and its occasion unknown. (Cic. in Verr. i. 51, 52; Pseud-Ascon. in Act. II. Verrian. p. 195, ed. Orelli.) [W.B.D.]

MU'STIUS, an architect, and a friend of the younger Pliny. (Ep. ix. 39.) [P. S.]

MUTIA'NUS. [MUCIANUS.]

MU'TILUS, C. PA'PIUS, one of the principal Samnite generals in the Marsic or Social war, B. C. 90—89. At the head of the greater part of the Samnite forces, he invaded Campania, took several of its towns, and obliged almost all the rest to surrender to him; but having made an attack upon the camp of the consul, Sex. Caesar, he was repulsed with a loss of 6000 men, B. C. 90. In the following year he had to resist Sulla, who had penetrated into Samnium, but he experienced a total defeat, was badly wounded in the engagement, and fled with a few troops to Aesernia. (Appian, B. C. i. 40, 42, 51; Oros. v. 18; Vell. Pat. ii. 16; Diod. xxxvii. Ecl. 1.) The name of this Samnite leader is given differently; but C. Papius Mutilus seems to have been his real name. Orosius calls him Papius Mutilus; Velleius terms him Papius Mutilius; and Appian styles him in two passages (i. 40, 42) C. Papius, and in the third (i. 51) Motilus, who is evidently the same person as the one he had previously called C. Papius. Diodorus names him C. Aponius Motulus (Μότυλος). The name Mutilus has been conjectured by a recent writer to be the same as Metellus, but there is no certainty on this point. (Comp. Prosper Mérimée, E'tudes sur l'Histoire Romaine, vol. i. pp. 137, 138, Paris, 1844.)

Appian relates (B. C. iv. 25), in his account of the proscription of B. C. 43, that there was one Statius proscribed who had distinguished himself greatly as a leader of the Samnites in the Social war, and who had afterwards been admitted into the Roman senate on account of the renown of his exploits, his wealth, and his noble birth. He was then eighty years of age, and his name was put down on the fatal list on account of his wealth. Now, as there is no one known in the Social war of the name of Statius, Wesseling conjectured (ad Diod. l. c.) that we ought to read Papius instead; and this correction has been generally received by subsequent writers. The principal objection to it, however, is that Livy speaks (Epit. 89) of the death of a Mutilus in the proscription of Sulla; and from the prominence given to the death of this person in the Epitome, it would almost appear as if he intended the great Samnite leader. (Comp. Prosper Mérimée, Ibid. vol. i. p. 325.)

MU'TILUS, PA'PIUS, a flatterer of Tiberius, proposed in the senate, A. D. 16, that the 13th of September — the day on which Scribonius Libo Drusus destroyed himself — should be observed as a public holiday, and that offerings should be made at the shrines of Jupiter, Mars, and Concordia. (Tac. Ann. ii. 32.)

MU'TINES (Μουτίνας, Polybius calls him Μυττόνας), an African by birth, belonging to the half-caste race called the Lybio-Phoenicians. He was brought up and trained in war under the eye of Hannibal, and having given frequent proofs of his ability and activity as an officer, was selected by that general to take the command in Sicily after the death of Hippocrates. He accordingly joined Epicydes and Hanno at Agrigentum before the close of the year B. C. 212, and being placed at the head of the Numidian cavalry, quickly spread his ravages through great part of the island. Marcellus was now compelled to turn his arms against this new enemy, and advanced as far as the river Himera, where he sustained a severe check from the cavalry of Mutines; but shortly after the jealousy of Hanno and Epicydes prompted them to give battle during a temporary absence of the Numidian leader, and they were totally defeated. (Polyb. ix. 22; Liv. xxv. 40, 41.) But even after this blow Mutines was soon able to resume the offensive, and, instead of shutting himself up within the walls of Agrigentum, carried his daring and destructive excursions into every part of the island. Laevinus, the new consul, who had succeeded Marcellus in the command, seems to have been wholly unable to repress these sallies; but the envy and jealousy of the Carthaginian general at length effected what the Roman arms could not, and Hanno having been prompted by these base motives to the dangerous step of superseding Mutines in his command, the latter, fired with resentment at the indignity, immediately entered into communication with the Romans, and betrayed Agrigentum into the hands of Laevinus. (Liv. xxvi. 21, 40; Zonar. ix. 7.) For this service he was rewarded with the rights of a Roman citizen, in addition to other honours. (Liv. xxvii. 5.) [E. H. B.]

MU'TIUS, a Roman architect of very great skill, who flourished in the first century B. C., and built the temple Honoris et Virtutis Marianae. (Vitruv. vii. Praef. § 17.) [P. S.]

MUTO or MUTTO, Q. was a man of the lowest rank, who was prosecuted by L. Laelius. (Cic. pro Scaur. 2, pro Fundan. Fr. i. p. 445, of the fourth volume of Orelli's Cicero.) [W. B. D.]

MUTUNUS or MUTINUS, that is, the phallus, or Priapus, which was believed to be the most powerful averter of demons, and of all evil that resulted from pride and boastfulness, and the like. The name is probably connected with μυττὸς or μύτης, i. e. ὁ πρὸς τὰ ἀφροδίσια ἐκλελυμένος. Mutunus is usually mentioned with the surname Tutunus or Tutinus, which seems to be connected with the verb tueri. A public Mutunus, that is, the one who averted evil from the city of Rome and the republic, had a sanctuary in the upper part of Velia, which existed there down to the time of Augustus, when it was removed outside the city. (Arnob. adv. Gent. iv. 7; August. De Civ. Dei, iv. 11; Lactant. i. 20; Tertull. Apol. 25; Fest. p. 154, ed. Müller.) [L. S.]

MYAGRUS, a Phocaean, is mentioned by Pliny among those statuaries who made athletas et armatos et venatores sacrificantesque (H. N. xxxiv. 8. s. 19. § 34), and by Vitruvius as one of those artists who failed to attain to eminence, not for the want of industry and skill, but of good fortune (iii. Praef. § 2). [P. S.]

MYCALE'SIDES (Μυκαλησίδες), the mountain nymphs of Mycale. (Callim. Hymn. in Del. 50; Paus. vii. 4. § 1.) [L. S.]

MYCALE'SSIA (Μυκαλησσία), a surname of Demeter, derived from Mycalessus in Boeotia, where the goddess had a sanctuary. (Paus. ix. 19. § 4.) [L. S.]

MYCE'NE (Μυκήνη), a daughter of Inachus and wife of Arestor, from whom the town of Mycenae or Mycene was believed to have derived its name. (Hom. Od. ii. 120; Paus. ii. 16. § 3.) [L. S.]

MYCERI'NUS, or MECHERI'NUS (Μυκερῖνος, Μεχερῖνος), was son of Cheops, king of Egypt, according to Herodotus and Diodorus, and succeeded his uncle Chephren on the throne. His conduct formed a strong contrast to that of his father and uncle, being as mild and just as theirs had been tyrannical. On the death of his daughter, he placed her corpse within the hollow body of a wooden cow, which was covered with gold. Herodotus tells us that it was still to be seen at Saïs in his time. We further hear of Mycerinus that, being warned by an oracle that he should die at the end of six years, because he had been a gentle ruler and had not wreaked the vengeance of the gods on Egypt, he gave himself up to revelry, and strove to double his allotted time by turning night into day. He built a pyramid also, or rather began to build it, but died before it was finished. It was smaller than those of Cheops and Chephren, and, according to Herodotus, was wrongly ascribed by some to the Greek hetaera Rhodopis. (Herod. ii. 129—134 ; Diod. i. 64 ; Ath. x. p. 438, b.) [E. E.]

MYDON, of Soli, a painter of some note, was the disciple of the statuary Pyromachus. He therefore flourished about Ol. 138 or B. C. 228. (Plin. H. N. xxxv. 11. s. 40. § 42.) [P. S.]

MYGDON (Μύγδων). 1. A brother of Amycus, king of the Bebryces, was slain by Heracles, who assisted Lycus in his war with Mygdon. (Apollod. ii. 5. § 9.)

2. A son of Acmon, a Phrygian king, who fought with Otreus and Priam against the Amazons. (Hom. Il. iii. 186, &c. ; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 402.) A part of the Phrygians are said to have been called after him Mygdonians. (Paus. x. 27, init. ; comp. COROEBUS.) [L. S.]

MYIA (Μυῖα). 1. Daughter of Pythagoras and Theano (Porphyr. p. 3 ; Clemens Alex. Strom. iv. p. 522 ; Suidas), was, according to Iamblichus, the wife of Milon of Crotona. A letter, addressed to a certain Phyllis, is extant under her name. (Lucian, Muscae Enc. extr.; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. i. pp. 883, 886.)

2. A Spartan poetess, who composed hymns to Apollo and Diana (Suidas, s. v.). Lucian (Muscae Enc. extr.) mentions an ancient poetess of the name, celebrated for her beauty and learning, but whether he refers to the Spartan poetess or not, is uncertain.

3. A Thespian poetess, who wrote some lyrical poems (Suidas, s. v.). She is probably the same with Corinna [CORINNA], who bore that surname. [C. P. M.]

MYIAGRUS or MYIODES (Μυίαγρος), that is, the fly-catcher, is the name of a hero, who was invoked at Aliphera, at the festival of Athena, as the protector against flies. (Paus. v. 14. § 2, viii. 26. § 4.) [L. S.]

MYLES (Μύλης), a son of Lelex, brother of Polycaon, father of Eurotas, and king of Lacedaemon, was regarded as the inventor of mills. (Paus. iii. 1. § 1, 20. § 2, iv. 1. § 2.) Stephanus Byzantius mentions Μυλάντιοι θεοί as the protectors of mills. [L. S.]

MYLLUS (Μύλλος), a comic poet, a contemporary of Epicharmus, who with Euetes and Euxenides revived comedy in Athens at the same time that Epicharmus was labouring in the same direction in Sicily. He appears to have been especially successful in the representation of a deaf man, who, nevertheless, hears every thing ; whence arose a proverb, Μύλλος πάντ' ἀκούει. According to Eustathius he was an actor as well as a dramatist, and still adhered to the old practice of having the faces of his actors besmeared with red-ochre. (Suidas, s. v. Ἐπίχαρμος ; Hesychius, vol. ii. p. 632 ; Eustathius, ad Il. p. 906, 53, ad Od. p. 1885, 21 ; Meineke, Hist. Crit. Com. Graec. p. 26.) [C. P. M.]

MYNES (Μύνης), a son of Evenus of Lyrnesus, and husband of Briseis, was slain by Achilles. (Hom. Il. ii. 692, xix. 296 ; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 322.) [L. S.]

MYNISCUS (Μυνίσκος), a tragic actor, a native of Chalcis, who was attacked by Plato in his comedy called Σύρφαξ, on account of his gluttony. A man named Myniscus was one of the actors of Aeschylus. The Myniscus who was ridiculed by Plato was perhaps his grandson. (Athen. viii. p. 344, d. e. ; Meineke, Fragmenta Poët. Com. vol. ii. p. 668.) [C. P. M.]

MYREPSUS, NICOLAUS. [NICOLAUS.]

MYRINA (Μύρινα). 1. A daughter of Cretheus and the wife of Thoas, from whom the town of Myrina in Lemnos was believed to have derived its name. (Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. i. 604.)

2. An Amazon, who is likewise said to have given the name to the town of Myrina in Lemnos. (Strab. xii. p. 573 ; Steph. Byz. s. v.)

3. A daughter of Teucer and the wife of Dardanus. (Hom. Il. ii. 814 ; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 351.) [L. S.]

MYRINUS appears as the name of an epigrammatic writer in Brunck's Anal. (ii. p. 107). Nothing more is known of him. It has been conjectured that he is no other than Agathias of Myrina. [AGATHIAS.] (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iv. p. 483.) [C. P. M.]

MYRME'CIDES (Μυρμηκίδης), a sculptor and engraver, of Miletus or Athens, is generally mentioned in connection with Callicrates, like whom he was celebrated for the minuteness of his works. [CALLICRATES.] His works in ivory were so small that they could scarcely be seen without placing them on black hair. (Varro, L. L. vii., ix. 62 ; Cic. Acad. ii. 38 ; Suid. s. vv. Μυρμηκίδης and γελοῖος.) [P. S.]

MYRMEX (Μύρμηξ), that is, an ant, from which animal, according to some traditions, the Myrmidons in Thessaly derived their name. An Attic maiden of the name of Myrmex, it is said, was beloved by Athena ; and when the goddess had invented the plough, Myrmex boastfully pretended to have made the discovery herself, whereupon she was metamorphosed into an ant. But when afterwards Zeus made his son Aeacus king of Thessaly, which was not inhabited by human beings, he metamorphosed all the ants of the country into men, who were thence called Myrmidones. (Virg. Aen. iv. 402, with the note of Serv. ; Hygin. Fab. 52 ; Strab. viii. p. 375, ix. p. 433 ; comp. AEACUS.) According to Philochorus (ap. Harpocr. s. v. Μελίτη), Myrmex was the father of Melite, from whom the Attic demos of Melite derived its name. [L. S.]

MY'RMIDON (Μυρμιδών), a son of Zeus and Eurymedusa, the daughter of Cleitos, whom Zeus deceived in the disguise of an ant. Her son was for this reason called Myrmidon (from μύρμηξ, an ant), and was regarded as the ancestor of the Myrmidons in Thessaly. He was married to Peisidice, by whom he became the father of Antiphus and Actor. (Apollod. i. 7. § 3 ; Apollon. Rhod. i. 56 ; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 320 ; Clem. Alex. Protrept. p. 34 ; Arnob. adv. Gent. iv. 26.) [L. S.]

MY'RMIDON (Μυρμιδών), an Athenian, who commanded a force of 10,000 men, which formed part of the armament sent by Ptolemy, the son of Lagus, under his brother Menelaus, to effect the reduction of Cyprus, B. C. 315. He was afterwards despatched to the assistance of Asander in Caria, against the generals of Antigonus. (Diod. xix. 62.) [E. H. B.]

MYRIS. [MOERIS.]

MYRO (Μυρώ). 1. The elder of the two daughters of Aristotimus, tyrant of Elis. [ARI-STOTIMUS.] When Aristotimus was killed, Myro and her sister were compelled by those into whose hands they had fallen to hang themselves. (Plut. de Virt. Mul. p. 252.)

2. A Rhodian lady mentioned by Suidas (s. v.) as having addicted herself to philosophy and literature: she wrote fables, and a work called χρείαι γυναικῶν βασιλίδων. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. i. p. 628.)

3. See MOERO. [C. P. M.]

MYRON (Μύρων), historical. 1. An Athenian of the deme Phlya, in the tribe Cecropis, is mentioned by Plutarch (Solon, p. 84, c.) as the prosecutor of Megacles and the other Alcmaeonidae who had rendered themselves impious by the massacre of the partisans of Cylon, when they were prevailed on by Solon to submit their cause to the decision of an extraordinary court of three hundred persons.

2. Tyrant of Sicyon, the father of Aristonymus, and grandfather of Cleisthenes. He gained the victory at Olympia in the chariot-race in the thirty-third Olympiad (B. C. 648). In commemoration of this victory he erected a treasury at Olympia, consisting of two chambers, lined with plates of brass. (Paus. vi. 19. § 1; Herod. vi. 126.)

3. One of the generals of Mithridates, sent by him, together with Menemachus, at the head of a large force of infantry and cavalry against the Romans in the course of the campaign of Lucullus. The two generals, with all their forces, were defeated and cut to pieces. (Plut. Lucull. p. 502, a.) [C. P. M.]

MYRON, a native of Priene, the author of an historical account of the first Messenian war, from the taking of Ampheia to the death of Aristodemus. His date cannot be ascertained accurately, but he belongs in all probability to the Alexandrine period, not earlier than the third century B. C. According to Pausanias he was an author on whose accuracy very little reliance could be placed. Both Diodorus and Myron placed Aristomenes in the first Messenian war. Müller (Dorians, i. 7. § 9) affirms that this statement was "in the teeth of all tradition"; but Grote (Hist. of Greece, vol. ii. p. 558) is inclined to think that censure too unqualified. There is, however, sufficient reason for believing that the old traditions suffered quite as much corruption and interpolation at the hands of Myron, as at those of the poet Rhianus. (Paus. iv. 6, &c.; Athen. vi. p. 271, f. xiv. p. 657, d.; Voss. de Hist. Graec. p. 472, ed. Westermann.) [C. P. M.]

MYRON (Μύρων), one of the most celebrated of the Greek statuaries, and also a sculptor and engraver, was born at Eleutherae, in Boeotia, about B.C. 480. (Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 8. s. 19. § 3.) Pausanias calls him an Athenian, because Eleutherae had been admitted to the Athenian franchise. He was the disciple of Ageladas, the fellow-disciple of Polycleitus, and a younger contemporary of Phidias. Pliny gives for the time when he flourished the 87th Olympiad, or B. C. 431, the time of the beginning of the Peloponnesian war. (H. N. xxxiv. 8. s. 19.)

The chief characteristic of Myron seems to have been his power of expressing a great variety of forms. Not content with the human figure in its most difficult and momentary attitudes, he directed his art towards various other animals, and he seems to have been the first great artist who did so. To this characteristic Pliny no doubt refers, when he says, Primus hic multiplicasse veritatem videtur, numerosior quam Polycletus (l. c. § 3). To this love of variety he seems in some degree to have sacrificed accuracy of proportion and intellectual expression. (Plin. l. c.; comp. Cic. Brut. 18.) Neither did he pay much attention to minute details, distinct from the general effect, such as the hair, in which he seems to have followed, almost closely, the ancient conventional forms. (Plin. l. c.)

Quinctilian (xii. 10) speaks of his works as softer than those of Callon, Hegesias, and Calamis. The author of the Rhetorica ad Herennium (iv. 6) speaks of his heads as especially admirable.

Myron's great works were nearly all in bronze, of which he used the variety called Delian, while Polycleitus preferred the Aeginetan. (Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 2. s. 5; Dict. of Antiq. s. v. aes.)

The most celebrated of his statues were his Discobolus and his Cow. The encomiums lavished by various ancient writers on the latter work might surprise us if we did not remember how much more admiration is excited in a certain stage of taste by the accurate imitation of an object out of the usual range of high art, than by the most beautiful ideal representation of men or gods; and there can be no doubt that it was almost a perfect work of its kind. Still the novelty of the subject was undoubtedly its great charm, which caused it to be placed at the head of Myron's works, and celebrated in many popular verses. Pliny says of it: "Myronem bucula maxime nobilitavit, celebratis versibus laudata." The Greek Anthology contains no less than thirty-six epigrams upon it, which, with other passages in its praise, are collected by Sontag in the Unterhaltungen für Freunde der alten Literatur, pp. 100—119. Perhaps the best, at least the most expressive of the kind of admiration it excited, is the following epigram, which is one out of several epigrams on Myron's Cow by Ausonius (Epig. 58.):—

"Bucula sum, caelo genitoris facta Myronis
Aerea; nec factam me puto, sed genitam.
Sic me taurus init: sic proxima bucula mugit:
Sic vitulus sitiens ubera nostra petit.
Miraris, quod fallo gregem? Gregis ipse magister
Inter pascentes me numerare solet."

These epigrams give us some of the details of the figure. The cow was represented as lowing and the statue was placed on a marble base, in the centre of the largest open place in Athens, where it still stood in the time of Cicero. (Cic. in Verr. iv. 60.) In the time of Pausanias it was no longer there; it must have been removed to Rome, where it was still to be seen in the temple of Peace, in the time of Procopius. (Bell. Goth. iv. 21.)

A work of higher art, and far more interesting to us, was his Discobolus, of which there are several marble copies in existence. It is true that we cannot prove by testimony that any of these alleged copies were really taken from Myron's work, or from imitations of it; but the resemblance between them, the fame of the original, and the well-known frequency of the practice of making such marble copies of celebrated bronzes, all concur to put the question beyond reasonable doubt. Of these copies we have the good fortune to possess one, in the Townley Gallery of the British Museum, which was found in the grounds of Hadrian's Tiburtine Villa, in 1791: another, found on the Esquiline in 1782, is in the Villa Massimi at Rome: a third, found in Hadrian's Villa, in 1793, is in the Vatican Museum; a fourth, restored as a gladiator, is in the Capitoline Museum. To these may, in all probability, be added (5) a torso, restored as one of the sons of Niobe, in the gallery at Florence; (6) the torso of an Endymion in the same gallery; (7) a figure restored as a Diomed, and (8) a bronze in the gallery at Munich. (Müller, in the Amalthea, vol. iii. p. 243.) The original statue is mentioned by Quinctilian and Lucian. The former dilates upon the novelty and difficulty of its attitude, and the triumph of the artist in representing such an attitude, even though the work may not be in all respects accurate (ii. 13). Lucian gives a much more exact description. (Philopseud. 18, vol. iii. p. 45):—Μῶν τὸν δισκεύοντα, ἦν δ' ἐγώ, φῂς, τὸν ἐπικεκυφότα κατὰ τὸ χῆμα τῆς ἀφέσεως, ἀπεστραμμένον εἰς τὸ δισκοφόρον, ἠρέμα ὀκλάζοντα τῷ ἑτερῷ, ἐοικότα ξυναστησομένῳ μετὰ τῆς βολῆς; οὐκ ἐκεῖνον, ἦ δ' ὅς, ἐπεὶ καὶ Μύρωνος ἔργον ἐν καὶ τοῦτο ἔστιν, ὁ δισκοβόλος ὃν λέγεις. We have given the passage at length in order to make manifest the absurdity of supposing that the figure was not in the action of throwing the quoit, but merely stretching back the hand to receive the quoit from some imaginary attendant who held it (τὸν δισκοφόρον). The real meaning is that the head was turned round backwards towards the hand which held the quoit. The two most perfect copies, the Townley and the Massimi, agree with Lucian's description, except that the former has the head in quite a different position, bending down forwards. Barry preferred this position (Works, vol. i. p. 479; ed. 1809, 4to.); but the attitude described by Lucian, and seen in the Massimi statue, gives a better balance to the figure. There is, also, great reason to doubt whether the head of the Townley statue really belongs to it. (See Townley Gallery, Lib. Ent. Knowledge, vol. i. p. 240, where it is figured.) On the whole, the Massimi copy is the best of all, and probably the most faithful to the original. It is engraved in the Abbildungen zu Winckelmann's Werke, fig. 80; and in Müller's Denkmäler d. alten Kunst, vol. i. pl. xxxii. fig. 139, b.

Of Myron's other works Pliny (xxxiv. 8. s. 19. § 3) enumerates the following:—a dog; Perseus, which Pausanias saw in the Acropolis at Athens (i. 23. § 8); sea-monsters (pristas, see Böttiger, inf. cit.); a satyr admiring a double flute and Minerva, probably a group descriptive of the story of Marsyas; Delphic pentathletes; pancratiasts; a Hercules, which, in Pliny's time, was in the temple of Pompey, by the Circus Maximus; and an Apollo, which was taken away from the Ephesians by M. Antonius, and restored to them by Augustus, in obedience to an admonition in a dream. The words in the passage of Pliny, fecisse et cicadae monumentum ac locustae carminibus suis Erinna significat, are a gross blunder, which Pliny made by mistaking the name of the poetess Myro in an epigram by Anyte (or Erinna, Anth. Pal. vii. 190) for that of the sculptor Myron.

In addition to Pliny's account, the following works of Myron are mentioned by other writers: Colossal statues of Zeus, Hera, and Heracles, at Samos, the three statues on one base. They were removed by M. Antonius, but restored by Augustus, except the Zeus, which he placed on the Capitol and built a shrine for it (Strab. xiv. p. 637, b.) A Dionysus in Helicon, dedicated by Sulla. (Paus. ix. 30. § 1.) A Hercules, which Verres took from Heius the Mamertine. (Cic. Verr. iv. 3.) A bronze Apollo, with the name of the artist worked into the thigh, in minute silver letters, dedicated in the shrine of Aesculapius at Agrigentum by P. Scipio, and taken away by Verres. (Cic. Verr. iv. 43.) A wooden statue of Hecate, in Aegina. (Paus. ii. 20. § 2.) Several statues of athletes. (See Sillig, s. v.) Lastly, a striking indication how far Myron's love of variety led him beyond the true limits of art, a drunken old woman, in marble, at Smyrna, which of course, according to Pliny, was inprimis inclyta. (Plin. H. N. xxxvi. 5. s. 4.) His Cow was not his only celebrated work of the kind: there were four oxen, which Augustus dedicated in the portico of the temple of Apollo on the Palatine, B. C. 28 (Propert. ii. 23. 7); and a calf carrying Victory, derided by Tatian. (Adv. Graec. 54, p. 117, ed. Worth.)

He was also an engraver in metals: a celebrated patera of his is mentioned by Martial (vi. 92).

Nothing is known of Myron's life except that, according to Petronius (88), he died in great poverty. He had a son, Lycius, who was a distinguished artist.

(Besides the usual authorities, Winckelmann, Meyer, Thiersch, Müller, Junius, Sillig, &c., there is an excellent lecture on Myron in Böttiger's Andeutungen zu 24 Vorträgen über die Archäologie, Vorles. 21.) [P. S.]

MYRONIA'NUS (Μυρωνιανός), of Amastris, a Greek writer of uncertain age, was the author of a work entitled Ἱστορικῶν ὁμοίων κεφάλαια. (Diog. Laërt. iv. 14, v. 36.) It is also cited by Diogenes under the title of Ἱστορικὰ κεφάλαια (x. 3), and of Ὅμοια simply (i. 115, iii. 40, iv. 8).

MYRO'NIDES (Μυρωνίδης), a skilful and successful Athenian general. In B. C. 457, the Corinthians invaded Megara with the view of relieving Aegina, by drawing away thence a portion of the Athenian troops, which were besieging the chief city of the island. The Athenians, however, who had at the same time another force in Egypt, acting with Inarus, did not recal a single man from any quarter for the protection of Megara: but the old and young men who had been left behind at home, marched out under Myronides, and met the Corinthians in the Megarian territory. After a battle, in which victory inclined, though not decisively, to the Athenians, the Corinthian troops withdrew, and Myronides erected a trophy. But the Corinthians, being reproached at home for leaving the field, returned; and were setting up a rival trophy, when the Athenians made a sally from Megara, and, in the battle which ensued, completely defeated them. The fugitives, in their retreat, entered an enclosure fenced in by a large ditch, where they were surrounded by the Athenians, who occupied with a part of their force the only egress, and slew with their darts every man within. In the following year, B. C. 456, and sixty-two days after the battle of Tanagra, Myronides led an Athenian army into Boeotia, and defeated the Boeotians at Oenophyta, a victory which made his countrymen masters of Phocis, and of all the Boeotian towns, with the single exception of Thebes; while even there it seems to have led to the temporary establishment of democracy. After his victory, Myronides marched against the Opuntian Locrians, from whom he exacted a hundred hostages; and then, according to Diodorus, he penetrated into Thessaly, to take vengeance for the desertion of the Thessalian troops to the Lacedaemonians at the battle of Tanagra; but he failed in his attempt on the town of Pharsalus, and was obliged to return to Athens. It is possible that the subject of the present article may have been the father of ARCHINUS, the Athenian statesman, who took a chief part in the overthrow of the thirty tyrants, B. C. 403; for Demosthenes mentions a son of Archinus, called Myronides, who may have been named after his grandfather, according to a custom by no means uncommon. (Thuc. i. 105, 106, 108, iv. 95; Aristoph. Lys. 801, Eccl. 303; Aristot. Polit. v. 3, ed. Bekk.; Lys. Ἐπιταφ. p. 195; Diod. xi. 79—83; Plat. Menex. p. 242; Dem. c. Timocrat. p. 742; Herm. Pol. Ant. § 169, note 1; Wachsmuth, Hist. Ant. vol. ii. p. 133, Eng. transl.; Thirlwall's Greece, vol. iii. p. 30, note 2, p. 33, notes; Thuc. i. iii.) [E. E.]

MYRRHA (Μύρρα), a daughter of Cinyras and mother of Adonis. (Luc. D. Syr. 6; comp. ADONIS.) Lycophron (829) calls Byblos in Phoenicia Μύρρας ἄστυ. [L. S.]

MYRSILUS. [CANDAULES.]

MY'RSILUS, a Greek historical writer, a native of Lesbos. When he lived is not known. Dionysius of Halicarnassus (i. 23) has borrowed from him almost verbatim a part of his account of the Pelasgians. He refers to him again in i. 28. Myrsilus was the author of the notion that the Tyrrhenians, in consequence of their wandering about after they left their original settlements, got the name of Πελαργοί, or storks. Athenaeus (xiii. p. 610, a.) quotes from a work by Myrsilus, entitled Ἱστορικὰ παράδοξα. He is also quoted by Strabo (i. p. 60, xiii. p. 610), and by Pliny (H. N. iii. 7, iv. 12). By Arnobius (iii. 37, iv. 24), he is called Myrtilus. (Voss. de Hist. Græc. p. 473, ed. Westermann). [C. P. M.]

MYRSUS (Μύρσος), a Lydian, son of Gyges, was the bearer to Polycrates of the letter containing the treacherous promises by which he was induced to place himself in the power of Oroetes, satrap of Sardis. Myrsus was one of those who were slain in an ambuscade by the Carians in the Ionian war, B. C. 498. (Herod. iii. 122, v. 121.) [E. E.]

MY'RTILUS (Μυρτίλος), a son of Hermes by Cleobule, or by Clytia (Hygin. Poet. Astr. ii. 13), or, according to others, by Phaetusa or Myrto. (Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. i. 752.) He was the charioteer of Oenomaus, king of Elis, and, having betrayed his master, he was thrown into the sea by Pelops near Geraestus in Euboea; and that part of the Aegean is said to have thenceforth been called after him the Myrtoan sea. At the moment he expired, he pronounced a curse upon the house of Pelops, which was hence harassed by the Erinnyes of that curse. His father placed him among the stars as auriga. (Soph. Elect. 509; Eurip. Or. 993, &c.; Apollon. Rhod. i. 755; Paus. ii. 18. § 2, v. 1. § 5, viii. 14. § 8; Tzetz. ad Lyc. 156, 162; Hygin. Fab. 84, Poet. Astr. ii. 13; Serv. ad Virg. Georg. i. 205, iii. 7; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 184.) His tomb was shown at Pheneus, behind the temple of Hermes, where the waves were believed to have washed his body on the coast. There he was also worshipped as a hero, and honoured with nocturnal sacrifices. (Paus. vi. 20. § 8, viii. 14. § 7.) [L. S.]

MY'RTILUS (Μυρτίλος), a Greek comic poet, the brother of Hermippus. Suidas has preserved the names of two of his plays, the Τιτανόπανες, and the Ἔρωτες. One object of his ridicule in the former was the tasteless love of display shown by the Megarian Choregi. (Aspasius ad Aristot. Ethic. Nic. iv. 2; Meineke, Hist. Crit. Com. Graec. p. 100; Bode, Geschichte der Hellen. Dichtkunst, vol. iii. part ii. p. 170). [C. P. M.]

MY'RTILUS, a slave or a freedman, seems to have been bribed by Antony, or some one of that party, to make an attempt upon the life of D. Brutus, but was detected and put to death. (Cic. ad Att. xv. 13, xvi. 11.)

MY'RTILUS, L. MINU'CIUS, was handed over to the Carthaginians, because he had beaten the ambassadors of the latter, B. C. 187. (Liv. xxxviii. 42.)

MYRTIS (Μύρτις), an Argive, whom, with several others of that and other states, Demosthenes (de Cor. p. 324, ed. Reiske) charged with treachery on the ground of their having misled their fellow-citizens with respect to the danger to be apprehended from the growing power of Philip, and so kept them from combining against him. He charges them also with having done so from corrupt motives. Polybius (xvii. 14) exonerates them from the charge of treachery. [C. P. M.]

MYRTIS (Μύρτις), a lyric poetess, a native of Anthedon. She was reported to have been the instructress of Pindar, and to have contended with him for the palm of superiority. This is alluded to in an extant fragment of Corinna. (Bergk's Poetae Lyrici Graeci, p. 815.) There were statues in honour of her in various parts of Greece. She was also reckoned amongst the nine lyric Muses. (Anthol. Pal. ix. 26; Suidas s. vv. Πίνδαρος, Κόριννα; Tatian. Orat. ad Graec. 52; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. p. 133; Bode, Gesch. der Hellen. Dichtkunst, vol. ii. pt. 2, p. 112.) [C.P.M.]

MYRTO (Μυρτώ), a woman from whom, according to some, the Myrtoan sea derived its name. (Paus. viii. 14. § 8; Apollon. Rhod. i. 752; comp. MYRTILUS.) [L. S.]

MYRTO (Μυρτώ), a daughter of one Aristeides, was, according to some accounts, the first wife of Socrates. (Ath. xiii. p. 555, d.; Böckh, Publ. Econ. of Athens, b. i. c. 20.) [E. E.]

MYRTOESSA (Μυρτώεσσα), the nymph of a well of the same name in Arcadia; she was represented at Megalopolis along with Archiroe, Hagno, Anthracia and Nais. (Paus. viii. 31. § 2.) [L. S.]

MYRTON (Μύρτων), and his son NICANOR (Νικάνωρ), were men of weight and influence in Epeirus, and are mentioned by Polybius (who bears testimony at the same time to their previous high character for uprightness) as having lent themselves to abet the cruel and oppressive conduct of CHAROPS [No. 2]. Charops was accompanied by Myrton, when he went to Rome to endeavour to obtain the senate's confirmation of his proceedings. (Polyb. xxxii. 21, 22.) [E. E.]

MYS (Μῦς), an artist in the toreutic department, engraved the battle of the Lapithae and the Centaurs and other figures on the shield of Phidias's colossal bronze statue of Athena Promachos, in the Acropolis of Athens. (Paus. i. 28. § 2.) If we are to believe Pausanias, these works were executed from designs by Parrhasius, who flourished half a century later than Phidias. It is probable that there is a mistake in the passage of Pausanias, and that Mys ought to be considered as a contemporary of Phidias, about B. C. 444. (Sillig, s. v.) He is mentioned as one of the most distinguished engravers by Pliny (H. N. xxxiii. 12. s. 55), Propertius (iii. 7. 14), Martial (viii. 33, 50, xiv. 93), and Statius (Silv. i. 3. 50). [P. S.]

MYSCELLUS (Μύσκελλος, or Μύσκελος), a native of Rhypes, one of the twelve divisions of Achaia, and, according to Ovid (Metam. xv. 15) a Heraclide, and the son of an Argive named Alemon. He led the colony which founded Crotona, B. C. 710. They were assisted in founding the city by Archias, who was on his way to Sicily [ARCHIAS]. The colony was led forth under the sanction of the Delphic oracle, Myscellus having previously been to survey the locality. He was so much better pleased with the site of Sybaris, that on his return he made an unsuccessful attempt to persuade the Delphic god to allow the colonists to select Sybaris as their place of settlement. Respecting the choice offered to Archias and Myscellus by the oracle, and the selection which each made, see ARCHIAS, Vol. I. p. 265. (Strab. vi. pp. 262, 269, viii. p. 387; Dionys. ii. p. 361; Schol. ad Arist. Equit. 1089; Suidas s. v. Μύσκελος; Clinton, F. H. vol. i. anno 710, vol. ii. p. 265; Müller, Dorians, i. 6. § 12.) [C. P. M.]

MY'SIA (Μυσία). 1. A surname of Demeter, who had a temple, Μυσαῖον, between Argos and Mycenae and at Pellene. It is said to have been derived from an Argive Mysius, who received her kindly during her wanderings, and built a sanctuary to her. (Paus. ii. 18. § 3, 35. § 3, vii. 27. § 4.)

2. A surname of Artemis, under which she was worshipped in a sanctuary near Sparta. (Paus. iii. 20. § 9.) [L. S.]

MYSON (Μύσων), a native of Chenae or Chen, a village either in Laconia (according to Stephanus Byz.) or on Mount Oeta (according to Pausanias, x. 24, § 1), who is enumerated by Plato (Protag. 28, p. 343) as one of the seven sages, in place of Periander. [C. P. M.]

MYTILE'NE (Μυτιλήνη), a daughter of Macar or Pelops, became by Poseidon the mother of Myton. The town of Mytilene in Lesbos was believed to have derived its name from her, or from her son, or from a personage of the name of Mytilus. (Steph. Byz. s. v.) [L. S.]

N.

NABARZA'NES (Ναβαρζάνης), a Persian in the service of Dareius. He is first spoken of by Q. Curtius on the occasion of his sending a letter to Sisines, a Persian attached to Alexander, exhorting him apparently to contrive his assassination. Nabarzanes commanded the Persian cavalry on the right wing at the battle of Issus. Afterwards, when the fortunes of Dareius seemed desperate, Nabarzanes joined Bessus and Barsaentes in plotting either to kill Dareius, or to give him up to Alexander. In a council held after quitting Ecbatana, he had the audacity to propose that Dareius should retire into one of the remote provinces of the empire, and for a time resign his authority as king into the hands of Bessus. Dareius was so incensed at the proposal, that he drew his scimitar, and was with difficulty prevented from killing Nabarzanes on the spot. The conspirators now resolved to seize Dareius, who, notwithstanding that their designs were discovered by Patron, and made known to the king, refused to take refuge among the Greek mercenaries. By command of Bessus, Dareius was seized, and thrown into chains, and murdered, when they were overtaken by Alexander. Nabarzanes fled into Hyrcania; and when Alexander reached the river Ziobaris or Stiboetes, sent a letter to him, offering to surrender himself if assured of personal safety. This was promised him, upon which he gave himself up, bringing with him a large amount of presents, among which was the beautiful eunuch Bagoas [BAGOAS], through whose entreaties mainly Alexander was induced to pardon Nabarzanes. Of his further fate we have no notice. (Q. Curt. iii. 9. § 1, 7. § 22, v. 9. § 2, 10. § 1, &c., 11. § 8, 12. § 15, 13. § 18, vi. 3. § 9, 4. § 8, 5. § 22; Arrian, iii. 21.) [C. P. M.]

NABDALSA, a Numidian chief, conspicuous both from his birth and wealth, who enjoyed a high place in the favour of Jugurtha, by whom he was frequently employed in services of the most important nature. In consequence of the confidence thus reposed in him by the Numidian king, he was the person selected by Bomilcar as his intended minister in his designs against the life of that monarch [BOMILCAR]; but the negligence of Nabdalsa suffered these projects to transpire. Bomilcar was seized and put to death, but we are not informed whether Nabdalsa shared the same fate. (Sall. Jug. 70—72.) [E. H. B.]

NABIS (Νάβις), succeeded in making himself tyrant of Lacedaemon on the death of Machanidas, B. C. 207. To obviate the inconvenience of having a rival at any future time, he had Pelops, son of the king Lycurgus, who was still quite young, assassinated. To secure himself still further, he carried the licence of tyranny to the furthest possible extent; put to death or banished all the wealthiest and most eminent citizens, and even pursued them in exile, sometimes causing them to be murdered on their road; at other times, when they had reached some friendly city, getting persons not likely to be suspected to hire houses next to those in which the exiles had taken up their abode, and then sending his emissaries to break through the party-walls, and assassinate them in their own houses. All persons possessed of property who remained at Sparta were subjected to incessant exactions, and the most cruel tortures if they did not succeed in satisfying his rapacity. One of his engines of torture resembled the maiden of more recent times: it was a figure resembling his wife Apega, so constructed as to clasp the victim and pierce him to death with the nails with which the arms and bosom of the figure were studded. (Polyb. xiii. 7.) The money which he got by these means and by the plunder of the temples enabled him to raise a large body of mercenaries, whom he selected from among the most abandoned and reckless villains: murderers, burglars, thieves, and reprobates of every kind found an asylum in Sparta and a patron in Nabis. He likewise manumitted a great number of helots and slaves, and apportioned them lands. He extended his protection over the pirates of Crete, whom he sheltered and assisted, receiving a share of their booty. Nor did he content himself with making Sparta a den of robbers, emissaries of the same sort were scattered over all parts of Peloponnesus, the proceeds of whose plunder he shared, while he afforded them a refuge whenever danger threatened. When he first opened negotiations with the Romans we are not informed, but we find him included as one of the allies of the Romans in the treaty made between them and Philip in the year B. C. 204. (Liv. xxix. 12.) The impunity with which Nabis pursued the course which has been described for two or three years encouraged him to form greater projects. An opportunity soon presented itself. Some Boeotians induced one of the grooms of Nabis to abscond with them, carrying off the most valuable of his horses. The fugitives were pursued, and overtaken at Megalopolis. The pursuers were allowed to carry off the horses and groom; but when they attempted to lay hands on the Boeotians also, they were hindered by the people and magistrates of the town, and compelled to quit it. Nabis seized upon this as a pretext for making inroads into the territory of Megalopolis. These he followed up by seizing the city of Messene, though he was at the time in alliance with the Messenians. (Polyb. xvi. 13.) Philopoemen, by his private influence, collected the forces of Megalopolis, and marched to Messene, upon which Nabis evacuated the town, and hastily returned into Laconia (in the latter part of B. C. 202, or the beginning of B. C. 201). In B. C. 201 Philopoemen became Achaean praetor, and in the third year of his office he collected the forces of the Achaean league with the greatest possible secresy at Tegea, drew the mercenaries of Nabis into an ambush on the borders of Laconia, at a place called Scotitas, and defeated them with great slaughter. For the rest of the year Nabis was compelled to keep within his own borders. (Polyb. xiii. 8, xvi. 36, 37; Paus. iv. 29. § 10, viii. 50. § 5.) As soon as Philopoemen was replaced by other and inferior leaders, Nabis renewed his attacks upon Megalopolis, and, according to Plutarch (Philop. p. 363), reduced them to such distress, that they were compelled to sow corn in the streets of their city, to avoid starvation. It was at this juncture, when the Achaean army had been disbanded, and the contingents had not been fixed for the different states, that Philip undertook to repel Nabis, on condition that the Achaeans would help him to defend Corinth and some other places. As his object was evidently to involve the Achaeans in his contest with the Romans, his offer was prudently declined, and the assembly at which it was made was dismissed, after a decree had been passed for levying troops against Nabis. (Liv. xxxi. 25.) Philip now (B. C. 198), finding it inconvenient to defend Argos himself, instructed Philocles to give up the custody of the city to Nabis, who, after having betrayed the people into an open expression of the hatred they felt towards him, was admitted by night into the city. He forthwith proceeded to extort the money of the citizens by means similar to those which he had found so successful at Sparta; and then, to secure the support of at least one portion of the community, he proposed a decree for the cancelling of debts, and for a fresh partition of the lands. (Liv. xxxii. 38, &c.) Having procured an interview with Flamininus and Attalus, he agreed to grant a truce for four months to the Achaeans, and placed a body of his Cretans at the disposal of Flamininus. He then returned to Sparta, leaving a garrison in Argos, and sent his wife Apega in his place. She seems to have been a fit helpmate for her husband, whom she even outdid at Argos, robbing and spoiling the women of the city in much the same fashion as her husband had robbed the men. (Polyb. xvii. 17; Liv. xxxii. 40.)

Upon the representations of the commissioners employed in settling the affairs of Greece after the conclusion of the war with Philip, the Roman senate took into consideration the question of peace or war with Nabis, and finally referred the matter to Flamininus. He laid it before a congress of the allies at Corinth when war was unanimously decreed. Pythagoras, who was at once brother-in-law and son-in-law of Nabis, and was in command at Argos, prevented the Romans from getting the city into their possession without a siege; and Flamininus, by the advice of Aristaenus, chose rather to carry the war into Laconia. With a powerful force he descended to the banks of the Eurotas. Nabis strengthened the defences of Sparta, and struck terror into his subjects by the sanguinary execution of eighty suspected citizens. His troops sustained some losses in engagements with the enemy, and Gythium, the arsenal of Sparta, was taken. Nabis, though reinforced by Pythagoras, was fain to solicit an interview with Flamininus. A conference ensued which lasted two days, a long account of which is given by Livy (xxxiv. 30—33). A truce was granted, that Nabis might consult his friends, and Flamininus his allies. The latter could only be induced to consent to peace at all by the representations which Flamininus made to them of the magnitude of the contributions which he should be obliged to lay upon them for the expenses of the war. The terms offered were such as Nabis refused to accept, and the negotiations were broken off. But being more closely pressed by the besieging army, and the city having been nearly carried by assault, Nabis was compelled to implore peace, which was granted on the former conditions, according to which he was to evacuate all the places he held beyond Laconia, to give up to the Romans the ports of Laconia, and the whole of his navy, to confine himself to Laconia, to give up to the exiles their wives and children, and pay 500 talents. This treaty was ratified by the Roman senate; and amongst other hostages, Armenas, the son of Nabis, was sent to Rome, where he died some time after. The Argives, meantime, had expelled the garrison of Nabis from their city, B. C. 195. (Liv. xxxiv. 33—43; Polyb. xx. 13.)

When the Aetolians, after the departure of Flamininus from Greece, were endeavouring to rekindle the flames of war, they incited Nabis to commence hostilities. He immediately began to make attempts upon the maritime towns of Laconia. The Achaeans, who had been constituted the protectors of them, sent to Rome. Directions were given by the senate to the praetor, Atilius, to repel the aggressions of Nabis; but before his arrival it was deemed necessary by the Achaeans, who were again headed by Philopoemen, at once to relieve Gythium. The attempts of Philopoemen to effect this by sea failed, to some extent, from his having placed his admiral, Tiso, on board a large ship which was utterly unseaworthy, and went to pieces at the first shock; and notwithstanding a favourable diversion by land, Gythium was taken by Nabis, and Philopoemen retired to Tegea. On re-entering Laconia, he was surprised by Nabis; but through his skilful conduct, the forces of the tyrant were defeated with great slaughter, and Philopoemen ravaged Laconia unmolested for thirty days. The war was now intermitted for a time, probably through the weakness of Nabis (Thirlwall, Hist. of Greece, vol. viii. p. 335), who appealed for help to the Aetolians. A small force was sent by them under Alexamenus, by whom Nabis was soon after assassinated, B. C. 192 (Liv. xxxv. 12, 13, 22, 25—35; Paus. viii. 50. § 7, 10; Plut. Philop. p. 364.) [C. P. M.]

NABONASSAR (Ναβονάσαρος). Among the most perplexing questions of Eastern history, is the comparative state of the Assyrian and the Babylonian or Chaldean empire, and the succession of their kings. There seems to be little doubt, however, that the Babylonian kingdom did not extend its conquests till the reign of Nebuchadnezzar B. C. 604. Till this time the kings of Babylon were often dependent on the kings of Assyria, and acted as their viceroys, in the same manner as Cyrus the younger was dependent on his brother. From this general fact, as well as from an inference to be stated immediately, Rosenmüller is of opinion that Nabonassar, the king of Babylon B. C. 747, was, without doubt, a vassal of Assyria. We find in sacred history (2 Kings, xvii. 24) that the king of Assyria, while colonising Samaria, "brought men from Babylon." Rosenmüller assumes that this king was Shalmaneser, or Salmanasar, and argues that we must hence conclude that Babylon was at that time — a period subsequent to Nabonassar's reign — and consequently before, tributary to Assyria. Paulus, in his Key to Isaiah (quoted by Rosenmüller), is of a different opinion, and is corroborated by Clinton. This latter writer infers from Ezra (iv. 2), that the colonisation of Samaria took place under Esarhaddon, the Assyrian monarch, who undoubtedly effected a change in the Babylonian monarchy, and placed his son there as viceroy. In the absence of all positive authority, therefore, we can draw no inference from the event referred to by Rosenmüller. Clinton concludes, on the authority of Polyhistor and the astronomical canon, that Babylon had always kings of her own from the earliest times, and conjectures that Nabonassar and his successors were independent till the reign of Esarhaddon. This conclusion is strengthened by the existence of the celebrated Era of Nabonassar. We may fairly infer, from this monarch's reign having been fixed upon by the Babylonian astronomers as the era from which they began their calculations, that there was some distinguished event — probably the temporary establishment of Babylon as an independent kingdom — which led to their choice. In the absence of any thing like certainty to guide us, we may, notwithstanding, pronounce the opinion which Scaliger once held, but afterwards retracted, that Nabonassar and Baladon are identical, to be untenable.

The Era of Nabonassar. This era serves, in astronomical, the same purpose as the Olympiads in civil history. It was the starting point of the Babylonian chronology, and was adopted by the Greeks of Alexandria, by Hipparchus, Berosus, and Ptolemy. Its date is ascertained from the eclipses recorded by Ptolemy, and the celestial phenomena with which he marks the day of Nabonassar's accession to the throne. It is fixed as the 26th of February, B. C. 747. Scaliger De Emend. Temp. (p. 392) notices the coincidence between the years of this era and the sabbatical year of the Samaritans. Thus, to take the year of Christ, 1584: 1584 + 747 = 2331 of the era of Nabonassar, which is both divisible by 7 and a sabbatical year. (Rosenmüller, Biblic. Geogr. of Central Asia, vol. ii. p. 41, &c., Edinburgh; Clinton, F. H. vol. i. p. 278; Scaliger, De Emend. Temp. p. 352, &c.) [W. M. G.]

NACCA. [NATTA.]

NAE'NIA, i. e. a dirge or lamentation, equivalent to the Greek θρῆνος, such as was uttered at funerals, either by relatives of the deceased or by hired persons. At Rome Naenia was personified and worshipped as a goddess, who even had a chapel, which, however, as in the case of all other gods in connection with the dead, was outside the walls of the city, near the porta Viminalis. The object of this worship was probably to procure rest and peace for the departed in the lower world; this may be inferred from the fact of Naeniae being compared with lullabyes, and they seem to have been sung with a soft voice, as if a person was to be lulled to sleep. (August. de Civ. Dei, vi. 9; Arnob. adv. Gent. iv. 7, vii. 32; Horat. Carm. iii. 28. 16; Fest. pp. 161, 163, ed. Müller.) [L. S.]

NAE'VIA E'NNIA. [ENNIA.]

NAEVIA GENS, plebeian, is not mentioned in history till the time of the second Punic war, towards the close of which one of its members, Q. Naevius Matho, was praetor. None of the Naevii, however, obtained the consulship under the republic, and it was not till A. D. 30, when L. Naevius Surdinus was consul, that any of the gens was raised to this honour. The principal surnames under the republic are BALBUS and MATHO: besides these we also find the cognomens Crista, Pollio, Turpio, which are given under NAEVIUS. On coins we find the cognomens Balbus, Capella, Surdinus. (Eckhel, vol. v. p. 259.)

NAE'VIUS. 1. Q. NAEVIUS, or NAVIUS, as the name is written in the MSS. of Livy, was a centurion in the army of Q. Fulvius Flaccus, who was engaged in the siege of Capua in B. C. 211, when Hannibal attempted to relieve the town. Naevius greatly distinguished himself by his personal bravery on this occasion, and by his advice the velites were united with the equites and did good service in repulsing the Campanian cavalry. (Liv. xxvi. 4, 5; Frontin. Strateg. iv. 7. § 29; Val. Max. ii. 3. § 3.)

2. Q. NAEVIUS CRISTA, a praefect of the allies, served under the praetor M. Valerius in the war against Philip in B. C. 214, during the course of the second Punic war, and distinguished himself by his bravery and military skill. (Liv. xxiv. 40.)

3. Q. NAEVIUS, was one of the triumvirs appointed in B. C. 194, for founding a Latin colony among the Bruttii. He and his colleagues had the imperium granted to them for three years. (Liv. xxxiv. 53, xxxv. 40.)

4. M. NAEVIUS, tribune of the plebs, B. C. 184, entered upon his office in B. C. 185, in which year, at the instigation of Cato the censor, he accused Scipio Africanus the elder of having been bribed by Antiochus to allow that monarch to come off too leniently. Scipio's speech in his defence was extant in the time of A. Gellius, who quotes a striking passage from it; but there was some dispute whether Naevius was the accuser of Scipio; some authorities spoke of the Petilii as the parties who brought the charge. (Liv. xxxviii. 56, xxxix. 52; Gell. iv. 18; Aur. Vict. de Vir. Ill. 49.) The short quotation which Cicero (de Orat. ii. 61) makes from a speech of Scipio against Naevius must have been delivered upon another occasion, since Livy (xxxviii. 56) tells us that the speech which Scipio delivered in his defence on the occasion referred to, did not contain the name of the accuser. (Meyer, Orator. Roman. Fragm. p. 6, &c., 2d ed.)

5. SEXT. NAEVIUS, a praeco, the accuser of P. Quintius whom Cicero defended. (Cic. pro Quint. 1, &c.) [QUINTIUS.]

6. SER. NAEVIUS, a person defended by C. Curio against Cicero. (Cic. Brut. 60.)

7. NAEVIUS TURPIO, a quadruplator or public informer, was one of the unscrupulous agents of Verres in plundering the unhappy Sicilians. He had been previously condemned for injuriae by the praetor C. Sacerdos. (Cic. Verr. ii. 8, iii. 39, 40, v. 41.)

8. NAEVIUS POLLIO, a Roman citizen, who was stated by Cicero to have been a foot taller than the tallest man that ever lived. This statement of Cicero, which is quoted by Columella (iii. 8. § 2), was doubtless contained in his work entitled Admiranda. Pliny also speaks (H. N. vii. 16) of the great height of this Naevius Pollio, but says that the annals did not specify what his height was.

CN. NAE'VIUS. Of the life of this ancient Roman poet but few particulars have been recorded. It has been commonly supposed that he was a native of Campania, because Gellius (i. 24) characterises the epitaph which he composed upon himself as "plenum superbiae Campanae." Klussmann, however, the most recent editor of Naevius's fragments, thinks that he was a Roman, from the circumstance of Cicero's alluding to him in the De Oratore (iii. 12) as a model of pure elocution, and contends that no inference can be drawn from the mention of Campanian pride, which, as is shown by Cicero's speech, De Lege Agr. (ii. 33), had become proverbial. But to this it may be objected, that in the passage of the De Oratore the name of Plautus, an Umbrian, is coupled with that of Naevius; a fact which invalidates that argument for his Roman birth. And though the pride of the Campanians may have become a proverb, it is difficult to see how it could with propriety be applied to any but those Gascons of ancient Italy. However this may be, it is probable that Naevius was at least brought early to Rome; but at what time cannot be said, as the date of his birth cannot be fixed with any accuracy. The fact, however, of his having died at an advanced age about the middle of the sixth century of Rome, may justify us in placing his birth some ten or twenty years before the close of the preceding one, or somewhere between the years 274 and 264 B. C. And this agrees well enough with what Gellius tells us (xvii. 21), on the authority of Varro, about his serving in the first Punic war, which began in 264 B. C., and lasted twenty-four years. The first literary attempts of Naevius were in the drama, then recently introduced at Rome by Livius Andronicus. According to Gellius, in the passage just cited, Naevius produced his first play in the year of Rome 519, or B. C. 235. Gellius, however, makes this event coincident with the divorce of a certain Carvilius Ruga, which, in another passage (iv. 3) he places four years later (B. C. 231), but mentions wrong consuls. Dionysius (ii. 25) also fixes the divorce of Carvilius at the latter date; Valerius Maximus (ii. 1) in B. C. 234. These variations are too slight to be of much importance. Naevius was attached to the plebeian party; an opponent of the nobility, and inimical to the innovations then making in the national literature. These feelings he shared with Cato; and, though the great censor was considerably his junior, it is probable, as indeed we may infer from Cicero's Cato (c. 14), that a friendship existed between them. It was in his latter days, and when Cato must have already entered upon public life, that Naevius, with the licence of the old Attic comedy, made the stage a vehicle for his attacks upon the aristocracy. Gellius (vi. 8) has preserved the following verses, where a little scandalous anecdote respecting the elder Scipio is accompanied with the praise justly due to his merits: —

Etiam qui res magnas manu saepe gessit gloriose,
Cujus facta viva nunc vigent, qui apud gentes solus praestat,
Eum suus pater cum pallio uno ab amica abduxit.

These lines, a fragment probably of some interlude, would have derived much of their piquancy from their contrast with the current story of Scipio's continence after the taking of Carthago Nova, in B.C. 210. Asconius (Cic. Verr. i. 10) has preserved the following lampoon on the Metelli: — where the insinuation is, as Cicero explains in the passage to which the note of Asconius refers, that the Metelli attained to the consular dignity, not by any merit of their own, but through the blind influence of fate. In what year could this attack have been made? From the way in which the answer to it is recorded by Asconius, it would seem to have been during the actual consulship of one of the family. (Cui tunc Metellus consul iratus responderat senario hypercatalecto, qui et Saturnius dicitur, Dabunt malum Metelli Naevio poetae).

Fato Metelli Romae fiunt consules;

It can hardly be doubted, therefore, that the person in question was Q. Caecilius Metellus, consul in B. C. 206. The haughty aristocracy of Rome were by no means disposed to let such attacks pass unpunished. By the law of the Twelve Tables a libel was a capital offence, and Metellus carried his threat into execution by indicting Naevius. The poet escaped with his life, but was given into the custody of the triumviri capitales (Gell. iii. 3); an imprisonment to which Plautus alludes in his Miles Gloriosus (ii. 2. 56). Confinement brought repentance. Whilst in prison he composed two plays, the Hariolus and Leon, in which he recanted his previous imputations, and thereby obtained his release through the tribunes of the people. (Gell. l. c.) His repentance, however, did not last long, and he was soon compelled to expiate a new offence by exile. At that time a man might choose his own place of banishment, and Naevius fixed upon Utica. Here it was, probably, that he wrote his poem on the first Punic war, which, as we learn from Cicero (De Senect. 14), was the work of his old age; and here it is certain that he died; but as to the exact year there is some difference of opinion. According to Cicero (Brut. 15), his decease took place in the consulship of Cethegus and Tuditanus, B. C. 204. As we learn, however, from the same passage that this was by no means a settled point, and that Varro, diligentissimus investigator antiquitatis, extended his life rather longer, it may be safer to place his death, with Hieronymus (in Euseb. Chron. Ol. cxliv. 3), in B. C. 202, which was probably the date of Varro. The epitaph which he composed upon himself, preserved by Gellius in the passage alluded to at the beginning of this notice, runs as follows:—

> Mortales immortales flere si foret fas,
> Flerent Divae Camenae Naevium poetam.
> Itaque postquam est Orcino traditus thesauro
> Obliti sunt Romani loquier Latina lingua.

Naevius seems to have transmitted an hereditary enmity against the nobility, if, indeed, the tribune Naevius, who accused Scipio of peculation in B. C. 185, was of his family. (Liv. xxxviii. 56; Gell. iv. 18.) [See above, NAEVIUS, No. 4.]

Naevius was both an epic and a dramatic poet. The work which entitled him to the former appellation was his poem before alluded to on the first Punic war, of which a few fragments are still extant. It was written in the old Saturnian metre; for Ennius, who introduced the hexameter among the Romans, was not brought to Rome till after the banishment of Naevius. The poem appears to have opened with the story of Aeneas's flight from Troy, his visit to Carthage and amour with Dido, together with other legends connected with the early history both of Carthage and of Rome. Originally the poem was not divided into books, and we learn from Suetonius (De Ill. Gramm. 2), that Lampadio distributed it into seven. It was extensively copied both by Ennius and Virgil. The latter author took many passages from it; particularly the description of the storm in the first Aeneïd, the speech with which Aneas consoles his companions, and the address of Venus to Jupiter. (Cic. Brut. 19; Macrob. Sat. vi. 2; Serv. ad Aen. i. 198.)

A translation of the Cypria Ilias has been ascribed to Naevius; but the heroic metre in which it is executed is a sufficient proof that it was the production of some later writer, probably Laevius, whose fragments seem to have been frequently confounded with those of Naevius. (Pontan. ad Macrob. Sat. i. 18.)

His dramatic writings comprised both tragedies and comedies; and, among the latter, that more peculiarly Roman species of composition, the Comoedia Togata. Welcker, however, doubts about his claims to be considered as a tragic poet, and altogether denies that he wrote Togatae. (Die Griech. Tragödien, pp. 1345, 1372.) Among his tragedies have been reckoned Andromache sive Hector Proficiscens, Danaë, Hesione, Iphigenia, Lycurgus (by some thought to have been a comedy), the Equus Trojanus (also ascribed to Livius), and the Dolus, a title variously spelt (see Müller, ad Varr. L. L. p. 163). Klussmann (p. 100) holds the Equus Trojanus and Dolus to be one and the same play. Several other tragedies seem to have been wrongly ascribed to Naevius, whose dramatic fragments have been frequently confounded with those of Livius, Ennius, and other writers.

Of his Togatae the titles of two only can be cited; the Romulus, a Praetextata, and the Clastidium, probably a Tabernaria. (Donat. ad Ter. Adelph. iv. 1, 21; Varr. L. L. p. 163, Müll.)

In addition to these, we find the titles of between thirty and forty comedies, many of which, from their names, seem to have been taken from the Greek, but were probably adapted to Roman manners with considerable freedom, in the fashion of Plautus rather than of Terence. Of most of these comedies, as well as of the plays before enumerated, several short fragments are extant.

Besides these regular dramas, Naevius seems to have written entertainments called Ludi or Satirae (Cic. Cato, 6); and it was probably in these that he attacked the aristocracy.

The remains of Naevius are too insignificant to afford any criterion of his poetical merits, concerning which we must therefore be content to accept the testimony of antiquity. That he was so largely copied by subsequent poets, is a proof of his genius and originality. Plautus alludes to him more than once; and Terence, in the prologue to his Andria, ranking him with Ennius and Plautus, prefers even his more careless scenes to the obscure diligence of his own contemporaries. Cicero (Brut. 18) sets his Punic War as much above the Odyssey of Livius Andronicus as Myro surpassed Daedalus in the art of sculpture. His antiquated style did not suit the fastidious refinement of the Augustan age. Yet he was still a favourite with the admirers of the genuine old school of Roman poetry; and the lines of Horace (Ep. ii. 1. 53) show that his works, if not so much read as formerly, were still fresh in the memories of men.

The fragments of Naevius have been published, together with those of other Latin poets, by the Stephani, 8vo. Paris, 1564; but in this collection many are wrongly attributed to Naevius. There is another collection by Almeloveen, 12mo. Amster. 1686. The fragments of the Bellum Punicum, together with those of Ennius, were published by P. Merula, 4to. Leyden, 1595; and by Spangenberg, 8vo. Leipzig, 1825. They have also been collected by Hermann in his Elementa Doctrinae Metricae (iii. 9), and by Düntzer and Lersch, in a treatise entitled De versu quem vocant Saturnio, 8vo. Bonn, 1839. The dramatic fragments by Delrio, Syntagma Tragoediae Latinae, 4to. Paris, 1619; Maittaire, London, 1713; Bothe, Poetarum Latii scenicorum fragmenta, Leipzig, 1834. The most convenient collection of the entire fragments is that of Klussmann, 8vo. Jena, 1843, accompanied with a life of Naevius, and an essay on his poetry. NAIADES. [NYMPHAE.]

NAMU'SA, AUFI'DIUS, one of the numerous pupils of Serv. Sulpicius. There were ten of the pupils of Sulpicius who wrote books, and from the works of eight of them Namusa compiled a work which was distributed into one hundred and eighty parts or divisions (libri). The work of Namusa is cited by Ulpian (Dig. 13. tit. 6. s. 5. § 7), Javolenus (Dig. 35. tit. 1. s. 40. § 3), and Paulus (Dig. 39. tit. 3. s. 2. § 6); and we are thus made acquainted with some of the legal opinions of Servius. As to the expression "his auditoribus," used by Pomponius (Dig. 1. tit. 2 s. 2. § 44) see Grotius, Vitae Jurisconsult. and Zimmern, Geschichte des Röm. Privatrechts, vol. i. p. 293. [G. L.]

NANNII or NANNEII, persons of property prescribed by Sulla. (Cic. de Pet. Cons. c. 2.)

When Cicero speaks (ad Att. i. 16. § 3) of Calvus ex Nanneianis illo, he means to indicate Crassus, who was one of the purchasers of the confiscated property of the Nannii.

NANNO (Νάννώ), a flute-player, beloved by Mimnermus, and repeatedly celebrated by him, as well as mentioned in connection with his name by Poseidippus. (Anth. Graec. vol. ii. p. 48, vol. viii. p. 142, ed. Jacobs; Stobaeus, vol. i. p. 303, vol. iii. pp. 332, 435, ed. Gaisford.) [W. M. G.]

NAPAEAE. [NYMPHAE.]

NARAVAS (Ναραύας,, a Numidian chief, who bears a conspicuous part in the war of the Carthaginians against their revolted mercenaries and African subjects. He at first espoused the cause of the rebels, and joined the army of Spendius with a considerable force, but was afterwards induced to go over to the Carthaginians. The latter change, which took place at so critical a period that it was probably the means of saving the whole army of Hamilcar Barca from destruction, is ascribed to the influence exercised over the mind of Naravas by the personal character of that general, who received him with open arms and promised him his daughter in marriage. Throughout the remainder of the war Naravas was distinguished for his zeal and fidelity in the Carthaginian cause, and contributed essentially to the ultimate success of Hamilcar. (Polyb. i. 78, 82, 84, 86.) Naravas is the Greek form of the name, which is not mentioned by any Latin writer: the more correct form would probably be Narbal, or rather, Naarbaal. (Gesenius, Ling. Phoen. Mon. p. 410.) [E. H. B.]

NARCAEUS (Ναρκαῖος), a son of Dionysus and Narcaea, established a sanctuary of Athena Narcaea in Elis, and also introduced there the worship of Dionysus. (Paus. v. 16. § 5.) [L. S.]

NARCISSUS (Νάρκισσος), a son of Cephissus and the nymph Liriope of Thespiae. He was a very handsome youth, but wholly inaccessible to the feeling of love. The nymph Echo, who loved him, but in vain, died away with grief. One of his rejected lovers, however, prayed to Nemesis to punish him for his unfeeling heart. Nemesis accordingly caused Narcissus to see his own face reflected in a well, and to fall in love with his own image. As this shadow was unapproachable Narcissus gradually perished with love, and his corpse was metamorphosed into the flower called after him narcissus. This beautiful story is related at length by Ovid (Met. iii. 341, &c.). According to some traditions, Narcissus sent a sword to one of his lovers, Ameinius, who killed himself with it at the very door of Narcissus' house, and called upon the gods to avenge his death. Narcissus, tormented by love of himself and by repentance, put an end to his life, and from his blood there sprang up the flower narcissus (Conon, Narrat. 24). Other accounts again state that Narcissus melted away into the well in which he had beheld his own image (Paus. ix. 31. § 6); or that he had a beloved twin sister perfectly like him, who died, whereupon he looked at his own image reflected in a well, to satify his longing after his sister. Eustathius (ad Hom. p. 266) says that Narcissus was drowned in the well. [L. S.]

NARCISSUS. 1. A freedman of the emperor Claudius, over whom he possessed unbounded influence. He had charge of the emperor's letters. Reimar (ad Dion. Cass. lx. 34) quotes an old inscription (ap. Fabrettum, p. 543) which runs thus: NARCISSUS AUG. L. AB. EPISTULIS. (Comp. Suet. Claud. 28; Zonar. p. 563, d.) When Messallina wished to compass the death of C. Appius Silanus, Narcissus, between whom and herself there existed at that time a good understanding, pretended to the emperor that in a dream he had seen him fall by the hand of Silanus. The preconcerted entrance of Silanus immediately afterwards was alleged as a confirmation of the vision, and the unfortunate youth was immediately put to death. The emperor thanked his freedman in the senate, A. D. 42. (Suet. Claud. 37; Dion Cass. lx. 14.) Narcissus soon afterwards seized the opportunity afforded by the conspiracy of Furius Camillus Scribonianus to get the emperor to order the death of a number of innocent persons. Messallina and Narcissus even went so far as to put to the torture many knights and senators. (Dion Cass. lx. 15, 16.) Several of those most involved in the conspiracy, who could propitiate Narcissus and Messallina by money, escaped. In A. D. 43 we find Vespasianus sent as legatus of a legion into Germany through the influence of Narcissus. (Suet. Vesp. 4.) When the soldiers under A. Plautius in Britain mutinied, Narcissus was sent by the emperor to restore order; but on his attempting to address the soldiers he was received with shouts of indignation, and not suffered to speak. His mission, however, accomplished its purpose, for the soldiers, under the influence of this revulsion of feeling, suffered Plautius to take the command of them. (Dion Cass. lx. 19.)

When Messallina, having lost the confidence of the freedmen of the palace, in consequence of her having caused the death of Polybius, proceeded in her mad extravagance to marry C. Silius, information was given to the emperor, who at the time was at Ostia, by Narcissus, through some women. Narcissus persuaded the emperor that his only chance of safety lay in entrusting to him the command of the praetorian soldiers; and to prevent any one else from having access to the ear of Claudius, he asked and obtained permission to ride back to Rome in the same carriage with him. As they approached the city he diverted the attention of the emperor from the appeals of Messallina, who had come out to meet them, and prevented her children from being brought to their father. Finding Claudius not so prompt in ordering the death of Messallina as he wished, and fearing the effects of her habitual influence over him, Narcissus himself gave orders for putting her to death. The emperor was told that she had perished, and made no further inquiries. Narcissus shortly after received the insignia of a praetor. (Tac. Ann. xi. 30—38; Suet. Claud. 28.) In the discussions which ensued as to whom Claudius should marry, Narcissus supported the claims of Aelia Petina. (Tac. Ann. xii. 1.) Dion Cassius (lx. 34) relates an anecdote which shows that Narcissus thoroughly appreciated the stupidity of the emperor. He however got into considerable disgrace on account of the insufficient manner in which the canal for draining the lake Fucinus, the construction of which he had superintended, had been made. Agrippina charged him with the fraudulent appropriation of great part of the money apportioned for the work. Narcissus, in return, did not leave unnoticed her imperious temper and ambitious designs, and threw his influence into the scale in favour of Britannicus. (Tac. Ann. xii. 57, 65; Dion Cass.

lx. 34.) Agrippina, to make sure of the succession for her son, resolved to poison the emperor. She accordingly sent away Narcissus to Campania, on the pretext of his making use of the warm baths for the gout, with which he seems to have been affected. Here he was put to death almost immediately on the accession of the emperor Nero, A. D. 54. (Tac. Ann. xiii. 1 ; Dion Cass. lx. 34.) Before his death he burnt all the letters of Claudius which were in his possession. He amassed an enormous fortune, amounting, according to Dion Cassius, to 400,000,000 sesterces, equivalent to 3,125,000*l.* of our money. (Comp. Juvenal, xiv. 329.) If the following inscription refers to him, he had a wife named Claudia Dicaeosyna : D. M. ‖ CLAVDIAE ‖ DICAEOSYNAE ‖ TI. CLAVDIVS NARCISSUS LIB. EID. COIV. ‖ PIENTISSIMAE ‖ ET FRVGALISSI ‖ B. M. (Orell. Inscript. Lat. Select. vol. i. p. 177.) In another inscription we have : NARCISI. TI. CLAVDI ‖ BRITANIC ‖ I. ‖ SVPRA ‖ INSVLAS. (Orell. l. c. and No. 2927, p. 505.) His name also occurs in Inscript. No. 4902, vol. ii. p. 414.

2. A freedman of the emperor Nero, who was put to death by the emperor Galba. (Dion Cass. lxiv. 3.) [C. P. M.]

NARCISSUS, a celebrated athlete, with whom Commodus was in the habit of practising his gymnastic exercises, was employed by Marcia to strangle the emperor, when the poison that had been administered to him proved too slow in its operation, A. D. 192. (Dion Cass. lxxii. 22 ; Lamprid. Commod. 17 ; Aur. Vict. de Caes. 18, Epit. 17.) Narcissus appears to have had great influence with this emperor, for we are told that it was at his suggestion that Pescennius Niger was placed by Commodus in the command of the Syrian armies. (Spartian. Pescen. Nig. 1.) Narcissus was afterwards exposed to the lions by the emperor Severus on account of his having strangled Commodus. (Dion Cass. lxxiii. 16 ; Spartian. Sever. 14.)

NARSES, son of Artaxerxes III. [ARSES.]

NARSES, king of Persia. [SASSANIDAE.]

NARSES (Ναρσῆς), the rival of Belisarius. This celebrated general and statesman was perhaps born as early as A. D. 472. He was of foreign descent and of quite obscure parentage ; indeed, it seems that his parents sold him, or that he was made a prisoner of war when a mere boy, and his fate was that of so many other boys captured in war : he was castrated. Of his earlier life nothing is known. He came, however, to Constantinople and was employed in the imperial household. He was of material service to the emperor Justinian during the Νίκα riots (532), in which the name of Belisarius likewise became conspicuous. Narses was then cubicularius or chamberlain, as Theophanes states, and it was perhaps the judicial use he made of the funds entrusted to him, by bribing over the emperor's opponents, which caused him to be appointed treasurer to his master. In later years he was employed in several embassies, and discharged his duties to the complete satisfaction of his master, whose confidence he enjoyed in the highest degree. In 538 he was sent to Italy with reinforcements for Belisarius, who was then in the field against the Goths ; but it is more than probable that he had secret instructions to thwart that great commander, and prevent him from obtaining advantages which might have rendered him dangerous to the suspicious Justinian. The contingent commanded by Narses consisted of 5000 veterans and 2000 Herules, savage but gallant warriors, and one of his lieutenants was another Narses, the brother of Aratius, an excellent general, whom Baronius would not have confounded with the great Narses had he been aware that the second Narses fell in the battle of Anglone in 543. Narses and Belisarius effected their junction at Firmium, and soon afterwards they relieved Rimini, an exploit the honour of which was attributed to Narses, though the fact was that he tried to persuade Belisarius from venturing his army in such an expedition. Belisarius became soon aware that Narses had not only secret designs against him, but acted agreeably to Justinian's wishes ; for in the council of war he never proposed any measure of importance without finding Narses of a contrary opinion, and had the mortification, moreover, to see him supported by a crowd of jealous or disaffected officers. Vexed at these unfair proceedings, Belisarius claimed absolute obedience, and produced his imperial commission in which Justinian commanded the officers of every degree to obey him implicitly ; but Narses, pointing out the last words of the letter, in which it was said "that the officers should obey him in every thing compatible with the welfare of the empire," continued in his disobedience, pretending that the plans of Belisarius were dangerous to the empire. Hence arose violent quarrels, and Narses with his troops separated himself from Belisarius. About this time the Goths, or, more correctly speaking, the Franks and Burgundians, their allies, had reduced Milan to extremities, after besieging it for a considerable time ; and, anxious to save that large city, Belisarius sent orders to Joannes and Justin to hasten to its relief. They answered that they had only to obey orders emanating from Narses. Belisarius endured this insult with forbearance, and at last prevailed upon Narses to give his consent to the contemplated expedition of those two generals ; but it was then too late, the Roman garrison of Milan surrendered, and that splendid city was reduced to a heap of ruins, while its inhabitants were massacred by the victors. Justinian now became afraid that the jealousy between the two commanders would lead to still greater calamities, and he consequently recalled Narses (539). This was the first equivocal début of a general who afterwards put an end to the Gothic dominion in Italy.

During the following twelve years the name of Narses is scarcely mentioned in the annals of the empire, but he continued nevertheless to exercise a predominant influence in the privy council of Justinian. The world, however, was more accustomed to look upon him as a statesman than as a general, and great was consequently the surprise when, in 551, the emperor put him at the head of a formidable expedition destined to retrieve the fortune of the Roman arms in Italy, where the Goths had had the upper hand ever since the recall of Belisarius in 548. The campaign of Narses in Italy 538, had been no proof of his military skill, and the Roman veterans revolted at fighting under a eunuch, whom the very laws of the country seemed to exclude from any command over men. Little affected by their demonstrations, and despising the ridicule which the people tried to throw upon him, Narses, availing himself of the unlimited confidence of Justinian, drained the imperial treasury, and vigorously pushed on his preparations for the ensuing campaign. In the spring of 552 every thing was ready,

However, Ancona was the only port left to the Romans in Italy between Ravenna and Otranto; the Gothic fleet covered the sea; and it was consequently dangerous to trust the safety of 100,000 men, and the issue of the whole undertaking to the chances of the weather or a naval battle. However, the Gothic fleet was beaten and destroyed off Sinigaglia. Narses nevertheless resolved to march round the Adriatic. This road presented no less formidable difficulties: the whole low country traversed by the Po, the Adige, &c., and their countless branches, was an impassable swamp; the bridges over the Po and the Adige had been broken down by the enemy; and the only remaining passage over the latter river, at Verona, was guarded by the gallant Teias with a strong body of veteran Goths. Narses consequently chose a middle course. He coasted the Dalmatian shore of the Adriatic as far as the northern corner of that sea, whence his army continued by land, while the fleet took a parallel course along the shore, and wherever a river or a canal checked the progress by land, the ships conveyed timber and other materials to the spot for the speedy construction of bridges. Thus he reached Ravenna, Teias being all the while quite unable to molest him. He remained nine days in that city. Thence he marched upon Rimini, and the Gothic garrison having dared to insult him, he drove them back within their walls, and slew their commander Usdrilas. Without losing time in besieging Rimini he proceeded on the Flaminian way to Rome, where king Totilas awaited him with his main army. They met in the plain of Lentaglio, between Tagina (Taginae, Tadinae) and the tombs of the Gauls: the left of the Romans was under the immediate command of Narses and Joannes, the nephew of Vitalienus, and the right was commanded by Valerianus, John Phagas, and Dagistheus. The Romans carried the day: 6000 Goths fell on the field, and king Totilas was slain in his flight: his armour was sent to Constantinople (July 552). Teias was now chosen king of the Goths. Narses reaped the fruits of his victory by receiving the keys of the strongest fortresses of the Goths in that portion of Italy. Rome was forced to surrender by Dagistheus, a distinguished general, whose name and that of his colleague Bessus are strangely connected with the chances of warfare; for it was Bessus who commanded in Rome when it was reduced by the Goths in 546, a misfortune which he afterwards retrieved by reducing Petra, the bulwark of the empire towards the Caucasus, over which Dagistheus was appointed commander; and Dagistheus having been compelled to surrender Petra again to the Persians, took in his turn his revenge by reducing Rome. In the course of the Gothic war Rome had been five times taken and retaken: in 536 by Belisarius, in 546 by Totilas, in 547 again by Belisarius, in 549 again by Totilas, and in 552 by Narses. Narses despatched Valerian to the Po for the purpose of preventing the fugitive Goths from rallying round the headquarters of Teias at Pavia and Verona; but Teias eluded his vigilance, and, aided by a body of Franks whose alliance he had bought, suddenly broke forth from behind his lines, and appeared in Southern Italy to avenge the death of Totilas. But, instead of avenging it, he shared his fate on the banks of the Sarnus (Draco), a little river which flows into the bay of Naples (March, 553). In a bloody battle, which lasted two days, the Gothic army was utterly defeated, Teias and a countless number were slain, and the rest capitulated, but were allowed to withdraw from Italy: this condition was never well observed. Narses now marched to the north, reducing one fortress after the other, and gaining the confidence of the inhabitants through his firm yet generous and faithful conduct. He thought he had subdued Italy when he was undeceived by the appearance of a host of 75,000 Alemanni and Franks, who came down the Alps under the command of the two gallant dukes of the Alemanni, Leutharis and Buccellinus. The Roman vanguard, commanded by Fulcaris, a brave but rash Herulian, was cut to pieces in the amphitheatre of Parma, and, in spite of the efforts of Narses, the barbarians rushed down into Southern Italy. Leutharis ravaged Apulia and Calabria, and Buccellinus plundered Campania, Lucania, and Bruttium; but they were more formidable as marauders than as soldiers; they could overrun the country, but they oppressed it too much to be able to maintain themselves in it, and they consequently thought of returning to the Alps. Their ranks were thinned through losses and diseases, to which Leutharis fell a victim with his whole band, and while Buccellinus was staying near Capua, Narses came on with his veterans and slew him and his followers in a fierce battle at Casilinum, on the Vulturnus. Agathias says, that out of 30,000 men only 5000 escaped in this battle. The power of the Goths was now irretrievably ruined, and Italy was once more a province of the Roman empire, which Justinian finally pacified and organised by his famous "Pragmatica." Narses was appointed governor of Italy, and took up his residence at Ravenna.

During many subsequent years the name of Narses is not once mentioned; but we cannot but presume that in regulating the domestic affairs of Italy he acted in a way that did credit to his genius, although we know that his conduct was far from being free from avarice. In 563 he had an opportunity of proving that he was still the old general. Vidinus, comes, caused a fierce revolt in Verona and Brescia, and was supported by some Franks and a band of Alemanni under Amingus, who made sad havoc in Upper Italy, till Narses fell upon them and crushed them at once, whereupon Verona and Brescia submitted. Sindual, a chief of the Herules, who had served Narses faithfully during many years, imitated the example of Vidinus and shared his fate; but while Narses spared the life of the comes he ordered Sindual to be hanged, so incensed was he at his want of loyalty. These victories caused great joy in Constantinople; but the death of Justinian, which took place in the same year, and the accession of Justin, were heavy checks upon the influence of Narses at the imperial court, and finally contributed to his ruin.

The death of Justinian and the extreme age of Narses caused two movements of great importance. The administration of the great exarch of Italy was vigorous but oppressive; and although the Gothic war had impoverished that unhappy country to an enormous degree, he extracted the last coin from its inhabitants. Had he continued to send a proportionate share of it into the imperial treasury, he might have continued his extortions without feeling the consequences; but it appears that he was less liberal to Justin than to Justinian, and the wealth and oriental luxuries with which he surrounded himself in his palace at Ravenna excited the indignation of the Romans. During the life of Justinian, however, they did not complain, knowing that every attempt to shake Justinian's confidence in his great minister would have been in vain ; but no sooner was he dead than a deputation of Romans waited upon his successor, exposing the extortions of Narses, and declaring that they would prefer the rude yet frank despotism of the Goths to the system of craft and avarice carried on by their present governor. Their complaints were not only listened to with attention, but were taken up by Justin as a pretext for getting rid of a man who was not his creature, and Narses was consequently dismissed, and Longinus appointed in his stead. He might have borne his disgrace with magnanimity but for the insulting message of the empress Sophia, who bade him leave the profession of arms to men, and resume his former occupations among the eunuchs, and spin wool with the maidens of the palace. Stung to the quick by this woman-like yet ungenerous taunt, Narses answered that "he would spin her such a thread as she would not unravel during her life." ("Narses dicitur haec responsa dedisse: Talem se eidem telam orditurum qualem ipsa, dum viveret, deponere non posset," Paul. Diacon. de Gest. Long. ii. 6.) Narses retired quietly from office and took up his residence at Naples. An opportunity for gratifying his revenge was at hand. The Longobards were meditating an invasion of Italy, a scheme of which Justin was well aware when he dismissed Narses, who was, however, the only man able to prevent such a calamity. "Full of rage," says Paulus Diaconus (l. c.), "Narses sent messengers to the Longobards, and invited them to leave the poor fields of Pannonia and take possession of rich Italy. At the same time he sent them all kinds of fruits and other products of Italy, in order to make them greedy and hasten their arrival." King Alboin accordingly descended from the Alps into Italy. No sooner, however, was Narses informed of it, than he repaired to Rome, and tried to soothe the emperor by a submissive letter. The invasion of Italy, however, of which he could not but accuse himself as the cause, preyed upon his mind, and he died of grief (568). All this appears strange ; his conduct seems unaccountable ; and weighty doubts have been raised by competent historians against the authenticity of the tale. But severe critics, Pagi, Muratori, Horatius Blancus, Petavius, &c., as well as the more modern Le Beau and Gibbon, are of opinion that there is no ground for disbelieving it. One might ask, why the emperor did not immediately resent his treachery? and how Narses, after playing such a dangerous game, could venture to repair to Rome, instead of joining the Longobards? The fact of the Romans being disaffected to Justin and devotedly attached to Narses does not explain the mystery. The following hypothesis might perhaps throw some light on the matter. The ambition of Narses was not only unlimited, but it was coupled with that irritable and resentful temper which is peculiar to women and eunuchs. His deposition was sufficient to rouse the former, and the bitter taunt of the empress Sophia could not but provoke the latter. He thus invited the Longobards, not in order that they might conquer Italy, but to compel Justin to put him once more at the head of the army, since he was the only man who could check the barbarians ; and had death not prevented him he would certainly have triumphed over his enemies, and taken ample revenge for the insults he had suffered. Such stratagems have often been invented by adventurers aspiring to power, as well as by men high in office, aiming at still greater power. It is said that Narses attained the age of ninety-five. Gibbon doubts it, and perhaps not without reason. "Is it probable," says he, "that all his exploits were performed at fourscore?" It is certainly not probable ; but when Blucher performed his great exploits he was past seventy, and he was as fresh in the field as a young man.

Narses was one of those rare men who are destined by Providence to rise above all others, and, according to circumstances or the particular shape of their genius, to become either the benefactors or the scourges of mankind. Of low and perhaps barbarian parentage, slave, eunuch, with the body of a boy and the voice of a woman, he made himself equal to the greatest, and was inferior to none, for his soul was that of a hero ; his mind, bold and inflexible in its resolutions, was yet of that elastic kind that adapts itself to circumstances ; and through the labyrinth of schemes and intrigues his talents guided him with the same security that leads the plain warrior on the broad way of heroic action. Equal to Belisarius as a general, he was his superior as a statesman ; but his virtues were less pure than those of the unfortunate hero ; and in a moral point of view he stands far below his rival. (Procop. Bell. Goth. ii. 13, &c., iii. iv. ; Paul. Diacon. de Gest. Long. ii. 1—5 ; Marcellin. Chron. ; Agathias, lib. i. ii. ; Zonar. vol. ii. p. 68, &c. ; Cedren. p. 387 ; Malela, p. 83 ; Theoph. p. 201—206 (the index confounds the great Narses with Narses the general of Maurice and Tiberius); Evagrius, iv. 24 ; Anastasius, Histor. p. 62, &c. ; Vita Joan. iii. p. 43 ; Agnellus, Liber Pontific.) [W. P.]

NA'SAMON (Νασάμων), a son of Amphithemis and Tritonis, the ancestral hero of the Nasamones in the north of Africa, who are said to have derived their name from him. (Apollon. Rhod. iv. 1496.) [L. S.]

NA'SCIO, a Roman divinity, presiding over the birth of children, and accordingly a goddess assisting Lucina in her functions, and analogous to the Greek Eileithyiae. She had a sanctuary in the neighbourhood of Ardea. (Cic. de Nat. Deor. iii. 18.) [L. S.]

NASE'NNIUS, C., served as a centurion in Crete, under Metellus Creticus, and, after the assassination of Julius Caesar, united himself to Cicero, who gave him a letter of introduction to Brutus. (Cic. ad Brut. i. 8.)

NASI'CA, an agnomen in the family of the Scipios. [SCIPIO.]

NASI'CA, CAE'SIUS, commanded a Roman legion under Didius Gallus in Britain. (Tac. Ann. xii. 40.) [GALLUS, DIDIUS.]

NASIDIE'NUS, a wealthy (beatus) Roman, who gave a supper to Maecenas, which Horace ridicules so unmercifully in the eighth satire of his second book. It appears from v. 58, that Rufus was the cognomen of Nasidienus. The scholiasts tell us that Nasidienus was a Roman eques ; but it is probable that the name is fictitious, as it is not very likely that Horace would have satirised in this way a man who was honoured by Maecenas with his company. There is another Nasidienus mentioned by Martial (vii. 54).

NASI'DIUS, Q. or L.*, was sent by Pompey, in B. C. 49, with a fleet of sixteen ships to relieve Massilia, when it was besieged by Caesar's troops, under the command of D. Brutus. He was unable, however, to effect his object, was defeated by Brutus, and fled to Africa, where it appears that he had the command of the Pompeian fleet. (Caes. B.C. ii. 3—7 ; Cic. ad Att. xi. 17 ; Auctor, Bell. Afr. 64, 98.) After the conquest of Africa by Caesar, Nasidius probably fled to Spain and followed the fortunes of the Pompeian party, but he is not mentioned again for some time. Cicero, in his seventh Philippic (c. 9), speaks of an L. Visidius, a Roman eques, who had assisted him in suppressing the conspiracy of Catiline, and who was at that time (B. C. 43) engaged in levying troops to oppose Antony at Mutina. For L. Visidius Orelli proposes to read L. Nasidius, which occurs in a few manuscripts, but Garatoni objects (ad loc.) that it is unlikely that Pompey would have given him the command of a fleet, unless he had held some office in the state, and we know that the appellation of Roman eques was not applied to a person after he had been quaestor. But whether this passage refers to Nasidius or not, we do not hear of him again till B. C. 35, when he is mentioned as one of the principal officers of Sex. Pompey, who deserted to Antony upon the failing fortunes of the former. (Appian, B. C. v. 139.) He continued faithful to the fortunes of Antony in the civil war between him and Octavian, and commanded part of Antony's fleet, which was defeated by Agrippa off Patrae, in B. C. 31, previous to the decisive battle of Actium. (Dion Cass. l. 13.) The coin annexed refers to Nasidius: it bears on the obverse the head of Pompey with a trident and NEPTVNI, and on the reverse a ship with Q. NASIDIVS.

COIN OF NASIDIUS.

NASO, P. a man whom Cicero speaks of as "omni carens cupiditate," was praetor B. C. 44 (Cic. Philipp. iii. 10). He seems to be the same as Naso, the augur, whom Cicero mentioned in a letter in the preceding year (ad Att. xii. 17). The gentile name of Naso does not occur.

NASO, M. ACTO'RIUS. [ACTORIUS.]

NASO, ANTO'NIUS, a tribune of the praetorian troops, A. D. 69 (Tac. Hist. i. 20). He may be the same person as the L. Antonius Naso, who, as we learn from coins, was procurator of Bithynia in the reign of Vespasian. (Eckhel, vol. ii. p. 404.)

NASO, L. A'XIUS, only mentioned on coins, a specimen of which is annexed. The obverse represents a woman's head surmounted with a helmet, with NASO. S. C. ; the reverse, Diana in a chariot drawn by stags, with one dog before her and two behind her, and the legend L. AXSIVS. L. F.

COIN OF L. AXIUS NASO.

NASO, JU'LIUS, an intimate friend of Pliny and Tacitus, both of whom interested themselves much in his success, when he became a candidate for the public offices of the state (Plin. Ep. vi. 6, 9). One of Pliny's letters (iv. 6) is addressed to him.

NASO, L. OCTA'VIUS, whose heres was L. Flavius, praetor designatus in B. C. 59. (Cic. ad Q. Fr. i. 2. § 3.)

NASO, CN. OTACI'LIUS, is recommended by Cicero to the notice and favour of Acilius, in B. C. 46. (Cic. ad Fam. xiii. 33.)

NASO, OVI'DIUS. [OVIDIUS.]

NASO, SE'XTIUS, one of the conspirators against Caesar, B. C. 44. (Appian, B. C. ii. 113.)

NASO, VALE'RIUS, who had previously been praetor, was sent to Smyrna in A. D. 26, to superintend the erection of a temple to Tiberius (Tac. Ann. iv. 56).

NASO, Q. VOCO'NIUS, the judex quaestionis in the trial of Cluentius, B. C. 66. Since Cicero in one passage calls him Q. Naso (pro Cluent. c. 53), and in another Q. Voconius (Ibid. c. 54), Garatoni and Klotz, in their notes upon Cicero's oration, make two different persons out of Q. Voconius Naso, namely Q. Voconius, the judex quaestionis, and Q. Naso, the praetor. But Madvig has shown satisfactorily (de Ascon. p. 121), that Cicero refers only to one person, the judex quaestionis, pointing out moreover that the judices quaestionum were appointed to preside in those cases which the praetors, from their limited number, could not attend to, and that accordingly a praetor and a judex quaestionis would not be in the same court. This opinion of Madvig is also adopted by Zumpt (ad Cic. Ver. p. 234). Cicero in his oration for Flaccus, B. C. 59, speaks (c. 21) of Q. Naso, as having been praetor, but the year of his praetorship is unknown. (Orelli, Onom. Tull. p. 649.)

NATA'LIS, ANTO'NIUS, a Roman eques, was one of Piso's friends, and joined him in the conspiracy against Nero, A. D. 66, but having become suspected, and being threatened with the torture, he disclosed the names of the conspirators, and thus escaped punishment. (Tac. Ann. xv. 50, 54—56, 71.)

NATA'LIS, CAECI'LIUS, the person who maintains the cause of paganism in the dialogue of Minucius Felix, entitled Octavius. [FELIX, MINUCIUS.] Various conjectures have been made as to who this Natalis was ; but there are no sufficient data for deciding the question. (Bähr, Christl. Röm. Theologie, § 19.)

NATA'LIS, MINU'CIUS or MINI'CIUS. There is a rescript of Trajan to Minucius Natalis (Dig. 2. tit. 12. s. 9), who was probably a proconsul, and may be the jurist Natalis. In this passage of the Digest his name is written Minitius Natalis. This person appears to have been also consul and augur. The letter of Pliny the Younger to his friend Minucius may probably be addressed to Minucius Fundanus. (Plin. Ep. vii. 12.)

The time of the jurist Natalis is determined as

prior to that of Salvius Julianus, by the fact that Julianus wrote notes in six books Ad (apud, in) Minitium or Ad Minicium, from which books there are some citations in the Digest (6. tit. 1. s. 61). In one passage, the tenth book of the work, Ad Minitium is cited (Dig. 19. tit. 1. s. 11. § 15), but as Zimmern suggests, x. is a blunder for v.

Pomponius (Dig. 19. tit. 1. s. 6. § 4) quotes Minicius as quoting Sabinus. [G. L.]

NATTA or NACCA, "a fuller" (Festus, s. v.; Appul. Met. ix. p. 636, ed. Ouden.), was the name of a family of the Pinaria gens. Natta, or Nata, which we find upon coins, seems to be the correct orthography. The Nattae are very rarely mentioned, but appear to have been a very ancient family. Cicero speaks in general of the Pinarii Nattae as nobiles, and mentions an ancient bronze statue of a Natta, which was struck by lightning in the consulship of Torquatus and Cotta, B. C. 65. (Cic. de Div. i. 12, ii. 20, 21.)

1. L. PINARIUS NATTA, magister equitum to the dictator L. Manlius Capitolinus, B. C. 363, and praetor, B. C. 349. Livy does not give his cognomen, but it is preserved in the Fasti Capitolini. (Liv. vii. 3, 25.)

2. L. (PINARIUS) NATTA was the brother of the wife of the celebrated tribune P. Clodius, and obtained a seat in the college of pontiffs through the influence of his brother-in-law, who passed over his own brother in favour of Natta. Through his connection with Clodius, he was one of the enemies of Cicero, who mentions him on one or two occasions. (Cic. pro Dom. 45, 52, ad Att. iv. 8, b. § 3.) The gentile name of Natta is only mentioned in a passage of Servius (ad Virg. Aen. viii. 269), who calls him Pinarius Natta, but the genuineness of this passage has been called in question by Wolf (ad Cic. pro Dom. l. c.). Now as we read of only one wife of Clodius, namely, Fulvia, it has been usually supposed that the above L. Natta was the brother of this Fulvia, and that his full name was therefore L. Fulvius Natta* ; but Drumann has brought forward (Geschichte Roms, vol. ii. p. 370) reasons which render it very probable, that Clodius had, previous to his marriage with Fulvia, married another wife of the name of Pinaria, and that L. Natta was the brother of the latter and not the brother of Fulvia. The name of Natta is otherwise unknown in the Fulvia gens. The mother of Natta and of his sister Pinaria married a second time L. Murena, consul B. C. 62, and we consequently find Natta described as a step-son of Murena. (Cic. pro Muren. 35, pro Dom. 52.)

3. PINARIUS NATTA, a client of Sejanus, and one of the two accusers of Cremutius Cordus, A. D. 25. (Tac. Ann. iv. 34.)

4. NATTA, a person satirised by Horace (Sat. i. 6. 124) for his dirty meanness, was probably a member of the noble Pinarian family, and therefore attacked by Horace for such conduct.

The coin annexed refers to some Pinarius Natta, but who he was is quite uncertain. The obverse represents a winged head of Pallas, the reverse Victory in a chariot drawn by two horses.

* Hence we frequently find Natta or Nacca given as a cognomen in the Fulvia gens, as is stated in the article FULVIA GENS ; but if Drumann's supposition is correct, and we believe it is, this is a mistake.

COIN OF PINARIUS NATTA.

NAUBO'LIDES (Ναυβολίδης), a patronymic from Naubolus, and accordingly applied to his sons, Iphitus (Hom. Il. ii. 518) and Clytoneus (Apollon. Rhod. i. 135). It also occurs as the name of a Phaeacian. (Hom. Carm. viii. 116.) [L. S.]

NAU'BOLUS (Ναύβολος). 1. A son of Lernus and the father of Clytoneus, was king of Tanagra in Boeotia. (Apollon. Rhod. i. 135, &c., 208 ; Orph. Argon. 144 ; Lycoph. 1068.)

2. A son of Ornytus, and father of Iphitus, was king of Phocis. (Hom. Il. ii. 518 ; Apollod. i. 9. § 16.) [L. S.]

NAUCERUS, a statuary, who made a panting wrestler. (Plin. xxxiv. 8. s. 19.) [P. S.]

NAUCLEIDES (Ναυκλείδης). 1. A Plataean, the leader of the faction who invited and opened the gates for the Thebans who seized upon Plataeae B. C. 431. (Thuc. ii. 2 ; Dem. c. Neaeram, 25, p. 1378.)

2. One of the two Spartan ephors, sent, according to the Spartan custom, with the king Pausanias into Attica in B. C. 403, at the time when the Athenians were hard pressed by Lysander. He entered cordially into the plans of Pausanias for defeating the designs of Lysander. (Xen. Hellen. ii. 4. § 36.) He is perhaps the same with the Naucleidas, son of Polybiades, whom Lysander ridiculed and assailed on account of his obesity and luxurious mode of life in an assembly of the people, to such an extent that he was near being exiled forthwith. The people, however, contented themselves with threatening him with banishment if he did not reform his mode of life. (Athen. xii. p. 550 d.) [C. P. M.]

NAU'CRATES (Ναυκράτης), historical. 1. A native of Carystus, who, with Androcles of Sphettus, lent a sum of money to Artemon and Apollodorus, for the recovery of which a suit was instituted by Androcles against Lacritus, the brother of Artemon. This matter is the subject of the speech of Demosthenes Πρὸς τὴν Λακρίτου παραγραφήν.

2. A Lycian demagogue, who incited the Lycians to offer some fruitless resistance to M. Brutus. (Plut. Brut. p. 998, b.) [C. P. M.]

NAU'CRATES (Ναυκράτης), literary. 1. Surnamed Erythraeus, and termed by Suidas (s. v. Isocrates) Ἐρυθραῖος Ναυκρατίτης, was a disciple of Isocrates. He is mentioned among the orators who competed (B. C. 352) for the prize offered by Artemisia for the best funeral oration delivered over Mausolus. (Suidas, s. v. Theodectes, et l. c.; Gell. x. 68.) He wrote on the subject of rhetoric. From the incidental notice taken of his writings by Cicero (De Orat. iii. 44), we may infer that he shared in and defended the technical refinement of his master. In one of his treatises we learn from Quintilian (iii. 6) that he applied the word στάσις, as the appropriate technical term for the status or quaestio, the consideration of a case in its most general aspect, and that some regarded him as the inventor of the term so applied.

As Isocrates wrote models for judicial and political orations, Naucrates furnished models (none of which are extant) of funeral orations, celebrating men of public fame. (Dionys. vol. ii. p. 39, ed. Sylburg.)

Eustathius twice refers to a commentary on Homer by Naucrates Erythraeus, who may, perhaps, be regarded as identified with the rhetorician by the term Sophista which he applies to him. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. i. pp. 484, 517.) But the manner in which the commentator is mentioned by Stephanus Byzantinus (s. v. Ερυθρὰ), solely in connection with the commentary, renders it doubtful whether there may not have been two of the same name.

2. Stobaeus mentions the saying of one Naucrates, whom he designates ὁ σοφὸς (vol. i. p. 390, ed. Gaisford). [W. M. G.]

NAU'CYDES (Ναυκύδης), an Argive statuary, the son of Mothon, and the brother and teacher of Polycleitus II. of Argos, made a gold and ivory statue of Hebe, which stood by the celebrated statue of Hera by Polycleitus I. in the Heraeum near Mycenae; a bronze statue of Hecate at Argos; and several statues of athletes. (Paus. ii. 17. § 5, 22. § 8, vi. 6. § 1, 8. § 3, 9. § 1.) Tatian mentions his statue of Erinna the poetess. (Adv. Graec. 51, p. 113, Worth.) Pliny, who places him at Ol. 90, B. C. 420 (H. N. xxxiv. 8. s. 19), mentions his Mercury, Discobolus, and a man sacrificing a ram (Ibid. § 19). Besides his brother Polycleitus, Alypus of Sicyon was his disciple. (Paus. vi. 1. § 2; comp. Thiersch, Epochen, pp. 143, 150, 282, 283, and Sillig, Catal. Artif. s. v.) [P. S.]

NA'VIUS. [NAEVIUS, No. 1.]

NA'VIUS, ATTUS, a renowned augur in the time of Tarquinius Priscus. In his boyhood he showed his skill in the art before he had received any instruction; but after he had been taught by the Etruscans, he excelled all the augurs of his time. The most extraordinary proof of his knowledge of augury is related in the legend of Tarquinius Priscus. This king proposed to double the number of the equestrian centuries, and to name the three new ones after himself and two of his friends, but was opposed by Navius, because Romulus had originally arranged the equites under the sanction of the auspices, and consequently no alteration could be made in them without the same sanction. The tale then goes on to say that the king thereupon commanded him to divine whether what he was thinking of in his mind could be done, and that when Navius, after consulting the heavens, declared that it could, the king held out a whetstone and a razor to cut it with. He immediately cut it. A statue of Attus was placed in the comitium, on the steps of the senate-house, the place where the miracle had been wrought, and beside the statue the whetstone was preserved. There was a current report, according to Dionysius, that Attus fell a victim to the anger of Tarquin. Attus Navius seems to be the best orthography, making Attus an old praenomen, though we frequently find the name written Attius. (Liv. i. 36; Flor. i. 5; Aurel. Vict. de Vir. Ill. 6; Dionys. iii. 70—72; Cic. de Div. i. 17, de Nat. Deor. ii. 3, iii. 6, de Rep. ii. 20; Niebuhr, Hist of Rome, vol. i. pp. 360, 361.)

NAUMA'CHIUS (Ναυμάχιος), a Gnomic poet. Of the age in which he lived nothing is known. In addition to the verses which bear his name, there has been conjecturally attributed to him a moral poem, assigned by Gesner to Phocylides, which Brunck thinks inferior to the known productions of Naumachius. There are three fragments of this author in hexameters preserved by Stobaeus. 1. Eleven lines of what seems to be an introduction to a poem on the due management of the marriage state on the part of women; the introduction, however, dissuading from marriage, and recommending celibacy. 2. Fifty-eight lines of what seems to be the poem itself. The instructions are exceedingly comprehensive, including most sensible and prudent directions for the behaviour of a good wife to a wise and to a foolish husband, for the regulation of her household, her choice of companions, and her dress. He disapproves of second marriages, and enjoins cheerfulness and discretion. 3. Four lines and a portion of a fifth, depreciating gold, precious stones, and purple clothing. The first and third fragments have more of poetry than the larger piece, but the language of all is pure, and the style glowing and spirited. It must have been from a seeming allusion in the first to the superiority of celibacy, as introducing to a mystic marriage, where the virgin becomes queen of women, that the suggestion has been made that Naumachius was a Christian writer. If so, however, we could not have failed to detect in the second extract some allusion to the injunctions of Scripture on the subject. But there seems to be no reason to doubt that his notions were purified by an acquaintance with the maxims of Christianity. (Stobaeus, vol. iii. pp. 22, 68, 234, ed. Gaisford; translated by Hugo Grotius in Stobaeus, iv. p. 164, &c. p. 187, &c., 224, ed. Gaisford; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. i. pp. 721, 726.) [W. M. G.]

NAU'PLIUS (Ναύπλιος). 1. A son of Poseidon and Amymone, of Argos, a famous navigator, and father of Proetus and Damastor (Apollon. Rhod. i. 136, &c.; Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. iv. 1091). He is the reputed founder of the town of Nauplia, which derived its name from him (Paus. ii. 38. § 2, iv. 35. § 2; Schol. ad Eurip. Orest. 54). He is also said to have discovered the constellation of the great bear. (Theon, ad Arat. Phaen. 27; Paus. viii. 48. § 5; Strab. viii. p. 368.)

2. A son of Clytoneus, was one of the Argonauts and a descendant of Nauplius, No. 1. (Apollon. Rhod. i. 134.)

3. A king of Euboea, and father of Palamedes, Oeax and Nausimedon, either by Clymene or Philyra or Hesione (Apollod. ii. 1. § 4). Clymene was a daughter of Catreus, and she and her sister Aerope had been given by their father to Nauplius, who was to carry them to some foreign country; but Nauplius married Clymene, and gave Aerope to Pleisthenes, who became by her the father of Agamemnon and Menelaus (Apollod. iii. 2. § 2). His son Palamedes had been condemned to death by the Greeks during the siege of Troy, and as Nauplius considered his condemnation to be an act of injustice, he watched for the return of the Greeks, and as they approached the coast of Euboea, he lighted torches on the most dangerous part of the coast. The sailors thus misguided suffered shipwreck, and perished in the waves or by the sword of Nauplius (Philostr. Her. x, 11; Schol. ad Eurip. Orest. 422; Tzetz, ad Lycoph. 384; Hygin. Fab. 116). He is further said to have wreaked his vengeance on the Greeks by sending false messages to the wives of the heroes fighting at Troy, and thus to have led them to faithlessness towards their husbands or to self-destruction. (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 24 ; Tzetz, l. c.; Paus. i. 22. § 6.) [L. S.]

NAUSI'CAA (Ναυσικάα), the daughter of Alcinous, king of the Phaeacians and Arete, became the friend of Odysseus (Hom. Od. vi. 16, &c.; comp. ODYSSEUS). Later writers represent her as the wife of Telemachus, by whom she is said to have become the mother of Perseptolis or Ptoliporthus. (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1796 ; Dict. Cret. vi. 6.) [L. S.]

NAUSI'CRATES (Ναυσικράτης), a Greek comic poet, doubtfully placed by Clinton (F. H. vol. ii. p. xlv.) among the writers of the middle comedy. Meineke (Frag. Com. Graec. vol. i. p. 495) infers the same thing, from his tragico-comic style. Suidas (s. v.) attributes to him two plays, Ναυκλήροι and Περσίς. Athenaeus (ix. p. 399, e.), when giving an extract from the play called Περσίς, calls him Naucrates; but this is clearly an error ; or it may be a shortened form, similar to those adduced by Lobeck, in his edition of Aglaophamus (pp. 994, 996). From the fragments preserved by Athenaeus, consisting of twelve lines from the Ναυκλήροι and three from the Περσίς, we can infer nothing of the plot ; but there is some humour in his inflated description of the mullet and the blue shark in the passages from the former play. These passages are most ingeniously dovetailed and amended by Meineke (vol. iv. p. 575, &c.). (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. p. 471 ; Athen. l. c. vii. p. 296, a. p. 325, e. p. 330, b.) [W. M. G.]

NAUSI'MEDON. [NAUPLIUS, No. 3.]

NAUSI'NOUS (Ναυσίνοος), a son of Odysseus by Calypso, and brother of Nausithous. (Hes. Theog. 1017 ; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1796.) [L. S.]

NAUSI'PHANES (Ναυσιφάνης), a native of Teos, attached to the philosophy of Democritus, and, according to Sextus Empiricus, a disciple of Pyrrhon. He had a large number of pupils, and was particularly famous as a rhetorician. Epicurus was at one time one of his hearers, and as he could not deny this, though he was anxious to be considered a self-taught man, he was obliged to content himself with abusing him, and maintaining that he had learnt nothing from him. (Cic. de Nat. Deor. i. 26, 33 ; Diog. Laërt. ix. 69, 102, x. 8, 14; Sext. Empir. adv. Math. i. 1, p. 215.) [C. P. M.]

NAUSI'THOUS (Ναυσίθοος). 1. A son of Poseidon and Periboea the daughter of Eurymedon, was the father of Alcinous and Rhexenor, and king of the Phaeacians, whom he led from Hypereia in Thrinacia to the island of Scheria, in order to escape from the Cyclopes. (Hom. Od. vi. 7, &c. vii. 56, &c. viii. 564 ; Apollon. Rhod. iv. 547.)

2. [NAUSINOUS.] [L. S.]

NAUTES or NAU'TIUS. [NAUTIA GENS.]

NAU'TIA GENS, an ancient patrician gens, a member of which obtained the consulship as early as B. C. 488. It claimed to be descended from Nautius or Nautes, one of the companions of Aeneas, who was said to have brought with him the Palladium from Troy, which was placed under the care of the Nautii at Rome. (Dionys. vi. 4 ; Virg. Aen. v. 704, with the note of Servius.) Like many of the other ancient gentes, the Nautii disappear from history about the time of the Samnite wars. All the Nautii bore the surname of RUTILUS.

NAXUS (Νάξος), a son of Polemo and father of Leucippus, gave his name to the island of Naxos, which had before been called Dia. (Diod. v. 51.) [L. S.]

NAZA'RIUS. The ninth piece in the collection of the "Panegyrici Veteres" [see DREPANIUS] bears the title Nazarii Panegyricus Constantino Augusto. It was delivered at Rome (c. 38) at the beginning of the fifth year of the Caesars, Crispus and Constantine, which commenced on the 1st of March A. D. 321 (cc. 1, 2). It is chiefly occupied with the praises of Constantine, the father, who is proposed as the bright exemplar of every virtue to his sons. The circumstance that the emperor was not present (c. 3, comp. c. 36), renders the grossness of the flattery somewhat less odious. With regard to the author we find two notices in the version of the Eusebian Chronicle by Jerome, the one under A. D. 315, "Nazarius insignis rhetor habetur;" the other under A. D. 337, "Nazarii rhetoris filia in eloquentia patri coaequatur," both of which we may fairly conclude refer to the author of this oration. Ausonius also notices incidentally an "illustrious" rhetorician, Nazarius, who may be the same person. (Prof. Burdig. xiv.)

The eighth piece in the above collection, styled Incerti Panegyricus Constantino Augusto dictus, from the resemblance in style as well as from an expression in the ninth (c. 30), is generally believed to be also the work of Nazarius. It was pronounced at Trèves by a native of Gaul (c. 1), in the year A. D. 313, and celebrates in the most turgid language the victory over Maxentius. (For authorities and illustrations see the references at the end of DREPANIUS, EUMENIUS, MAMERTINUS.) [W. R.]

NEAERA (Νέαιρα). 1. A nymph, who became by Helios the mother of Lampetia and Phaetusa. (Hom. Od. xii. 133.)

2. A daughter of Pereus, and the wife of Aleus, by whom she became the mother of Auge, Cepheus, and Lycurgus. (Apollod. iii. 9. § 1 ; Paus. viii. 4. § 3, who calls her the wife of Autolycus.)

3. One of the daughters of Niobe. (Apollod. iii. 5. § 3.)

4. The wife of Strymon, and mother of Evadne. (Apollod. ii. 1. § 2.)

5. A nymph, who became by Zeus the mother of Aegle. (Virg. Eclog. vi. 20 ; comp. AEGLE, No. 1.) [L. S.]

NEALCES (Νεάλκης), a painter who flourished in the time of Aratus, B. C. 245. Plutarch relates that, when Aratus was destroying the pictures of the tyrants, Melanthius's picture of Aristratus was saved by the intercession of Nealces, who painted over with a black colour the figure of Aristratus, but left the rest of the picture uninjured (Plut. Arat. 13). Pliny mentions with high praise his Venus and his naval battle between the Egyptians and the Persians (H. N. xxxv. 11. s. 40, §§ 36, 41). A curious story is told of another of his pictures by Pliny (xxxv. 10. s. 36. § 20). His daughter Alexandria was also a painter (Didymus, ap. Clem. Alex. Strom. iv. p. 381, c.) His colour-grinder Erigonus also became a distinguished painter. [P. S.]

NEANTHES (Νεάνθης), of Cyzicum, lived about B. C. 241, and was a disciple of the Milesian Philiscus, who himself had been a disciple of Isocrates. He was a voluminous writer, principally of history, but very scanty materials have reached us, to form any judgment of his merits. The various authors, however, that quote him seem, with rare exceptions, to place great reliance on his accuracy and judgment. He is very largely referred to by Diogenes Laërtius, and by Athenaeus, and by several of the early Christian writers, as well as by others. Vossius (de Hist. Graec. cap. xv.) refers to several of them, but by far the most complete list is that given by Clinton (F. H. vol. iii. p. 509). He gives as the writings of Neanthes: 1. Memoirs of king Attalus. 2. Helienica. 3. Lives of illustrious men. 4. Pythagorica. 5. Τὰ κατὰ πόλιν μυθικά. 6. On Purification. 7. Annals. He probably also wrote an account of Cyzicum, as we may infer from a passage in Strabo (p. 45). And Harles (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. p. 311, vol. vi. p. 134) attributes to him a work περὶ κακοζηλίας ῥητορικῆς, as well as many panegyrical orations. (Vossius, Clinton, Harles, ll. cc.; Westermann, Gesch. der Griech. Beredt. p. 86.) [W. M. G.]

NEARCHUS (Νέαρχος.) 1. Tyrant of Elea or Velia in Magna Graecia, known only from an anecdote of him in connection with the philosopher Zenon, whom he put to the torture for having conspired against his life. [Zenon]. (Diod. x. Exc. Vales. p. 557, Exc. Vat. p. 36; Val. Max. iii. 3. ext. 3; Diog. Laërt. ix. 29.)

2. A friend and follower of Agathocles, who was sent by him to Syracuse with the tidings of his successes in Africa. (Diod. xx. 16.)

3. A Tarentine, who adhered to the cause of the Romans throughout the second Punic war, notwithstanding the defection of his countrymen. He was on terms of friendly intimacy with Cato the Censor, who lived in his house after the recapture of Tarentum by Fabius Maximus (B. C. 209), and derived from him instruction in the tenets of the Pythagorean philosophy, of which Nearchus was a follower. (Plut. Cat. Maj. 2; Cic. de Sen. 12.) [E. H. B.]

NEARCHUS (Νέαρχος), son of Androtimus, one of the most distinguished of the friends and officers of Alexander. He was a native of Crete, but settled at Amphipolis. (Arr. Ind. 18; Diod. xix. 19. Stephanus Byzantinus, s. v. Αητή, calls him a native of Lete in Macedonia, but this is certainly a mistake.) Of his family or parentage we know nothing, but he appears to have occupied a prominent position at the court of Philip, where he attached himself to the party of Alexander, and was banished, together with Ptolemy, Harpalus, and others, for participating in the intrigues of the young prince. After the death of Philip, he was recalled, and, in common with all those who had suffered on the same account, treated with the utmost distinction by Alexander. (Plut. Alex. 10; Arr. Anab. iii. 6.) After the conquest of the maritime provinces of Asia, Nearchus was appointed to the government of Lycia, together with the adjoining provinces south of the Taurus (Arr. l. c.), a post which he continued to fill without interruption for five years. In B. C. 329 he joined Alexander at Zariaspa in Bactria with a force of Greek mercenaries; and from this time, instead of returning to his government, he accompanied the king in his subsequent campaigns. He appears to have held at first the rank of chiliarch of the hypaspists, a somewhat subordinate situation; but his acquaintance with naval matters, as well as the personal favour he enjoyed with Alexander, induced the latter during his Indian expedition to confide to Nearchus the chief command of the fleet which he had caused to be constructed on the Hydaspes. (Arr. Anab. iv. 7. § 4, 30. § 11, vi. 2. § 6, Ind. 18.) During the descent of that river and the Indus to the sea, his duties were comparatively easy, and he is only mentioned as commanding the fleet whenever the king himself was not with it; but it is evident that he had given sufficient proof of his skill and capacity, so that when Alexander, after having reached the mouth of the Indus, meditated the sending round his ships by sea from thence to the Persian gulf, he gladly accepted the offer of Nearchus to undertake the command of the fleet during this long and perilous navigation. When we consider the total ignorance of the Greeks at this time concerning the Indian seas, and the imperfect character of their navigation, it is impossible not to admire the noble confidence with which Nearchus ventured to promise that he would bring the ships in safety to the shores of Persia, "if the sea were navigable, and the thing feasible for mortal man." (Arr. Ind. 19. 20. Anab. vi. 5, 19; Curt. ix. 38; Diod. xvii. 104; Plut. Alex. 66.) Nor did his conduct throughout the expedition fall short of his promises; and Arrian expressly attributes the safe result of the enterprise on more than one occasion to the prudence and judgment, as well as courage, of the commander. (Ind. 32.)

Nearchus was compelled to remain in the Indus for some sime after Alexander had set out on his return, waiting for the cessation of the etesian winds, or south-western monsoon. Meanwhile, the Indians had gathered again, after the king's departure, in considerable force, and began to annoy him with their attacks, which caused him to hasten his departure, and he set out on the 21st of September B. C. 325, before the winds had become altogether favourable. The consequence was, that after sailing out of the Indus, and a short distance along the coast, he was compelled to remain twenty-four days in a harbour near the confines of the Indians and Oreitae, to which he gave the name of the port of Alexander. Leaving this on the 23d of October, he continued his voyage along the coast of the Oreitae, and after encountering many dangers from rocks and shoals, and losing three of his ships in a storm, he arrived at a place called Cocala, where he halted ten days to repair his vessels. During this interval he entered into communication with Leonnatus, who had been left behind in charge of the province of the Oreitae, and from whom he received supplies of provisions, and reinforcements of men to replace those whom he had found the least efficient of his crews. From this time, until he reached the coast of Carmania, Nearchus was entirely dependent upon his own resources, and had to contend not only with the perils of an unknown navigation, but with the greatest distress from want of provisions, as they coasted along the sandy and barren shores of the Ichthyophagi, and with the discontent of his own followers, to which that scarcity gave rise. Throughout this period he displayed the utmost firmness as well as energy; and the courage with which he confronted alike the novel dangers which threatened them from whales (Arr. Ind. 30), and the mysterious perils of the island reputed to be enchanted (Ib. 31), proves him to have been a man altogether above the level of his age and country. At a fishing village called Mosarna, he for the first time obtained a pilot acquainted with the coast, which greatly facilitated his farther progress, and at length on the eightieth day of his voyage (Dec. 9.) he anchored at the mouth of the river Anamis, in the fertile district of Harmozia, and had the happiness of learning that Alexander himself was encamped at a short distance in the interior. Nearchus himself hastened to the king, who received him with every demonstration of joy, and celebrated sacrifices and festivals for the safety of his fleet, in which the admiral was distinguished by every kind of honour. He was, however, unwilling to expose his friend to any farther dangers, and was desirous to transfer to some one else the task of conducting the fleet up the Persian gulf, but Nearchus insisted on being allowed to complete what he had so successfully begun, and returned to his camp on the Anamis, from whence he continued his voyage with comparatively little of difficulty or danger along the north shore of the Persian gulf to the mouth of the Pasitigris, and up that river to Susa. Here he arrived in February 324, shortly after Alexander himself; and in the brilliant festivities with which the king here celebrated the conquest of Asia as well as his own nuptials with Stateira, Nearchus bore an important part, being one of those rewarded with crowns of gold for their distinguished services, at the same time that he obtained in marriage a daughter of the Rhodian Mentor and of Barsine, to whom Alexander himself had been previously married. (Arr. Ind. 21—42, Anab. vi. 28, vii. 4. § 9, 5. § 9; Strab. xv. pp. 721, 725, 726; Curt. x. i. § 10; Diod. xvii. 106; Plut. Alex. 68. Concerning the chronology of the voyage, see Vincent, vol. i., and Droysen, Gesch. Alex. pp. 478, 481.)

From this time Nearchus appears to have continued in close attendance upon Alexander till his death, as we find him mentioned as dissuading the king from entering Babylon on account of the predictions of the Chaldaeans, and again during Alexander's last illness holding a conversation with him upon naval matters. It appears, indeed, that he had been already designated for the chief command of the fleet with which the king was at this time meditating the conquest of Arabia, B. C. 323; and the latter had just given him a sumptuous feast previous to his departure, when the illness of Alexander himself put an end to the expedition. (Plut. Alex. 73, 75, 76; Diod. xvii. 112; Arr. Anab. vii. 25.) It was natural that one who had held so high a place in the confidence of the king should take a prominent part in the discussions that ensued after his death: yet it is remarkable that Curtius is the only writer who mentions his name at all upon that occasion. But the statement of that author (x. 20), that it was Nearchus who put forward the claims of Heracles, the son of Barsinë, to the throne, is rendered so probable by his near connexion with the latter, that there can be little doubt of its correctness. But it is probable that his not being a Macedonian by birth operated against Nearchus, and it would seem that his tranquil and unambitious character did not qualify him to take a leading part in the stormy dissensions that followed: he not only acquiesced in the adoption of arrangements opposed to his advice, but seems to have been contented, in the division of the provinces, to obtain his former government of Lycia and Pamphylia, and to hold even these as subordinate to Antigonus. (Justin. xiii. 4; comp. Droysen, Hellenism, vol. i. p. 42.) To the fortunes of the latter, whether from motives of private friendship or policy, we find him henceforth closely attached: in B. C. 317 he accompanied Antigonus in his march against Eumenes; and generously interceded with him in favour of the latter, when he had fallen into his hands as a prisoner. (Diod. xix. 19; Plut. Eum. 18.) Again, in 314, he was one of the generals who were selected by Antigonus, on account of their mature age and experience in war, to assist with their counsels his son Demetrius, left for the first time in command of an army. (Diod. xix. 69.) This is the last occasion on which his name appears in history.

We learn from many ancient authors that Nearchus left a history or narrative of the voyage by which he had earned such great celebrity; and the substance of this interesting work has been fortunately preserved to us by Arrian, who has derived from it the whole of the latter part of his "Indica." The strange paradox put forward by Dodwell (Dissert. de Arriani Nearcho, ap. Geogr. Gr. Minores, tom. i., reprinted, together with a Latin translation of Vincent's refutation by Schmieder, in his edition of the Indica of Arrian, p. 232, &c.), that the work made use of by Arrian was not really the production of Nearchus, but the forgery of a later age, though adopted by Bohlen (das alte Indien, vol. i. p. 68), has been generally rejected by later writers, and is sufficiently refuted by Vincent in his elaborate work on "The Commerce and Navigation of the Ancients in the Indian Seas (vol. i. p. 68—77):" but he justly adds: "The internal evidence of the work speaks more forcibly for itself than all the arguments which can be adduced in its favour." The accuracy of the geographical details contained in it has been fully demonstrated by the same author, as well as by the eminent geographers d'Anville, Gosselin, and Ritter, who have also shown that many of the statements regarded by the ancients as marvellous or incredible have been confirmed by the researches of modern travellers. In other instances, although we cannot defend the accuracy of his assertions, it is at least possible to show how the error has originated. (See particularly Schmieder, ad Arr. Ind. 25.) Indeed Strabo himself, while he censures Nearchus, together with Megasthenes and Onesicritus, for his fabulous tales (ii. p. 70), has, in numerous instances, made use of his authority without scruple (xv. pp. 689, 691, 696, 701, 705, 706, 716, 717, &c.). On the other hand, it seems probable that Pliny, on whose authority Dodwell mainly relied, had not consulted the original work of Nearchus, but had contented himself with the abridgment of that of Onesicritus, as published by Juba. (Plin. H. N. vi. 23; comp. Vincent, l. c., and Geier, Alex. Magni Hist. Script. p. 80, &c.) Suidas, who accuses Nearchus of having falsely pretended to be commander of the whole fleet, when he was in fact only a pilot or captain (κυβερνήτης), has by a strange error transferred to him what Arrian, whose very words he copies, says of Onesicritus. (Suid. s. v. Νέαρχος; Arr. Anab. vi. 2.)

Schmieder and some other writers, relying partly upon a passage of Suidas (s. v. Νέαρχος), partly upon some statements quoted by Strabo, which have no immediate reference to the voyage, have maintained that, besides the Παράπλους, or narrative of his voyage, Nearchus had written a separate history of the wars of Alexander: but there is certainly no occasion for such a supposition. If, as appears probable, he began his narrative from the first construction of the fleet on the Hydaspes, it would naturally include an account of Alexander's wars against the Malli, as well as his subsequent march through Gedrosia; and it is evident that he prefixed to his work a general account of India, its inhabitants and their customs, from which both Strabo and Arrian have borrowed largely. Geier (l. c. p. 113—115) has justly pointed out that all the facts cited frem Nearchus are such as would naturally be comprised in a work thus limited, or might readily have been introduced in digressions. All the questions, both literary and geographical, connected with the Paraplus of Nearchus, are fully discussed in the work of Dr. Vincent above cited (4to. London. 1807); in the preface, notes, and dissertations appended by Schmieder to his edition of Arrian's "Indica" (8vo. Hal. 1798); and in Geier's Alexandri Magni Historiarum Scriptores, pp. 108—150. The last author has brought together all the fragments of Nearchus, that is to say, all the passages where he is cited by name either by Strabo or Arrian; but there is no doubt that besides these his work is the sole authority followed by the latter writer throughout the narrative of his voyage. NEARCHUS, painter. [ARISTARETE.]

NEBRO'PHONUS (Νεβροφόνος), a son of Jason and Hypsipyle, and brother of Euneus. (Apollod. i. 9. § 17.) [L. S.]

NEBRUS (Νεβρός), the thirteenth in descent from Aesculapius, the son of Sostratus III., and the father of Gnosidicus and Chrysus, who lived in the seventh and sixth centuries B. C. (Jo. Tzetzes, Chil. vii. Hist. 155, in Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. xii. p. 680, ed. vet.; Poet. Epist. ad Artax. in Hippocr. Opera, vol. iii. p. 770; Thessal. Orat. ad Aram, ibid. p. 835, &c.) He was a native of the island of Cos, and the most celebrated physician of his time. During the Crissaean war he joined the camp of the Amphictyons (as has been mentioned in the article CHRYSUS), taking with him his son Chrysus, and a penteconter fitted up at his own expence with both medical and military apparatus. Here they were of great use to the besiegers, and Nebrus is said to have poisoned the water used by the town, though, according to Pausanias (Phoc. c. 37. § 5), this barbarous expedient was adopted in consequence of the recommendation of Solon, B. C. 591. (Penny Cyclopaedia, art. Nebrus.) [W. A. G.]

NECO, or NECHO (Νεκώς, Νέχως, Νεκαῦς, Νεχαώς, Νεχαώ). 1. Father of Psammetichus, was put to death by Sabacon, the Aethiopian usurper of the Egyptian throne (Herod. ii. 152).

2. Son of Psammetichus, whom he succeeded on the throne of Egypt in B. C. 617. His reign was marked by considerable energy and enterprise, both in following up the career of conquest towards the north-east, for which his father had opened the way by the capture of Azotus, and also (as connected with this) in the formation of a navy, and the prosecution of maritime discovery. It was probably with a view to war at once, and to commerce, that he began to dig the canal intended to connect the Nile with the Arabian Gulf. He desisted, however, from the work, according to Herodotus, on being warned by an oracle, that he was constructing it only for the use of the barbarian invader. But the greatest and most interesting enterprise with which his name is connected, is the circumnavigation of Africa by the Phoenicians, in his service, and acting under his directions, who set sail from the Arabian Gulf, and accomplishing the voyage in somewhat more than two years, entered the Mediterranean, and returned to Egypt through the Straits of Gibraltar. His military expeditions were distinguished at first by brilliant success, which was followed, however, by the most rapid and signal reverses. On his march against the Babylonians and Medes, whose joint forces had recently destroyed Nineveh, he was met at Megiddo, in the tribe of Manasseh, by Josiah, king of Judah, who was a vassal of Babylon. In the battle which ensued, Josiah was defeated and mortally wounded, and Necho advanced to the Euphrates, where he conquered the Babylonians and took Carchemish or Circesium, where he appears to have established a garrison. Herodotus tells us that, after the battle at Megiddo, he took the town of Cadytis, which, therefore, it has been argued, can hardly be identified with Jerusalem, according to the usual opinion, since that place lay far out of the line of his progress (See Ewing in the Classical Museum, vol. ii. p. 93, &c.) But the objection vanishes if we suppose it to have been taken by one of his generals immediately after the battle with Josiah, or afterwards by himself on his triumphant return homeward from the Euphrates, when we know that he deposed Jehoahaz and placed Eliakim (Jehoiakim) on the throne of Judah, as the tributary vassal of Egypt, B. C. 610. In the fourth year of the reign of Jehoiakim, B. C. 606, Nebuchadnezzar attacked Carchemish, defeated Necho, who had marched thither to meet him, and, advancing onward with uninterrupted success, reduced to subjection all the country between "the river of Egypt" and the Euphrates. He would appear also to have invaded Egypt itself. From this period certainly Necho made no effort to recover what he had lost, if we except a preparation for war with Babylon (B. C. 603, the third year of Jehoiachim), which was soon abandoned in fear. In B. C. 601, Necho died after a reign of sixteen years, and was succeeded by his son Psammis or Psammuthis (Herod. ii. 158, 159, iv. 42; Larch. ad ll. cc.; Diod. i. 33; Wess. ad loc.; Strab. i. p. 56, xvii. p. 804; Plin. H. N. vi. 29; Joseph. Ant. x. 5, 6; 2 Kings xxiii. 29, &c., xxiv. 7; 2 Chron. xxxv. 20, &c., xxxvi.1—4; Jerem. xlvi.; comp. Heeren, African Nations, vol. ii. pp. 374, 389, &c.; Bunsen, Aegyptens Stelle in der Weltgeschichte, vol. iii. p. 141, &c.) [E. E.]

NECTA'NABIS, NECTA'NEBUS, or NECTA'NEBES (Νεκτάναβις, Νεκτάνεβος, Νεκτανέβης).

1. King of Egypt, the first of the three sovereigns of the Sebennite dynasty, succeeded Nepherites on the throne about B. C. 374, and, in the following year, successfully resisted the invasion of the Persian force under Pharnabazus and Iphicrates, owing partly to the natural advantages of the country for defence, and partly to the dilatory and over-cautious conduct of Pharnabazus. Nectanabis died after a reign of ten years, according to Eusebius, and was succeeded by Tachos. (Diod. xv. 41—43; Nep. Iph. 2; comp. Rehdantz, Vit. Iph. Chabr. Tim. iv. § 3; Bunsen, Aegyptens Stelle in der Weltgesch. vol. iii. Urkundenbuch, pp. 40, 41.)

2. Appears to have been the nephew of Tachos, who, in his expedition to Phoenicia, in B. C. 361, left his brother behind as governor of Egypt, and placed Nectanabis, who accompanied him, in the command of his Egyptian forces, and sent him to lay siege to the cities in Syria. Taking advantage of the power thus entrusted to him, and aided by his father, who had raised a rebellion at home, Nectanabis persuaded his troops to renounce their allegiance to Tachos, and revolted. Being acknowledged by the Egyptian people also as king, he made overtures and large promises to Agesilaus and Chabrias, both of whom were engaged with Greek mercenaries in the service of Tachos. Chabrias refused to transfer his assistance to him, but he was more fortunate with Agesilaus, and Tachos, finding himself thus deserted, fled for refuge to Artaxerxes II., and, notwithstanding the confused statement of Diodorus to the contrary, seems to have made no further attempt to recover the crown. It was, however, disputed with Nectanabis by a certain Mendesian, who for some time met with considerable success, but was ultimately defeated by the skill of Agesilaus, and the Spartan king left Egypt with rich presents from Nectanabis, whom he had thus firmly established on the throne. (Xen. Ages.; Plut. Ages. 37—40, Apoph. Lac. Ages. 76—78; Diod. xv. 92, 93; Wess. ad loc.; Nep. Chabr. 2, 3, Ages. 8; Ath. xiv. p. 616, d, e; Paus. iii. 10; Polyaen. ii. 1; Aelian, V. H. v. 1; Perizon. ad loc.; Clinton, F. H. vol. ii. App. pp. 213, 316; Rehdantz, Vit. Iph. Chabr. Tim. v. § 11.) Artaxerxes III. (Ochus), soon after his accession in B. C. 359, made several attempts to recover Egypt; but the generals, whom he sent thither, were utterly defeated by Nectanabis, through the skill mainly of two experienced commanders in his service, Diophantus, of Athens, and Lamius, of Sparta. The failure of the Persian attacks on Egypt encouraged Phoenicia also and Cyprus to revolt, and Artaxerxes accordingly (leaving the reduction of Cyprus to IDRIEUS) resolved to put himself at the head of an expedition which should crush the Phoenician rebellion, and should then proceed to take vengeance on Nectanabis. It therefore became necessary for his own defence that the Egyptian king should succour the Phoenicians, and we find him accordingly despatching MENTOR, the Rhodian, to their aid with 4000 mercenaries. But Mentor went over to Artaxerxes, and, after the subjugation of Phoenicia, accompanied him in his invasion of Egypt. Nectanabis had made large and active preparations for defence; but, according to Diodorus, his presumptuous confidence made him think that he could conduct the campaign alone, while his utter unfitness for the command of an army (obvious enough indeed in his former war with the Mendesian pretender) caused his ruin. Some of his troops having sustained a defeat from Nicostratus and Aristazanes, he adopted in alarm the fatal step of shutting himself up in Memphis. Here he remained without a struggle, while town after town submitted to the enemy, and at length, despairing of his cause, he fled with the greater part of his treasures into Aethiopia. Another account, viz. that of Lynceus (ap. Ath. iv. p. 150, b), represents him as having been taken prisoner by Artaxerxes, and kindly treated, while a third story brings him to Macedonia, and makes him become the father of Alexander the Great, having won the favours of Olympias by magic arts. But this deserves mention only as a specimen of those wild legends, by which Oriental vanity strove to reconcile itself to a foreign yoke by identifying the blood of its conqueror with its own (Diod. xvi. 40, 41, 42, 44, 46—51; comp. Isaiah xix. 11, &c.; Vitringa, ad loc.; Thirlwall's Greece, vol. vi. p. 142; Wess. ad Diod. xvi. 51). The date usually assigned to the conquest of Egypt by Ochus is B. C. 350; but see Thirlwall's Greece, vol. vi. p. 142, note 2. Nectanabis was the third king of the Sebennite dynasty, and the last native sovereign who ever ruled in Egypt (comp. Ezek. xxix. 14, 15, xxx. 13). We read in Diogenes Laërtius (viii. 87; comp. Menag. ad loc.) that he received at his court, and recommended to the priests the astronomer Eudoxus, who came to him with a recommendation from Agesilaus. Pliny (H. N. xxxvi. 9.) speaks of an obelisk which had been made by order of Nectanabis, and was set up at Alexandria by Ptolemy Philadelphus; but it does not appear to which of the two persons above-mentioned he is alluding. [E. E.]

NECTAR (Νέκταρ), was, according to the early poets, the wine or drink of the gods, which was poured out to them by Hebe or Ganymede, and the colour of which is described as red (Hom. Il. iv. 3, Od. v. 93, 195, &c.; Ov. Met. x. 161). Like the wine of mortals it was mixed with water when it was drunk, and the wine which Odysseus had carried with him is called by Polyphemus the cream of nectar (ἀπορρὼξ νέκταρος, Od. ix. 359). Later writers sometimes by nectar understand a fragrant balm which prevents the decomposition of organic bodies, as, in fact, even in Homer (Il. xix. 39), Thetis prevents the body of Patroclus becoming decomposed by anointing it with ambrosia and nectar (comp. Ov. Met. iv. 250). Some of the ancient poets, moreover, described nectar not as the drink, but as the food of the immortals, that is, they made it the same as ambrosia. (Athen. ii. p. 39; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1632.) [L. S.]

NECTA'RIUS (Νεκτάριος), was the successor of Gregory of Nazianzus, and the predecessor of John Chrysostom, as bishop of Constantinople. His occupancy of the episcopal chair between two such men would have required extraordinary merit to make him conspicuous. But, in truth, though he does not seem to merit the epithet applied to him by Gibbon, "the indolent Nectarius," the fact of his having been appointed at all is the most remarkable thing in his personal history. When Gregory, as has been related [Vol. II. p. 313], resigned his office, A. D. 381, it was during the meeting of the second oecumenical council at Constantinople. Nectarius, a senator, and a man of the highest family, was a native of Tarsus. The ecclesiastical historians relate that, at this time, he intended to visit his native place, and previously waited on Diodorus, the bishop of Tarsus, who was in Constantinople attending the council. Diodorus, along with the other bishops, was perplexed as to whom they should nominate to the vacant see. Struck by the majestic appearance and the white hair of Nectarius, taking for granted that he had been baptized, Diodorus requested Nectarius to postpone his departure, and recommended him to Flavian, bishop of Antioch, as a fit person to succeed Gregory. Flavian laughed at the strange proposal, but, to oblige his friend, put his name last on the list, which he, as well as the other bishops, presented to the emperor. To the astonishment of all, Theodosius selected Nectarius, and persisted in his choice, even when it was ascertained that he had not yet been baptized. The bishops at last acceded to the wish of the monarch, who had so stoutly opposed the Arians, while the people, attracted probably by the gentle manners and the venerable appearance of the man, presenting as he did every way a strong contrast to Gregory, loudly applauded the choice. Nectarius was baptized, and, before he had time to put off the white robes of a neophyte, he was declared bishop of Constantinople. Most important matters came under the consideration of the council, over which it is probable he was now called to preside. He showed his discretion by putting himself under the tuition of Cyriacus, bishop of Adana; but we can hardly believe that he took any active part in the theological questions which were discussed. It is doubtful whether the canons that were enacted, under the name of the second oecumenical council, were not passed at two different sessions, a second taking place in 382. But this does not matter much, as they all bear the name of this council. The principal business transacted in the council, theologically considered, related to the confirming and extending of the Nicene Creed, mainly to meet the opinions of the Macedonians. The creed thus enlarged is that used at the mass of the Roman Catholic church. Other canons regulated discipline, the restriction of the authority of each bishop to his own diocese, and the restoration of penitent heretics. The most important article of all, however, historically considered, was one which was conceded not more to the natural propriety of the arrangement, than to the personal favour which the emperor bore to Nectarius. It was decreed, that as Constantinople was New Rome, the bishop should be next in dignity to the bishop of Rome, and hold the first place among the Eastern prelates. This, which was at first a mere mark of dignity, became a source of substantial power, embroiled Constantinople with Rome, and was pregnant with all those circumstances that have marked this important schism. Nectarius was the first who held the dignity of ex officio head of the Eastern bishops, as patriarch of Constantinople. These canons were signed on the 9th of July, 381. The zeal of Theodosius in the extirpation of Arianism led to the summoning of a council (not oecumenical) at Constantinople, in July, 383. There assembled the chiefs of all the sects. By the advice of Sisinnius, afterwards a Novatian bishop, given through Nectarius, the emperor ensnared his opponents into an approval of the writings of the early fathers. He then required of each sect a confession of its faith, which, having read and considered, he condemned them all, and followed up this condemnation by the most stringent laws, for the purpose of entirely rooting them out. As might have been expected, Nectarius was obnoxious to the Arians, and we find that in 388, while the emperor Theodosius was absent in Italy, opposing Maximus, a rumour that had arisen of the defeat and death of the prince having excited their hopes, a riot ensued, in the course of which they set fire to the house of Nectarius. In the year 390, Nectarius, alarmed by the public odium which had been excited by the seduction of a woman of quality by a deacon, abolished the practice of confession which had been introduced into the Eastern church—a penitential priest having been appointed, whose office it was to receive the confessions of those who had fallen into sin, after baptism, and prescribe acts of penitence previously to their being admitted to partake of the privileges of the church. The last council (not oecumenical) at which Nectarius presided was held in Constantinople in 394, regarding a dispute as to the bishopric of Bostria. Nectarius survived his patron, Theodosius, two years, dying on the 27th of September, 397. He seems to have borne his honours meekly, and to have acted with great discretion. In the subtle controversies that agitated the church, we learn that he avoided discussion himself, and was guided by the advice of men better skilled in the puzzling dialectics of the time. If the conjecture of Tillemont (vol. ix. p. 486) be correct, he was married, and had one son. His brother Arsatius succeeded John Chrysostom as patriarch of Constantinople. (Fleury, Hist. Eccles. vol. iv. v. cc. 18, 19; Socrat. H. E. v. 8, 13; Sozom. H. E. vii. 8, 9, 14, 16, viii. c. 23.) Nectarius wrote (Cave doubts this) a homily De S. Theodoro, a martyr, whose festival is held by the Greek church on the first sabbath of Lent. The original is said to exist in several libraries, and a Latin version was printed, Paris, 1554, with some Homilies of Chrysostom. Also his Sententia Synodalis de Episcopatu Bostrensi, is given in Jure Graec. Roman. lib. iv. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ix. p. 309, vol. x. p. 333; Cave, Hist. Lit. vol. i. p. 277.) [W. M. G.]

NEDA (Νέδα), an Arcadian nymph, from whom the river Neda and also a town (Steph. Byz. s. v.) derived their name. She was believed, conjointly with Theisoa and Hagno, to have nursed the infant Zeus (Callim. Hymn. in Jov. 38; Paus. viii. 38. § 3). In a Messenian tradition Neda and Ithome were called nurses of Zeus (Paus. iv. 33. § 2). She was represented at Athens in the temple of Athena. (Paus. viii. 47. § 2.) [L. S.]

NEDU'SIA (Νεδουσία), a surname of Athena, under which she had a sanctuary on the river Nedon (from which she derived the name), and another at Poieessa in the island of Cos. The latter was said to have been founded by Nestor on his return from Troy, and to have derived its name from Nedon, a place in Laconia. (Strab. viii. p. 360, x. p. 487; Steph. Byz. s. v. Νέδων.) [L. S.]

NEIS (Νηΐς), a daughter of Zethus, or of Amphion by Niobe, from whom the Neitian gate at Thebes was believed to have derived its name (Schol. ad Eurip. Phoen. 1104). According to Pausanias Neis was a son of Zethus (ix. 8. § 3). [L. S.]

NELEIDES, NELEIADES, and NELEIUS (Νηλείδης, Νηληϊάδης, Νηλήϊος), patronymics of Neleus, by which either Nestor, the son of Neleus, or Antilochus, his grandson, is designated. (Hom. Il. viii. 100, xi. 617, x. 87, xxiii. 514; Ov. Met. xii. 553; Herod. v. 65.) [L. S.]

NELEUS (Νηλεύς), a son of Cretheus and Tyro, the daughter of Salmoneus. Tyro, previous to her marriage with Neleus, is said to have loved the river-god Enipeus; and in the form of Enipeus Poseidon once appeared to her, and became by her the father of Pelias and Neleus (Hom. Od. xi. 234, &c.). Tyro exposed the two boys, but they were found and reared by horse-herds, and when they had grown up they learned who their mother was, and Pelias killed their foster-mother, who had ill-used Tyro (Apollod. i. 9. § 8).

After the death of Cretheus, the two brothers quarrelled about the succession to the throne of Iolcus. Neleus, who was expelled, went with Melampus and Bias to Pylos, which his uncle Aphareus gave to him (Apollod. i. 9. § 9 ; Diod. iv. 68). Neleus thus became king of Pylos, which town he found in existence when he arrived there ; but some state that he himself built Pylos, or at least that he erected the royal palace there (Paus. iv. 2. § 3, 36. § 1). It should be observed that several towns of the name of Pylos claimed the honour of being the city of Neleus or of his son Nestor, such as Pylos in Messenia, Pylos in Elis, and Pylos in Triphylia ; the last of which is probably the one mentioned by Homer in connection with Neleus and Nestor (Strab. viii. p. 337). Neleus was married to Chloris, who, according to Homer (Od. xi. 280, &c.), was a daughter of Amphion of Orchomenos, and according to others (Diod. l. c.) a Theban woman, and by her he became the father of Nestor, Chromius, Periclymenus, and Pero, though the total number of his sons was twelve (Od. xi. 285, Il. xi. 692 ; Apollod. i. 9. § 9 ; Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. i. 156). When Heracles had killed Iphitus, he went to Neleus to be purified ; but Neleus, who was a friend of Eurytus, the father of Iphitus, refused to purify Heracles (Diod. iv. 31). In order to take vengeance, Heracles afterwards marched against Pylos, and slew the sons of Neleus, with the exception of Nestor (Hom. Il. xi. 690), though some later writers state that Neleus also was killed (Apollod. ii. 6. § 2, 7. § 3 ; Hygin. Fab. 10). Neleus was thus reduced to a state of defencelessness, and Augeas, king of the Epeians, availed himself of the opportunity for harassing his kingdom ; among other things Augeas intercepted and kept for himself a team of four horses which Neleus had sent to the Olympian games (Hom. Il. xi. 699, &c.). Neleus took vengeance for this by carrying away the flocks of the Epeians (Il. xi. 670, &c.), whereupon the latter invaded the territory of Pylos, and besieged Thryoëssa on the Alpheius. Athena informed Neleus of it, but he would not allow his son Nestor to venture out against the Epeians, and concealed his war steeds. But Nestor fought against them on foot, and was victorious (Il. xi. 707, &c.). Pausanias says (ii. 2. § 2) that Neleus died at Corinth, and that he, in conjunction with Nestor, restored the Olympian games. The descendants of Neleus, the Neleïdae, were expelled from their kingdom by the Heracleidae, and migrated for the most part to Athens (Paus. ii. 18. § 7, iv. 3. § 3). It should be observed that Hyginus (Fab. 10, 14) calls the father of Neleus Hippocoon, and that he mentions him among the Argonauts. [L. S.]

NELEUS (Νηλεύς or Νείλεος), the younger son of Codrus, disputed the right of his elder brother Medon to the crown on account of his lameness, and when the Delphic oracle declared in favour of Medon, he placed himself at the head of the colonists who migrated to Ionia, and himself founded Miletus. His son Aepytus headed the colonists who settled in Priene. Another son headed a body of settlers who reinforced the inhabitants of Iasus, after they had lost a great number of their citizens in a war with the Carians. (Herod. ix. 97 ; Paus. vii. 2, § 1, who in the old edition calls him Neileus ; Polyb. xvi. 12 ; Suidas, s. v. Ἰωνία ; Strab. xiv. p. 633.) [C. P. M.]

NELEUS, a native of Scepsis, the son of Coriscus. He was a disciple of Aristotle and Theophrastus, the latter of whom bequeathed to him his library, and appointed him one of his executors. The history of the writings of Aristotle as connected with Neleus and his heirs, is fully discussed elsewhere. [Vol. I. p. 323.] Of the personal history of Neleus nothing further is known. (Strab. xiii. p. 608, b ; Diog. Laërt. v. 52, 53, 55, 56 ; Athen. i. p. 3, a ; Plut. Sull. p. 468. b ; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iii. p. 499.) [C. P. M.]

NE'MEA (Νεμέα), a daughter of Asopus, from whom the district of Nemea between Cleonae and Phlius in Argolis was said to have received its name. (Paus. ii. 15. § 3, v. 22. § 5.) [L. S.]

NEMEIUS (Νεμεῖος), the Nemeian, a surname of Zeus, under which he had a sanctuary at Argos, with a bronze statue, the work of Lysippus, and where games were celebrated in his honour. (Paus. ii. 20. § 3, 24. § 2.) [L. S.]

NEMERTES (Νημερτής), that is, the Unerring, a daughter of Nereus and Doris. (Hom. Il. xviii. 46 ; Hes. Theog. 262.) [L. S.]

NEMESIA'NUS, M. AURE'LIUS OLY'MPIUS, who, in all probability, was a native of Africa, since he is styled in MSS. Poeta Carthaginiensis, and is referred to as Aurelius Carthaginiensis by Hincmar archbishop of Rheims (A. D. 845), flourished at the court of the emperor Carus (A. D. 283), carried off the prize in all the poetical contests of the day (omnibus coronis [not coloniis] illustratus emicuit), and was esteemed second to the youthful prince Numerianus alone, who honoured him so far as permit him to dispute, and, of course, to yield to the palm of verse. Vopiscus, to whom we are indebted for these particulars, informs us that he was the author of poems upon fishing, hunting, and aquatics (ἁλιευτικά, κυνηγετικά, ναυτικά, unless we read ἱξευτικά), all of which have perished, with the exception of a fragment of the Cynegetica, extending to 325 hexameter lines, which, in so far as neatness and purity of expression are concerned, in some degree justifies the admiration of his contemporaries. What has been preserved contains precepts for rearing horses and dogs, and for providing the apparatus of the huntsman, but is evidently merely an introduction to the main body of the work, which seems to have embraced a very wide field, and to have been intended to contain a complete account of all the beasts of chase, and of the various methods pursued for their capture or destruction.

Two short fragments, De Aucupio, which, with their history, will be found in the Poetae Latini Minores of Wernsdorf (vol. i. p. 128), and likewise a piece entitled Laudes Herculis, the work of some unknown writer, have been ascribed, on no good evidence, to Nemesianus (Wernsdorf, vol. i. p. 275) ; and he is by some erroneously supposed to have been the author of four out of the eleven pastorals which bear the name of Calpurnius Siculus [CALPURNIUS], and to have been shadowed forth in one of the others (the fourth) under the designation of Meliboeus. The inscription "Ad Nemesianum Carthaginiensem," prefixed to these eclogues, in many editions, rests upon the authority of no MSS., except such as are of recent date, and is now generally regarded as an interpolation.

The fragment of the Cynegetica was first published by the heirs of Aldus (8vo. Venet. 1534), in a volume containing also the poem of Gratius Faliscus upon hunting, and a bucolic ascribed to Nemesianus. It will be found along with the lines De Aucupio, in the Poetae Latini Minores of Burmann, 4to. Lug. Bat. 1731, vol. i. pp. 317, 451, and of Wernsdorf, 8vo. Altenb. 1780, vol. i. pp. 3, 123. The best edition is that of Stern, entitled "Gratii Falisci et Olympii Nemesiani carmina venatica cum duobus fragmentis De Aucupio," 8vo. Hal. Sax. 1832. There is a translation into French by M. S. Delatour, 18mo. Paris, 1799. [W. R.]

NE'MESIS (Νέμεσις), is most commonly described as a daughter of Night, though some call her a daughter of Erebus (Hygin. Fab. praef.) or of Oceanus (Tzetz. ad Lyc. 88; Paus. i. 33. § 3, vii. 5. § 1). Nemesis is a personification of the moral reverence for law, of the natural fear of committing a culpable action, and hence of conscience, and for this reason she is mentioned along with Αἰδώς, i. e. Shame (Hes. Theog. 223, Op. et D. 183). In later writers, as Herodotus and Pindar, Nemesis is a kind of fatal divinity, for she directs human affairs in such a manner as to restore the right proportions or equilibrium wherever it has been disturbed; she measures out happiness and unhappiness, and he who is blessed with too many or too frequent gifts of fortune, is visited by her with losses and sufferings, in order that he may become humble, and feel that there are bounds beyond which human happiness cannot proceed with safety. This notion arose from a belief that the gods were envious of excessive human happiness (Herod. i. 34, iii. 40; Pind. Ol. viii. in fin., Pyth. x. 67). Nemesis was thus a check upon extravagant favours conferred upon man by Tyche or Fortune, and from this idea lastly arose that of her being an avenging and punishing power of fate, who, like Dike and the Erinyes, sooner or later overtakes the reckless sinner (Apollon. Rhod. iv. 1043; Sophocl. Philoct. 518; Eurip. Orest. 1362; Catull. 50, in fin.; Orph. Hymn. 60). The inhabitants of Smyrna worshipped two Nemeses, both of whom were daughters of Night (Paus. vii. 5. § 1). She is frequently mentioned under the surnames Adrasteia [ADRASTEIA, No. 2] and Rhamnusia or Rhamnusis, the latter of which she derived from the town of Rhamnus in Attica, where she had a celebrated sanctuary (Paus. i. 33. § 2). Besides the places already mentioned she was worshipped at Patrae (Paus. vii. 20, in fin.) and at Cyzicus (Strab. p. 588). She was usually represented in works of art as a virgin divinity, and in the more ancient works she seems to have resembled Aphrodite, whereas in the later ones she was more grave and serious, and had numerous attributes. But there is an allegorical tradition that Zeus begot by Nemesis at Rhamnus an egg, which Leda found, and from which Helena and the Dioscuri sprang, whence Helena herself is called Rhamnusis (Callim. Hymn. in Dian. 232; Paus. i. 33. § 7). On the pedestal of the Rhamnusian Nemesis, Leda was represented leading Helena to Nemesis (Paus. l. c.). Respecting the resemblance between her statue and that of Aphrodite, see Plin. H. N. xxxvi. 4; comp. Paus. i. 33. § 2; Strab. pp. 396, 399. The Rhamnusian statue bore in its left hand a branch of an apple tree, in its right hand a patera, and on its head a crown, adorned with stags and an image of victory. Sometimes she appears in a pensive standing attitude, holding in her left hand a bridle or a branch of an ash tree, and in her right a wheel, with a sword or a scourge. (Hirt, Mythol. Bilderb. p. 97, &c.) [L. S.]

NEME'SIUS (Νεμέσιος). 1. The author of a Greek treatise, Περὶ Φύσεως Ἀνθρώπου, De Natura Hominis, of whose date and personal history little is known. He is called bishop of Emesa, in Syria, in the MSS. of his work, and also by Anastasius Nicenus (Quaest. in S. Script. ap. Biblioth. Patrum, vol. vi. p. 157, ed. Paris, 1575), and was evidently a Christian and a man of piety. The time in which he lived cannot be determined with much exactness, as the only ancient writers by whom he is quoted or mentioned are probably Anastasius and Moses Bar-Cepha (De Parad. i. 20, p. 55, ed. Antw. 1569), which latter author calls him "Numysius Philosophus Christianus." He himself mentions Apollinaris (p. 77, ed. Oxon.) and Eunomius (p. 73), and therefore may be supposed to have lived at the end of the fourth or beginning of the fifth century after Christ. He has sometimes been confounded with other persons of the same name; but, as these erroneous conjectures have already been corrected by other writers, they need not be noticed here particularly. His work has sometimes been attributed to St. Gregory of Nyssa, an error which has probably arisen from confounding this treatise with that entitled Περὶ Κατασκευῆς Ἀνθρώπου, De Hominis Opificio, written by St. Gregory to complete the Henaëmeron of his brother St. Basil. The treatise by Nemesius is an interesting philosophical little work, which has generally been highly praised by all who have mentioned it. The author has indeed been accused of holding some of Origen's erroneous opinions, but has been defended by his editor, bishop Fell, who, however, confesses that, with respect to the pre-existence of souls, Nemesius differed from the commonly received opinion of the Church. (Annot. p. 20.) Probably the principal source of the celebrity obtained by Nemesius is his having been brought forward as a person who was aware of the functions of the bile, and also of the circulation of the blood; and the passages which have been supposed to contain these doctrines are certainly sufficiently striking to deserve to be given here at full length. The former is as follows (c. 24, p. 242, ed. Matth.):—"The motion of the pulse (called also the vital power) takes its rise from the heart, and chiefly from the left ventricle. . . . . The artery is, with great vehemence, dilated and contracted, by a sort of constant harmony and order, the motion commencing at the heart. While it is dilated, it draws with force the thinner part of the blood from the neighbouring veins, the exhalation or vapour of which blood becomes the aliment for the vital spirit. But while it is contracted, it exhales whatever fumes it has through the whole body and by secret passages, as the heart throws out whatever is fuliginous through the mouth and nose by expiration." The other passage is almost equally curious (c. 28. p. 260):—"The yellow bile," he says, "is constituted both for itself and also for other purposes; for it contributes to digestion and promotes the expulsion of the excrements; and therefore it is in a manner one of the nutritive organs, besides imparting a sort of heat to the body, like the vital power. For these reasons, therefore, it seems to be made for itself; but, inasmuch as it purges the blood, it seems to be made in a manner for this also." It is hardly necessary to say, that these passages are far enough from proving that Nemesius had anticipated the discoveries of Harvey and Sylvius; but at the same time they show that the ancients had advanced much farther in the path of science than is commonly supposed. The work is included in several of the collections of Patristic Theology. It appeared for the first time in a separate form in a Latin translation by George Valla, Lugd. 8vo. 1538. The first Greek edition was published at Antwerp, 8vo. 1565, edited by Nicasius Ellebodius, with a Latin translation; the next was by Dr. (afterwards bishop) Fell, Oxon. 8vo. 1671; the last and best is by C. F. Matthaei, Halae, 8vo. 1802. It was translated into Italian by Domin. Pizzimenti, 8vo. (s. l. et a.); into English by George Wither, London, 12mo. 1636; into German by Osterhammer, Saltzburg, 8vo. 1819; and into French by J. B. Thibault, Paris, 8vo. 1844. Further information respecting Nemesius and his opinions, theological, philosophical, and physiological, may be found in Bayle's Dict. Hist. et Crit., and Chauffepié's Supplem.; Fabric. Bibl. Graec.; Brucker, Hist. Crit. Philosoph.; Haller, Biblioth. Anat.; Sprengel, Hist. de la Méd.; Freind's Hist. of Physic. See also the Preface and Notes to Fell's edition (reprinted by Matthaei), and to Thibault's translation.

2. A friend of St. Gregory Nazianzen, a man of learning and cultivated taste, who was first an advocate, and afterwards praefect of Cappadocia. St. Gregory appears to have been on very intimate terms with him, and to have written to him numerous letters, of which only four are still extant (Epist. 198—201, vol. ii. p. 163, &c. ed. Paris), written about the year 386. He also addressed a poem to him (about the same time), in which he tries to persuade him to embrace the Christian faith (Carm. vii. vol. ii. p. 1070), but the result of his exhortation is not known. He has been supposed to be the author of the work Περὶ Φύσεως Ἀνθρώπου, but probably without sufficient reason; as, though it is quite possible that a heathen magistrate might afterwards become a Christian bishop, it is hardly probable that no notice of so eminent a conversion should have been preserved. In fact, there seems to be no reason for supposing the two persons to be one and the same, except that they probably lived about the same time.

3. Four letters of St. Isidorus, of Pelusium, written about the beginning of the fifth century after Christ, are addressed to a person named Nemesius, in one of which he is called Ἄρχων, Praetor (i. 47, ed. Paris, 1638), but it is not quite certain that the same individual is meant in each instance (ii. 135, iv. 39, v. 36).

4. "Nemesii, legum periti, mentio apud Aeneam Gazaeum, Epist. xx." (Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. viii. p. 448, ed. Harles.) But the name in the passage in question is not Νεμέσιος, but Νεμεσίων.

5. An Alexandrian presbyter who subscribed to the deposition of Arius, A. D. 321. (Fabric. l. c.) [W. A. G.]

NEOCLES (Νεοκλῆς), historical. 1. The father of Themistocles, was an Athenian of distinguished rank, connected with the priestly house of the Lycomedae (Plut. Them. i. p. 111; Herod. vii. 173).

2. A son of Themistocles and Archippe, who was killed while yet a boy by the bite of a horse. (Plut. Them. p. 128, b.) [C. P. M.]

NEOCLES, literary. 1. An Athenian, the father of Epicurus, was one of the cleruchi (agrippeta, as Cicero, de Nat. Deor. i. 26, calls him) sent to Samos after its conquest in the time of Pericles. Not finding his land sufficient for his maintenance, he set up a school. (Strab. xiv. p. 638; Diog. Laërt. x. 1.)

2. Brother of Epicurus, wrote an account of the sect of the Epicureans, which is lost. He was the author of the maxim λάθε βιώσας, upon which Plutarch wrote a small essay. (Plut. Non Suav. Vivi Sec. Epic. pp. 1089, 1128, &c.; Suidas, s. v. Νεοκλῆς; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iii. p. 608.)

3. A native of Crotona, from whom Athenaeus (ii. p. 57, f.) quotes, to the effect that the egg from which Helena was produced fell from the moon, the women there being oviparous. [C. P. M.]

NEOCLES, painter. [Xenon.]

NEOLA'US (Νεώλαος), brother of Molon and Alexander, who revolted against Antiochus the Great. [Antiochus, Vol. I. p. 196.] He commanded the left wing of the rebel army in the battle in which Molon was defeated. When all was lost he escaped from the battle, and went to Persis, where Alexander was. Having killed his mother, and the children of Molon, he slew himself upon their corpses, after persuading Alexander to follow his example. (Polyb. v. 53. § 11, 54. § 5.) [C. P. M.]

NEON (Νέων). 1. A Corinthian officer, who accompanied Timoleon in his expedition to Sicily, and was appointed by him to command the citadel of Syracuse, when that fortress was placed in his hands by the younger Dionysius. In this post Neon not only held out against the combined efforts of Hicetas and the Carthaginian general Mago, but took advantage of their absence on an expedition against Catana, to make himself master of the important quarter of Acradina. (Plut. Timol. 18.)

2. A Messenian, son of Philiades, and brother of Thrasybulus, who is accused by Demosthenes of having betrayed his country to Philip king of Macedon (Dem. de Cor. p. 324, ed. Reiske; Harpocration, s. v. Νέων). An elaborate vindication of his conduct, together with that of others of his contemporaries who had adopted the same line of policy, is found in Polybius (xvii. 14).

3. An officer who commanded under Demetrius Poliorcetes in the great sea-fight off Salamis in Cyprus, B. C. 306. (Diod. xx. 52.)

4. A Boeotian, who was one of the leaders of the Macedonian party in his native country, during the reign of Antigonus Doson. An accident put it in his power to confer a great personal obligation upon that monarch: for Antigonus having touched with his fleet on the coast of Boeotia, the ships were all left aground by a sudden change of tide: Neon, who was hipparch at the time, came up with the Boeotian cavalry, but instead of taking advantage of the situation of Antigonus, he allowed him to depart in safety. For this act he incurred much censure from his countrymen, but obtained a high place in the favour of Antigonus and his successor Philip. (Polyb. xx. 5.)

5. A Theban, probably grandson of the preceding, took a prominent part in the politics of Boeotia during the disputes between the Romans and Perseus. He was one of the principal authors of the alliance concluded by the Boeotians with the Macedonian king, on which account he was driven into exile, when the cities of Boeotia submitted to the Roman deputies Marcius and Atilius, B. C. 172. Hereupon he took refuge with Perseus, to whose fortunes he seems to have henceforward closely attached himself, as he was one of the three companions of the king's flight after the decisive battle of Pydna, B. C. 168. He eventually fell into the hands of the Romans, by whom he was executed the following year, B. C. 167. (Polyb. xxvii. 1, 2; Liv. xliv. 43, xlv. 31; Plut. Aemil. 23). [E. H. B.]

NEOPHRON or NEOPHON (Νεόφρων, Νεοφῶν, Suidas gives both, Diogenes Laërtius Νεόφρων), of Sicyon, a tragic writer of doubtful age. In the Scholia to the Medeia of Euripides, we have two fragments of a play written by him on the same subject, one of four lines at v. 668, and another of five lines at v. 1354. Besides these we have fifteen lines quoted by Stobaeus, from the same tragedy. The account given of him by Suidas, as has been shown by Elmsley (ad Eurip. Med. p. 68), is manifestly inconsistent. Suidas states that he wrote 120 tragedies, that the Medeia of Euripides was sometimes attributed to him, and that he was the first to introduce on the stage the Παιδαγωγός, and the examination of slaves by torture. In one particular—that the Medeia of Euripides was sometimes attributed to him—Suidas is confirmed by Diogenes Laërtius. But Suidas goes on to say that he was involved in the fate of Callisthenes, and put to death by Alexander the Great. If the latter account be true, the former cannot but be an error, as Euripides lived long before the days of Alexander the Great, and, in the very play of the Medeia, among others, had introduced the Παιδαγωγός. Besides, Nearchus, a tragedian, is mentioned by Suidas (s.v. Καλλισθένης) as the unfortunate friend of Callisthenes who suffered with him. From this reasoning it seems certain that Suidas confounded the two, and that Clinton is right in placing Neophron, as he does, before the age of Euripides. This is further strengthened by an acute remark of Elmsley's, that men do not quote small plagiarists of great writers, but delight to trace wherever great writers have borrowed their materials. As far as we can judge from the fragments already mentioned, Euripides may have borrowed his plot and characters from Neophron, but certainly not his style. (Elmsley, l. c.; Gaisford's Stobaeus, vol. i. p. 385; Suid. s. v.; Diog. Laërt. ii. 134; Clinton, F. H. vol. ii. p. xxxi.) [W. M. G.]

NEO'PHYTUS. A short, but curious tract, published by Cotelerius in his Ecclesiae Graecae Monumenta, vol. ii. p. 457—462, bears this title: Νεοφύτου πρεσβυτέρου μοναχοῦ καὶ ἐγκλειστοῦ περὶ τῶν κατὰ χώραν Κύπρον σκαιῶν, Neophyti Presbyteri Monachi et Inclusi, De Calamitatibus Cypri. It gives a brief account of the usurpation of the island by Isaac Comnenus, its conquest, and the imprisonment of Isaac by Richard Coeur de Lion, king of England, and the sale of the island to the Latins (as the writer represents the transaction) by Richard. The writer was contemporary with these transactions, and therefore lived about the close of the twelfth century. He was a resident in and probably a native of Cyprus. There are several MSS. in the different European libraries bearing the name of Neophytus. Of these a MS. formerly in the Colbertine Library at Paris, contained thirty Orationes, evidently by our Neophytus: a Catena in Canticum, and some others on theological subjects, are of more dubious authorship, but are probably by our Neophytus: a Demonstratio de Plantis, and one or two chemical treatises, are by another Neophytus, surnamed Prodromenus; and Definitiones and Divisiones Summariae totius Aristotelis Philosophiae and Epitome in Porphyrii quinque voces et in Aristotelis Organon are apparently by a third writer of the same name. (Cotelerius, l. c. and notes in col. 678, 679; Du Cange, Glossarium Med. et Inf. Graecitatis; Index Auctorum, p. 29; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. v. p. 738, vol. viii. 661, 662, vol. xi. p. 339, &c.; Cave, Hist. Litt. ad Ann. 1190, vol. ii. p. 251, ed. Oxford, 1740, 1742.) [J. C. M.]

NEOPTO'LEMUS (Νεοπτόλεμος), i. e. a young warrior, a son of Achilles and Deidameia, the daughter of Lycomedes, was also called Pyrrhus (Apollod. iii. 13. § 8; Hom. Od. xi. 491, &c.). According to some, however, he was a son of Achilles and Iphigeneia (Tzetz. ad Lyc. 133; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1187), and after the sacrifice of his mother he was carried by his father to the island of Scyros. The name of Pyrrhus is said to have been given to him by Lycomedes, because he had fair (πυῤῥός) hair, or because Achilles, while disguised as a girl, had borne the name of Pyrrha (Paus. x. 26. § 1; Hygin. Fab. 97; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1187; Serv. ad Aen. ii. 469). He was called Neoptolemus because either Achilles or Pyrrhus himself had fought in early youth (Eustath. l. c.). From his father he is sometimes called Achillides (Ov. Her. viii. 3), and from his grandfather or great-grandfather, Pelides and Aeacides (Virg. Aen. ii. 263, iii. 296). Neoptolemus was brought up in Scyros in the house of Lycomedes (Hom. Il. xix. 326; Soph. Philoct. 239, &c.), whence he was fetched by Odysseus to join the Greeks in the war against Troy (Hom. Od. xi. 508), because it had been prophesied by Helenus that Neoptolemus and Philoctetes, with the arrows of Heracles, were necessary for the taking of Troy (Soph. Phil. 115). In order to obtain those arrows Neoptolemus and Odysseus were sent from Troy to the island of Lemnos, where Philoctetes was living, who was prevailed upon to join the Greeks (Soph. Phil. 1433). At Troy Neoptolemus showed himself in every respect worthy of his great father, and at last was one of the heroes that were concealed in the wooden horse (Hom. Od. xi. 508, &c. 521). At the taking of the city he killed Priam at the sacred hearth of Zeus Herceius (Paus. iv. 17. § 3, x. 27; Virg. Aen. ii. 547, &c.), and sacrificed Polyxena to the spirit of his father (Eurip. Hecub. 523). When the Trojan captives were distributed, Andromache, the widow of Hector, was given to Neoptolemus, and by her he became the father of Molossus, Pielus, Pergamus (Paus. i. 11. § 1), and Amphialus (Hygin. Fab. 123; comp. ANDROMACHE). Respecting his return from Troy and the subsequent events of his life the traditions differ. According to Homer (Od. iii. 188, iv. 5, &c.) he lived in Phthia, the kingdom of his father, whither Menelaus sent to him Hermione from Sparta, because he had promised her to him at Troy. According to others Neoptolemus himself went to Sparta to receive Hermione, because he had heard a report that she was betrothed to Orestes (Hygin. Fab. 123; Paus. iii. 25. § 1, 26. § 5). Servius (ad Aen. ii. 166, iii. 321, &c.) relates that on the advice of Helenus, to whom he subsequently gave Andromache and a district in

Epeirus, Neoptolemus returned home by land, because he had been forewarned of the dangers which the Greeks would have to encounter at sea. Some again state that from Troy he first went to Molossia, and thence to Phthia, where he recovered the throne which had in the mean time been taken from Peleus by Acastus (Dict. Cret. vi. 7, &c.; Eurip. Troad. 1125; comp. Hom. Od. iv. 9). Others, that on his return to Scyros, he was cast by storm on the coast of Ephyra in Epeirus, where Andromache gave birth to Molossus, to whom the Molossian kings traced their descent (Pind. Nem. iv. 82, vii. 54, &c.). Others lastly say that he went to Epeirus of his own accord, because he would or could not return to Phthia in Thessaly (Paus. i. 11. § 1; Virg. Aen. iii. 333; Justin. xvii. 3). In Epeirus he is also said to have carried off Lanassa, a granddaughter of Heracles, from the temple of the Dodonean Zeus, and to have become by her the father of eight children (Justin. l. c.). Shortly after his marriage with Hermione, Neoptolemus went to Delphi, some say to plunder the temple of Apollo, who had been the cause of the death of Achilles, or to take the god to account for his father; and according to others to take offerings of the Trojan booty to the god, or to consult him about the means of obtaining children by Hermione (Schol. ad Pind. Nem. vii. 54, 58, ad Eurip. Or. 1649, Androm. 51). It is owing to this uncertainty that some ancient writers distinguish between two different journeys to Delphi, where he was slain, either by the command of the Pythia (Paus. i. 13. § 7), or at the instigation of Orestes, who was angry at being deprived of Hermione (Eurip. Androm. 891, &c. 1085, &c.; Virg. Aen. iii. 330); and according to others again, by the priest of the temple, or by Machaereus, the son of Daetas (Schol. ad Pind. Nem. vii. 62; Paus. x. 24. § 4; Strab. p. 421). His body was buried at Delphi, under the threshold of the temple, and remained there until Menelaus caused it to be taken up and buried within the precincts of the temple (Pind. Nem. vii. 62; Paus. x. 24. § 5). He was worshipped at Delphi as a hero, as presiding over sacrificial repasts and public games. At the time when the Gauls attacked Delphi he is said to have come forward to protect the city, and from that time to have been honoured with heroic worship. (Paus. i. 4. § 4, x. 23. § 3.) [L. S.]

NEOPTO'LEMUS I. (Νεοπτόλεμος), king of Epeirus, was son of Alcetas I., and father of Alexander I., and of Olympias, the mother of Alexander the Great. On the death of Alcetas, Neoptolemus and his brother Arymbas or Arrybas agreed to divide the kingdom, and continued to rule their respective portions without any interruption of the harmony between them, until the death of Neoptolemus, which, according to Droysen, may be placed about B. C. 360. No further incidents of his reign have been transmitted to us. (Paus. i. 11. §§ 1, 3; Justin. vii. 6. § 10, xvii. 3. § 14; Droysen, Hellenismus, vol. i. p. 250, not.) [E. H. B.]

NEOPTO'LEMUS II., king of Epeirus, was son of Alexander I. and grandson of the preceding. At his father's death in B. C. 326, he was probably a mere infant, and his pretensions to the throne were passed over in favour of Aeacides. It was not till B. C. 302 that the Epeirots, taking advantage of the absence of Pyrrhus, the son of Aeacides, rose in insurrection against him, and set up Neoptolemus in his stead. The latter reigned for the space of six years without opposition, but effectually alienated the minds of his subjects, by his harsh and tyrannical rule. He thus paved the way for the return of Pyrrhus, who landed in Epeirus in B. C. 296, at the head of a force furnished him by Ptolemy, king of Egypt. Neoptolemus, alarmed at the disaffection of his subjects, consented to a compromise, and it was agreed that the two rivals should share the sovereignty between them. But such an arrangement could not last long; at a solemn festival, where the two kings and all the chief nobles of the land were assembled, Neoptolemus had formed the design to rid himself of his rival by poison; but the plot was discovered by Pyrrhus, who in return caused him to be assassinated at a banquet to which he had himself invited him. (Plut. Pyrrh. 4, 5; Droysen, vol. i. p. 250.) [E. H. B.]

NEOPTO'LEMUS (Νεοπτόλεμος), historical. 1. A Macedonian officer of Alexander the Great. As we are told by Arrian that he belonged to the race of the Aeacidae, he was probably related to the family of the kings of Epeirus. He is mentioned as serving in the royal guards (ἑταῖροι) and distinguished himself particularly at the siege of Gaza, B. C. 332, of which he was the first to scale the walls. (Arr. Anab. ii. 27.) We hear but little of him during the subsequent campaigns of Alexander, but he appears to have earned the reputation of an able soldier; and in the division of the provinces, after the death of the king, Neoptolemus obtained the government of Armenia. (Carmania, in Dexippus, ap. Phot. p. 64, b. is clearly a false reading; see Droysen, vol. i. p. 50.) It seems, however, that he had already given evidence of a restless and unsettled disposition, which caused Perdiccas to regard him with suspicion, and in B. C. 321, when the latter set out for Egypt, he placed Neoptolemus under the command of Eumenes, who was enjoined to exercise particular vigilance in regard to him. The suspicions of the regent proved not unfounded: Neoptolemus immediately entered into correspondence with the hostile leaders, Antipater and Craterus, and, on being ordered by Eumenes to join him with his contingent, refused to comply. Hereupon Eumenes immediately marched against him, defeated his army, and compelled all the Macedonian troops in his service to take the oath of fidelity to Perdiccas. Neoptolemus himself escaped with a small body of cavalry and joined Craterus, whom he persuaded to march immediately against Eumenes, while the latter was still elated with his victory, and unprepared for a fresh attack. But their cautious adversary was not to be taken by surprise, and met his enemies in a pitched battle. In this Neoptolemus commanded the left wing, on which he was opposed to Eumenes himself; and the two leaders, who were bitter personal enemies, sought each other in the fight, and engaged in single combat, in which, after a desperate struggle, Neoptolemus was slain by his antagonist. (Diod. xviii. 29—31; Plut. Eum. 4—7; Corn. Nep. Eum. 4; Justin. xiii. 6, 8; Dexippus, ap. Phot. p. 64, b.; Arrian, ap. Phot. p. 70, b., 71, a.)

2. A Macedonian, father of Meleager, the general of Alexander. (Arr. Anab. i. 24. § 1.)

3. A Macedonian officer, who was killed at the siege of Halicarnassus, B. C. 333. (Diod. xvii. 25.) He is doubtless the same who is called by Arrian, the son of Arrhabaeus and brother of Amyntas, though that author represents him as having fought on the Persian side. (Arr. Anab. i. 20. § 15; and see Schmieder, ad loc.)

4. One of the generals of Mithridates, and brother of Archelaus. He had already distinguished himself previous to the breaking out of the wars with Rome, by an expedition against the barbarians north of the Euxine, whom he defeated in several battles, and appears to have pushed his conquests as far as the mouth of the Tyras (Dniester), where he erected a fortress which continued to bear his name. In the course of these wars he is said to have defeated the barbarians in a combat of cavalry, on the ice at the entrance of the Palus Maeotis, on the very same spot where he the following summer gained a naval victory. (Strab. ii. 1, p. 73, vii. 3, pp. 306, 307.) In B. C. 88 he was united with his brother Archelaus in the command of the great army with which Mithridates invaded Bithynia, and defeated Nicomedes III. at the river Amnius. This success was quickly followed up by Neoptolemus and Menophanes, who defeated the Roman general M. Aquillius in a second decisive action, and compelled him to fly for refuge to Pergamus. (App. Mithr. 17—19.) After this he appears to have accompanied Archelaus to Greece, where he was defeated by Sulla's lieutenant, Munatius, near Chalcis, with heavy loss, B. C. 86. (Ibid. 34.) After this we find him commanding the fleet of Mithridates, which was stationed at Tenedos (B. C. 85), where he was attacked and defeated by Lucullus, the quaestor of Sulla. (Plut. Lucull. 3.) From this time we hear no more of him. [E. H. B.]

NEOPTO'LEMUS (Νεοπτόλεμος), literary. 1. Of Paros, the most eminent literary person of this name. The following works are ascribed to him. 1. Περὶ Ἐπιγραμμάτων, probably a collection of epigrams. (Athen. x. p. 454, f.; Jacobs, Anthol. vol. vi. p. xxxvi.) 2. Περὶ Γλωσσῶν, to the third book of which Athenaeus refers (xi. p. 476, f.). It is probably to this work that Achilles Tatius refers, ἐν ταῖς Φρύγιαις φωναῖς. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vi. p. 193.) 3. A Commentary on Homer. (Id. vol. i. p. 517.) 4. A Commentary on Theocritus, quoted in the Scholia on i. 52. (Id. vol. iii. pp. 781, 798.) 5. A Treatise on Poetry, to which Horace is said to have been indebted in his Ars Poetica. (Id. vol. vi. p. 373.)

2. According to a conjecture of Clinton (F. H. vol. i. p. 349), who has collected (l. c.) all the ancient notices on the subject, there was a Milesian Neoptolemus, to whom was falsely ascribed the epic Ναυπακτία. Pausanias thinks it the work of Carcinus. [CARCINUS.] The Scholiast on Apollonius Rhodius, however, expressly attributes it to Neoptolemus. Perhaps, however, Neoptolemus the Parian may have commented on this work also. Heyne latterly agreed with Pausanias that the Ναυπακτία was named from Naupactus, the birthplace of its author Carcinus. (Apollon. Rhod. v. 299; Schol. ad Apollod. iii. 10. § 12, and Observat. in loc. by Heyne, ed. Gotting. 1803.)

3. A poet from whose work, Περὶ ἀστεισμῶν, two lines are quoted by Stobaeus (120. 5, vol. iii. p. 459, ed. Gaisford).

4. There was also a celebrated Athenian tragedian of this name, who performed at the games in which Philip of Macedon was slain, B. C. 336. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. p. 312; Diod. xvi. vol. ii. p. 152, ed. Amstel. 1745; Sueton. Cal. c. 57.) If Josephus (Ant. xix. 1) be correct, the play performed was on the subject of Cinyras and Myrrha. But Neoptolemus (Diod. l. c.), by order of the king, introduced some new lines (quoted by Diod. l. c.), probably composed by Neoptolemus himself. A saying of his on the murder of the king is recorded by Stobaeus (98. 70, vol. iii. p. 295, ed. Gaisford). He took an active part in the transactions between the Athenians and Philip. He had been intimate with and espoused the side of the latter, for whose court he ultimately left Athens. (Dem. pp. 58, 344, 442, ed. Reiske.) [W. M. G.]

NE'PHELE (Νεφέλη). 1. The wife of the Thessalian king Athamas, by whom she became the mother of Phrixus and Helle. (Apollod. i. 9. § 1; comp. ATHAMAS.)

2. The wife of Ixion, by whom she became the mother of the Centaurs. [CENTAURI.] [L. S.]

NEPOS, a friend of the younger Pliny, who addresses four letters to him (ii. 3, iii. 16, iv. 26, vi. 19), but whether he is the same as either the Calvisius Nepos or the Licinius Nepos mentioned below, is uncertain.

NEPOS, CALVI'SIUS, a friend of the younger Pliny, was a candidate for the office of military tribune, and was warmly recommended by Pliny to Sossius. (Plin. Ep. iv. 4.)

NEPOS, CORNE'LIUS, was the contemporary and friend of Cicero, Atticus, and Catullus. He was probably a native of Verona, or of some neighbouring village, and died during the reign of Augustus. No other particulars, with regard to his personal history, have been transmitted to us. (Catull. i. 3; comp. Auson. praef. Epigramm.; Cic. ad Att. xvi. 5; Plin. H. N. v. 1, ix. 39, x. 23; Plin. Ep. iv. 28; Hieron. Chron. Euseb. Olymp. clxxxv.) He is known to have written the following pieces, all of which are now lost.

1. Chronica. An Epitome of Universal History, it would appear, in three books. For the name and some idea of the contents we are indebted to Ausonius (Epist. xvi.), A. Gellius (xvii. 21. § 3, 8, 24), and Solinus (i. § 27, xliv. § 1), while Catullus, when dedicating his poems to Cornelius Nepos, indicates, though obscurely, the object and extent of the production in question,

> Jam tum cum ausus es, unus Italorum,
> Omne aevum tribus explicare chartis,
> Doctis, Jupiter! et laboriosis.

(See also Minucius Felix, c. 22.)

2. Exemplorum Libri, of which Charisius (p. 119, ed. Putsch.) quotes the second book, and A. Gellius (vii. 18. § 11) the fifth. This was probably a collection of remarkable sayings and doings, of the same description as the compilation subsequently formed by Valerius Maximus.

3. De Viris Illustribus. Gellius (xi. 8) tells an anecdote of Cato, adding "Scriptum est hoc in libro Cornelii Nepotis De Illustribus Viris." (See also Serv. ad Virg. Aen. 372; Diomedes, p. 405, ed. Putsch.; and Charisius, pp. 113, 114, 195, ed. Putsch., who refers to books ii. xv. and xvi.) It is not impossible that it may be the same work as the preceding, quoted under a different title.

4. Vita Ciceronis, an error in which is corrected by A. Gellius (xv. 28).

5. Epistolae ad Ciceronem, from one of which Lactantius has preserved an extract (Instit. Div.

iii. 15; comp. Cic. ad Att. xvi. 5), but we cannot tell whether they were ever formally collected into a volume. The Epistolae Ciceronis ad Cornelium Nepotem are adverted to under CICERO, p. 743.

6. Perhaps poems also, at least he is named in the same category with Virgil, Ennius, and Accius by the younger Pliny (Ep. v. 3).

7. De Historicis. In the life of Dion (c. 3), which now bears the name of Cornelius Nepos, there is the following sentence, "Sed de hoc in eo meo libro plura sunt exposita qui De Historicis conscriptus est."

In the year 1471 a quarto volume issued from the press of Jenson at Venice, entitled Aemilii Probi de Vita excellentium, containing biographies of twenty distinguished commanders, nineteen Greeks and one Persian, in the following order, which, it has been subsequently ascertained, obtains in all MSS.:—1. Miltiades. 2. Themistocles. 3. Aristides. 4. Pausanias. 5. Cimon. 6. Lysander. 7. Alcibiades. 8. Thrasybulus. 9. Conon. 10. Dion. 11. Iphicrates. 12. Chabrias. 13. Timotheus. 14. Datames. 15. Epaminondas. 16. Pelopidas. 17. Agesilaus. 18. Eumenes. 19. Phocion. 20. Timoleon. Next came three chapters headed De Regibus, presenting very brief notices of certain famous kings of Persia and Macedonia, of the elder Sicilian Dionysius, and of some of the more remarkable among the successors of Alexander. The volume concluded with a biography of Hamilcar, and a biography of Hannibal. A preface, or introduction to the lives, commenced with the words, "Non dubito fore plerosque, Attice, qui hoc genus scripturae, leve, et non satis dignum summorum virorum judicent," and prefixed to the whole was a dedication, in verse, to the emperor Theodosius, in which we find the couplet

> Si rogat Auctorem, paulatim detege nostrum
> Tunc Domino nomen, me sciat esse Probum.

A second edition, in quarto, of the same book, without date, was printed at Venice by Bernardinus Venetus. In this a biography of Cato is added. The title in one part of the volume is Aemilii Probi Historici excellentium Imperatorum Vitae, in another Aemilii Probi de Virorum Illustrium Vita. A third edition, in quarto, without date and without name of place or printer, but known to belong to Milan, and to be not later than 1496, was published as Aemilius Probus de Viris Illustribus; and here we have not only the biography of Cato, but a life of Atticus also. Numerous impressions appeared during the next half century, varying from the above and from each other in no important particular, except that in the Strasburg one of 1506, the life of Atticus is ascribed to Cornelius Nepos, a point in which it is supported by many MSS. But in 1569 a great sensation was produced among the learned by the edition of the celebrated Dionysius Lambinus (4to. Paris, 1569), who not only revised the text with much care, but strenuously maintained that the whole work was the production of that Cornelius Nepos who flourished towards the close of the Roman republic, and not of an unknown Aemilius Probus, living at the end of the fourth century. The arguments upon which he chiefly insisted were,—

1. The extreme purity of the Latinity, and the chaste simplicity of the style, which exhibit a striking contrast to the semi-barbarian jargon and meretricious finery of the later empire. Every critical scholar must feel the weight of this observation.

2. The person addressed in the preface or introduction must be Pomponius Atticus, the friend of Cicero. This is fully proved by a passage in the life of Cato (sub fin.) where we read, "Hujus de vita et moribus plura in eo libro persecuti sumus quem separatim de eo fecimus rogatu Pomponii Attici," words which are unquestionably perfectly decisive in so far as the memoir in which they occur is concerned, but this, as we have seen, was not included in the original edition, is wanting in some MSS., and, along with the Atticus, is separated, as it were, from the rest in all.

3. The lofty tone in which the grandeur and power of the Roman people are celebrated, the boldness of the comments on free institutions and tyrants, would have been totally out of place at an epoch of degradation and slavery. Allusions, also, it is affirmed, may be detected to the civil war between Caesar and Pompey. Upon a careful examination of all the quotations adduced it will be seen that no weight ought to be attached to this portion of the proof.

4. Lambinus was informed, upon what he considered good authority, that one MS. ended in this manner, "Completum est opus Aemilii Probi, Cornelii Nepotis." But even if we admit the accuracy of a statement vouched for so imperfectly, it leads to no result, for the first clause might be intended to assign the 20 biographies, the De Regibus, the Hamilcar and the Hannibal, to Probus; the concluding phrase to mark Nepos as the author of the Cato and the Atticus.

The question thus started has given rise to interminable discussions; but the leading hypotheses may be reduced to three.

I. Many of the contemporaries of Lambinus, unable or unwilling to abandon the belief in which they had been reared, and clinging to the verses addressed to Theodosius, doggedly maintained that the old opinion was after all true, and that all the lives, except perhaps those of Cato and Atticus, which stood upon somewhat different ground, were the property of Probus, and of no one else. This position is now very generally abandoned.

II. Lambinus, as we have seen, pronounced the lives to belong entirely to Cornelius Nepos. Those who support this hypothesis, which has been more widely received than any other, hold, that what we now possess may be regarded, either as a portion of the voluminous collection, De Viris Illustribus, or as an independent work, which, having fallen into oblivion, was brought to light by Aemilius Probus, who fraudulently endeavoured to palm it off as his own; or, perhaps, meant to do nothing more than claim the credit of having discovered and described it; or, that the verses in question, which are absent from several MSS., refer to some totally different production, and have by mere accident found their way into their present position.

III. Barthius, steering a middle course, threw out that the biographies, as they now exist, are in reality epitomes of lives actually written by Nepos, and that we ought to look upon Probus as the abbreviator; others, adopting the general idea, think it more likely that the abridgments were executed at an earlier period.

Without attempting to enter at large into the merits of these conflicting systems, and of the many minor controversies to which they have given rise, all of which will be found stated in the works noted down at the end of this article, we may remark that the third hypothesis, under one form or other, will, if properly applied, tend to remove many of the difficulties, and explain many of the anomalies by which the subject is embarrassed more effectually than either of the two others. It will enable us to account for the purity of the language, and for the graceful unaffected ease of the clauses, when taken singly, and at the same time to understand the harsh and abrupt transitions which so frequently occur in passing from one sentence or from one paragraph to another. But while we may safely admit that we hold in our hands the abridgment of some writer of the Augustan age, we must bear in mind that the evidence adduced to prove that writer to be Cornelius Nepos is miserably defective, an exception being always made in respect of the life of Atticus, which is expressly assigned to him in at least two of the best MSS.

These biographies have, almost ever since their first appearance, been a favourite school-book, and hence editions have been multiplied without end. We have already described the earliest. After the labours of Lambinus, we may particularly notice those of Schottus, fol. Francf. 1609, of Gebhardus, 12mo. Amst. 1644, of Boeclerus, 8vo. Argentor. 1648, of Bosius, 8vo. Jen. 1675, of Van Staveren, 8vo. Lug. Bat. 1734, 1755, 1773, the last being the best, of Heusinger, 8vo. Krug. 1747, of Fischer, 8vo. Lips. 1759, of Harles, Hal. 1773, Lips. 1806, of Paufler, with useful notes written in German, 8vo. Lips. 1804, of Tzschucke, 8vo. Gotting. 1804, with an excellent commentary in a separate volume, of Titze, 8vo. Prag. 1813, of Bremi, 8vo. Zurich, 1820, of Bardili, 2 vols. 8vo. Stuttgard, 1820, of Daehne, 12mo. Lips. 1827, of Roth, who has brought back Aemilius Probus on his title page, Basil, 8vo. 1841, and of Benecke, 8vo. Berol. 1843, which is purely critical. The editions of Van Staveren, 1773, of Tzschucke, 1804, of Bremi, 1820, contain every thing that the student requires, and perhaps no single edition will be found more serviceable than that of Lemaire, 8vo. Paris, 1820. The dissertation prefixed to the editions of Lambinus, Titze, Bardili, Daehne, Roth, and Benecke, will yield full information on the controversy. The translations into different languages are countless; the first into English is, "The Lives of illustrious Men, written in Latin by Cornelius Nepos, done into English by several [twelve] gentlemen of the University of Oxford, Lond. 1684," and frequently reprinted. Sir Matthew Hale had previously translated "The Life of Atticus, with moral and political Observations," 8vo. Lond. 1677. [W. R.]

NEPOS, JU'LIUS, the last emperor but one of the Western Empire, A. D. 474—475. He was the son of Nepotianus, by a sister of that Marcellinus who established a temporary independent principality in Illyricum, about the middle of the fifth century. [MARCELLINUS.] A law of the Codex of Justinian mentions a Nepotianus as general of the army in Dalmatia in A. D. 471, but it is doubtful whether this was the emperor's father or the emperor himself, as it is not clear whether the true reading of the Codex is Nepotianus or Nepos, and even the determination of the reading would not settle the point, as Theophanes (Chronographia, ad A. M. 5965) gives to the emperor himself the name of Nepotianus, and adds that he was a native of Dalmatia. It is not improbable that the family of Marcellinus preserved, after his death in A. D. 468, a portion of the power which he had possessed in Illyricum, and that this was the motive which induced the Eastern emperor Leo [LEO I.] to give to Nepos his niece (or, more accurately, the niece of his wife the empress Verina) in marriage, and to declare him, by his officer Domitianus, at Ravenna, Augustus (Jornandes incorrectly says Caesar) of the Western empire. (Jornand. de Regnor. Success.) The actual emperor, at the time when Nepos was thus exalted, was Glycerius [GLYCERIUS], who was regarded at Constantinople as an usurper. Nepos marched against his competitor, took him prisoner at Portus at the mouth of the Tiber, and obliged him to become a priest. These events took place, according to the more numerous and better authorities, in A. D. 474, but Theophanes, by contracting the reign of Glycerius to five months [GLYCERIUS], brings his deposition within the year 473. The elevation of Nepos is placed by the Chronicon of an anonymous author, published by Caspinianus (No. viii. in the Vetustior. Latinor. Chronica of Roncallius), on the 24th of June, which date, if correct, must refer to his victory over Glycerius, for his proclamation as emperor at Ravenna must have been antecedent to the death of Leo (which occurred in January 474), at least antecedent to the intelligence of Leo's death reaching Ravenna. If we suppose the proclamation of Nepos as emperor to have occurred in August 473, a supposition to which we see no objection, the date given by Theophanes, who, as a Byzantine, would compute the reign of Nepos from his accession de jure, may be reconciled with that of the Latin chroniclers, who date from the time of his becoming emperor de facto, and on this supposition the interval from August 473 to June 474 must have been occupied in preparing his armament or executing his march against Glycerius.

From hints in the letters of Sidonius Apollinaris (Ep. v. 16, viii. 7, ed. Sirmond) it may be gathered that Nepos had, before his accession, acquired some reputation both for warlike ability and for general goodness of character, and that during his brief reign his conduct was answerable to his previous character. But the condition of the empire was past remedy. The Visigoths, settled in Aquitania, were eagerly striving, under their king Euric, to expel the Romans from the territories of the Arverni, the modern Auvergne, the last part of the province which remained to its ancient masters, and which was bravely defended by its inhabitants under the conduct of Ecdicius (Jornandes calls him Decius), brother-in-law of Sidonius Apollinaris. The Goths besieged the town of Arverni or Clermont, in the summer of 474, but Epiphanius, bishop of Ticinum (Pavia), being sent by Nepos, concluded a peace (Ennod. Vita Epiphan.), which, however, Euric soon broke, and Nepos was obliged, in a second treaty, in which the quaestor Licinianus was his negotiator, to cede the disputed territory to its assailants. (Sirmond, Not. ad Sidon. Ep. iii. 1.) Tillemont makes the embassy of Licinianus unavailing, and considers that of Epiphanius to have been consequent on its failure; but we think Sirmond's view of the matter more consistent with the account of Ennodius.

These transactions with the Visigoths constitute almost the whole that is known of the reign of Nepos. He had recalled Ecdicius from Gaul, and had appointed Orestes to be magister militum of that diocese in his place. Orestes, assuming the command of the troops assembled at Rome, and, marching as if towards Gaul, came to Ravenna, where Nepos appears to have been, raised there the standard of revolt, and proclaimed his son Augustulus emperor. [AUGUSTULUS, ROMULUS.] Nepos fled into Dalmatia. His expulsion is fixed by the anonymous Chronicon already cited for the date of his accession, on the 28th of August 475, so that his actual reign was about fourteen months.

After his expulsion from Italy, he appears to have retained the Dalmatian territory, which he, or some of his family, had inherited from Marcellinus, and was still recognised at Constantinople and in the East as emperor of the West. Meanwhile, Orestes was defeated and killed, and Augustulus deposed, by Odoacer the Herulian [AUGUSTULUS; ORESTES; ODOACER], who sought the patronage of the Eastern emperor Zeno; but Zeno persisted in recognising the title of Nepos. (Malchus, apud Collectan. de Legation.) In A. D. 480 Nepos was killed near Salona, where he appears to have resided, by Viator and Ovida or Odiva, two of his own officers (Marcellin. Chronicon), probably at the instigation of his deposed predecessor Glycerius [GLYCERIUS], who held the bishopric of Salona. (Malchus, apud Phot. Bibl. Cod. 78.) Odiva or Ovida was vanquished and killed the next year, 481, by Odoacer who had invaded Dalmatia. (Cassiodor. Chron.) Tillemont thinks that the title of Nepos, till his death, was recognised by some of the cities of Gaul. The accounts of the life and reign of Nepos are brief and fragmentary. To the authorities cited in the course of the article may be added Marius Aventic. Chronicon; Chronici Prosperiani Auctarium, No. iv. apud Roncallium; Catalogus Imperatorum, No. xi. apud eundem; Jornandes, de Rebus Geticis; the Excerpta subjoined by Valesius to Amm. Marc.; Evagrius, H. E. ii. 16; Tillemont, Hist. des Empereurs, vol. vi. pp. 424—434, 440—443; Gibbon, Decline and Fall, ch. xxxvi; Eckhel, vol. viii. p. 202. [J. C. M.]

COIN OF JULIUS NEPOS.

NEPOS, LICI'NIUS, is frequently mentioned by the younger Pliny as an upright man and a severe praetor. (Plin. Ep. iv. 29, v. 4, 21, vi. 5.)

NEPOS, MA'RIUS, expelled from the senate by Tiberius, A. D. 17, on account of his extravagance. (Tac. Ann. ii. 48.)

NEPOS, METELLUS. [METELLUS.]

NEPOS, P. VALE'RIUS, was one of the accusers of Milo, whom Cicero defended. (Ascon. in Mil. p. 35.)

NEPOTIA'NUS, one of the Bordeaux professors commemorated by Ausonius (Prof. Burdig. xv.). Distinguished, if we can believe this complimentary address, as a grammarian, a rhetorician, a poet, and a philosopher, he died at the age of ninety, leaving behind him two children. [W. R.]

NEPOTIA'NUS, FLA'VIUS POPI'LIUS, son of Eutropia, the half-sister of Constantine the Great [EUTROPIA; THEODORA], headed a rash enterprise whose object was to withstand the usurpation of Magnentius. Having collected a band of gladiators, runaway slaves, and similar desperadoes, he assumed the purple on the 3d of June 350, marched upon Rome, defeated and slew Anicius (or Anicetus), the new praetorian prefect, and made himself master of the city, which was deluged with blood by the excesses of contending factions. But after having enjoyed a confused shadow of royalty for twenty-eight days only, the adventurer was overpowered and put to death, along with his mother, by Marcellinus, who had been despatched by Magnentius to quell the insurrection, and many of the most noble and wealthy among the senators, by whom his pretensions had been admitted, shared a like fate. This Nepotianus is supposed to be the person who appears in the Fasti as the colleague of Facundus for the year 336, and it has been conjectured that his father was the Nepotianus who held the office of consul in 301. [MAGNENTIUS; MARCELLINUS.] (Julian. Orat. i. ii.; Aur. Vict. de Caes. 42, Epit. 42; Eutrop. x. 6; Zosim. ii. 43; Chron. Alexandr.; Chron. Idat.) [W. R.]

COIN OF NEPOTIANUS.

NEPOTIA'NUS, JANUA'RIUS. [MAXIMUS, VALERIUS, p. 1002.]

NEPTU'NUS, the chief marine divinity of the Romans. His name is probably connected with the verb νάω or nato, and a contraction of navitunus. As the early Romans were not a maritime people, and had not much to do with the sea, the marine divinities are not often mentioned, and we scarcely know with any certainty what day in the year was set apart as the festival of Neptunus, though it seems to have been the 23rd of July (X. Kal. Sext.). His temple stood in the Campus Martius, not far from the septa; but respecting the ceremonies of his festival we know nothing, except that the people formed tents (umbrae) of the branches of trees, in which they probably rejoiced in feasting and drinking (Varro, de Ling. Lat. vi. 19; Horat. Carm. iii. 28; Paul. Diac. p. 377, ed. Müller; Tertull. de Spect. 6; P. Vict. Reg. Urb. IX.; Dict. of Ant. s. v. Neptunalia). When a Roman commander sailed out with a fleet, he first offered up a sacrifice to Neptunus, which was thrown into the sea (Cic. de Nat. Deor. iii. 20; Liv. xxix. 27). In the Roman poets Neptunus is completely identified with the Greek Poseidon, and accordingly all the attributes of the latter are transferred by them to the former. [POSEIDON.] [L. S.]

NERA'TIUS MARCELLUS. [MARCELLUS.]

NERA'TIUS PRISCUS, a Roman jurist, who lived under Trajan and Hadrian. It is said that Trajan sometimes had the design of making Neratius his successor in place of Hadrian. (Spart. Hadr. 4.) He enjoyed a high reputation under Hadrian, and was one of his consiliarii. (Spart. Hadr. 18.) Neratius was consul, but the year is uncertain. The works of Neratius were fifteen books of Regulae, three books of Responsa, and seven books of Membranae, from which there are sixty-four excerpts in the Digest. A fourth book of Epistolae, and a treatise entitled Libri ex Plautio, are cited in the Digest (8. tit. 3. s. 5. § 1; 33. tit. 7. s. 12. § 35). He also wrote a book, De Nuptiis (Gell. iv. 4), if Neratius is the right reading there. It is a mistake to collect from a passage in the Digest (39. tit. 6. s. 43), that he wrote notes Ad Fulcinium. Paulus wrote Ad Neratium, in four books, from which there are excerpts in the Digest.

When Priscus is mentioned in the Digest, Javolenus Priscus is meant. Neratius wrote in a clear, condensed style, and is a good authority. He is often cited by subsequent jurists. (Grotius, Vitae Juriconsult.; Zimmern, Geschichte des Röm. Rechts, vol. i. p. 324; Puchta, Cursus, &c. vol. i. p. 444, 1st ed.) [G. L.]

NEREIS (Νηρεΐς), or Nerine (Virg. Eclog. vii. 37), is a patronymic from Nereus, and applied to his daughters (Nereides, Νηρεΐδες, and in Homer Νηρηΐδες) by Doris, who were regarded by the ancients as marine nymphs of the Mediterranean, in contra-distinction from the Naiades, or the nymphs of fresh water, and the Oceanides, or the nymphs of the great ocean (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 622). The number of the Nereides was fifty, but their names are not the same in all writers (Hom. Il. xviii. 39, &c.; Hes. Theog. 240, &c.; Pind. Isthm. vi. 8; Apollod. i. 2. § 7; Ov. Met. ii. 10, &c.; Virg. Aen. v. 825; Hygin. Fab. praef.) They are described as lovely divinities, and dwelling with their father at the bottom of the sea, and they were believed to be propitious to all sailors, and especially to the Argonauts (Hom. Il. xviii. 36, &c. 140; Apollod. i. 9. § 25; Apollon. Rhod. iv. 859, 930). They were worshipped in several parts of Greece, but more especially in sea-port towns, such as Cardamyle (Paus. iii. 26. § 5), and on the Isthmus of Corinth (ii. 1. § 7). The epithets given them by the poets refer partly to their beauty and partly to their place of abode. They were frequently represented in antiquity, in paintings, on gems, in relievoes and statues, and commonly as youthful, beautiful, and naked maidens, and often grouped together with Tritons and other marine monsters, in which they resemble the Bacchic routs. Sometimes, also, they appear on gems as half maidens and half fish, like mermaids, the belief in whom is quite analogous to the belief of the ancients in the existence of the Nereides. (Hirt, Mythol. Bilderb. p. 150, tabb. 18, 19.) [L. S.]

NEREIS (Νηρηΐς), daughter of Pyrrhus I., king of Epeirus, was married, apparently long after her father's death, to Gelon, the son of Hieron, king of Syracuse, by whom she became the mother of Hieronymus. It appears that she outlived her niece Deïdameia, and was thus the last surviving descendant of the royal house of the Aeacidae. (Paus. vi. 12. § 3; Polyb. vii. 4. § 5; Justin. xxviii. 3. § 4; Vales. ad Diod. Exc. p. 568.) Her name is found in an inscription on the theatre of Syracuse, from which it appears that she bore the title of queen. (Raoul-Rochette, Mémoires de Numismatique et d'Antiquité, p. 73, 4to. Paris, 1840.) Justin erroneously supposes her to be a sister of the Deïdameia (or Laodameia, as he calls her) who was assassinated by Milon. That she was a daughter of the elder Pyrrhus, see Droysen, vol. ii. p. 275, note. [E. H. B.]

NEREIUS, a patronymic from Nereus, applied to his descendants, such as Phocus. (Ov. Met. vii. 685, xiii. 162; Virg. Aen. ix. 102). [L. S.]

NEREUS (Νηρεύς), a son of Pontus and Gaea, and husband of Doris, by whom he became the father of the 50 Nereides. He is described as the wise and unerring old man of the sea, at the bottom of which he dwelt (Hom. Il. xviii. 141, Od. xxiv. 58; Hes. Theog. 233, &c.; Apollod. i. 2. § 6). His empire is the Mediterranean or more particularly the Aegean sea, whence he is sometimes called the Aegean (Apollon. Rhod. iv. 772; Stat. Theb. viii. 478). He was believed, like other marine divinities, to have the power of prophesying the future and of appearing to mortals in different shapes, and in the story of Heracles he acts a prominent part, just as Proteus in the story of Odysseus, and Glaucus in that of the Argonauts (Apollod. ii. 5. § 11; Horat. Carm. i. 15). Virgil (Aen. ii. 418) mentions the trident as his attribute, and the epithets given him by the poets refer to his old age, his kindliness, and his trustworthy knowledge of the future. In works of art, Nereus, like other sea-gods, is represented with pointed sea-weeds taking the place of hair in the eyebrows, the chin, and the breast. (Hirt, Mythol. Bilderb. p. 150, &c.)

There is another mythical personage of the name of Nereus. (Apollod. i. 7. § 4). [L. S.]

NERIO, NERIENE, or NERIENIS, wife of the Roman god Mars. Very little is known about her, and the ancients themselves were doubtful as to the correct form of her name, though Gellius (xiii. 22) prefers Nerio, which is analogous with Anio. The name is said to be of Sabine origin, and to be synonymous with virtus or fortitudo. (Plaut. Truc. ii. 6. 24; Martian. Cap. 3; L. Lydus, de Mens. iv. 42.) [L. S.]

NE'RITUS (Νήριτος), a son of Pterelaus in Ithaca, from whom mount Neriton, in the west of Ithaca, was believed to have derived its name. (Hom. Od. ix. 22, xvii. 207; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1815.) [L.S.]

NE'RIUS, CN., of the Papinian tribe, accused P. Sestius of bribery in B. C. 56 (Cic. ad Q. Fr. ii. 3. § 5). This Cn. Nerius may be the same as the Nerius who was quaestor in B. C. 49, as we learn from some interesting coins, of which a specimen is annexed. The obverse represents the head of Saturn, with NERI Q. VRB. (i. e. quaestor urbanus), and the reverse some military standards, with L. LEN(T). C. MAR(C). COS. (i. e. L. Lentulus and C. Marcellus, consuls). The head of Saturn on the coin has evident reference to the temple of that deity, the aerarium at Rome, of which the quaestors had the charge, and where likewise the standards were kept, to which fact the reverse alludes (comp. Dict. of Ant. s. v. Aerarium). The names of the consuls prove both that the coin was struck in B. C. 49, and that Nerius belonged to their party; and it is not improbable that the head of Saturn was employed as an emblem in allusion to the treasury having been broken open by Caesar, and with a view of intimating that he had thus violated the sanctity of a temple. (Eckhel, vol. v. pp. 160, 161.)

COIN OF NERIUS.

NERO, was a cognomen of the Claudia Gens, which is said to signify, in the Sabine tongue "fortis ac strenuus." (Sueton. Tib. Nero, 1; and the remarks of Gellius, xiii. 22.)

1. TIB. CLAUDIUS NERO was one of the four sons of App. Claudius Caecus, censor B. C. 312. Nothing is known of him except that he was the paternal ancestor of the emperor Tib. Claudius Nero Caesar. (Sueton. Ner. 3.)

2. C. CLAUDIUS NERO (Liv. xxiv. 17), in the fourth consulship of Q. Fabius Maximus, and the third of M. Marcellus, B. C. 214, commanded a body of cavalry under the consul Marcellus. He was instructed to attack the rear of Hannibal's army near Nola, but he either lost his way or had not time to come up, and he was not present in the engagement in which the consul defeated Hannibal, for which he was severely rated by Marcellus. He is evidently the C. Claudius Nero who was praetor in the year but one after (Liv. xxv. 1, 2), and was stationed at Suessula, whence he was summoned by the consuls Q. Fulvius III. and Appius Claudius (B. C. 212) to assist at the siege of Capua. (Liv. xxv. 22, xxv. 5.) Nero was sent in the same year into Spain (Liv. xxvi. 17; Appian, Hispan. 17) with a force to oppose Hasdrubal. He landed at Tarraco (Tarragona), but Hasdrubal eluded his attack, and P. Cornelius Scipio was sent to command in Spain. Nero commanded as legatus (Liv. xxvii. 14) under Marcellus B. C. 209, and the battle in which Hannibal was defeated near Canusium (Canosa). In B. C. 207, Nero was consul with M. Livius II. Nero marched into the south of Italy against Hannibal, whom he defeated and pursued. In the mean time Hasdrubal, who was in the north of Italy, sent messengers to Hannibal, who was retreating to Metapontum, followed by Nero. The messengers were taken by the Romans, and the contents of their despatches being read, Nero determined not to confine himself to the limits of his command, but to march against Hasdrubal, who was intending to effect a junction with Hannibal in Umbria. He communicated his design to the Roman senate, and instructed them how to act. Nero joined his colleague M. Livius in Picenum. A sanguinary battle was fought with Hasdrubal on the river Metaurum, in which Hasdrubal fell: in no one battle in the campaign with Hannibal was the slaughter so great. Nero returned to his camp in the south, taking with him the head of Hasdrubal, which he ordered to be thrown before the posts of Hannibal, and he sent him two of his captives to tell him what had befallen his brother and his army. (Liv. xxvii. 41—51; Appian, Annibal. 52, &c.) Nero shared in the triumph of his colleague, but as the battle was fought in his colleague's province, Livius rode in a chariot drawn by four horses followed by his soldiers; Nero rode on horseback, without a train, but the popular opinion made up for his diminished honours. This great battle, which probably saved Rome, gave a lustre to the name of Nero, and consecrated it among the recollections of the Romans.

> Quid debeas, o Roma, Neronibus,
> Testis Metaurum flumen et Hasdrubal
> Devictus. Horat. Carm. iv. 4.

In B. C. 201, Nero and others were sent on a mission to Ptolemaeus, king of Egypt, to announce the defeat of Hannibal, thank the king for his fidelity to the Romans, and pray for his support if they should be compelled to go to war with Philippus, king of Macedonia.

The relationship of Nero to the other Claudii does not appear. He was censor B. C. 204, with M. Livius (Liv. xxix. 37).

3. C. CLAUDIUS NERO was praetor B. C. 181, and had the province of Sicily (Liv. xl. 18). He may be the son of No. 2.

4. APP. CLAUDIUS NERO was praetor B. C. 195 (Liv. xxxiii. 43), with Hispania Ulterior as his province. Nothing is recorded of his operations in Spain, and it is doubtful if he went there, for the fear of a Spanish war soon subsided. In B. C. 189, he was one of ten commissioners (legati) who were sent into Asia to settle affairs. (Liv. xxxvii. 55.)

5. TIB. CLAUDIUS NERO was praetor B. C. 204 (Liv. xxix. 11), and had Sardinia for his province. He may have been the son of No. 2. In B. C. 202 he was consul with M. Servilius Geminus (Liv. xxx. 26), and he obtained as his province Africa, where he was to have the command against Hannibal conjointly with P. Cornelius Scipio. But he was not present at the battle of Zama. A violent storm attacked his fleet soon after he set out, and he put in at Populonii. He thence passed on to Ilva (Elba), and to Corsica. In his passage to Sardinia his ships suffered still more, and he finally put into Carales (Cagliari) in Sardinia, where he was obliged to winter, and whence he returned to Rome in a private capacity, his year of office having expired. (Liv. xxx. 39.)

6. TIB. CLAUDIUS NERO, praetor, B. C. 178, had the Peregrina Jurisdictio, but he was sent to Pisae with a military command to take care of the province of M. Junius the consul, who was sent into Gallia to raise troops (Liv. xli. 98), and his command there was extended. (Liv. xli. 18.) In B. C. 172 he was sent on a mission into Asia. (Liv. xlii. 19.) Tib. Claudius was praetor again in B. C. 165, with Sicily for his province. (Liv. cxv. 16.)

7. TIB. CLAUDIUS NERO served under Cn. Pompeius Magnus in the war against the pirates, B. C. 67. (Florus iii. 6; Appian, Mithridat. 95.) He is probably the Tib. Nero mentioned by Sallust (Bell. Cat. 50) and by Appian (B. C. ii. 5), who recommended that the members of the conspiracy of Catiline, who had been seized, should be kept confined till Catiline was put down, and they knew the exact state of the facts.

8. TIB. CLAUDIUS NERO, the father of the emperor Tiberius, was probably the son of No. 7. He was a descendant of Tib. Nero [see above, No. 1], the son of App. Claudius Caecus. He served as quaestor under C. Julius Caesar (B. C. 48) in the Alexandrine war (B. Al. 25; Dion Cass. xlii. 40), and commanded a fleet which defeated the Egyptian fleet at the Canopic mouth of the Nile. He was rewarded for his services in Caesar's cause by being made a pontifex in the place of P. Cornelius Scipio, and was employed in establishing colonies in Gallia north of the Alps, among which Narbo (Narbonne) and Arelate (Arles) are mentioned; but the colony to Narbo was a supplementum, for it was settled A. D. 116. On the assassination of Caesar he went so far as to propose that the assassins should be rewarded. He was praetor probably in B. C. 42. On the quarrels breaking out among the triumviri he fled to Perusia and joined the consul L. Antonius, who was besieged there B. C. 41. In this year his eldest son Tiberius, the future emperor, was born: his mother was Livia Drusilla, the daughter of Livius Drusus. When Perusia surrendered in the following year, Nero effected his escape to Praeneste and thence to Naples, and after having made an unsuccessful attempt to arm the slaves by promising them their freedom, he passed over to Sext. Pompeius in Sicily (comp. Suet. Claud. 4, and Dion Cass. xlviii. 15). His wife and child, scarcely two years old, accompanied Nero in his flight. At Naples, while they were secretly trying to get a ship, they were nearly betrayed by the cries of the child. Nero, not liking the reception that he met with from Pompeius, passed over to M. Antonius in Achaea, and, on a reconciliation being effected between M. Antonius and Octavianus at the close of the year (B. C. 40), he returned with his wife to Rome. Livia, who possessed great beauty, excited the passion of Octavianus, to whom she was surrendered by her husband, being then six months gone with child of her second son Drusus. Nero gave Livia away as a father would his daughter (B. C. 38), but he must have formally divorced her first. The old and the new husband and the wife sat down together to the marriage entertainment. When Drusus was born, Caesar sent the boy to his father, for, being begotten during Nero's marriage with Livia, Nero was his lawful father. Caesar, who was a man of great method, made an entry in his memorandum-book, to the effect "that Caesar sent to Nero his father the child that was born of Livia his wife." (Dion Cass. xlviii. 44; Tacit. Annal. i. 10, v. 1.) Nero died shortly after, and left Caesar the tutor of his two sons. If Tiberius was born in B. C. 42 (see Clinton, Fasti, B. C. 42), Nero died in B. C. 34 or 33, for Tiberius, his son, pronounced his funeral oration in front of the Rostra, when he was nine years old. [G. L.]

NERO, Roman emperor, A. D. 54—68. The emperor Nero was the son of Cn. Domitius Ahenobarbus, and of Agrippina, daughter of Germanicus Caesar, and sister of Caligula. Nero's original name was L. Domitius Ahenobarbus, but after the marriage of his mother with her uncle, the emperor Claudius, he was adopted by Claudius A. D. 50, and was called Nero Claudius Caesar Drusus Germanicus. Claudius had a son, Britannicus, who was three or four years younger than Nero.

Nero was born at Antium, a favourite residence of many of the Roman families, on the coast of Latium on the 15th of December A. D. 37 (comp. Suet. Ner. c. 6, ed. Burmann; Tacit. Ann. xii. 25, ed. Oberlin, and the notes in both). Shortly after his adoption by Claudius, Nero being then sixteen years of age, married Octavia, the daughter of Claudius and Messallina. Among his early instructors was Seneca. Nero had some talent and taste. He was fond of the arts, and made verses; but he was indolent and given to pleasure, and had no inclination for laborious studies. His character, which was naturally weak, was made worse by his education; and when he was in the possession of power he showed what a man may become who has not been subjected to a severe discipline, and who in a private station might be no worse than others who are rich and idle.

On the death of Claudius, A. D. 54, Agrippina, who had always designed her son to succeed to the power of the Caesars, kept the emperor's death secret for a while. All at once the gates of the palace were opened, and Nero was presented to the guards by Afranius Burrhus, praefectus praetorio, who announced Nero to them as their master. Some of them, it is said, asked where was Britannicus; but there was no effort made to proclaim Britannicus, and Nero being carried to the praetorian camp, was saluted as imperator by the soldiers, and promised them the usual donation. The senate confirmed the decision of the soldiers, and the provinces quietly received Nero as the new emperor. (Tacit. Ann. xii. 69; Dion Cass. lxi. 1, &c.)

Nero showed at the commencement that he had not all the acquirements which the Romans had been accustomed to see in their emperors. His public addresses were written by Seneca, for Nero was deficient in one of the great accomplishments of a Roman, oratory. The beginning of his reign was no worse than might be expected in an ill-educated youth of seventeen; and the senate were allowed to make some regulations which were supposed to be useful (Tac. Ann. xiii. 4). The affairs of the East required attention. The Less Armenia was given to Aristobulus, a Jew, and son of Herodes, king of Chalcis. Sophene was given to Sohemus.

The follies and crimes of Nero were owing to his own feeble character and the temper of his mother. This ambitious woman wished to govern in the name of her son, and she received all the external marks of respect which were due to one who possessed sovereign power. Seneca and Burrhus exerted their influence with Nero to oppose her designs, and thus a contest commenced which must end in the destruction of Agrippina or her opponents. Nero began to indulge his licentious inclinations without restraint, and one of his boon companions was an accomplished debauchee, Otho, who afterwards held the imperial power for a few months. Nero assumed the consulship A. D. 55, with L. Antistius Vetus for his colleague. The jealousy between him and his mother soon broke out into a quarrel, and Agrippina threatened to join Britannicus and raise him to his father's place. Nero's fears drove him to commit a crime which at once stamped his character and took away all hopes of his future life. Britannicus, who was just going to complete his fourteenth year, was poisoned by the emperor's order, at an entertainment where Agrippina and Octavia were present. Nero showed his temper towards his mother by depriving her of her Roman and German guard; but an appearance of reconciliation was brought about by the bold demeanour of Agrippina against some of her accusers, whom Nero punished. (Tacit. Ann. xiii. 19—22.)

In A. D. 57 Nero was consul for the second time with L. Calpurnius Piso as his colleague, and in A. D. 58, for the third time with Valerius Messalla. Nero, who had always shown an aversion to his wife Octavia, was now captivated with the beauty of Poppaea Sabina, the wife of his companion Otho, a woman notorious for her dissolute conduct. Otho was got out of the way by being made governor of Lusitania, where he acquired some credit, and passed the ten remaining years of Nero's life.

The affairs of Armenia, which had been seized by the Parthians, occupied the Romans from the beginning of Nero's reign, and Domitius Corbulo was sent there to conduct the war. This vigorous commander re-established discipline among the troops. The chief struggle commenced A. D. 58, with Tiridates, who had been made king of Armenia by the Parthian king Vologeses, who was his brother. Corbulo was ambitious to make the Roman arms again triumphant in the countries in which L. Lucullus and Cn. Pompeius had once acquired military fame. After some attempt at negotiation, Corbulo prosecuted the war with great activity. He took and destroyed Artaxata, the capital of Armenia; and afterwards, marching to the town of Tigranocerta, which the Romans had formerly captured under Lucullus, he took this strong place also, or, according to other accounts, it surrendered like Artaxata (Tacit. Ann. xiii. 41, xiv. 24). The capture of Tigranocerta took place A. D. 60, and the Romans were now complete masters of Armenia. The affairs of the Rhenish frontier were tolerably quiet in the early part of Nero's reign. The Roman soldiers, under Paullinus Pompeius on the lower Rhine, were employed in finishing the embankments which Drusus had begun sixty-three years before for checking the waters of the river; and L. Vetus formed the noble design of uniting the Arar (Saone) and Moselle by a canal, and thus connecting the Mediterranean and the German Ocean by an uninterrupted water communication, through the Rhone and the Rhine. But the mean jealousy of Aelius Gracilis, the legatus of Belgica, frustrated this design.

Nero's passion for Poppaea was probably the immediate cause of his mother's death. Poppaea aspired to marry the emperor, but she had no hopes of succeeding in her design while Agrippina lived, and accordingly she used all her arts to urge Nero to remove out of the way a woman who kept him in tutelage and probably aimed at his ruin. That Agrippina might have attempted to destroy her son, or at least to give the imperial power to some new husband of her choice, is probable enough; and it is a significant fact, that we find her own head and that of Nero on the same face of a medal, and that at the beginning of his reign she was hardly prevented from assuming the discharge of the imperial functions (Tacit. Ann. xiii. 5). After an unsuccessful attempt to cause her death in a vessel near Baiae, she was assassinated by Nero's order (A. D. 59), with the approbation at least of Seneca and Burrhus, who saw that the time was come for the destruction either of the mother or the son (Tacit. Ann. xiv. 7). The death of Agrippina was communicated to the senate by a letter which Seneca drew up, and this servile body, with the exception of Thrasea Paetus, returned their congratulations to the emperor, who shortly after returned to Rome. But though he was well received, he felt the punishment of his guilty conscience, and said that he was haunted by his mother's spectre (Suet. Ner. 34). A great eclipse of the sun happened during the sacrifices which were made for the death of Agrippina, and there were other signs which superstition interpreted as tokens of the anger of the gods (Dion Cass. lxi. 16, ed. Reimarus, and the note). Nero drowned his reflections in fresh riot, in which he was encouraged by a band of flatterers. One of his great passions was chariot-driving, and he was ambitious to gain credit as a musician, and actually appeared as a performer on the theatre. At the same time his extravagance was exhausting the finances, and preparing the way for his ruin, though unfortunately it was still deferred for some years.

In A. D. 60, Nero was consul for the fourth time with C. Cornelius Lentulus for his colleague. There was a comet in this year, which then, as in more recent times, was considered to portend some great change. In this year Tigranes was settled as king of Armenia, and the Roman commander Corbulo, leaving some soldiers to protect him, retired to his province of Syria. The fear of Nero now induced him to urge Rubellius Plautus, who belonged to the family of the Caesars through his mother Julia, the daughter of Drusus, to leave Rome. Plautus was a man of good character, and Nero considered him a dangerous rival. He retired to Asia, where he was put to death two years after by Nero's order (Tacit. Ann. xiv. 22; Dion Cass. lxii. 14). In A. D. 61, the great rising in Britain under Boadicea took place, which was put down by the ability and vigour of the Roman commander Suetonius Paullinus.

The praetor Antistius was charged with writing scandalous verses against Nero, and he was tried under the law of majestas, and only saved by Thrasea from being condemned to death by the senate. Antistius was banished, and his property made public. Fabricius Veiento, who had written freely against the senate and the priests, was convicted and banished from Italy. His writings were ordered to be burnt, the consequence of which was they were eagerly sought after and read: when they were no longer forbidden they were soon forgotten, as Tacitus remarks (Ann. xiv. 49), and his remark has much practical wisdom in it. The death of Burrhus (A. D. 62) was a calamity to the state. Nero placed in command of the praetorian troops, Fennius Rufus and Sofonius Tigellinus: Rufus was an honest inactive man; Tigellinus was a villain, whose name has been rendered infamous by the crimes to which he urged his master, and those which he committed himself. Seneca, who saw his credit going, wisely asked leave to retire; and the philosopher, who could not approve of all Nero's excesses, though his own moral character is at least doubtful, left his old pupil to follow his own way and the counsels of the worst men in Rome.

Nero was now more at liberty. In order that he might marry Poppaea, he divorced his wife Octavia, on the alleged ground of sterility, and in eighteen days he married Poppaea. Not satisfied with putting away his wife, he was instigated by Poppaea to charge her with adultery, for which there was not the slightest ground, and she was banished to the little island of Pandataria, where she was shortly after put to death. According to Tacitus (Ann. xiv. 64) Octavia was only in her twentieth year; her unhappy life and her untimely death were the subject of general commiseration.

The affairs of Armenia (A. D. 62) were still in a troubled state, and the accounts of the historians of the period are not very clear. The Parthians again invaded Armenia, and Tiridates attempted to recover it from Tigranes. It seems to have been agreed between Vologeses and Corbulo that Tiridates should have Armenia, and that hostilities should cease. But the ambassadors whom Vologeses sent to Rome, returned without accomplishing the object of their mission, and the war against the Parthians in Armenia was renewed under L. Caesennius Paetus. But the incompetence of the general caused the ruin of the enterprise, and he was forced to sue for terms to Vologeses, and to consent to evacuate Armenia (Tacit. Ann. xv. 16 ; Dion Cass. lxii. 21). In the following year Corbulo came to terms with Tiridates, who did homage to the portrait of Nero in the presence of the Roman commander (Tacit. Ann. xv. 30), and promised that he would go to Rome, as soon as he could prepare for his journey, to ask the throne of Armenia from the Roman emperor. The town of Pompeii in Campania was nearly destroyed in this year by an earthquake. Poppaea gave birth at Antium to a daughter, who received the title of Augusta, which was also given to the mother. The joy of Nero was unbounded, but the child died before it was four months old.

The origin of the dreadful conflagration at Rome (A. D. 64) is uncertain. It is hardly credible that the city was fired by Nero's order, though Dion and Suetonius both attest the fact, but these writers are always ready to believe a scandalous tale. Tacitus (Ann. xv. 38) leaves the matter doubtful. The fire originated in that part of the circus which is contiguous to the Caelian and Palatine hills, and of the fourteen regiones of Rome three were totally destroyed, and in seven others only a few half-burnt houses remained. A prodigious quantity of property and valuable works of art were burnt, and many lives were lost. The emperor set about rebuilding the city on an improved plan, with wider streets, though it is doubtful if the salubrity of Rome was improved by widening the streets and making the houses lower, for there was less protection against the heat. Nero found money for his purposes by acts of oppression and violence, and even the temples were robbed of their wealth. With these means he began to erect his sumptuous golden palace, on a scale of magnitude and splendour which almost surpasses belief. The vestibule contained a colossal statue of himself one hundred and twenty feet high (Suet. Ner. c. 31 ; Martial, Spect. Ep. 2). The odium of the conflagration which the emperor could not remove from himself, he tried to throw on the Christians, who were then numerous in Rome, and many of them were put to a cruel death (Tacit. Ann. xv. 44, and the note of Lipsius).

The tyranny of Nero at last (A. D. 65) led to the organisation of a formidable conspiracy against him, which was discovered by Milichus, a freedman of Flavius Scevinus, a senator and one of the conspirators. The discovery was followed by many executions. C. Calpurnius Piso was put to death, and the poet Lucan, a vile flatterer of Nero (Pharsal. i. 33, &c.*), had the favour of being allowed to open his veins. Plautius Lateranus was hurried to death without having time allowed to embrace his children. It is not certain if Seneca was privy to the conspiracy: Dion, of course, says that he was. It is probable that some proposals might have been made to him by the conspirators, and it is probable that he declined to join them. However this may be, the time was come for Nero to get rid of his old master, and, with his counsellors Poppaea and Tigellinus near him, he sent Seneca orders to die. The philosopher opened his veins, and, after long suffering, he was taken into a bath or vapour room, which stifled him. It seems that Seneca died about the time when the conspiracy was discovered ; Lucan and others died after him. The senate was assembled, as if they were going to hear the results of a successful war, and Tigellinus was rewarded with the triumphal ornaments. (Tacit. Ann. xv. 72.)

The death of Poppaea came next. Her brutal husband, in a fit of passion, kicked her when she was with child, and she died of the blow. Her body was not burnt, but embalmed and placed in the sepulchre of the Julii. Nero now proposed to marry Antonia, the daughter of the emperor Claudius and his sister by adoption, but she refused the honour, and was consequently put to death. Nero, however, did marry Statilia Messallina, the widow of Vestinus, whom he put to death, because he had married Messallina, with whom Nero had cohabited.

The catalogue of the crimes of Nero makes the greater part of his life, but his crimes show the character of the man and of the times, and to what a state of abject degradation the Roman senate was reduced, for the senate was made the instrument of murder. The jurist C. Cassius Longinus was exiled to Sardinia. L. Junius Silanus Torquatus, a man of merit, L. Antistius Vetus, his mother-in-law Sextia, and his daughter Pollutia, the wife of Rubellius Plautus, were all sacrificed. Virtue in any form was the object of Nero's fear. For some reason or caprice the emperor gave a large sum, which we may assume was public money, to rebuild Lugdunum (Lyon), which had suffered by a fire ; and the town showed its gratitude, by espousing his cause when he was deserted by every body. The grant, however, was made some years after the conflagration.

In the reign of Nero (A. D. 66) Apollonius of Tyana visited Rome, and, though he was accused of magic, he had the good luck to escape. Nero now became jealous of the philosophers, and Musonius Rufus, a Roman eques and a stoic philosopher, was banished by the emperor. The fragment of the sixteenth book of the Annals of Tacitus concludes with the account of the death of Annaeus Mella, the father of Lucan, and C. Petronius, a man of pleasure, but probably not the author of the Satyrica. Nero, as Tacitus says (Ann. xvi. 21), now attacked virtue itself in the persons of Thrasea Paetus and Barea Soranus. The crime of Thrasea was his virtue: the charge against him was that he kept away from the senate, and by his absence condemned the proceedings of that body. The senate condemned him to die, but he had the choice of the mode of death, and he opened his veins. Soranus was rich, and that made part of his crime. He was condemned with his young daughter Servilia, who had without his knowledge consulted the fortune-tellers to know what would be her father's fate. (Tacit. Ann. xvi. 30, &c.) With the death of Thrasea, who, as the blood flowed from his veins, declared it to be a libation to Jupiter the Liberator, the fragment of the sixteenth book of Tacitus ends, and the fate of the despicable tyrant has not been transmitted to us in the words of the indignant historian, who himself is compelled to apologise for his tedious record of crimes and bloodshed. (Tacit. Ann. xvi. 16.)

The time chosen for the death of Thrasea and Soranus was that when Tiridates was preparing to make his entry into Rome. The Armenian king came by land to Rome with his wife and his children. The provinces that he passed through had to support the expense of his numerous train. He entered Italy from Illyricum, and was received by Nero at Naples, before whom he fell on his knees, and acknowledged him as his lord. Tiridates was conducted to Rome, where he humbled himself before Nero in the theatre, who gave him the crown of Armenia and permission to rebuild Artaxata (Dion Cass. lxiii. 6). Tiridates went home by way of Brundusium. Vologeses was invited to Rome by Nero to go through the same ceremony, but he declined the honour, and suggested that if Nero wished to see him he should come to Asia. (Dion Cass. lxiii. 7.)

Nero formed some plans for extending the empire, and various expeditions were talked of, but Nero was not a soldier: he had not even that Roman virtue. In the latter part of this year he visited Achaea with a great train, to show his skill to the Greeks as a musician and charioteer, and to receive the honours which were liberally bestowed upon him. While Nero was in Achaea, Cestius Gallus, the governor of Syria, sent him intelligence of his defeat by the Jews, who were in arms; on which Nero sent Vespasian, the future emperor, to carry on the war against them, and Mucianus to take the administration of Syria.

In the year A. D. 67 Nero was present at the Olympic games, which had been deferred from the year 65 in order that so distinguished a person might be present. To commemorate his visit he declared all Achaea to be free, which was publicly proclaimed at Corinth on the day of the celebration of the Isthmian games. But the Greeks paid dear for what they got, by the price of every thing being raised in consequence of Nero's visit; and they witnessed one of his acts of cruelty, in putting to death, at the Isthmian games, a singer whose voice drowned that of the imperial performer. (Lucian, Nero, vol. iii. p. 642, ed. Hemst.) Nero also paid a visit to Delphi, and got a kind of indirect promise of a long life; but other matters reported about this visit are somewhat confusedly told by different authorities. He also designed a canal across the Isthmus, which was commenced with great parade, and Nero himself first struck the ground with a golden spade. The works were carried on vigorously for a time, but were suspended by his own orders. While Nero was in Greece he summoned Corbulo there in an affectionate letter, but, on the old soldier arriving at Cenchreae, Nero sent orders to put him to death, which Corbulo anticipated by stabbing himself. Thus perished a man who had served the empire and the emperor faithfully, and whose military talent and integrity entitled him to the name of a genuine Roman. (Dion. lxiii. 17.)

Nero had left Helius a freedman in the administration of Rome, with full power to do as he pleased, which power he abused. Helius, foreseeing the mischief that was preparing for his master, wrote to request him to return to Rome, and finally he went to Greece to urge his departure. Nero left Greece probably in the autumn of A. D. 67. He entered Rome in triumph, as befitted an Olympic victor, through a breach made in the walls, riding in the car of Augustus, with a musician at his side; and he displayed the numerous crowns that he had received in his Grecian visit. Music, chariot driving, and the like amusements, occupied this foolish man until, as Tillemont naïvely remarks, the rising in Spain and Gaul gave him other occupation.

Silius Italicus, the poet, and Galerius Trachalus were consuls A. D. 68, the last year of Nero's life. The storm that had long been preparing broke out in Gaul, where Julius Vindex, the governor of Celtica, called the people together, and, pointing out their grievances, and pourtraying the despicable character of Nero, urged them to revolt. Vindex was soon at the head of a large army, and he wrote to Galba, who was governor of Hispania Tarraconensis, to offer his assistance in raising him to the imperial power. Galba at the same time learned that Nero had sent orders to put him to death, on which he made a public harangue against the crimes of Nero, and was proclaimed emperor; but he only assumed the title of legatus of the senate and the Roman people. Nero was at Naples when he heard of the rising in Gaul, which gave him little concern, and he went on with his ordinary amusements. At last he came to Rome, where he heard of the insurrection of Galba, which threw him into a violent fit of passion and alarm, but he had neither ability nor courage to organise any effectual means of resistance. The senate declared Galba an enemy of the state; and Nero, for some reason or other, deprived the two consuls of their office, and made himself sole consul. This was his fifth consulate. Possibly he had some vague idea of putting himself more distinctly at the head of affairs with the title of sole consul, which Cn. Pompeius had once enjoyed before him and C. Julius Caesar.

Verginius Rufus, governor in Upper Germany, a man of ability and integrity, was not favourable to the pretensions of Galba. Rufus first marched against Vindex, and was supported by those parts of Gaul which bordered on the Rhine; the town of Lyon, with others, declared against Vindex. Verginius laid siege to Vesontio (Besançon), and Vindex came to relieve it. The two generals had a conference, and appear to have come to some agreement; but, as Vindex was going to enter the town, the soldiers of Verginius, thinking that he was about to attack them, fell on the troops of Vindex. The whole affair is very confused; but the fact that Vindex perished, or killed himself, is certain. The soldiers now destroyed the statues of Nero, and proclaimed Verginius as Augustus; but he steadily refused the honour, and declared that he would submit to the orders of the senate. The death of Vindex discouraged Galba, who was beginning to lose all hopes, when he received intelligence from Rome that he was recognised as the successor of Nero.

A famine at Rome, and the exertion that Nero was making to raise money, hastened his ruin. Nymphidius Sabinus, who was now praefectus praetorio with Tigellinus, taking advantage of a rumour that Nero was going to fly to Egypt, persuaded the troops to proclaim Galba. Nero was immediately deserted. He escaped from the palace at night with a few freedmen, and made his way to a house about four miles from Rome, which belonged to Phaon, one of his freedmen, where he passed the night and part of the following day in a state of agonising terror. His hiding-place being known, a centurion with some soldiers was sent to seize him. Though a coward, Nero thought a voluntary death better than the indignities which he knew were preparing for him; and, after some irresolution, and with the aid of his secretary Epaphroditus, he gave himself a mortal wound when he heard the trampling of the horses on which his pursuers were mounted. The centurion on entering attempted to stop the flow of blood, but Nero saying, "It is too late. Is this your fidelity?" expired with a horrid stare.

The body of Nero received funeral honours suitable to his rank, and his ashes were placed in the sepulchre of the Domitii by two of his nurses and his concubine Acte, who had won Nero's affections from his wife Octavia at the beginning of his reign. (Tac. Ann. xiii. 12; Suet. Ner. 50.) Suetonius, after his manner, gives a description of Nero's person, which is not very flattering: the "cervix obesa" of Suetonius is a characteristic of Nero's bust. (Lib. of Entertaining Knowledge, Townley Gallery, vol. ii. p. 28.)

In his youth Nero was instructed in all the liberal knowledge of the time except philosophy; and he was turned from the study of the old Roman orators by his master Seneca. Accordingly, he applied himself to poetry, and Suetonius says that his verses were not made for him, as some suppose, for the biographer had seen and examined some of Nero's writing-tablets and small books, in which the writing was in his own hand, with many erasures and cancellings and interlineations. He had also skill in painting and modelling. Though profuse and fond of pomp and splendour, Nero had apparently some taste. The Apollo Belvedere and the Fighting Gladiator, as it is called, by Agasias, were found in the ruins of a villa at Antium, which is conjectured to have belonged to Nero. (See Thiersch, Ueber die Epochen der Bildenden Kunst, &c. p. 312, 2d ed.)

Nero's progress in crime is easily traced, and the lesson is worth reading. Without a good education, and with no talent for his high station, he was placed in a position of danger from the first. He was sensual, and fond of idle display, and then he became greedy of money to satisfy his expenses; he was timid, and by consequence he became cruel when he anticipated danger; and, like other murderers, his first crime, the poisoning of Britannicus, made him capable of another. But, contemptible and cruel as he was, there are many persons who, in the same situation, might run the same guilty career. He was only in his thirty-first year when he died, and he had held the supreme power for thirteen years and eight months. He was the last of the descendants of Julia, the sister of the dictator Caesar.

There were a few writers in the time of Nero who have been preserved—Persius the satirist, Lucan, the author of the Pharsalia, and Seneca, the preceptor of Nero. The jurists, C. Cassius Longinus, after whom the Sabiniani were sometimes called Cassiani, and Nerva, the father of the emperor Nerva, lived under Nero. (Tac. Ann. xiii.—xvi.; Suet. Ner.; Dion Cass. lxi.—lxiii. ed. Reimarus. All the authorities for the facts of Nero's life are collected by Tillemont, Histoire des Empereurs, vol. i.) [G. L.]

COIN OF THE EMPEROR NERO.

NERO, the eldest son of Germanicus and Agrippina, was a youth of about twelve years of age at the death of his father in A. D. 19. In the following year (A. D. 20) he was commended to the favour of the senate by the emperor Tiberius, who went through the form of requesting that body to allow Nero to become a candidate for the quaestorship five years before the legal age. He likewise had the dignity of pontiff conferred upon him, and about the same time was married to Julia, the daughter of Drusus, who was the son of the emperor Tiberius. Nero had been betrothed in the lifetime of his father to the daughter of Silanus (Tac. Ann. ii. 43), but it appears that this marriage never took effect. By the death of Drusus, the son of Tiberius, who was poisoned at the instigation of Sejanus in A. D. 23, Nero became the heir to the imperial throne; and as Sejanus had compassed the death of Drusus, in order that he might succeed Tiberius, the same motives led him to plan the death of Nero, as well as of his younger brother Drusus. And this he found no difficulty in accomplishing, as the jealous temper of Tiberius had already become alarmed at the marks of public favour which were exhibited to Nero and Drusus as the sons of Germanicus, and he had expressed his displeasure in the senate, in A. D. 24, at the public prayers which had been offered for their health. Spies were placed about Nero, and every word and action of the unhappy young prince were eagerly caught up, misinterpreted and misrepresented, and then reported to the emperor. His wife was also entirely in the interests of Sejanus, since her mother was the mistress of the all-powerful minister; and his brother Drusus, who was of an unamiable disposition, and who did not stand so high in the favour of their mother Agrippina, was readily induced to second the designs of Sejanus, in hopes that the death of Nero would secure him the succession to the throne. At length, in A. D. 29, Tiberius sent a letter to the senate in which he accused Agrippina and Nero in the bitterest terms, but was unable to convict them of any attempt at rebellion; the haughtiness of the former and the licentiousness of the latter were the chief crimes laid to their charge. The people, who loved Agrippina and hallowed the memory of Germanicus, surrounded the senate-house, exclaiming that the letter was a forgery. On the first day the senate came to no resolution on the matter, and Tiberius found it necessary to repeat his charges. The obsequious body dared no longer resist; and the fate of Agrippina and Nero was sealed. Nero was declared an enemy of the state, was removed to the island of Pontia, and shortly afterwards was there starved to death. According to some accounts he put an end to his own life, when the executioner appeared before him with the instruments of death. (Tac. Ann. iii. 29, iv. 8, 17, 59, 60, 67, v. 3, 4; Suet. Tib. 24; Cal. 7; Dion Cass. lviii. 8.) Respecting Drusus, the brother of Nero, see DRUSUS, No. 16, and respecting Julia, the wife of Nero, see JULIA, No. 9.

NERVA, ACU'TIUS, one of the consules suffecti in the reign of Trajan, A. D. 100. (Fasti; Plin. Ep. ii. 12.)

NERVA, COCCEIUS. 1. M. COCCEIUS NERVA, was consul with L. Gellius Poplicola, B. C. 36. (Dion Cass. xlviii. 54.) He is probably the Cocceius who brought about the reconciliation between M. Antonius and Caesar Octavianus, B. C. 40, though this Cocceius is called Lucius by Appian (B. C. v. 60, &c.); and also the Cocceius mentioned by Horace (Sat. i. 5. 28, &c.). He is sometimes considered to be the grandfather of the emperor Nerva, and consequently the same person who died in the time of Tiberius, A. D. 33, which is not possible.

2. M. COCCEIUS NERVA, who died A. D. 33, was probably the son of the consul of B. C. 36: he was the grandfather of the emperor Nerva. This Nerva was consul with C. Vibius Rufinus, A. D. 22: Tacitus (Ann. iv. 58) says that he had been consul. He was one of the intimate friends of Tiberius Caesar, who gave him the superintendence of the aqueducts of Rome (Frontinus, De Aquaeduct. ii.). Nerva accompanied Tiberius in his retirement from Rome A. D. 26. In the year A. D. 33, he resolutely starved himself to death, notwithstanding the intreaties of Tiberius, whose constant companion he was. Tacitus (Ann. vi. 26) and Dion Cassius (lviii. 21) give different reasons for this resolution of Nerva, but we may infer from both of them that Nerva was tired of his master. Tacitus says, that he was profoundly skilled in the law. He is often mentioned in the Digest (43. tit. 8. s. 2; 16. tit. 3. s. 32), and he wrote several legal works, but the title of no one of them is mentioned.

3. M. COCCEIUS NERVA, was the son of the jurist. He must have been a precocious youth, if we rightly understand Ulpian (Dig. 3. tit. i. s. 1), when he says that he gave responsa (publice de jure responsitasse) at the age of seventeen or a little more. He is probably the Cocceius Nerva mentioned by Tacitus (Ann. xv. 72) as Praetor Designatus. He wrote a work De Usucapionibus (Dig. 41. tit. 2. s. 47) as Papinian states; and he is often cited in the Digest under the name of Nerva Filius. Gaius (Instit. ii. 195, iii. 133) cites Nerva, without saying whether he means the father or the son. [G. L.]

NERVA, M. COCCEIUS, Roman emperor, A. D. 96—98, was born at Narnia, in Umbria (Aur. Vict. Epit. 12), as some interpret the words of Victor, or rather his family was from Narnia. His father was probably the jurist, No. 3. The time of his birth was A. D. 32, inasmuch as he died in January, A. D. 98, at the age of nearly sixty-six (Dion Cass. lxviii. 4). He was consul with Vespasian, A. D. 71, and with Domitian, A. D. 90. Tillemont supposes him to be the Nerva mentioned by Tacitus (Ann. xv. 72), but this Nerva is, perhaps, the father of the emperor.

Nerva was probably at Rome when Domitian was assassinated, and privy to the conspiracy, though Aurelius Victor (de Caes. 12) seems to intend to say that he was in Gaul, which is very improbable. His life was saved from the cruelty of Domitian by the emperor's superstition, who believed an astrologer's prediction that Nerva would soon die a natural death (Dion Cass. lxvii. 15). On the assassination of Domitian, in September, A. D. 96, Nerva was declared emperor at Rome by the people and the soldiers, and his administration at once restored tranquillity to the state. He stopped proceedings against those who, under the system of his predecessor, had been accused of treason (majestas), and allowed many exiled persons to return to Rome. The class of informers were suppressed by penalties (Plin. Panegyr. c. 35); some were put to death, among whom was the philosopher Sura; and, conformably to the old law, Nerva declared that slaves and freedmen should never be examined as witnesses against their masters or patrons when accused of a crime (Dion Cass. lxvii. 1). These measures were necessary to restore order and confidence after the suspicious and cruel administration of Domitian. But there was weakness in the character of Nerva, as appears from the following anecdote. He was entertaining Junius Mauricus and Fabius Veiento at table. Veiento had played the part of an accuser (delator) under Domitian. The conversation turned on Catullus Messallinus, who was then dead, but had been an infamous informer under Domitian. "What would this Catullus be doing," said Nerva, "if he were alive now;" to which Mauricus bluntly replied, "he would be supping with us" (Aur. Vict. Epit. 12).

The public events of his short reign were few and unimportant; and it is chiefly his measures of internal administration of which there are any records. Nerva attempted to relieve the poverty of many of the citizens by buying land and distributing it among them, one of the remedies for distress which the Romans had long tried, and with little advantage. The practice of occasionally distributing money among the poor citizens, and allowances of grain, still continued under Nerva, one of the parts of Roman administration which continually kept alive the misery for which it supplied temporary relief. He also diminished the expences of the state by stopping many of the public shows and festivals. Many enactments, by which we must understand Senatus consulta, were passed in his time, among which the prohibition against making eunuchs is worthy of notice; but Domitian had already made the same regulation in the beginning of his reign (Dion Cass. lxvii. 2), whence we must conclude that the law had either been repealed or required some stricter penalties to enforce it.

In the second year of his reign, Nerva was consul, for the third time, with L. Verginius Rufus, also for the third time consul. Rufus had been proclaimed emperor by the soldiers in the time of Nero, A. D. 68, but had refused the dangerous honour. The emperor made no difficulty about associating Rufus with himself in the consulship, but Rufus was a very old man, and soon died. Calpurnius Crassus, a descendant of the Crassi of the republic, with others, conspired against the emperor, but the plot was discovered, and Nerva rebuked the conspirators by putting into their hands at a show of gladiators, the swords with which the men were going to fight, and asking the conspirators, in the usual way, if they were sharp enough. This anecdote, if true, shows that the exhibitions of gladiators were in use under Nerva. The text of Dion does not state what was the punishment of Crassus, but Victor (Epit. 12) says that Crassus was relegated with his wife to Tarentum, and that the senate blamed the emperor for his leniency; but Nerva had sworn at the commencement of his reign that he would put no senator to death, and he kept his word.

The feebleness of the emperor was shown by a mutiny of the Praetorian soldiers, who were either urged on by their Praefectus, Aelianus Casperius, or had bribed him to support them. The soldiers demanded the punishment of the assassins of Domitian, which the emperor refused. Though his body was feeble, his will was strong, and he offered them his own neck, and declared his readiness to die. However, it appears that the soldiers effected their purpose, and Nerva was obliged to put Petronius Secundus and Parthenius to death, or to permit them to be massacred by the soldiers (Plin. Panegyr. c. 6; Aur. Vict. Epit. 12; Dion Cass. lviii. 3). Casperius, it is said, carried his insolence so far as to compel the emperor to thank the soldiers for what they had done.

Nerva felt his weakness, but he showed his noble character and his good sense by appointing as his successor a man who possessed both vigour and ability to direct public affairs. He adopted as his son and successor, without any regard to his own kin, M. Ulpius Trajanus, who was then at the head of an army in Germany, and probably on the Lower Rhine. It was about this time that news arrived of a victory in Pannonia, which is commemorated by a medal, and it was apparently on this occasion that Nerva assumed the title of Germanicus. He conferred on Trajan the title of Caesar and Germanicus, and the tribunitian power. Trajan was thus associated with Nerva in the government, and tranquillity was restored at Rome. In the year A. D. 98, Nerva and Trajan were consuls. The emperor died suddenly on the 27th of January, in the sixty-third year of his age, according to Victor; but according to Dion, at the age of sixty-five years, ten months and ten days. Eutropius incorrectly states that he was seventy-one. Victor records an eclipse of the sun on the day of Nerva's death, but the eclipse happened on the 21st of March, A. D. 98.

The body of Nerva was carried to the pile on the shoulders of the senators, as that of Augustus had been, and his remains were placed in the sepulchre of Augustus. Nerva received the honour of deification. (The authorities for the reign of Nerva are contained in Tillemont, Histoire des Empereurs, vol. ii., who has made some use of the doubtful authority of the Life of Apollonius by Philostratus; Dion Cass. lib. lxviii. with the notes of Reimarus; Aurelius Victor. ed. Arntzenius; and C. Plinius, Panegyricus, ed. Schaefer.) [G. L.]

COIN OF THE EMPEROR NERVA.

NERVA, LICI'NIUS. 1. C. Licinius Nerva, a son of C. Licinius Nerva, of whom nothing is known. Nerva the son was one of the legati who, in B. C. 168, brought the news to Rome of the defeat of the Illyrian army, and the capture of Gentius, and the conquest of Illyricum. In B. C. 167, he was one of the six praetors, with the province of Hispania Ulterior. Drumann concludes that he did not go to his province, because at the close of B. C. 167 he was one of the commissioners appointed to carry back the Thracian hostages, which reason is not quite conclusive. (Liv. xlv. 3, 16, 42.)

2. A. Licinius Nerva is called the brother of Caius by Drumann, which is possible, but no proof is alleged. He was a tribunus plebis, B. C. 178, and he proposed that the consul, A. Manlius Vulso, should not hold his command among the Istri beyond a certain day, the object of the tribune being to bring Manlius to trial for misconducting the war. (Liv. xli. 10.) In B. C. 171 Nerva was one of three commissioners sent to Crete to get archers for the army of the consul P. Licinius Crassus, and in B. C. 169 he was sent with others into Macedonia to examine and report on the state of the Roman army there, and the resources of king Perseus. In B. C. 166, he was a praetor, with one of the Hispaniae as his province. (Liv. xlii. 35, xliv. 18, xlv. 44.)

3. A. Licinius Nerva, probably the son of the praetor of B. C. 166. According to Drumann he was praetor in B. C. 143, and in B. C. 142 governor of Macedonia, when his quaestor, L. Tremellius, defeated a Pseudoperseus, or a Pseudophilippus, for there seems some uncertainty about the name, and a body of 16,000 men in arms. Nerva received on this occasion the title of imperator. (Liv. Epit. 53; Eutrop. iv. 15.)

4. C. Licinius Nerva. His precise relationship to the preceding is unknown. He is mentioned by Cicero (Brut. 34), and contrasted with L. Bestia, whence Meyer concludes that he may have been Bestia's colleague in the tribuneship. Cicero calls him a bad man, but not without some eloquence.

5. Licinius Nerva, is known only from the coins as a quaestor of Decimus Brutus, in the war before Mutina. (Drumann, Geschichte Roms, vol. iv. p. 19, No. 85.)

6. P. Licinius Nerva, in B. C. 103, was propraetor in Sicily at the time when the second Servile War broke out. The senate had made a decree that no free person of those nations which had alliance and friendship with Rome should be enslaved, and it was alleged that the Publicani had seized and sold many as slaves, probably because they did not pay the taxes. Nerva published an edict that all persons in Sicily who were entitled to the benefit of the decree should come to Syracuse to make out their case. Above eight hundred persons thus recovered their freedom, but those who held persons in slavery, fearing that the matter would go further, prevailed on Nerva not to allow any further claims of freedom to be made, to which he assented, and a rising of the slaves was the consequence. This war lasted four years, and was ended by the proconsul Aquillius. The history of this rising is told circumstantially by Diodorus (xxxvi.; Excerpts by Photius, Cod. 244). The praetor by treachery gained some advantage over the slaves, and the Roman troops after this success retired to their quarters. But the disturbance soon broke out, and it assumed the form of a regular war under Athenion. L. Licinius Lucullus, the father of Lucullus, the vanquisher of Mithridates, was sent in B. C. 102 to succeed Nerva in the government of Sicily.

7. A. LICINIUS NERVA SILIANUS, was adopted by some Licinius Nerva, as the name Silianus shows, out of the Silia gens. He was the son of P. Silius (Vell. Pat. ii. 116), a distinguished commander under Augustus, and consul, B. C. 20, with M. Appuleius. Silianus was consul, A. D. 7, but he is called Licinius Silanus in the text of Dion Cassius (lv. 30). P. Silius, the consul of B. C. 20, appears in the Fasti Consulares as P. Silius Nerva, whence it appears that the cognomen Nerva belonged to the Silii. [SILIUS.]

The authorities for the Licinii Nervae are collected by Drumann, Geschichte Roms, vol. iv. p. 196, &c. [G. L.]

NERVA, SI'LIUS. [NERVA, LICINIUS, No. 7, and SILIUS.]

NERVA TRAJA'NUS. [TRAJANUS.]

NERULI'NUS, the son of P. Suillius, one of the chief instruments of the tyranny of Claudius, escaped accusation when his father was tried and condemned at the beginning of Nero's reign, A. D. 59, because the emperor thought that sufficient punishment had been inflicted on the family (Tac. Ann. xiii. 43). On the coins of Smyrna, struck in the time of Vespasian, we find the name of M. Suillius Nerulinus, proconsul (Eckhel, vol. ii. p. 556), and it is not improbable that this is the same person as the Nerulinus mentioned above. He may also be the same as the M. Suillius who was consul with L. Antistius, in the reign of Claudius, A. D. 50. (Tac. Ann. xii. 50.)

NESAIA (Νησαία), a daughter of Nerus and Doris, and one of the Nereides. (Hom. Il. xviii. 40; Hes. Theog. 249.) [L. S.]

NESEAS, painter. [ZEUXIS.]

NESIO'TES, a sculptor, appears to have been an assistant of the celebrated Athenian artist Critias, and not a surname of the latter, as some modern writers have conjectured. [CRITIAS, Vol. I. p. 893.]

NESO (Νησώ), one of the Nereides (Hes. Theog. 261); but Lycophron (1468) mentions one Neso as the mother of the Cumaean sibyl. [L. S.]

NESSUS (Νέσσος). 1. The god of the river Nestus (also called Nessus or Nesus) in Thrace, is described as a son of Oceanus and Thetys. (Hes. Theog. 341.)

2. A centaur, who carried Deianeira across the river Evenus, but, wishing to run away with her, he was shot by Heracles with a poisoned arrow, which afterwards became the cause of Heracles' own death. (Soph. Trach. 558; Apollod. ii. 7. § 4; comp. HERACLES.) [L. S.]

NESSUS, a painter, was the son of Habron, who was also a painter. [HABRON.]

NESTOR (Νέστωρ), a son of Neleus and Chloris of Pylos in Triphylia, and husband of Eurydice (or, according to others, of Anaxibia, the daughter of Cratieus), by whom he became the father of Peisidice, Polycaste, Perseus, Stratius, Aretus, Echephron, Peisistratus, Antilochus, and Thrasymedes. (Hom. Od. iii. 413, &c., 452, 464, xi. 285, &c.; Apollod. i. 9. § 9.) With regard to Anaxibia having been his wife, we are informed by Eustathius (ad Hom. p. 296), that after the death of Eurydice, Nestor married Anaxibia, the daughter of Atreus, and sister of Agamemnon; but this Anaxibia is elsewhere described as the wife of Strophius, and the mother of Pylades. (Paus. ii. 29. § 4.) When Heracles invaded the country of Neleus, and slew his sons, Nestor alone was spared, because at the time he was not at Pylos, but among the Gerenians, where he had taken refuge. (Hom. Il. xi. 692; Apollod. ii. 7. § 3; Paus. iii. 26. § 6.) This story is connected with another about the friendship between Heracles and Nestor, for the latter is said to have taken no part in the carrying off from Heracles the oxen of Geryones; and Heracles rewarded Nestor by giving to him Messene, and became more attached to him even than to Hylas and Abderus. Nestor, on the other hand, is said to have introduced the custom of swearing by Heracles. (Philostr. Her. 2; comp. Ov. Met. xii. 540, &c.; Paus. iv. 3. § 1, who states that Nestor inhabited Messenia after the death of the sons of Aphareus.) When a young man, Nestor was distinguished as a warrior, and, in a war with the Arcadians, he slew Ereuthalion. (Hom. Il. iv. 319, vii. 133, &c., xxiii. 630, &c.) In the war with the Eleians, he killed Itymoneus, and took from them large flocks of cattle. (xi. 670.) When, after this, the Eleians laid siege to Thryoëssa, Nestor, without the warsteeds of his father, went out on foot, and gained a glorious victory. (xi. 706, &c.) He also took part in the fight of the Lapithae against the Centaurs (i. 260, &c.), and is mentioned among the Calydonian hunters and the Argonauts (Ov. Met. viii. 313; Val. Flacc. i. 380); but he owes his fame chiefly to the Homeric poems, in which his share in the Trojan war is immortalized. After having, in conjunction with Odysseus, prevailed upon Achilles and Patroclus to join the Greeks against Troy, he sailed with his Pylians in sixty ships to Asia. (Il. ii. 591, &c., xi. 767.) At Troy he took part in all the most important events that occurred, both in the council and in the field of battle. Agamemnon through Nestor became reconciled with Achilles, and therefore honoured him highly; and whenever he was in any difficulty, he applied for advice to Nestor. (ii. 21, x. 18.) In the picture which Homer draws of him, the most striking features are his wisdom, justice, bravery, knowledge of war, his eloquence, and his old age. (Od. iii. 126, &c., 244, xxiv. 52, Il. i. 273, ii. 336, 361, 370, &c., vii. 325, ix. 104, x. 18, xi. 627.) He is said to have ruled over three generations of men, so that his advice and authority were deemed equal to that of the immortal gods. (Od. iii. 245, Il. i. 250; comp. Hygin. Fab. 10.) In this sense we have also to understand the tria saecula, which he is said by Latin writers to have ruled. (Gellius, xix. 7; Cic. De Senect. 10; Horat. Carm. ii. 9. 13; Ov. Met. xii. 158.) But, notwithstanding his advanced age, he was brave and bold in battle, and distinguished above all others for drawing up horses and men in battle array. After the fall of Troy he, together with Menelaus and Diomedes, returned home, and safely arrived in Pylos (Od. iii. 165, &c.), where Zeus granted to him the full enjoyment of old age, surrounded by intelligent and brave sons. (Od. iv. 209, &c.) In this condition he was found by Telemachus, who visited him to inquire after his father, and was hospitably received by him. The town of Pylos in Messenia claimed to be the city of Nestor; and, when Pausanias visited it, the people showed to him the house in which Nestor was believed to have lived. (Paus. iv. 3. § 4, 36. § 2.) In the temple of Messene at Messene he was represented in a painting with two of his sons, and he was also seen in the painting of Polygnotus in the Lesche at Delphi. (Paus. iv. 31. § 9, x. 25, in fin.; Philostr. Her. 2.) [L. S.]

NESTOR (Νέστωρ). 1. Of Laranda in Lycia according to Suidas, in Lycaonia according to Strabo and Stephanus Byzantinus. He lived in the reign of the emperor Severus, between A. D. 194 and 211. He is mentioned by Suidas (s. v.) as an epic poet. We infer from Stephanus Byzantinus (s. v. Ὑστάσπαι) that he wrote a poem called Ἀλεξανδρείας, "On the deeds of Alexander," to which Suidas probably refers. Suidas also mentions that he was the father of the poet Peisander. Tryphiodorus, as we learn from Eustathius in the prooemium to the Odyssey, wrote an Odyssey λειπογράμματον, wanting the letter σ throughout. Similarly, Nestor, we learn from Suidas, wrote the Iliad, omitting in each book the letter indicating its number, as in the first book, the letter α, in the second, the letter β, and so on with the rest. He wrote also a poem entitled Μεταμορφώσεις. Four fragments of his writings are inserted in the Anthologia Graeca (vol. iii. p. 54, ed. Jacobs). The fourth of these epigrams has point, and rebukes men for attempting poetry who are unskilled in the art. The last line has passed into the proverb of Erasmus, Equitandi peritus ne canas. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. i. pp. 134, 517, iii. p. 46, iv. p. 483; Jacobs, Anth. Graec. vol. iii. p. 54, vol. xiii. p. 921; Suid. Steph. ll. cc.)

2. A stoical philosopher of Tarsus. (Strab. xiv. p. 674.)

3. An academic philosopher, preceptor of Marcellus, son of Octavia. Marcellus died B. C. 23. (Strab. lib. xiv. p. 675; Clinton, F. H. vol. iii. pp. 237, 548.) [W. M. G.]

NESTO'RIDES (Νεστορίδης), a patronymic employed to designate Antilochus, the son of Nestor (Hom. Il. vi. 33, xv. 589, xxiii. 353), and Peisistratus, also the son of Nestor (Od. iii. 36, 482, &c.). [L. S.]

NESTO'RIUS, a celebrated Haeresiarch of the fifth century, was born, according to Socrates (H. E. vii. 29), and Theodoret (Haeret. Fabul. Compend. iv. 12), at Germanicia, a city in the northern extremity of Syria, amid the offshoots of the Taurus. Marcellinus (Chronicon) speaks of him as a native of Antioch, and Cassian is understood by some to say (De Incarnat. vi. 3) that he was baptized at Antioch; but the passage in Cassian is obscure, and the statement of Socrates is preferable to that of Marcellinus. He was apparently of humble birth. Cyril (Homil. iv. de Divers. p. 357; Opera, vol. v. pt. ii. ed. Paris, 1638), speaks of him as being "lifted out of the dunghill," a reference apparently to Ps. cxiii. 7, and raised to the height of heaven: language which could be applied only to one of obscure origin, even by so unscrupulous a person as Cyril. Theodoret (ibid.), who was disposed to the opinions of Nestorius, and who cannot be suspected of any personal ill-will to him, states that he could not discover either the place of his education or the extent of his acquirements; and the silence of Socrates as to his possessing any other qualifications for the patriarchate, than a good voice and a fluent utterance (εὔφωνος δὲ ἄλλως καὶ εὔλαλος), indicates that his early education was as defective as his birth was obscure. After various changes of residence, he fixed his abode at Antioch, and having received here some instruction, was ordained presbyter. He at once set himself to gain popularity, and succeeded: his fluency as a preacher attracted admiration; and his staid deportment, sober garb, and studious habits excited reverence. So great and general was the respect entertained for him, that when he was appointed patriarch of Constantinople, the appointment was hailed with general approval. He was consecrated 10th April 428, according to the authority of Socrates. Liberatus places his consecration on the 1st of April (Breviar. cap. 4) which Le Quien (Oriens Christian., vol. i. col. 215) observes to be more consistent with the usage of the Constantinopolitan Church, as it coincided that year with Sunday, on which day the patriarchs were usually consecrated. Theophanes places the appointment of Nestorius in A. M. 5923, Alex. era, which corresponds with A. D. 430 or 431; but his chronology is by no means accurate in this part of his work. Nestorius was consecrated rather more than three months after the death of his predecessor Sisinnius.

He gave immediately on his appointment an indication of the violent and intolerant course which he afterwards pursued. He thus publicly addressed the emperor Theodosius the Younger (Socrat. H. E. vii. 29): "Purge the earth, sire, of heretics for me, and I will in return bestow heaven on you. Join me in putting away the heretics, and I will join you in putting away the Persians." The bigotry of some was pleased with the declaration, but wiser auditors listened with sorrow to the proof which it gave of his violent and boastful temper. His deeds were answerable to his words. The Arians had a house of prayer, in which they privately met for worship: on the fifth day from his ordination he attempted to destroy it; but its persecuted occupants chose rather to set it on fire themselves; and when the spreading conflagration had excited a tumult, they prepared, says Socrates (ibid.), but without stating in what way, to revenge the injury. The Novatians [NOVATIANUS] and the Quartadecimans of Asia were also persecuted by him; the former, according to Socrates (ibid.), from his envy of the reputation of Paulus their bishop; the latter, so far as appears, from mere intolerance. These persecutions led to tumults both at Miletus and Sardis, in which many persons lost their lives. The followers of Macedonius, too, [MACEDONIUS, No. 3], were goaded by persecution into outrage, and this was made the occasion of further oppression.

But while he was thus persecuting others, he was raising up enemies against himself by enunciating doctrines at variance, at least in appearance, with the orthodox views and tendencies of the age. He had brought with him from Antioch Anastasius, also a presbyter of that city, and in his administration of the patriarchate made him his confidential adviser. Theophanes calls him his Syncellus, or personal attendant. Both Nestorius and Anastasius appear to have imbibed the disposition prevalent at Antioch, to distinguish carefully between the divine and human natures attributed to Christ, a disposition promoted by the reaction occasioned by the opposite opinion of the Apollinarists. [APOLLINARIS, No. 2]. With these tendencies Nestorius of course disapproved of the practice of some persons at Constantinople who called the Virgin Mary Θεοτόκος, "Mother of God." Against the expression Anastasius objected in a public discourse, which, according to Theo-phanes, Nestorius himself had prepared, and intrusted him to deliver. "Let no one," said the preacher, "call Mary 'the mother of God;' for Mary was a human being; and that God should be born of a human being is impossible." Eusebius, then a Scholasticus or pleader at Constantinople, afterward bishop of Dorylaeum, was, according to Theophanes, the first to catch at the obnoxious objection [EUSEBIUS of DORYLAEUM]; and many both of the clergy and laity were scandalized by it. Nestorius, of course, supported Anastasius; and by continually insisting on the subject in dispute, and reiterating the objection to the term Θεοτόκος, aggravated the quarrel. As might be expected, his adversaries were too much inflamed to judge him fairly. Instead of recognizing his true object, which was to guard against confounding the two natures of Christ, many of them charged him with reviving the dogma of Photinus and Paul of Samosata [PAULUS SAMOSATENUS; PHOTINUS], that Christ was ψιλὸς ἄνθρωπος, "a mere man." Some of his own clergy preached against the heresy of their bishop, others attempted to catechize him on the alleged unsoundness of his faith. The violence and arrogance of Nestorius could not brook this: the preachers were silenced, the catechizers cruelly beaten and imprisoned: a monk who opposed his entrance into the church, was whipped and exiled; and many of the populace, for crying out that they had an emperor but not a bishop, were also punished with lashes. (Basil. diaconi Supplicatio, apud Concil. vol. i. col. 1335, &c. ed. Hardouin.). Proclus, titular bishop of Cyzicus, himself afterwards a competitor for the patriarchate of Constantinople, preaching in the great church at the command, and in the presence of Nestorius, asserted the propriety of giving the title Θεοτόκος to the Virgin. The audience applauded, and Nestorius rose and delivered a discourse in reply to Proclus, the substance of which is preserved in a Latin translation by Marius Mercator (Opera, vol. ii. p. 26, ed. Garnier, p. 70, ed. Baluze; and apud Galland. Biblioth. Patrum, vol. viii. p. 633) [MERCATOR]. The conflict became hotter. Dorotheus bishop of Marcianopolis, an ultra Nestorian [DOROTHEUS, No. 5], pronounced a public anathema in the church of Constantinople against all who applied the word Θεοτοκός to the Virgin. The audience raised a great outcry and left the church; and abbots and monks, priests and laymen, withdrew from communion with the patriarch, who countenanced Dorotheus (Cyril. Epistolae, 6, 9, pp. 30, 37; Opera, vol. v. pars ii.). Nestorius, no wise daunted by this mark of public opinion, assembled a council of those who adhered to him, and deposed priests and deacons, and even bishops of the opposite party, on a charge of Manicheism.

As might be expected, the struggle had meanwhile extended beyond the church and patriarchate of Constantinople. Pope Coelestine I. of Rome, and the haughty and violent patriarch Cyril of Alexandria embraced the opposite side to Nestorius. [COELESTINUS; ST. CYRILLUS of ALEXANDRIA.] Cyril assembled a council of the Egyptian bishops at Alexandria; and addressed synodal letters, one to Nestorius, setting forth the faith which the Egyptians regarded as orthodox, and concluding with twelve anathemas against the presumed errors of Nestorius; another to the recusants at Constantinople, clerical and lay, animating them in their resistance to their heretical bishop; and a third of similar tenour to the monks of that city. Nestorius was not slow to retort on his adversary the same number of anathemas. Coelestine, not satisfied with the doctrinal statements sent him by Nestorius, wrote to him (A. D. 430), threatening him with deposition and excommunication from the whole Catholic church within ten days, unless he expressed his accordance with the faith of the churches of Rome and Alexandria. He also wrote to the recusants to encourage them, and likewise to John, patriarch of Antioch [JOANNES, No. 9], to inform him of the sentence of deposition and excommunication pronounced against Nestorius. John wrote to Nestorius, inviting him to withdraw his opposition to the term Θεοτόκος, but manifesting a very different temper from Cyril and Coelestine. Nestorius, in his reply, which is extant in a Latin version, vindicated his opposition to the word, affirming that he had, on his first arrival at Constantinople, found the church divided on the subject, some calling the Virgin "Mother of God," others "Mother of Man;" and that he, to reconcile all, if possible, had proposed to call her "Mother of Christ" (Epistol. Nestorii ad Joan. apud Concil. vol. i. col. 1331; comp. Evagr. H. E. i. 7). The expedient was unobjectionable; but the violence of its proposer would have prevented peace, even had the temper of the factions and the times been more peace-loving and moderate.

A general council was now inevitable; and an edict of the emperors Theodosius and Valentinian III. appointed it to be held at Ephesus. Nestorius, prompt and fearless, arrived with a crowd of followers soon after Easter (A. D. 431). Cyril, who, beside his own dignity, was appointed temporarily to represent Coelestine, arrived about Pentecost: and the session of the council commenced, although John of Antioch, and the bishops of his patriarchate had not yet arrived. Cyril and Nestorius had a sharp encounter, Cyril seeking by terror to break the resolution of his opponent, Nestorius undauntedly replying, and then withdrawing with the bishops of his party, declaring that he would not return to the council until the arrival of John and the Eastern bishops. Cyril and his party refused to wait; and having sent to warn Nestorius to attend, and their messengers having been refused admittance, they proceeded in his absence (22d June) to try him, and depose him. A very few days afterward John and his fellow-prelates of the East arrived; and being indignant at the indecent haste and manifest injustice of Cyril and his party, and being countenanced by Candidianus, Comes Domesticorum, who was present by the emperor's order, formed themselves into a council, at which, however, Nestorius was not present, and imitating the very conduct which they blamed, deposed Cyril himself, and Memnon, bishop of Ephesus, one of his chief supporters. Cyril, supported by Juvenal, bishop of Jerusalem, retorted by deposing John; and the general council, instead of healing, seemed likely to extend the breach. The whole church was threatened with disruption. Tumults and conflicts ensued; and John, Comes Largitionum, found it needful to place Nestorius, Cyril, and Memnon under surveillance. Nestorius appealed to the emperors; the party of Cyril did the same, as also did John and the Oriental bishops. It is needless here to relate all the perplexed particulars of the sub sequent history. The deposition of Nestorius was ultimately confirmed, though he at last agreed for peace' sake to withdraw his objection to the word Θεοτόκος: many of the bishops of his party deserted him at once; and although John of Antioch and a number of the Eastern bishops held out for a time, ultimately John and Cyril were reconciled, and both retained their sees.

But the deposition of Nestorius, and the reconciliation of John and Cyril, neither suppressed the opinions of Nestorius, nor healed the dissensions which they had occasioned. Other teachers arose, who held and taught the same views, and diffused them among the Christians of the East, within and beyond the frontier of the empire toward Persia. The Nestorian communities, as they have continued to be called by their opponents, separated from the communion of the orthodox church, and were, doubtless for political reasons, patronized by some of the Persian kings [BARSUMAS]: and the Mahometan conquests in the seventh century, by the overthrow of the orthodox supremacy, gave scope to the spread of the Nestorians. Under the denomination of Chaldaean Christians, which is the designation they gave themselves, they still exist and are numerous in the East, having their own hierarchy of patriarchs, bishops, and inferior clergy; and retaining their characteristic tendency to distinguish carefully between the two natures of Christ, and their objection to the title "Mother of God."

After a vain attempt of Nestorius to gain the support of Scholasticus, one of the eunuchs about the court, he was ordered to retire to the monastery, apparently that of Euprepius, in the suburbs of Antioch, in which he had dwelt before his election to the patriarchate. Here he remained four years, being treated, according to his own statement (apud Evagr. H. E. i. 7), with kindness and respect. As, however, he persisted in maintaining his opinions, or as his opponents called it, his blasphemy, he was sentenced to perpetual banishment in the Greater Oasis in Upper Egypt, probably in A. D. 435; at the instigation of his former supporter, John of Antioch [JOANNES, No. 9], who was aggravated by his persistence, and by that of a few of the bishops who adhered to him. [MELETIUS, No. 7.] In this remote and painful exile, his spirit remained unbroken. He wrote a work, addressed to some Egyptian, on the subject of his wrongs, and addressed various memorials to the governor of the Thebaid. After an interval of uncertain length, he was carried off by the Blemmyes, who ravaged the Oasis with fire and sword: their compassion, however, released him, and he returned to the Thebaid. But the vindictiveness of his enemies was not satisfied: he was harshly hurried from one place of confinement to another, and at last died miserably from the effects of a fall. The story of his dying from some disease, in which his tongue was eaten by worms, which Evagrius had read in a certain work, was probably an invention springing from the mistaken notion that, in the retributive judgment of God, the member which had sinned should bear the punishment. The time of his death is not settled: he was living in A. D. 439, when Socrates wrote his history (Socrat. H. E. vii. 34), and probably died before A. D. 450. His death did not abate the bitterness of his enemies; Evagrius records, with apparent satisfaction (H. E. i. 7, ad fin.), that he passed from the sufferings of this world to sharper and more enduring woe in the world to come.

It is impossible either to deny or justify the violent treatment of Nestorius by the council of Ephesus. Neither can we, without compassion, read his touching appeal to his persecutors (apud Evagr. ibid.), that his past sufferings might be counted sufficient. But our compassion is materially checked by the consideration that he reaped as he had sown; and that there is little reason to think that success would have been more mildly used by him and his partizans, had they been victorious.

Gennadius (De Viris Illustribus, c. 53) mentions only one work of Nestorius, which he describes as being "quasi de Incarnatione Domini," and adds that the Haeresiarch supported his opinion by perverting sixty-two places of Scripture. The work has perished, except that some passages, cited from the writings of Nestorius by Cyril of Alexandria, in his Adversus Nestorii Blasphemias Contradictionum, Libri V. [CYRILLUS ST. of ALEXANDRIA] are thought to be from it. Nestorius, however, produced other works beside that mentioned by Gennadius. Of his Homiliae, thirteen are preserved in the works of Marius Mercator [MERCATOR], vol. ii. in the edition of Garnier, who has diligently collected from the Concilia and the works of Cyril various fragments in Greek of the original homilies, and of the other writings of Nestorius. Several of his Epistolae are preserved, some in Greek in the Concilia, others in a Latin version in the Concilia, or in the works of Mercator. His Anathematismi duodecim, in reply to Cyril, are contained, in a Latin version, in the Concilia. Alii duodecim Anathematismi are extant in a Syriac version, and were published, with a Latin version, from the Syriac, in the Bibliotheca Orientalis of Assemani, vol. iii. pars ii. p. 199. Nestorius, also, wrote a history of his disputes with his opponents, which he appears to have entitled "the Tragedy;" and which is probably the work mentioned by Evagrius (H. E. i. 7), as addressed, in the form of a dialogue, to a certain Egyptian. It is mentioned by Ebedjesu the Syrian, in a catalogue of works ascribed to Nestorius. Of the Liber Heraclidis, mentioned also by Ebedjesu, nothing seems to be known. A Syriac Liturgy, ascribed to Nestorius, is mentioned by Ebedjesu, and is extant. It was published in the original, with several similar works at Rome A. D. 1592; and is given in a Latin version in the Liturgiae Orientales of Eusebius Renaudot, vol. ii. p. 626. 4to. Paris, 1716. A memorial of Nestorius, on his sufferings, is also cited by Evagrius (H. E. i. 7).

The following works are conjecturally ascribed to him: — 1. Two Homiliae De Resurrectione et Ascensione Christi, which Combéfis, in his Auctarium Novum, had ascribed to Athanasius. 2. An Epistle, written before the council of Chalcedon, from a Syriac version of which Assemani gives two extracts in his Bibliotheca Orientalis, vol. iii. pars i. p. 36, note 5. 3. A Liturgy, still in use among the Nestorians, and different apparently from that already mentioned. 4. A Confession of Faith, extant in Greek, and of which a Latin version is given by Mercator, and in the Concilia: but this confession is more probably the work of Theodore of Mopsuestia. The original and the version are both given by Garnier, Mercatoris Opera, vol. ii. p. 251. Various fragments of the works of Nestorius are cited in the Acta Concilii Ephesini, in the Concilia: the passages cited under the title of Τετράδια, Quaterniones, are apparently from a collection of his Homiliae or Sermons (Socrates, H. E. vii. 29, 31, 32, 34; Evagrius, H. E. i. 2—7; Theophanes, Chronographia; Theodoret. Haeret. Fabular. Compend. iv. 12; Liberatus, Breviarium; Leontius Byzant. De Sectis, act. iv.; Gennadius, l. c.; Mercator, l. c.; Concilia, vol. i. col. 1271, &c. &c. ed. Hardouin.; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. x. p. 529, &c.; Cave, Hist. Litt. vol. i. p. 412, &c. ed. Oxford, fol. 1740—42; Tillemont, Mémoires, vol. xiv. passim. Fabricius has given a minute account of the works of Nestorius and of the ancient writers on the Nestorian controversy.) [J. C. M.]

NICAEA (Νικαία), a nymph, the daughter of the river-god Sangarius and Cybele. She was beloved by a shepherd, Hymnus, and killed him, but Eros took vengeance upon her, and Dionysus, who first intoxicated her, made her mother of Telete, whereupon she hung herself. Dionysus called the town of Nicaea after her. (Nonnus, Dionys. xvi.; Memnon, ap. Phot. Bibl. p. 233, ed. Bekker.) [L. S.]

NICAEA (Νίκαια). 1. Daughter of Antipater, was sent by her father to Asia to be married to Perdiccas, B. C. 323, at a time when the former still hoped to maintain friendly relations with the regent. Perdiccas, though already entertaining hostile designs, married Nicaea: but not long afterwards, by the advice of Eumenes, determined to divorce her, and marry Cleopatra instead. This step, which he took just before setting out on his expedition to Egypt, led to an immediate rupture between him and Antipater. (Arrian, ap. Phot. 70, a, b; Diod. xviii. 23.) We hear no more of Nicaea for some time, but it appears that she was afterwards — though at what period we know not — married to Lysimachus, who named after her the city, so celebrated in later times, on the Ascanian lake in Bithynia. (Strabo. xii. p. 565; Steph. Byz. s. v. Νίκαια.)

2. Wife of Alexander, tyrant of Corinth during the reign of Antigonus Gonatas. After the death of her husband, who was thought to have been poisoned by the command of the Macedonian king, Nicaea retained possession of the important fortress of Corinth: but Antigonus lulled her into security by offering her the hand of his son Demetrius in marriage, and took the opportunity during the nuptial festivities to surprise the citadel. (Plut. Arat. 17; Polyaen. iv. 6. § 1.) She is probably the same person mentioned by Suidas (s. v. Εὐφορίων) as patronising the poet Euphorion, though that author calls her husband ruler of Euboea, instead of Corinth.

3. There is a Nicaea mentioned by Livy (xxxv. 26), as the wife of Craterus (i. e. probably the brother of Antigonus Gonatas of that name), of whom nothing more is known. [E. H. B.]

NICAEARCHUS, a painter, whose age and country are unknown, painted Venus among the Graces and Cupids, and Hercules sad in repentance for his madness. (Plin. xxxv. 11. s. 40. § 36.) [P. S.]

NICAEAS, bishop of Aquileia, about the middle of the fifth century, is spoken of under NICETAS, p. 1185.

NICAE'NETUS (Νικαίνετος), an epigrammatic poet, was, according to the conjecture of Jacobs (Anthol. Graec. vol. xiii. p. 921), a native of Abdera, but had settled in Samos. Athenaeus (xiii. p. 590, b.) speaks of him as either of Samos or of Abdera, and Stephanus Byzantinus (s. v. Ἄβδηρα) mentions among the celebrated Abderites, Νικαίνετος ἐποποιός. Athenaeus (xv. p. 673, f.) speaks of him in connexion with his celebrating a Samian usage, as being a poet of strong native tendencies. From Athenaeus (p. 673, b.) we infer that he lived prior to the age of Phylarchus, who wrote B. C. 219. (Clinton, F. H. vol. iii. pp. 519, 563.) He wrote, among other things, a list of illustrious women, and epigrams. (Athen. ll. cc.) Six epigrams ascribed to him, the fourth very doubtfully, are inserted in the Anthologia of Jacobs (vol. i. p. 205, vol. xiii. p. 921; comp. Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iv. p. 484). [W. M. G.]

NICA'GORAS (Νικαγόρας), historical. 1. A Messenian, connected by the ties of hospitality with Archidamus, king of Sparta. When Archidamus fled into Messenia, Nicagoras provided him with a dwelling and all necessaries; and when Cleomenes held out hopes to Archidamus of his restoration, Nicagoras conducted the negotiations, and in the end accompanied him back to Sparta. Archidamus was put to death by Cleomenes, but Nicagoras was spared. Having subsequently met Cleomenes at Alexandria, when compelled to fly to the court of his friend Ptolemy Euergetes [CLEOMENES, Vol. I. p. 795], Nicagoras endeavoured to avenge the death of Archidamus by inducing Sosibius to charge Cleomenes with conspiring against the king's life. Cleomenes was placed in confinement, but afterwards escaped. (Polyb. v. 37, &c.; Plut. Agis et Cleom. p. 821, b.)

2. A. Rhodian, who, with Agesilochus and Nicander, was twice sent on an embassy to the Romans, in B. C. 169, to Rome, and in B. C. 168, to the consul Aemilius Paullus in Macedonia. See AGESILOCHUS, Vol. I. p. 70. (Polyb. xxviii. 2. 14.) [C. P. M.]

NICA'GORAS, literary. An Athenian sophist, the son of the rhetorician Mnesaeus, who lived in the time of the emperor Philippus. He wrote an account of the lives of various illustrious men (βίοι ἐλλογίμων), of Cleopatra of the Troad, and a speech composed on the occasion of an embassy to the emperor. He had a son named Minucianus. The writings of Minucianus [see above, p. 1092, a] are sometimes erroneously attributed to his son Nicagoras. (Suidas, s. vv. Μινουκιανός, Νικαγόρας; Philostr. Vit. Soph. II. Aspas. extr.) [C. P. M.]

NICANDER (Νίκανδρος), historical. 1. A king of Sparta, the eighth of the family of the Proclidae, the son of Charilaus, and the father of Theopompus. He was contemporary with Teleclus, and reigned twenty-eight or twenty-nine years, about B. C. 809—770. (Pausan. iii. 7. § 4. See Clinton, Fasti Hell. vols. i. and ii.) Some of his sayings are preserved by Plutarch (Lacon. Apophthegm. vol. ii. p. 155, ed. Tauchn.)

2. A piratical captain (archipirata) in the employment of Polyxenidas, the commander of the fleet of Antiochus, against Pausistratus, the Rhodian admiral, B. C. 190. (Liv. xxxvii. 11.)

3. An Aetolian, who, when his countrymen were endeavouring to organize a coalition against the Romans, was sent as ambassador to Philip V., king of Macedonia, B. C. 193, to urge him to join the league, but without effect. (Liv. xxxv. 12.) Two years later, B. C. 191, he was sent, together with Thoas, to beg the assistance of Antiochus the Great, king of Syria. By extraordinary diligence he accomplished his task, and returned from Ephesus to Phalara, on the Maliac Gulf, within twelve days. After falling into the hands of Philip, by whom he was treated with unexpected kindness, he reached Hypata just at the moment when the Aetolians were deliberating about peace, and by bringing some money from Antiochus, and the promise of further aid, he succeeded in persuading them to refuse the terms proposed by the Romans. (Liv. xxxvi. 29 ; Polyb. xx. 10, 11.) In B. C. 190 he was appointed praetor (or Στρατηγός) of the Aetolians (Clinton, Fasti Hell.), and endeavoured in vain to force the consul, M. Fulvius Nobilior, to raise the siege of Ambracia (Liv. xxxviii. 1, 4—6 ; Polyb. xxii. 8, 10), after which he was sent as ambassador to Rome, with Phaeneas, to settle the terms of peace. (Polyb. xxii. 13.) We hear no more of him, but that, as he was ever afterwards favourably inclined towards the royal family of Macedonia, because of Philip's kindness to him, he fell under the displeasure of the Romans on that account during their war with Perseus, B. C. 171—168, and that he was summoned to Rome, and died there. (Polyb. xx. 11, xxvii. 13, xxviii. 4, 6.)

4. One of the ambassadors from Rhodes to Rome, with Agesilochus and Nicagoras, probably B. C. 169. (Polyb. xxviii. 2, 14.) [W. A. G.]

NICANDER (Νίκανδρος), literary. 1. The author of two Greek poems that are still extant, and of several others that have been lost. His father's name was Damnaeus (Eudoc. Viol. ap. Villoison's Anecd. Gr. vol. i. p. 308, and an anonymous Greek life of Nicander), though Suidas (probably by some oversight) calls him Xenophanes (s. v. Νίκανδρος), and he was one of the hereditary priests of Apollo Clarius [CLARIUS], to which dignity Nicander himself succeeded (comp. Nicand. Alexiph. v. 11). He was born at the small town of Claros, near Colophon in Ionia, as he intimates himself (Ther. in fine), whence he is frequently called Colophonius (Cic. de Orat. i. 16 ; Suid. &c.), and there is a Greek epigram (Anthol. Gr. ix. 213) complimenting Colophon on being the birth-place of Homer and Nicander. He was said by some ancient authors to have been born in Aetolia, but this probably arose from his having passed some time in that country, and written a work on its natural and political history. He has been supposed to have been a contemporary of Aratus and Callimachus in the third century B. C., but it is more probable that he lived nearly a century later, in the reign of Ptolemy V. (or Epiphanes), who died B. C. 181, and that the Attalus to whom he dedicated one of his lost poems was the last king of Pergamus of that name, who began to reign B. C. 138 (Anon. Gr. Life of Nicander, and Anon. Gr. Life of Aratus). If these two dates are correct, Nicander may be supposed to have been in reputation for about fifty years cir. B. C. 185—135 (see Clinton's Fasti Hell. vol. iii.). He was a physician and grammarian, as well as a poet, and his writings seem to have been rather numerous and on various subjects.

The longest of his poems that remains is named Θηριακά, and consists of nearly a thousand hexameter lines. It is dedicated to a person named Hermesianax, who must not be confounded with the poet of that name. It treats (as the name implies) of venomous animals and the wounds inflicted by them, and contains some curious and interesting zoological passages, together with numerous absurd fables, which do not require to be particularly specified here. Haller calls it "longa, incondita, et nullius fidei farrago" (Biblioth. Botan.). His other poem, called Ἀλεξιφάρμακα, consists of more than six hundred lines, written in the same metre, is dedicated to a person named Protagoras, and treats of poisons and their antidotes : of this work also Haller remarks, "descriptio vix ulla, symptomata fuse recensentur, et magna farrago et incondita plantarum potissimum alexipharmacarum subjicitur." A full analysis of the medical portions of both these works may be found in Mr. Adams's Commentary on the fifth book of Paulus Aegineta. Among the ancients his authority in all matters relating to toxicology seems to have been considered high. His works are frequently quoted by Pliny (H. N. xx. 13, 96, xxii. 15, 32, xxvi. 66, xxx. 25, xxxii. 22, xxxvi. 25, xxxvii. 11, 28), Galen (de Hippocr. et Plat. Decr. ii. 8, vol. v. p. 275, de Locis Affect. ii. 5, vol. viii. p. 133, de Simpl. Medicam. Temper. ac Facult. ix. 2. § 10, x. 2. § 16, vol. xii. pp. 204, 289, de Ther. ad Pis. cc. 9, 13, vol. xiv. pp. 239, 265, Comment. in Hippocr. "De Artic." iii. 38, vol. xviii. pt. i. p. 537), Athenaeus (pp. 66, 312, 366, 649, &c.), and other ancient writers ; and Dioscorides, Aëtius, and other medical authors have made frequent use of his works. Plutarch, Diphilus and others wrote commentaries on his "Theriaca" [DIPHILUS], Marianus paraphrased it in iambic verse [MARIANUS], and Eutecnius wrote a paraphrase in prose of his two principal poems, which is still extant. On the subject of his poetical merits the ancient writers were not well agreed ; for though (as we have seen) a writer in the Greek Anthology compliments Colophon for being the birth-place of Homer and Nicander, and Cicero praises (de Orat. i. 16) the poetical manner in which in his "Georgics" he treated a subject of which he was wholly ignorant, Plutarch on the other hand (de Aud. Poët. c. 2, vol. i. p. 36, ed. Tauchn.) says that the "Theriaca," like the poems of Empedocles, Parmenides, and Theognis, have nothing in them of poetry but the metre. Modern critics have differed equally on this point ; but practically the judgment of posterity has been pronounced with sufficient clearness, and his works are now scarcely ever read as poems, but merely consulted by those who are interested in points of zoological and medical antiquities : — how opposite a fate to that which has befallen Virgil's Georgics ! In reference to his style and language Bentley calls him, with great truth, "antiquarium, obsoleta et casca verba studiose venantem, et vel sui saeculi lectoribus difficilem et obscurum." (Cambridge Museum Criticum, vol. i. p. 371.)

The following are the titles of Nicander's lost works, as collected by Fabricius (Bibl. Gr. vol. iv. p. 348, Harles) : 1. Αἰτωλικά, a prose work, consisting of at least three books ; quoted by Athenaeus (pp. 296, 477), Macrobius (Saturn. v. 21), Harpocration (Lex. s. v. Θύστιον), and other writers.* 2. Γεωργικά, a poem in hexameter verse, consisting of at least two books, of which some long fragments remain ; mentioned by Cicero (de Orat. i. 16), Suidas, and others, and frequently quoted by Athenaeus, (pp. 52, 133, 371, &c.).

* Fabricius and Schweighaeuser (Athen. p. 329, and "Ind. Auctor.") reckon among Nicander's works a poem called Βοιωτιακός, but this is wrong. See Dindorf's Athen. l. c. and "Ind. Scriptor."

3. Γλῶσσαι, a work in at least three books; quoted by Athenaeus (p. 288) and other writers. 4. Ἑτεροιούμενα, a poem in hexameter verse, in five books, mentioned by Suidas, and quoted by Athenaeus (pp. 82, 305), Antoninus Liberalis (Metamorph. cc. 12, 35), and other writers. It was perhaps in reference to this work that Didymus applied to Nicander the epithet "fabulosus" (Macrob. Saturn. v. 22.). 5. Εὐρωπία, or Περὶ Εὐρώπης, in at least five books, quoted by Athenaeus (p. 296), Stephanus Byzantinus (s. v. Ἄθως), and others. 6. Ἡμίαμβοι, mentioned by the scholiast on the Theriaca. 7. Θηβαϊκά, in at least three books, mentioned by the scholiast on the Theriaca, and probably alluded to by Plutarch (de Herod. Malign. c. 33, vol. v. p. 210, ed. Tauchn.). 8. Ἰάσεων Συναγωγή, mentioned by Suidas. 9. Κολοφωνιακά, of which work the same passage is quoted both by Athenaeus (p. 569) and Harpocration (Lex. s. v. Πάνδημος Ἀφροδίτη), though the former writer says it came from the third book, and the latter from the sixth. 10. Μελισσουργικά (Athen. p. 68). 11. Νύμφιοι (Schol. Nicand. Ther.). 12. Οἰταϊκά, a poem in hexameter verse, in at least two books, quoted by Athenaeus (pp. 282, 329, 411). 13. Ὀφιακόν (Schol. Nicand. Ther.; comp. Suid. s. v. Πάμφιλος). 14. The sixth book Περιπετειῶν (Athen. p. 606).* 15. Περὶ Ποιητῶν (Parthen. Erot. c. 4), perhaps the same work as that quoted by the scholiast on the "Theriaca," with the title Περὶ τῶν ἐν Κολοφῶνι Ποιητῶν; and probably the work in which Nicander tried to prove that Homer was a native of Colophon (Cramer's Anecd. Gr. Paris. iii. p. 98). 16. The Προγνωστικά of Hippocrates paraphrased in hexameter verse (Suid.). 17. Σικελιά, of which the tenth book is quoted by Stephanus Byzantinus (s. v. Ζάγκλη). 18. Τάκινθος (Schol. Nicand. Ther.). 19. Τῦφος (ibid.). 20. Περὶ Χρηστηρίων πάντων, in three books. (Suid.)

Nicander's poems have generally been published together, but sometimes separately. They were first published in Greek at the end of Dioscorides, Venet. 1499, fol. ap. Aldum Manutium; and in a separate form, Venet. 1523, 4to. in aedib. Aldi. Both poems were translated into Latin verse by Jo. Gorraeus, and by Euricius Cordus, and the "Theriaca" also by P. J. Steveius. The Greek paraphrase of both poems by Eutecnius first appeared in Bandini's edition, Florent. 1764, 8vo. The most complete and valuable edition that has hitherto appeared is J. G. Schneider's, who published the Alexipharmaca in 1792, Halae, 8vo., and the Theriaca in 1816, Lips. 8vo.; containing a Latin translation, the scholia, the paraphrase by Eutecnius, the editor's annotations, and the fragments of Nicander's lost works. The last edition is that published by Didot, together with Oppian and Marcellus Sidetes, in his collection of Greek classical authors, Paris, large 8vo. 1846, edited by F. S. Lehrs, and at present (it is believed) unfinished. The "Theriaca" were published in the Cambridge "Museum Criticum" (vol. i. p. 370, &c.), with Bentley's emendations, copied from the margin of a copy of Gorraeus's edition, which once (apparently) belonged to Dr. Mead, and is now preserved in the British Museum. (Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. iv. p. 345, &c. ed. Harles; Haller, Biblioth. Botan. and Biblioth. Medic. Pract.; Sprengel, Hist. de la Méd.; Choulant, Handb. der Bücherkunde für die Aeltere Medicin.)

2. A Peripatetic philosopher of Alexandria, who wrote a work Περὶ τῶν Ἀριστοτέλους Μαθητῶν. (Suid. s. v. Αἰσχρίων.)

3. A native of Chalcedon, who wrote a work relating to Prusias, king of Bithynia, entitled Προυσίου Συμπτώματα, of which the fourth book is quoted by Athenaeus (xi. p. 496).

4. The son of Euthydemus, introduced by Plutarch in his dialogue, De Solert. Animal. § 8. (vol. v. p. 444, ed. Tauchn.), and in his Symposiaca, is, perhaps, the person to whom he addressed his treatise, De recta Rat. Aud. vol. i. p. 86. He lived in the first century after Christ.

5. A foolish sophist, mentioned by Philostratus, who lived in the second century after Christ. (Damian. p. 601, ed. Paris, 1608.)

6. A grammarian of Thyatira, who is supposed by Fabricius to have been the same person as Nicander of Colophon, on account of an expression used by Stephanus Byzantinus (De Urb. s. v. Θυάτειρα); it is, however, more probable that Stephanus confounded together two different individuals. He wrote a work, Περὶ τῶν Δημῶν (Harpocrat. Lex. s. v. Θυργωνίδαι, Τιτακίδαι), and another called by Athenaeus (xv. p. 678), Ἀττικὴ Ὀνόματα, which is probably the same as that quoted by Harpocration, under the title Ἀττικὴ Διάλεκτος (s. v. Μέδιμνος, Βωλεωνες, Τριπτῆρα), and which consisted of at least eighteen books. (Harpocr. s. v. ξηραλοιφεῖν.) This is probably the work which is frequently quoted by Athenaeus (iii. pp. 76, 81, 114, &c.).

7. A native of Delphi, mentioned by Plutarch, and called in one passage ἱερεύς (De EI apud Delphos, c. 5, vol. iii. p. 82), and in another προφήτης (De Defectu Oracul. c. 51, vol. iii. p. 200), may possibly, as Wyttenbach supposes, be the same individual as the son of Euthydemus mentioned above, No. 4. (Wyttenb. Notes to Plut. De Recta Rat. Aud. p. 37, c.)

8. "Ambrosius Nicander, Toletanus, qui circa A. Chr. 817, S. Cyriaci Episcopi Anconitani Martyrium versibus Latinis scripsisse, et catalepses (sive argumenta) in Silii Italici libros composuisse traditur." (Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. iv. p. 354, ed. Harles.) Fabricius gives no authority for this statement, nor does Harles supply the defect. It appears, however, that there has been some confusion respecting this personage, who is, in fact, no other than Ambrosius de Victoria (or Nicander), who lived in the sixteenth century. (See Anton. Biblioth. Hisp. Vetus, vol. i. p. 508, vol. ii. p. 452; id. Biblioth. Hisp. Nova, vol. i. p. 67.)

9. Nicander Nucius [NUCIUS]. [W. A. G.]

NICA'NOR (Νικάνωρ). 1. Son of Parmenion, a distinguished officer in the service of Alexander. He is first mentioned at the passage of the Danube, in the expedition of Alexander against the Getae, B. C. 335, on which occasion he led the phalanx. (Arr. Anab. i. 4. § 3.) But during the expedition into Asia he appears to have uniformly held the chief command of the body of troops called the Hypaspists (ὑπασπισταί) or foot-guards, as his brother Philotas did that of the ἑταῖροι, or horse-guards. We find him mentioned, as holding this post, in the three great battles of the Granicus, of

* This work, however, is attributed to one of the other writers of this name, by both Schweighaeuser and Dindorf, in their "Ind. Auctor." to Athenaeus.

Issus, and of Arbela. He afterwards accompanied Alexander with a part of the troops under his command, during the rapid march of the king in pursuit of Dareius (B. C. 330); which was probably his last service, as he died of disease shortly afterwards, during the advance of Alexander into Bactria. His death at this juncture was probably a fortunate event, as it saved him from participating either in the designs or the fate of his brother Philotas. (Arrian, Anab. i. 14, ii. 8, iii. 11, 21, 25; Curt. iii. 24. § 7, iv. 50. § 27, v. 37. § 19, vi. 22. § 18; Diod. xvii. 57.)

2. Father of Balacrus, the satrap of Cilicia. [BALACRUS.] It is probably this Nicanor who is alluded to in an anecdote related by Plutarch of Philip of Macedon, as a person of some distinction during the reign of that monarch. (Plut. Apophth. p. 177.)

3. Son of Balacrus, and grandson of the preceding. (Harpocration, s. v. Νικάνωρ.)

4. Of Stageira, was despatched by Alexander to Greece to proclaim, at the Olympic games of the year B. C. 324, the decree for the recall of the exiles throughout the Greek cities. (Diod. xviii. 8; Deinarch. adv. Demosth. p. 199, ed. Bekk.) It is perhaps the same person whom we find at an earlier period entrusted with the command of the fleet during the siege of Miletus (Arr. Anab. i. 18, 19); at least it seems probable that the Nicanor there mentioned is not the son of Parmenion; he may, however, be identical with the following.

5. A Macedonian officer of distinction, who, in the division of the provinces at Triparadeisus, after the death of Perdiccas (B. C. 321), obtained the important government of Cappadocia. (Arrian, ap. Phot. p. 72, a.; Diod. xviii. 39; App. Mithr. 8.) He attached himself to the party of Antigonus, whom he accompanied in the war against Eumenes, and when, after the second battle in Gabiene, the mutinous Argyraspids consented to surrender their general into the hands of Antigonus [EUMENES], it was Nicanor who was selected to receive their prisoner from them. (Plut. Eum. 17.) After the defeat of Pithon and his associates, B. C. 316, Nicanor was appointed by Antigonus, governor of Media and the adjoining provinces, commonly termed the upper satrapies, which he continued to hold until the year 312, when Seleucus made himself master of Babylon. Thereupon Nicanor assembled a large force and marched against the invader, but was surprised and defeated by Seleucus at the passage of the Tigris, and his troops were either cut to pieces or went over to the enemy. According to Diodorus, he himself escaped the slaughter, and fled for safety to the desert, from whence he wrote to Antigonus for assistance. Appian, on the contrary, represents him as killed in the battle. It is certain, at least, that we hear no more of him. (Diod. xix. 92, 100; Appian, Syr. 55.)

6. A Macedonian officer under Cassander, by whom he was secretly despatched immediately on the death of Antipater, B. C. 319, to take the command of the Macedonian garrison at Munychia. Nicanor arrived at Athens before the news of Antipater's death, and thus readily obtained possession of the fortress, which he afterwards refused to give up notwithstanding the orders of Polysperchon. He however entered into friendly relations with Phocion, and through his means began to negotiate with the Athenians, who demanded the withdrawal of the Macedonian garrison from Munychia, according to the decree just issued by Polysperchon. But while he thus deluded them with false hopes, instead of surrendering Munychia, he took the opportunity to surprise the Peiraeeus also, and, having occupied it with a strong garrison, declared his intention to hold both fortresses for Cassander. (Diod. xviii. 64; Plut. Phoc. 31, 32; Corn. Nep. Phoc. 2.) In vain did Olympias, at this time on friendly terms with the regent, unite in commanding him to withdraw his troops: nor did Alexander, the son of Polysperchon, who arrived in Attica the following spring (B. C. 318) at the head of a considerable army, effect anything more. Shortly after, Cassander himself arrived with a fleet of thirty-five ships, and Nicanor immediately put him in possession of the Peiraeeus, while he himself retained the command of Munychia. He was, however, quickly despatched by Cassander with a fleet to the Hellespont, where he was joined by the naval forces of Antigonus; and though at first defeated by Cleitus, the admiral of Polysperchon, he soon after retrieved his fortune, and gained a complete victory, destroying or capturing almost the whole of the enemy's fleet. On his return to Athens he was received by Cassander with the utmost distinction, and reinstated in his former command of Munychia. But his late successes had so much elated him that he incurred the suspicion of aiming at higher objects, and intending to set up for himself. On these grounds Cassander determined to rid himself of one who was beginning to give him umbrage, and having succeeded by the basest treachery in decoying Nicanor into his power, he caused him to be put to death, after undergoing the form of a trial before the Macedonian army. (Plut. Phoc. 33; Diod. xviii. 65, 68, 72, 75; Polyaen. iv. 6. § 8, 11. § 1.; Trog. Pomp. prol. xiv.)

7. A son of Antipater and brother of Cassander, put to death by Olympias, B. C. 317. (Diod. xix. 11.)

8. A friend and general of Ptolemy, the son of Lagus, who was despatched by the Egyptian king in B. C. 320, with an army to reduce Syria and Phoenicia; an object which he quickly effected, taking prisoner Laomedon, the governor of those provinces. (Diod. xviii. 43.)

9. A Syrian Greek, who, together with a Gaul named Apaturius, assassinated Seleucus III. Ceraunus, during his expedition into Asia against Attalus, B. C. 222. He was immediately seized and executed by order of Achaeus. (Polyb. iv. 48; Euseb. Arm. p. 165, fol. ed.)

10. Surnamed the Elephant, a general under Philip V. king of Macedonia, who invaded Attica with an army shortly before the breaking out of the war between Philip and the Romans, B. C. 200; but, after laying waste part of the open country, he was induced, by the remonstrances of the Roman ambassadors then at Athens, to withdraw. (Polyb. xvi. 27.) He is again mentioned as commanding the rearguard of Philip's army at the battle of Cynoscephalae, B. C. 197. (Id. xviii. 7; Liv. xxxiii. 8.)

11. An Epeirot, son of Myrton, who united with his father in supporting the oppressive and rapacious proceedings of Charops in the government of their native country. [CHAROPS.] (Polyb. xxxii. 21.)

12. Son of Patroclus, was apparently the chief of the three generals who were sent by Lysias, the regent of Syria during the absence of Antiochus IV., to reduce the revolted Jews. They advanced as far as Emmaus, where they were totally defeated by Judas Maccabaeus, B. C. 165. (1 Macc. iii. iv., 2 Macc. viii.; Joseph. Ant. xii. 7. §§ 3, 4.) He is previously mentioned as holding an administrative office in Palestine. (Joseph. ib. xii. 5. § 5.)

13. A friend of Demetrius I. king of Syria, who had been detained, together with that monarch, as a hostage at Rome, and was one of the companions of his flight. (Polyb. xxxi. 22; Joseph. Ant. xii. 10. § 4.) When Demetrius was established on the throne of Syria, he despatched Nicanor, whom he had promoted to the dignity of elephantarch, or master of the elephants, with a large army into Judaea to reduce the Jews, who were still in arms under Judas Maccabaeus. Nicanor at first attempted to make himself master of the person of the Jewish leader by treachery, under pretence of a peaceful negotiation, but, having failed in this, he gave him battle at Capharsalem, and was defeated with heavy loss. A second action, near Bethoron, proved still more disastrous: Nicanor himself fell on the field, and his whole army was cut to pieces. (Joseph. Ant. xii. 10. §§ 4, 5; 1 Macc. vii., 2 Macc. xiv. xv.) [E. H. B.]

NICA'NOR (Νικάνωρ). 1. Aristotle's adopted son, repeatedly mentioned in his will, whom the philosopher destined to be his son-in-law. (Diog. Laërt. v. 12.) [See Vol. I. p. 317.]

2. A person mentioned in the will of Epicurus. (Diog. Laërt. x. 20.)

3. A celebrated grammarian, who lived during the reign of the emperor Hadrian, A. D. 127. According to Suidas (s. v.) he was of Alexandria; according to Stephanus Byzantinus (s. v. Ἱεράπολις) he was of Hierapolis. His labours were principally directed to punctuation, hence he received the ludicrous name of Στιγματίας (Suidas, l. c.), and, from his having devoted much of his attention to the elucidation of Homer's writings, through means of punctuation, he is called by Stephanus (l. c.) ὁ νέος Ὅμηρος. He wrote, also, on the punctuation of Callimachus, and a work Περὶ καθόλου στιγμῆς. He is copiously quoted in the Scholia Marciana on Homer. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. i. pp. 368, 517, vol. iii. p. 823, vol. vi. p. 345.)

4. Of Cos. He wrote a commentary on Theocritus, quoted in the Scholia on vii. 6. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. i. pp. 781, 798.)

5. Stephanus Byzantinus mentions a writer of this name to whom he adds that of Λέανδρος, as the author of a work called Μετονομασίας. Athenaeus quotes the same work, but calls the writer a Cyrenian, without giving him the surname. This is probably the same writer with the Nicanor mentioned in connection with the ancient origin of the Egyptians by the Scholiast on Apollonius Rhodius, iv. 262. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Ὕδη; Athen. vii. p. 296, d; Apoll. Rhod. p. 160, ed. Wellauer.) [W. M. G.]

NICA'NOR, SAE'VIUS, is celebrated by Suetonius as the first grammarian who acquired fame and honour among the Romans by teaching. He was the author of commentaries, the greater portion of which was said to have been suppressed (intercepta dicitur), and of a satire where he declares himself to have been a freedman, and to have been distinguished by a double cognomen,—

Saevius Nicanor, Marci libertus, negabit
Saevius Postumius idem, at Marcus docebit.

Suetonius adds, that, according to some accounts, in consequence of reports affecting his character, he retired to Sardinia and there died. (Sueton. de Illustr. Gramm. 5.) [W. R.]

NICA'NOR, of Paros, an encaustic painter, of whom we know nothing except that he painted in encaustic before Aristeides. (Plin. H. N. xxxv. 11. s. 39.) [P. S.]

NICARCHUS (Νίκαρχος), historical. 1. An Arcadian officer among the Greek forces who went to assist the younger Cyrus. When the Greek generals were treacherously assassinated by Tissaphernes, Nicarchus was severely wounded, but not killed, and came and informed the Greeks of what had taken place. He was subsequently induced to go over to the Persians, taking about twenty men with him (Xen. Anab. ii. 5. § 33, iii. 3. § 5).

2. One of the generals of Antiochus. We find him serving in Coelesyria in the war between Antiochus and Ptolemaeus. Together with Theodotus he superintended the siege of Rabbatamana, and with the same general headed the phalanx at the battle of Raphia [ANTIOCHUS, Vol. I. p. 196]. (Polyb. v. 69, 71, 79, 83, 85.) [C. P. M.]

NICARCHUS (Νίκαρχος), literary. 1. A person introduced by Aristophanes (Acharn. 856), whom Suidas mentions as a sycophant (s. vv. μίκρος γε μῆκος and φανῶν).

2. An epigrammatist. Reiske (It. Notit. p. 249), on insufficient grounds, conjectures he was a native of Samos. From the use of a Latin word in one of his epigrams (Jacobs, Anth. Graec. vol. iii. p. 66), we conclude that he lived at Rome. The inference that he lived near the beginning of the second century of the Christian era seems well founded. It is drawn not only from the general style of his writings, but from the fact, that in one of his epigrams (xxxi.) he satirizes Zopyrus, an Egyptian physician. From Plutarch (Symp. iii. 6) we learn that a physician of this name was his contemporary, and Celsus (v. 23) mentions Zopyrus in connection with king Ptolemy. (Jacobs, Anthol. Graec. vol. xiii. p. 922.) Thirty-eight epigrams are given under his name in the Greek Anthology. (Jacobs, vol. iii. p. 58, &c.) But the authorship of seven of these is doubtful. On the other hand, the third of Lollius Bassus, and four others of uncertain authorship, are assigned to him. The merit of these epigrams is not great. They are mostly satirical, and are often absurdly extravagant. What is worse, they are sometimes disfigured with grossness and obscenity. (Jacobs, Anthol. Graec. ll. cc. and vol. x. p. 17, &c.; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iv. p. 484.) [W. M. G.]

NICA'RETE (Νικαρέτη). 1. The mother of that Euxitheus, whose right of citizenship Demosthenes defended against Eubulides. (Dem. p. 1320, ed. Reiske.)

2. A courtezan, and proprietress of courtezans, amongst others of Neaera, against whom we have an oration of Demosthenes, Κατὰ Νέαιρας. Athenaeus (xiii. p. 593, f) mentions her, but a comparison of his statements with those of Demosthenes (especially p. 1351, ed. Reiske) will show that, if the text be correct, he has misrepresented the statements of the orator.

3. A woman of Megara. Athenaeus states her to have been of good family and education, and to have been a disciple of Stilpo, a dialectic philosopher, who was alive B. C. 299. Diogenes Laërtius states that she was Stilpo's mistress, though he had a wife. (Athen. xiii. p. 596, e ; Diog. Laërt. ii. 114.) Fabricius (Bibl. Graec. vol. iii. p. 628) states, on the authority of Laërtius, that Nicarete was the mother-in-law of Simmias, a Syracusan. Laërtius, however, only (l. c.) mentions Stilpo's daughter as the wife of Simmias, but gives no hint as to who was her mother. [W. M. G.]

NICA'RETE (Νικαρέτη), St., a lady of good family and fortune, born at Nicomedeia in Bithynia, renowned for her piety and benevolence, and also for the numerous cures which her medical skill enabled her to perform gratuitously. She suffered great hardships during a sort of persecution that was carried on against the followers of St. Chrysostom after his expulsion from Constantinople, A. D. 404. (Sozom. Hist. Eccles. viii. 23 ; Niceph. Callist. Hist. Eccles. xiii. 25.) She has been canonized by the Romish Church, and her memory is celebrated on December 27 (Martyr. Rom.). Bzovius (Nomencl. Sanctor. Profess. Medic.) and after him C. B. Carpzovius (De Medicis ab Eccles. pro Sanctis habit.) think it possible that Nicarete may be the lady mentioned by St. Chrysostom, as having restored him to health by her medicines (Epist. ad Olymp. 4. vol. ii. p. 571, ed. Bened.), but this conjecture is founded on a faulty reading that is now amended. (See note to the passage referred to.) [W. A. G.]

NICA'TOR, SELEUCUS. [SELEUCUS.]

NICE (Νίκη). 1. The goddess of victory, or, as the Romans called her, Victoria, is described as a daughter of Pallas and Styx, and as a sister of Zelus (zeal), Cratos (strength), and Bia (force). At the time when Zeus entered upon the fight against the Titans, and called upon the gods for assistance, Nice and her two sisters were the first that came forward, and Zeus was so pleased with their readiness, that he caused them ever after to live with him in Olympus. (Hes. Theog. 382, &c. ; Apollod. i. 2. § 2.) Nice had a celebrated temple on the acropolis of Athens, which is still extant and in excellent preservation. (Paus. i. 22. § 4. iii. 15. § 5.) She is often seen represented in ancient works of art, especially together with other divinities, such as Zeus and Athena, and with conquering heroes whose horses she guides. In her appearance she resembles Athena, but has wings, and carries a palm or a wreath, and is engaged in raising a trophy, or in inscribing the victory of the conqueror on a shield. (Paus. v. 10. § 2. 11. §§ 1, 2, vi. 18. § 1 ; comp. Hirt, Mythol. Bilderb. p. 93, &c.)

2. A daughter of Thespius and, by Heracles, mother of Nicodromus. (Apollod. ii. 7. § 8.)

3. Nice also occurs as a surname of Athena, under which the goddess had a sanctuary on the acropolis of Megara. (Paus. i. 42. § 4 ; Eurip. Ion, 1529.) [L. S.]

NICE'PHORUS (Νικηφόρος), i. e. bringing victory, occurs as a surname of several divinities, such as Aphrodite. (Paus. ii. 19. § 6.) [L. S.]

NICE'PHORUS I. (Νικηφόρος), emperor of Constantonople, A. D. 802—811, was a native of Seleuceia in Pisidia, and by all sorts of court intrigues rose to the important post of logotheta, or minister of finances, with which he was invested by the empress Irene. The prime minister Aëtius, an eunuch, conspired against that excellent princess with a view of putting his brother Leo on the throne. His schemes were seen through by several of the grand functionaries of state, and a counter-conspiracy took place, which is decidedly one of the most remarkable recorded in history. The principal leaders on both sides were eunuchs, of whom seven were against Aëtius, viz., Nicetas, the commander of the guard, his two brothers, Sisinnius and Leo Clocas, the quaestor Theoctistus, Leo of Sinope, Gregorius, and Petrus, all of whom held the patrician rank. Their object was to raise Nicephorus to the throne, and they succeeded through one of those sudden strokes which are so characteristic of the revolutions of Constantinople. On the 31st of October, 802, Nicephorus was suddenly proclaimed emperor. He began his career by deceiving Irene by false promises ; and no sooner had she entrusted her safety to him, than he sent her into exile in the island of Lesbos, where she died soon afterwards of misery and grief. The vices of the new master of the empire soon became so conspicuous that he incurred the hatred of the very parties to whom he was indebted for his elevation; but as he was supported by the clergy, and a crowd of reckless characters, he attacked his former friends openly, and put their leader Nicetas to death. Upon this Bardanes, surnamed the Turk, the bravest man and best general of Greece, rose in revolt, was proclaimed emperor by his adherents, and marched against Nicephorus, who was unable to vanquish him in the field, and took refuge in intrigues. Forsaken by his principal supporters Bardanes promised to submit on condition of enjoying his life and property. Both were granted him by the emperor. As soon, however, as Bardanes was in the power of his faithless rival, he was forced to take the monastic habit, had his property confiscated, was deprived of his eyes, and continued till his death to be a victim of unremitting cruelty and revenge. In 803 Nicephorus sent ambassadors to Charlemagne, and received in his turn an embassy from the latter. A treaty was made between them, by which the frontiers of the two empires were regulated: Charlemagne was confirmed in the possession of Istria, Dalmatia, Liburnia, Slavonia, Croatia, and Bosnia ; but the Dalmatian islands and sea-towns were left to Nicephorus. In these transactions Nicephorus showed no small deference to his great rival in the West, while he behaved with impudence towards his equally great rival in the East, the khalif Harun-ar-Rashid, who resented the insult by invading the empire. After a bloody war of several years, during which a great portion of Asia Minor was laid waste, Nicephorus was compelled to accept the disgraceful conditions of a peace, by which he was bound to pay to the khalif an annual tribute of 30,000 pieces of gold, out of which three were considered as being paid by the Greek emperor personally, and three others by his son Stauracius. In 807 Nicephorus set out for Bulgaria, being involved in a war with king Crum, and in the same year the Arabs ravaged Rhodes and Lycia. A dangerous conspiracy obliged him to return to Constantinople, where a few months after his arrival another one broke out of which he nearly became a victim. Through the death of Harun-ar-Rashid, in 809, Nicephorus was relieved from his most formidable enemy, but was nevertheless unable to secure peace to his subjects, king Crum of Bulgaria proving as dangerous as the khalif. In order to carry on the war against the Bulgarians with effect, Nicephorus established a strong and permanent cordon, or army of observation, along the Danube, and oppressed his people with taxes. The public indignation was roused, and an attempt was made to assassinate him. However, he was destined to die a more honourable death. Having drained the people of their gold and silver he was enabled to raise a very strong army, at the head of which he penetrated very far into Bulgaria (811), and so weakened Crum that the latter sued for peace. Nicephorus, proud of his success, rejected the request; but the barbarian king now rose with all the energy of despair, and, as often happens in such cases, ruined the man who was too sure of ruining him. The Greeks being encamped on a plain surrounded on all sides by steep rocks, intersected by a few narrow ravines, Crum contrived to block up all these defiles but one with enormous quantities of dry wood and other combustible materials, which one night were set on fire, while the Bulgarians from all sides shouted their war cries as if they intended to descend into the plain and take the camp by assault. The terrified Greeks rushed towards the only defile that was still open, but there were received by Crum with his main forces, and a conflict in the night ensued in which the Greek army was nearly destroyed, and Nicephorus lost his life, slain either by the enemy or his own enraged soldiers (25th of July 811). His son Stauracius, although badly wounded, escaped and hastened to Constantinople, where he was proclaimed emperor. (Theophan. p. 402, &c.; Cedren. p. 476, &c.; Zonar. vol. ii. p. 121, &c.; Manass. p. 93; Glyc. p. 285, &c.) [W. P.]

NICE'PHORUS II. PHOCAS (Νικηφόρος ὁ Φωκᾶς), emperor of Constantinople A. D. 963—969, was the son of the celebrated Bardas Phocas, and was born in or about 912. He owed his elevation to those great military capacities which were hereditary in his family, and through which he obtained a fame that places him by the side of Narses, Belisarius, and the emperors Heraclius, Mauricius, and Tiberius. In 954 Constantine VII. Porphyrogenitus appointed him magnus domesticus, and his brothers Leo and Constantine, next to him the best generals, were also entrusted with great military commands. The Greeks were then at war with the khalif Modhi, against whom Nicephorus and his brothers marched in 956. The first campaign was rather disastrous to the Greeks, who were defeated in a pitched battle in which Constantine Phocas was taken prisoner by the Arabs, who afterwards put him to death. In 958 Nicephorus and Leo took a terrible revenge. Chabgan, the Arab emir of Aleppo, the terror of the Christians, had conquered Cilicia: Nicephorus defeated him several times, took Mopsuestia and Tarsus, and forced him to fly into Syria, while Leo conquered the important fortress of Samosata. In an ensuing campaign in Syria the Greeks were likewise victorious, and, Romanus II. having succeeded his father Constantine in 959, Nicephorus proposed to the young emperor to drive the Arabs out of Crete, where they had established their power 136 years previously, to the great grief and annoyance of the Greeks. The expedition took place in 960, and the capital Candia, a fortress which was believed to be impregnable, having surrendered in 961, after a memorable siege of ten months, the island once more recognised the Greek rule. All Greece was in joy, and the conquest was thought to be so important, and, above all, was so unexpected, that the victor was allowed the honour of a public triumph in Constantinople. In 962 Nicephorus set out for another campaign in Syria, at the head of a splendid army of 200,000 men, according to the probably exaggerated statements of the Arabs, and of 80,000 men according to Liutprand. The passes across Mount Amanus were forced, Aleppo, Antioch, and the other principal towns of Syria surrendered, or were taken by assault, and Nicephorus pushed on towards the Euphrates. The victor was checked in his military career by the death of the emperor Romanus in 963, whose prime minister Brindas, jealous of the unparalleled success of Nicephorus, endeavoured to ruin him by intrigues. Brindas made tempting propositions to John Zimisces and his brother Romanus Curcuas, through whose instrumentality he hoped to accomplish his objects; but those two generals, having apprised their commander-in-chief of the treachery of Brindas, Nicephorus was enabled to triumph over his rival. Theophano, the widow of Romanus, rewarded him by appointing him supreme commander of all the Greek armies in Asia, with unlimited and almost sovereign authority. In consequence of a widow, the mother of two infant princes, being placed at the head of the empire, the numerous partisans of Nicephorus persuaded him to seize the supreme power, and after some hesitation he allowed himself to be proclaimed emperor. Upon this he went to Constantinople, and consolidated his power by marrying Theophano; he was crowned in the month of December, 963; and along with him reigned, though only nominally, Basil II. and Constantine IX., the two infant sons of Romanus and Theophano.

During the absence of Nicephorus the Greeks were victorious in Cilicia, under the command of John Zimisces, afterwards emperor, and Nicephorus having joined him in 964, they, in three campaigns, conquered Damascus, Tripoli, Nisibis, and many other cities in Syria, compelled the emir Chabgan to pay a tribute, and overran the whole country as far as the Euphrates. In 968 the Greeks crossed the Euphrates, Baghdad trembled, and the khalif seemed lost, but the death of Nicephorus, and the ensuing troubles in 969, saved the Mohammedan empire from destruction. Inflated with success Nicephorus had made himself odious to many of his subjects, and, although he was still popular with the army, the people in general, especially in Constantinople, were tired of his severity. Unfortunately for him he neglected his wife, and the bravest man in Greece fell a victim to the spite of a woman and the ambition of a jealous friend: John Zimisces and Theophano conspired against his life. Some of their helpmates were hidden in the imperial palace, and one night, on a certain signal being given, Zimisces came in a boat from the Asiatic side of the Bosporus, where he was watching an opportunity, to the water-gate of the palace, joined his confederates, and, guided by Theophano, entered the emperor's bedchamber. They found him sleeping on a skin: he started up, but the sword of one Leo clove his skull and he was soon despatched. His murderer Zimisces married his widow and succeeded him on the throne. Nicephorus Phocas was without doubt a most energetic man and a first-rate general, but his bright qualities were darkened by a very treacherous disposition, as we best see from his transactions with the emperor Otho I., which the latter entered into with a view of obtaining the hand of the princess Theophano or Theophania, the daughter of the late emperor Romanus, and stepdaughter of Nicephorus, for his son Otho, afterwards emperor. To this effect he sent, in 968, bishop Liutprand to Constantinople, who wrote a work on his embassy, which is one of the most interesting and important sources for the reign of Nicephorus, and the public and private lives of the Greeks of those times. The emperor Otho I. also endeavoured to obtain the cession of the Greek possessions in Italy, as a dowry of the princess Theophania, and it would perhaps have been advantageous to both parties if such a cession had taken place, Nicephorus being unable to defend Italy. The marriage of Otho II. with Theophania subsequently took place, but space forbids us to enter into the details of these transactions. (Liutprandus, Legatio ad Nicephorum Phocam; Cedren. p. 637, &c.; Zonar. vol. ii. p. 194, &c.; Manass. p. 114; Joel, p. 180; Glyc. p. 301, &c.) [W. P.]

NICE'PHORUS III. BOTANIA'TES (ὁ Βοτανιάτης), emperor of Constantinople A. D. 1078—1081. He belonged to an illustrious family which boasted of a descent from the Fabii of Rome. He was looked upon as a brave general, but his military skill was the only quality that recommended him. It is related in the life of the emperor Michael VII. Parapinaces, how Michael lost his throne in consequence of the contemporaneous rebellion of Bryennius and Botaniates, the subject of this article, and that the latter succeeded Michael on the throne. Botaniates was crowned on the 25th of March, 1078, and soon afterwards married Maria, the wife of Michael, from whom she became divorced by the deposed emperor taking holy orders. Before Nicephorus could enjoy his crown he had to defend it against Bryennius, whom he routed and made a prisoner in the bloody battle of Salabrya. Bryennius met the fate of most of the unfortunate rebels: he had his eyes put out, and was finally assassinated. Nicephorus made himself so detested by his brutal manners, his ingratitude, and his debaucheries, that his short reign of three years was little more than an uninterrupted struggle against rebels, amongst whom Basilacius, who was defeated on the Vardar by Alexis Comnenus, Constantine Ducas, and Nicephorus Melissenus, aspired to the throne. The last was still in arms when the two Comneni, Alexis and Isaac, were compelled to leave the court if they would maintain their dignity and independence, in consequence of which Alexis was proclaimed emperor and took up arms against his sovereign. Unable to resist the torrent, Nicephorus made propositions to Melissenus to abdicate in his favour, but Alexis Comnenus soon compelled him to do so in his own, and occupied the throne in his stead (1st of April, 1081). Nicephorus was obliged to become a monk and conform to the austere rules of St. Basil: he died some time after his deposition. His complaint that he regretted the loss of his throne and liberty less than the necessity he was under to refrain from eating meat, shows sufficiently what sort of man he was. (Zonar. vol. ii. p. 289, &c.; Bryenn. iii. 15, &c.; Scylit. p. 857, &c.; Joel, p. 185; Glyc. p. 332; Manass. p 135.) [W. P.]

NICE'PHORUS (Νικηφόρος), Byzantine writers. 1. BLEMMIDAS or BLEMMYDAS, lived in the thirteenth century. He was descended from a distinguished and wealthy family, but, nevertheless, took holy orders, and led the life of an ascetic. Having erected a beautiful church at his own expence at Nicaea, he was appointed presbyter of it, and, by his really Christian life, gave a good example to his people. One day Marchesina, the concubine of the emperor John Ducas, entered his church to hear the mass, when, to her astonishment and indignation, the honest Blemmidas ordered her to leave the church directly, and, as she refused to do so, he caused her to be turned out; in consequence of which he had to suffer much annoyance from the emperor. Theodore Lascaris, the successor of John Ducas, behaved differently to him, and on the death of the patriarch Germanus, in 1255, offered him the vacant seat, which, however, Nicephorus declined. In the religious disputes between the Greeks and the Latins, Blemmidas showed himself well disposed towards the latter. The year of the death of Blemmidas is not known. He wrote various works, the principal of which are:—1. Opusculum de Processione Spiritus Sancti, &c. In this work he adopts entirely the views of the Roman catholics on the procession of the Holy Ghost and other matters; which is the more surprising, as he wrote a second work on the same subject, where he defends the opinion of the Greek church. Leo Allatius (De Consensu, ii. 14) endeavours to justify him for his want of principle, showing that he either wrote that work when very young, before he had formed a thorough conviction on the point, or that some schismatics published their opinions under the name of Blemmidas. 2. De Processione Spiritus Sancti Libri II. This is the second work, just mentioned, the first book of which is dedicated to the emperor Theodore Lascaris, and the second to Jacob, archbishop of Bulgaria, ed. Graece et Latine, by Oderius Ragnaldus, in the appendix to the first volume of his Annales Ecclesiast.; by Leo Allatius, in the first volume of Orthodoxae Graeciae Script. 3. Epistola ad plurimos data postquam Marchesinam templo ejecerat, Graece et Latine, in the second book of Leo Allatius, De Consensu. 4. Epitome Logica et Physica, Graece, Augsburg, 1605, 8vo. There are also many other writings by Blemmidas extant in manuscript, in the libraries of Munich, Rome, Paris, and other places. (Cave, Hist. Liter. ad an. 1255; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. xi. p. 394.)

2. BRYENNIUS. [BRYENNIUS.]

3. CALLISTUS XANTHOPULUS, the celebrated author of the Ecclesiastical History, was born in the latter part of the thirteenth century, and died about 1450. According to his own saying (H. E. ii. p. 64), he had not yet completed his thirty-sixth year when he began to write that work, which he dedicated to the emperor Andronicus Palaeologus the elder, who died in 1327, whence we may infer the time of his birth. His works are:—1. Historia Ecclesiastica, in twenty-three books, of which there are eighteen extant, compiled from Eusebius, Sozomenus, Socrates, Theodoretus, Evagrius, Philostorgius, and other ecclesiastical writers. The eighteen extant books contain the period from Christ down to the death of the tyrant Phocas, in 610; of the remaining five books, there are Argumenta extant, from which we learn that the work was carried down to the death of the emperor Leo

Philosophus, in 911; but it is questionable whether they are the production of Callistus, or of some other writer. Although Callistus compiled from the works of his predecessors, he entirely remodelled his materials, and his elegant style caused him to be called Thucydides ecclesiasticus; while his want of judgment, his credulity, and his love of the marvellous, in consequence of which his work abounds with fables, induced some critics to style him the Plinius theologorum. He had apparently studied the classical models, for his style is vastly superior to that of his contemporaries. Of this work there exists only one MS., which was originally in the library of Matthias Corvinus, king of Hungary and Bohemia (1458—1490), at Ofen or Buda. When this city was taken by the Turks in 1526, the king's library was carried to Constantinople, where, soon afterwards, the MS. was purchased by a German scholar, who sold it in his turn to the imperial library in Vienna, where it is still kept. Editions: A Latin version by John Lang, of Erfurt, Basel, 1553, fol.; the same with scholia, 1560(61); Antwerp, 1560; Paris, 1562, 1573; Frankfort, 1588, fol.; Paris, 1566, 12 vols. 8vo. The principal edition is by Fronto Ducaeus, Paris, 1630, 2 vols. fol., containing the Greek text, with Lang's translation, both carefully revised by the editor. 2. Σύνταγμα de Templo et Miraculis S. Mariae ad Fontem, extant in MS. in the libraries of the Vatican and of Vienna, the latter very much damaged. 3. Catalogus Imperatorum Constantinopolitanorum, Versibus iambicis, finishing with Andronicus Palaeologus the elder, who died in 1327; a later hand has added the emperors down to the capture of Constantinople. Editio princeps, the Greek text, by John Lang, Basel, 1536, 8vo.; by Labbe in Histor. Protrept. Byzant., Paris, 1648; and often, the text or translation as an appendix to other works. 4. Catalogus Patriarchorum Constantinop., contains 141 persons, the last of whom is Callistus, who was made patriarch by the emperor John Cantacuzenus; later writers have added to the number; ed. ad calcem Epigrammatum Theodori Prodromi, Basel, 1536, 8vo.; and by Labbe quoted above, who gives a similar catalogue in prose containing 149 patriarchs. 5. Catalogus Libror. Geneseos, Exodi, Levitici, Numerorum et Deuteronomici, in iambic verses, extant in MS. 6. Catalogus SS. Patrum Ecclesiae, in eighteen iambic verses, first published by Fabricius in Bibl. Graec., quoted below. 7. Catalogus brevis Hymnographorum Ecclesiae Graecae, nine iambic verses, published by Fabricius, ibid. vol. xi. p. 81. 8. Menologium Sanctorum, in iambic verses, published by the same, together with Gaulmini Vita Mosis, Hamburg, 1714, 8vo. 9. Excidium Hierosolymitanum, in 150 iambic verses, published with a metrical Latin version, by F. Morellus, in Expositio Thematum Dominicorum, &c., Paris, 1620, 8vo. Further, a great number of hymns, sermons, homilies, epistles, &c.; Vita S. Andreae Apostoli, and other minor productions. Hody, the continuator of Cave, was of opinion that Anglicani Schismatis Redargutio, a work which he published at Oxford, 1691, 4to., ought to be ascribed to Nicephorus Callistus, but he afterwards changed his opinion. See his Letter to a Friend concerning a Collection of Canons, Oxford, 1692, 4to. That work was written about 1267. (Oudin, Comment. de Script. Ecclesiast. vol. iii. p. 709, &c.; Cave, Hist. Lit. ad an. 1333; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vii. p. 437; Hamberger, Nachrichten von gelehrten Männern.)

4. Chartophylax, a Byzantine monk of very uncertain age, wrote: Solutionum Epistolae II. ad Theodosium monachum, Graece et Latine, in Leunclavius, Jus Graeco-Romanum, in the twelfth vol. of Biblioth. Patr. Maxim., and in Orthodoxographi. He is said to have lived in the beginning of the ninth century. Fabricius thinks he is the same as Nicephorus Diaconus et Chartophylax, who was present at the second council of Nicaea, and was afterwards raised to the patriarchate: if so, however, he would be identical with Nicephorus, the famous author of the Breviarium, who was made patriarch in 806. (Cave, Hist. Lit. ad an. 801; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vii. pp. 608, 674.)

5. Chumnus. [Chumnus.]

6. Hieromonachus. [No. 10.]

7. Gregoras. [Gregoras.]

8. Monachus, a doubtful person, lived about 1100, according to P. Possinus. One Nicephorus, a monk, is the author of Περὶ φυλακῆς καρδίας, De Custodia Cordis, a very interesting and valuable essay, which Possinus published, in Greek and Latin, in his Thesaurus Asceticus, Paris, 1648, 4to. (Cave, Hist. Lit. ad an. 1101; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vii. p. 679.)

9. Patriarcha, the son of Theodorus, the notary or chief secretary of state to the emperor Constantine V. Copronymus, was born in 758, held the office of notarius to the emperor Constantine VI. (780—797), and was present at the second council of Nicaea, in 787, where he defended the images, for which his father had been twice sent into exile. Disgusted with the court intrigues he retired into a convent, and in 806 was raised to the patriarchate, after the death of the patriarch Tarasius. In 814 he strenuously opposed the emperor Leo Armenus when this prince issued his famous edict against the images. Leo, being unable to bend the stern mind of this patriarch, deposed him in 815, whereupon Nicephorus retired into the convent of St. Theodore, on one of the islands of the Propontis. There he died on the 2nd of June, 828. He is sometimes called Homologeta or Confessor, on account of his firm opposition to the iconoclasts and his ensuing deposition. Nicephorus is highly esteemed as the author of several important works, which are distinguished for their intrinsic value as much as for the style in which they are written. He wrote better than any of his contemporaries; he possessed the rare art of never saying a word too much, nor does he repeat himself, and he persuades equally through nature and art. His principal works are:

1. Κωνσταντινουπόλεως Ἱστορία σύντομος, Breviarium Historicum, commonly called Breviarium, one of the best works of the Byzantine period. It begins with the murder of the emperor Mauricius in 602, and is carried down to the marriage of the emperor Leo IV. and Irene, in 770. Editio princeps by D. Petavius, with a Latin version and notes, Paris, 1616, 8vo., together with a fragment of Nicephorus Gregoras, the History of Georgius Pachymeres, &c. Other editions, Paris, 1648, fol., with Theophylactus; Venice, 1729. There are two French translations, one by Monterole, Paris, 1618, 8vo., and the other by Morel, ib. 1634, 12mo. 2. Chronologia Compendiaria s. Tripartita, from Adam down to the time of the author. As early as about 872 this work was translated into Latin by Anastasius Bibliothecarius, and this version is contained in the Fabrot edition of the Ecclesiastical History of Anastasius, Paris, 1649, fol. It is also in most of the Biblioth. Patrum, and was published separately by Anton. Contius, Paris, 1573, 4to. J. Camerarius made another translation, which was published together with his Commentarii, &c. de Synod. Nicaean., Basel, 1561, fol. often reprinted. Further, the Greek text by Jos. Scaliger, in his Thesaurus Temporum, Leiden, 1606, fol.; Greek and Latin by J. Goarius, ad calcem Chron. Eusebii. Paris, 1652, fol. Venice, 1729, fol. 3. Ἀντιῤῥητικῶν Λόγοι III., of which the first, Adversus Mammonam (id est, Constantine Copronymus) et Iconomachos was published by Canisius, in the fourth vol. of his Antiq. Lection., and in most of the Biblioth. Patr.; ample fragments of the Antirrhetica are in Combéfis, Bibl. Auctuar. Paris, 1648. fol. 4. Στιχομετρία, s. Indiculus Libr. Sacror., the text with a translation by Anastasius Bibliothecarius, in Petri Pithoei Opera Posthuma, Paris, 1609, 4to.; also by Pearson, in his Critic. Sacr. Pearson, in Vindicia Ignatii, thinks that the Stichometria was written by somebody who lived before our Nicephorus. 5. Confessio Fidei ad Leonem III. Papam; a Latin version in Baronius, Annales, ad an. 811; Greek and Latin, in Acta Synod. Ephes. Heidelberg, 1591, fol., together with Zonaras, Paris, 1620, and elsewhere. 6. Canones Breviculi XVII., Greek and Latin, in the third book of Leunclavius, Jus Graec. Rom., also in the second book of Bonfinius, Jus Orientale, 1583, 8vo. 7. Canones (alii) XXXVII., Greek and Latin, in the third vol. of Cotelerius, Monument. Ecclesiae Graec. 8. Epistola continens XVII. Interrogationes de Re Canonica cum Responsionibus, ibid.

Bandurius intended to publish all the works of Nicephorus, and after completing all preparatory labours and making his work fit for the press, he published a "Conspectus," Paris, 1705, 8vo. Death prevented him from bringing out this edition of Nicephorus, which, according to the best knowledge of the writer of this article, is still in MS. in Paris: its publication is a great desideratum. The Elenchus Operum Nicephori given by Fabricius (vol. vii. p. 612, &c.) is taken from the "Conspectus," and we refer those students to it who wish to form an adequate idea of the number and importance of the works of Nicephorus. (Cave, Hist. Lit. ad an. 806; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vii. p. 462, &c. 603, &c. 612, &c.; Hankius, Script. Byzant.)

10. Philosophus, lived about 900, at Constantinople, where he enjoyed great esteem for his learning and genius. He wrote Oratio Panegyrica, s. Vita Antonii Caulei (Cauleae) Patriarch. CP., who died in 891 (895), which is printed in Bollandii Acta Sanct., ad diem 12 Februarii. He is perhaps also the author of Ὀκτατεύχὸς, s. Catena in Octateuchum et Libros Regum, which is ascribed to one Nicephorus Hieromonachus. The Octateuchus was published at Venice, 1772—1773, 2 vols. fol., with a Latin version and a commentary: in the title there stands Leipzig, without a date. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vii. p. 610; Cave, Hist. Lit. ad an. 895.)

12. Uranus, s. Oranus, of uncertain age, wrote Vita S. Symeonis Stylitae junioris, who died in 597 (in Acta Sanctor. ad 24 diem Maii). [W. P.]

NICE'RATUS (Νικήρατος). 1. The father of Nicias, the celebrated Athenian general. (Thuc. iii. 91; and passim.)

2. A son of Nicias, was put to death by the thirty tyrants, to whom his great wealth was no doubt a temptation. Theramenes, in his defence, as reported by Xenophon, mentions the murder of Niceratus as one of the acts which tended necessarily to alienate all moderate men from the government. On his death his wife slew herself to avoid falling into the power of the tyrants. Niceratus is spoken of as a man of very mild and benevolent disposition, and generally beloved. From Demosthenes we learn also that he was of a feeble constitution, and was childless; but the latter statement (if the reading ἄπαις be the right one) is inconsistent with the account in Lysias (Xen. Hell. ii. 3. § 39; Schn. ad loc.; Diod. xiv. 5; Dem. c. Meid. p. 567; Lys. de Bonis Niciae Frat. p. 149). Niceratus is introduced as one of the characters in the Symposium of Xenophon. [E. E.]

NICE'RATUS (Νικήρατος). To an epigrammatist of this name has been ascribed the fourth epigram of Nicaenetus, already mentioned [Nicaenetus], as of uncertain authorship. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iv. p. 485; Jacobs, Anthol. Graec. vol. vii. p. 230.) [W. M. G.]

NICE'RATUS (Νικήρατος), a Greek writer on plants, one of the followers of Asclepiades of Bithynia (Dioscor. De Mat. Med. i. praef. vol. i. p. 2; St. Epiphan. Adv. Haeres. i. 1. 3, p. 3, ed. Colon. 1682), who is quoted by Asclepiades Pharmacion (ap. Gal. De Compos. Medicam. sec. Loc. iii. 1, vol. xii. p. 634), and must, therefore, have lived in the latter half of the first century, B. C. His medical formulae are several times quoted by Galen (De Compos. Medicam. sec. Loc. vol. xiii. pp. 87, 96, 98, 110, &c., De Antid. ii. 15, vol. xiv. p. 197), and once by Pliny (H. N. xxxii. 31). Caelius Aurelianus mentions that he wrote a work on catalepsy (De Morb. ii. 5, p. 376). [W. A. G.]

NICE'RATUS, the son of Euctemon, an Athenian statuary, flourished, as it seems from Pliny (H. N. xxxiv. 8. s. 19. §§ 19, 31), in the time of Alcibiades, of whom and his mother Demarete he made statues. He also made the Aesculapius and Hygieia, which stood, in Pliny's time, in the temple of Concord at Rome. Tatian (adv. Graec. 53, 62) mentions his statues of Telesilla and Glaucippe, respecting which see Sillig, Catal. Artif. s. v. [P. S.]

NI'CEROS, a painter of Thebes, the son and disciple of Aristeides, and the brother of Ariston. (Plin. H. N. xxxv. 10. s. 36. § 23) [P. S.]

NICE'TAS (Νικήτας), Byzantine writers. 1. Acominatus (Ἀκομινάτος), also called Choniates, because he was a native of Chonae, formerly Colossae, in Phrygia, one of the most important Byzantine historians, was born about the middle of the twelfth century, and was descended from a noble and distinguished family. The emperor Isaac II. Angelus (1185—1195) appointed him governor of Philippopolis, at a period when the revolt of the Bulgarians, and the approach of the emperor Frederic I. of Germany, with an army of 150,000 men (1189), devolved most important duties upon the governors of the large towns in Thrace. Nicetas also held the offices of logotheta, praefectus sacri cubiculi, and others of importance, and he was honoured with the title of senator. He was present at the capture of Constantinople by the Latins in 1204, of which he has given us a most impressive and, undoubtedly, faithful description. His palace was burnt down during the storm, and after many dangerous adventures he escaped, with his family, to Nicaea, through the assistance of a generous Venetian merchant. There he continued to live at the court of the emperor Theodore Lascaris, and employed his time in writing that great historical work which has brought his name down to posterity. He died at Nicaea in, or perhaps after 1216. Modern travellers have tried, but in vain, to discover his tomb. The Historia is a corollary of ten distinct works, each of which contains one or more books, of which there are twenty-one, giving the history of the emperors from 1118 down to 1206: viz. Joannes Comnenus (1118—1143), in one book; Manuel Comnenus (1143—1180), in seven books; Alexis Comnenus (1180—1183), in one book; Andronicus Comnenus (1183—1185) in two books; Isaac Angelus (1185—1195), in three books; Alexis Angelus (1195—1203), in three books; Isaac Angelus and his son Alexis (1203—1204), in one book; Alexis Ducas Murzuplus (1204), in one book; Urbs Capta, or the events during and immediately after the taking of Constantinople (1204), in one book; Baldwin of Flanders (1204—1206), in one book. The mode of quoting this historical work is thus: Nicetas, Isaac Angelus, i. 3; Urbs Capta, c. 1; Andron. Comnen. ii. 5, &c. Editions: Ed. princeps, by H. Wolf, with a Latin version, Basel, 1557, fol.; reprinted, with an index and a chronology by Simon Goulartius, Geneva, 1593, 4to; by Fabrot, with a most valuable Glossarium Graeco-barbarum, and a revised translation, notes, &c., Paris, 1647, fol. in the Paris collection of the Byzantines; the same badly reprinted, Venice, 1729, fol. The last edition is in the Bonn collection of the Byzantines, edited by J. Bekker, 1835.

A Greek MS. in the Bodleian, divided into two books, and giving an account of the conquest of Constantinople, with special regard to the statues destroyed by the Latins, is ascribed to Nicetas, but it seems to have been altered by a later writer, who made additions. The account of the statues, which is of great interest, is given by Fabricius quoted below, and critical investigations concerning this MS. are given by Harris, in his Philological Enquiries (part iii. c. 5). The work itself has been published by Wilken, under the title of Nicetae Narratio de Statuis antiquis, quas Franci, post captam anno 1204 Constantinopolin destruxerunt, Lips. 1830. The four splendid brass horses at Venice were taken by the Venetians during the plunder of Constantinople in 1204, and fortunately escaped the barbarous avarice of the Latin soldiery. We cannot wonder at seeing Nicetas deeply incensed against the conquerors; but though very partial in his expressions, he is generally impartial as to facts. His style is bombastic, yet some portions of his work are most expressive and even beautiful. The History of Nicetas, as far as it treats the conquest of Constantinople, ought not to be studied without comparing it with Villehardouin's De la Conqueste de Constantinoble, and Paolo Ramusio's elegant work, De Bello Constantinopolitano, &c., Venice, 1635, fol.

Nicetas also wrote: Θησαυρὸς ὀρθοδοξίας, in twenty-seven books, the first five of which were translated into Latin by P. Morel (Morellus), Paris, 1561, 8vo., 1579, 1610; Geneva, 1629. They are also in the 12th vol. of the Bibl. Patr. Colon. But the whole is as yet unpublished. The complete work is extant in MS. in the Royal Library at Paris; and there is another, but somewhat abridged copy in the Bodleian. Some minor productions of Nicetas, among which a fragment on the ceremonies observed when a Mohammedan adopted the Christian religion, are extant in different libraries in Europe. Michael Choniates, the elder brother of Nicetas, wrote Μονῳδία, being the life of Nicetas in bombastic verses, translated into Latin, and published by P. Morel, Paris, 1566, 8vo.; and also in the 25th vol. of the Bibl. Patr. Lugdun. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vii. p. 737, &c.; Hankius, Script. Byzant.; Leo Allatius, De Nicetis; Hamberger, Nachrichten von gelehrten Männern; Harris, l. c.)

2. Archidiaconus et Chartophylax Magnae Ecclesiae Constantinopolitanae, lived about 1080, and wrote Ἀναθεματισμοὶ II., Anathematismi contra Joannem Philosophum Italum, a treatise on the orthodox faith, which is still esteemed in the Greek church, though it was never printed. It is extant in MS. at Venice. (Cave, Hist. Liter. ad an. 1080; Leo Allat. De Consensu Utriusque Eccles. l. ii. c. 10.)

3. Byzantinus, a monk who lived about 1120, wrote Tractatus Apologeticus pro Synodo Chalcedonensi adversus Armeniae Principem, ed. Leo Allatius, Graece et Latine, in the first vol. of Graecia Orthodoxa, Rome, 1652, 4to.; some ascribe this work to Nicetas Paphlago. (Cave, Hist. Liter. ad an. 1120; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vii. p. 746.)

4. David. [See No. 9.]

5. Eugenianus, lived probably towards the end of the the twelfth century, and wrote in poetry "The History of the Lives of Drusilla and Charicles," which is the worst of all the Greek romances that have come down to us. It was published for the first time by Boissonade, together with the fragments of an erotic poem by Constantinus Manasses, 1819, 2 vols.

6. Georgius, of uncertain age, wrote Epistolae de Creatione Hominis, extant in MS. at Vienna. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. xii. p. 53.)

7. Maronita, chartophylax, and afterwards archbishop of Thessalonica, lived about 1200, and showed himself well disposed towards the contemplated union of the Greek and Latin churches. He wrote: 1. De Processione Spiritus Sancti Dialogorum Libri VIII., in which he introduces a Greek and a Latin discussing the above subject. Leo Allatius (Contra Hottinger. c. 19) gives some fragments of it. 2. Responsio ad Interrogationes Basilii Monachi, Graec. et Lat. in Leunclavius, Jus Graeco-Rom. 3. Responsio ad Interrogationes de diversis Casibus Ecclesiast., ibid. 4. De Miraculis S. Demetrii Martyris, extant in the Bodleian. 5. Expositio Canonum s. Canticorum S. Joan. Damasceni, extant in MS. in Vienna. He also wrote some minor works. (Cave, Hist. Liter. ad an. 1201.)

8. Nicaeanus, chartophylax at Nicaea, of uncertain age, wrote De Schismate inter Eccles. Graecam et Romanam, extant in MS. in Paris and elsewhere; Leo Allatius gives a fragment of it in De Synodo Photian. Also perhaps De Azy- mis et Sabbatorum Jejunio, et Nuptiis Sacerdotum, which others ascribe to Nicetas Pectoratus. (Cave, Hist. Liter. D. p. 14.)

9. PAPHLAGO, DAVID, perhaps bishop of Dadybri in Paphlagonia, lived about 880, and became known by his attachment to the patriarch Ignatius, and by his attacks upon Photius. He wrote: — 1. Vita S. Ignatii Patriarchae, Graece et Latine, in Raderus (Acta Concilii, 8vo. Ingolstadt, 1004, 4to.); and also in the 8th vol. of Concilia. 2. Apostolorum XII. Encomia XII. 3. Orationes, viz. in Marcum Evangelistam, in Nativitatem S. Mariae, in Exaltationem S. Crucis, in S. Gregorium Theologum, Oratio Panegyrica in S. Hyacinthum Amastrensem Martyrem, all of which together with the Encomia Apostol. were published with a Latin translation by Combéfis in Novissimum Auctuarium, Paris, 1672, fol. 4. Oratio Panegyrica in inclytum Martyrem Eustathium, &c. ed. Graece et Lat. with notes by Combéfis, in Illustrium Chrysti Martyrum Triumphi, Paris, 1660, 8vo. 5. Historia Apocrypha, lost. Nicephorus Callistus borrowed freely from it for his Historia Eccles. 6. Liber pro Synodo Chalcedonensi adversus Epistolam Regis Armeniae, more probably the work of Nicetas BYZANTINUS [No. 3]. 7. Commentarii in Gregor. Nazianzeni Tetrasticha et Monosticha, perhaps the work of Nicetas Serron. The text, Venice, 1563, 4to.; a Latin version, Imola, 1588, 8vo. 7. Several hymns and minor productions. (Cave, Hist. Liter. ad an. 880; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vii. p. 747.)

10. PECTORATUS or STETHATUS (Στηθατός), (Sterno), a monk of Constantinople, lived in the middle of the 11th century, and became known through his violent opposition to the union of the two churches, and his attacks upon Cardinal Humbertus and the other legates of the Pope at Constantinople. He wrote: — 1. Liber adversus Latinos de Azymis et Sabbatorum Jejunio, et Nuptiis Sacerdotum, ascribed by some to Nicetas Nicaeanus. It was published by Basnage in the 3d vol. of Canisius, Lection. Antiq., and also by Baronius in the Appendix to the 11th vol. of the Annales. 2. Tractatus de Anima, extant in MS. 3. Carmen in Symeonem juniorem, ed. Graece Leo Allatius in his Diatriba de Symeon. 4. Some minor productions extant in MSS. (Cave, Hist. Liter. ad an. 1050; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vii. p. 753.)

11. RHETOR, perhaps identical with Nicetas Paphlago. Among other productions the following are ascribed to him: — 1. Several Orations known to Leo Allatius. 2. Diatriba in gloriosum Martyrem Pantieleemonem. 3. De Certamine et de Inventione, &c. Reliquiarum S. Stephani Protomartyris. 4. Encomium in Magnum Nicholaum Myrobleptem et Thaumaturgum. None of these have been published. (Cave, Hist. Liter. D. p. 14.)

12. SCUTARIOTA, a native of Scutari, opposite Constantinople, of uncertain age, wrote: — 1. Homiliae III. 2. Scholia sive Annotationes in Nicetae Acominati Thesaurum Orthodox. 3. Epistolae, De Arte Rhetorica, poems and other minor productions extant in MSS. in Paris and elsewhere. (Cave, Hist. Liter. D. p. 15; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vii. p. 755.)

13. SEIDUS, a violent opponent of the Latins, against whom he wrote a small work, a Latin translation of which begins "Non simpliciter antiqua novis venerabiliora, &c., and of which Leo Allatius gives some fragments in De Consensu, i. 14. (Cave, Hist. Liter. ad an. 1110.)

14. SERRON, archbishop of Serrae or Seres in Macedonia, and afterwards of Heracleia, lived in the 11th century, and has often, by Leo Allatius for instance, been confounded with Nicetas Paphlago. He wrote: — 1. Commentarii in XVI. Nazianzeni Orationes, published ad calcem Operum Nazianzeni, and separately, under the name of Nicetas David Paphlago, Venice, 1563, 4to. 2. Responsa Canonica ad Interrogationes cujusdam Constantini Episcopi, Graece et Latine in Leunclavius, Jus Graeco-Roman. 3. Catena in Jobum, a compilation ascribed by some to one Olympiodorus. Edit.: A Latin version, by Paulus Comitolus, Venice, 1587, 4to.; Graece et Latine, by Patricius Junius, London, 1637, fol. 4. Catenae in Lucam, Matthaeum aliosque, perhaps. (Cave, Hist. Liter. ad an. 1077; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. viii. p. 431; Hamberger, Nachrichten von gelehrten Männern.)

15. THESSALONICENSIS, was archbishop of Thessalonica, and wrote Dialogi Sex de Processione Spiritus Sancti, of which Leo Allatius gives a fragment in Contra Hottinger. Nicetas of Thessalonica lived about 1200; he has often been confounded with Nicetas Acominatus. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vii. p. 756.) [W. P.]

NICE'TAS, or, as his name is variously written, Nicaeas or Niceas, or Nicetus or Nicetius, was by birth a Dacian, and bishop of a city called by ecclesiastical writers Civitas Romatiana or Remessianensis, situated in Maesia, somewhere between Naissus and Sardica. This prelate visited Italy towards the close of the fourth century, and having repaired to Nola for the purpose of visiting the sepulchre of St. Felix, there gained the good-will of Paulinus, who celebrates, in a poem still extant, the high talents and virtues of his friend, and the zeal with which he laboured in preaching the Gospel among the barbarians. Nicetas paid a second visit to Nola A. D. 402, and it appears from an epistle of Pope Innocentius I. (n. xvii. ed. Coustant), where he is numbered among the dignitaries of Macedonia, that he was alive in 414.

Considerable confusion has been occasioned by the mistake of Baronius, who supposed that Nicetas the Dacian, mentioned in the Roman Martyrology under 7th January, was a different person from the Nicaeas Romatianae civitatis episcopus of Gennadius, and that the latter was the same with the Nicaeas of Aquileia, to whom a letter was addressed by Leo the Great in A. D. 458, — an hypothesis which forced him to prove that Aquileia bore the name of Civitas Romatiana. But the researches of Holstein, Quesnel and Tillemont have set the question at rest.

Gennadius informs us that Nicetas composed in a plain but elegant style instructions for those who were preparing for baptism, in six books, of which he gives the arguments, and also Ad Lapsam Virginem Libellus. Of these, the former is certainly lost, but we find among the works of St. Jerome (vol. xi. p. 178, ed. Vallarsi, vol. v. ed Bened.), a tract entitled Objurgatio ad Susannam Lapsam, and among the works of St. Ambrose (vol. ii. p. 301. ed. Bened.) the same piece under the name Tractatus ad Virginem Lapsam, although it can be proved by the most convincing arguments that neither of these divines could have been the author. Hence it was conjectured by Cotelerius that it might, in reality, belong to Nicetas, and his opinion has been very generally adopted, although the matter seems to be involved in great doubt. (Gennadius, de Viris Illustr. 22; Schönemann, Bibliotheca Patrum Lat. vol. ii. § 17.) [W. R.]

NICE'TAS or NICAEAS was, as we have noticed above, bishop of Aquileia in the middle of the fifth century. His remains have been carefully collected from various sources by Mai in the "Scriptorum Veterum Nova Collectio e Vaticanis Codicibus edita," 4to. Rom. 1833, vol. vii. p. 314—340. They consist of four short tracts: — 1. De Ratione Fidei. 2. De Spiritus Sancti Potentia. 3. De diversis Appellationibus Domino nostro Jesu Christo convenientibus. 4. Explanatio Symboli habita ad competentes, together with six fragments of a few lines each.

NICETAS, who was bishop of Trèves in the middle of the sixth century, does not fall within the limits of this work. [W. R.]

NICE'TAS (Νικήτας), a physician, to whom is addressed one of the letters of Theophylactus, archbishop of Bulgaria (Ep. 55). He is there styled "Physician to the King," and must have lived in the eleventh century after Christ. He is, perhaps, the same person as the compiler of a collection of surgical treatises, who is supposed to have lived at Constantinople at the end of the eleventh or the beginning of the twelfth century after Christ. It contains extracts from the works of Hippocrates, Soranus, Rufus, Galen, Oribasius, Paulus Aegineta, and other writers of less note; and is to be found in MS. in the Libraries at Paris (Codd. 2247, 2248), and Florence. Of the Laurentian MS., which is very ancient and valuable, a full account is given by Bandini in his Catal. Cod. Graec. Biblioth. Laurent. (vol. iii. p. 53, &c. cod. 7), where he has also inserted a complete list of the chapters contained in the volume, to the number of five hundred and eighteen. A part of the contents of this MS. was published at Florence, 1754 fol. by Antonio Cocchi, with the title: — "Graecorum Chirurgici Libri: Sorani unus de Fracturarum Signis, Oribasii duo de Fractis et de Luxatis, e Collectione Nicetae," &c. &c. The editor has added a Latin translation, and some valuable notes. The Commentary of Apollonius Citiensis on Hippocrates "De Articulis" was extracted from this collection. [APOLLONIUS, p. 245]. NI'CIAS (Νικίας), historical. 1. A native of Gortyn, in Crete. He was connected with the Athenians by the ties of proxenia, and it was at his request that the reinforcements sent to Phormion, when engaged on the west of Greece in B. C. 429, were ordered to stop on their way at Crete, to attack Cydonia. (Thuc. ii. 85.)

2. The father of Hagnon, the Athenian general. (Thuc. ii. 58.)

3. One of the most celebrated of the Athenian generals engaged during the Peloponnesian war. He was the son of Niceratus, from whom he inherited a large fortune, derived mainly from the silver mines at Laureium, of which he was a very large lessee, employing in them as many as 1000 slaves. (Xen. Mem. ii. 5. § 2, de Vect. 4. § 14; Athen. vi. p. 272, e.) His property was valued at 100 talents. (Lys. pro Arist. Bonis, p. 648.) From this cause, combined with his unambitious character, and his aversion to all dangerous innovations, he was naturally brought into connection with the aristocratical portion of his fellow-citizens. He was several times associated with Pericles, as strategus; and his great prudence and high character gained for him considerable influence. On the death of Pericles he came forward more openly as the opponent of Cleon, and the other demagogues of Athens; but from his military reputation, the mildness of his character, and the liberal use which he made of his great wealth, he was looked upon with respect, and some measure of attachment, by all classes of the citizens. His timidity led him to buy off the attacks of the sycophants. This feature of his character was ridiculed by more than one comic poet of the day. The splendour with which he discharged the office of choregus exceeded anything that had been seen before. On one occasion, when charged with the conduct of the Theoria to Delos, he made a remarkable display of his wealth and munificence. To prevent the confusion which usually ensued when the Chorus landed at Delos amidst the crowd of spectators, he landed first at Rheneia; and having had a bridge prepared before he left Athens, it was thrown across the channel between Rheneia and Delos, in the course of the night, and by daybreak it was ready, adorned in the most sumptuous manner with gilding and tapestry, for the orderly procession of the Chorus. After the ceremonies were over he consecrated a brazen palm tree to Apollo, together with a piece of land, which he purchased at the cost of 10,000 drachmae, directing that the proceeds of it should be laid out by the Delians in sacrifices and feasts; the only condition which he annexed being, that they should pray for the blessing of the god upon the founder. His strong religious feeling was perhaps as much concerned in this dedication, as his desire of popularity. It was told of him that he sacrificed every day, and even kept a soothsayer in his house, that he might consult the will of the gods not only about public affairs, but likewise respecting his own private fortunes. Aristophanes ridicules him rather severely in the Equites for his timidity and superstition (l. 28, &c., 80, 112, 358). The excessive dread which Nicias entertained of informers led him to keep as much as possible in retirement. He made himself difficult of access; and the few friends who were admitted to his privacy industriously spread the belief that he devoted himself with such untiring zeal to the public interests, as to sacrifice enjoyment, sleep, and even health, in the service of the state. His characteristic caution was the distinguishing feature of his military career. He does not seem to have displayed any very great ability, still less anything like genius, in the science of strategy; but he was cautious and wary, and does not appear on a single occasion to have been guilty of any act of remissness, unless it were in the siege of Syracuse. Hence his military operations were almost invariably successful. In B. C. 427 he led an expedition against the island of Minoa, which lies in front of Megara, and took it. (Thuc. iii. 51.) In the following year he led an armament of sixty triremes, with 2000 heavy-armed soldiers, against the island of Melos. He ravaged the island, but the town held out; and the troops being needed for an attack upon Tanagra, he withdrew, and, after ravaging the coast of Locris, returned home.

(Thuc. iii. 91 ; Diod. xii. 65.) He was one of the generals in B. C. 425, when the Spartans were shut up in Sphacteria. The amusing circumstances under which he commissioned his enemy, Cleon, to reduce the island, have already been described in the article CLEON [Vol. I. p. 797]. In the same year Nicias led an expedition into the territory of Corinth. He defeated the Corinthians in battle, but, apprehending the arrival of reinforcements for the enemy's troops, he re-embarked his forces. Two of the slain, however, having been left behind, whom the Athenians had not been able to find at the time, Nicias resigned the honours of victory for the purpose of recovering them, and sent a herald to ask for their restoration. He then proceeded to Crommyon, where he ravaged the land, and then directed his course to the territory of Epidaurus. Having carried a wall across the isthmus connecting Methone with the main land, and left a garrison in the place, he returned home. (Thuc. iv. 42—45 ; Diod. xii. 65.) In B. C. 424, with two colleagues, he led an expedition to the coasts of Laconia and captured the island of Cythera, a success gained with the greater facility, as he had previously had negotiations with some of the Cytherians. He stationed an Athenian garrison in the island, and ravaged the coast of Laconia for seven days. On his return he ravaged the territory of Epidaurus in Laconia, and took Thyrea, where the Spartans had settled the Aeginetans after their expulsion from their own island. These Aeginetans having been conveyed to Athens were put to death by the Athenians. (Thuc. iv. 54 ; Diod. l. c.) In B. C. 423, Nicias and Nicostratus were sent with an army to Chalcidice to check the movements of Brasidas. They obtained possession of Mende, and blockaded Scione ; while thus engaged they entered into an agreement with Perdiccas. Having finished the circumvallation of Scione, they returned home. (Thuc. iv. 130—132.)

The death of Cleon removed out of the way of Nicias the only rival whose power was at all commensurate with his own, and he now exerted all his influence to bring about a peace. He had secured the gratitude of the Spartans by his humane treatment of the prisoners taken at Sphacteria, so that he found no difficulty in assuming the character of mediator between the belligerent powers. The negotiations ended in the peace of B. C. 421, which was called the peace of Nicias on account of the share which he had had in bringing it about. (Thuc. v. 16, 19, 24, vii. 86.) In consequence of the opposition of the Boeotians, Corinthians, and others, and the hostile disposition of Argos, this peace was soon followed by a treaty of defensive alliance between Athens and Sparta. According to Theophrastus, Nicias, by bribing the Spartan commissioners, contrived that Sparta should take the oaths first. Grounds for dissatisfaction, however, speedily arose between the two states. The jealousy felt by the Athenians was industriously increased by Alcibiades, at whose suggestion an embassy came from Argos in B. C. 420, to propose an alliance. The Spartan envoys who came to oppose it were entrapped by Alcibiades into exhibiting an appearance of double dealing, and it required all the influence of Nicias to prevent the Athenians from at once concluding an alliance with Argos. He induced them to send him at the head of an embassy to Sparta to demand satisfaction with respect to the points on which the Athenians felt themselves aggrieved. The Spartan government would not comply with their demands, and Nicias could only procure a fresh ratification of the existing treaties. On his return the alliance with Argos was resolved on. (Thuc. v. 43, 46.)

The dissensions between Nicias and Alcibiades now greatly increased, and the ostracism of one or other began to be talked of. The demagogue Hyperbolus strove to secure the banishment of one of them that he might have a better chance of making head against the other. But Nicias and Alcibiades, perceiving his designs, united their influence against their common enemy, and the ostracism fell on Hyperbolus.

In B. C. 415, the Athenians resolved on sending their great expedition to Sicily, on the pretext of assisting the Segestaeans and Leontines. Nicias, Alcibiades, and Lamachus were appointed to the command. Nicias, who, besides that he disapproved of the expedition altogether, was in feeble health, did all that he could to divert the Athenians from this course. He succeeded in getting the question put again to the vote ; but even his representations of the magnitude of the preparations required did not produce the effect which he wished. On the contrary, the Athenians derived from them grounds for still greater confidence ; and Nicias and the other generals were empowered to raise whatever forces they thought requisite. When the armament arrived at Rhegium, finding the hopes which the Athenians had entertained with regard to the Segestaeans futile, in a conference of the generals Nicias proposed that they should call upon the Segestaeans to provide pay, if not for the whole armament, at least for the amount of the succours which they had requested, and that, if they furnished these, the forces should stay till they had brought the Selinuntines to terms, and then return home, after coasting the island to display the power of Athens. But the intermediate plan of Alcibiades was finally adopted. After the recall of Alcibiades Nicias found no difficulty in securing the concurrence of Lamachus in his plans. From Catana, which had come over to the Athenians and been made their head-quarters, Nicias and Lamachus proceeded with all their forces towards Segesta. On their way they captured Hyccara. Nicias went himself to Segesta, but could only obtain thirty talents. On their return they seem to have remained almost inactive for some time, but in the autumn they prepared to attack Syracuse. By a skilful stratagem the Athenians without molestation took possession of a station near the Olympieum, by the harbour of Syracuse. A battle took place the next day, in which the Syracusans were defeated. But, being in want of cavalry and money, the Athenians sailed away, and for the first part of the winter took up their station at Naxos. They were unsuccessful in their endeavours to induce Camarina to join them, but secured the assistance of several of the Sicel tribes. Even some Etruscan cities promised aid, and envoys were sent to Carthage. From Naxos Nicias removed to Catana. Additional supplies were sent from Athens, and arrived at Catana in the spring (B. C. 414). Nicias now made preparations for seizing Epipolae, in which he was successful ; and the circumvallation of Syracuse was immediately commenced. The work proceeded rapidly, and all attempts of the Syracusans to stop it were defeated. In a battle which took place in the marsh Lamachus was slain. It fortunately happened at this juncture that Nicias, who was afflicted with a painful disorder of the eyes, was left upon Epipolae, and his presence prevented the Syracusans from succeeding in a bold attempt which they made to gain possession of the heights and destroy the Athenian works. The circumvallation was now nearly completed, and the doom of Syracuse seemed sealed, when Gylippus arrived in Sicily [GYLIPPUS]. Nicias, for the first time in his life probably, allowed his confidence of success to render him remiss, and he neglected to prevent Gylippus from making his way into Syracuse. He seems now to have supposed that he should be unable to stop the erection of a counter-wall on Epipolae, and therefore abandoned the heights and established his army on the headland of Plemmyrium, where he erected three forts. His forces were defeated in an attempt to hinder the completion of the counterwork of the Syracusans. Succours were now called in by the Syracusans from all quarters, and Nicias found himself obliged to send to Athens for reinforcements, as his ships were becoming unsound, and their crews were rapidly thinned by deaths and desertions. He requested at the same time that another commander might be sent to supply his place, as his disorder rendered him unequal to the discharge of his duties. The Athenians voted reinforcements, which were placed under the command of Demosthenes and Eurymedon. But they would not allow Nicias to resign his command.

Meantime, Gylippus induced the Syracusans to try their fortune in a sea-fight. During the heat of the action he gained possession of the forts on Plemmyrium. The sea-fight at first was against the Athenians; but the confusion caused by the arrival of the reinforcements to the Syracusans from Corinth enabled the Athenians to attack them at an advantage, and gain a victory. Other contests followed in the great harbour, and in a severe engagement the Athenians were defeated with considerable loss. But at this moment the Athenian reinforcements arrived.

At the suggestion of Demosthenes, a bold attempt was made in the night to recover Epipolae, in which the Athenians, after being all but successful, were finally driven back with severe loss. Demosthenes now proposed to abandon the siege and return to Athens. To this Nicias would not consent. He professed to stand in dread of the Athenians at home, but he appears to have had reasons for believing that a party amongst the Syracusans themselves were likely in no long time to facilitate the reduction of the city, and, at his urgent instance, his colleagues consented to remain for a little longer. But meantime fresh succours arrived for the Syracusans; sickness was making ravages among the Athenian troops, and at length Nicias himself saw the necessity of retreating. Secret orders were given that every thing should be in readiness for departure, supplies were countermanded, and nothing seemed likely to prevent their unmolested retreat, when an eclipse of the moon happened. The credulous superstition of Nicias now led to the total destruction of the Athenian armament. The soothsayers interpreted the event as an injunction from the gods that they should not retreat before the next full moon, and Nicias resoluteiy determined to abide by their decision. The Syracusans now resolved to bring the enemy to an engagement, and, after some successful skirmishing, in a decisive naval battle defeated the Athenians, though a body of their land forces received an unimportant check. They were now masters of the harbour, and the Athenians were reduced to the necessity of making a desperate effort to escape. Nicias exerted himself to the utmost to encourage the men, but the Athenians were decisively defeated, and could not even be induced to attempt to force their way at day-break through the bar at the mouth of the harbour. They set out on their retreat into the interior of Sicily. Nicias, though bowed down by bodily as well as mental sufferings, used all his arguments to cheer the men. For the details of the retreat the reader is referred to Thucydides. Nicias and Demosthenes, with the miserable remnant of the troops, were compelled to surrender. Gylippus was desirous of carrying Nicias to Sparta; but those of the Syracusans with whom Nicias had opened a secret correspondence, fearing lest its betrayal should bring them into difficulties, eagerly urged that he should be put to death. His execution draws the following just remarks from Bishop Thirlwall (Hist. of Greece, vol. iii. p. 455): "His death filled up the measure of a singular destiny, by which the reputation he had acquired by his prudence and fortune, his liberality and patriotism, his strength as well as his weakness, all the good and the bad qualities of his mind and character, his talents and judgment, as well as his credulity and superstition, his premature timidity, his tardy courage, his long-protracted wavering and his unseasonable resolution, contributed in nearly equal degrees to his own ruin and to the fall of his country. The historian deplores his undeserved calamity; but the fate of the thousands whom he involved in his disasters was perhaps still more pitiable." According to Pausanias (i. 29. § 12), his name was omitted on a monument raised at Athens to the memory of those who fell in Sicily, because he surrendered himself voluntarily. (Plut. Nicias; Diod. xii. 83, &c.; Thuc. vi. and vii.; Thirlwall, Hist. of Greece, vol. iii. cc. 25 and 26.)

4. A herald of Philip, king of Macedonia, who was carried off from Macedonia, and kept ten months in custody at Athens. The letters of which he was the bearer were publicly read at Athens. (Philippi Epist. in Dem. Op. p. 159, ed. Reiske).

5. An Athenian, a relative of Apollodorus, who brought a suit against Phormion, on whose behalf Demosthenes wrote the speech ὑπὲρ Φορμίωνος. Nicias, Deinias, and Andromenes had induced Apollodorus to desist from a previous suit of the same kind. Nicias and Apollodorus married sisters, the daughters of Deinias. Nicias was uncle to a man named Stephanus, by whom he was stripped of his property. (Dem. adv. Steph. p. 1122, ed. Reiske.)

6. An officer in the service of Alexander the Great. After the capture of Sardes, he was appointed to collect the revenues of the province. (Arrian, i. 17. § 8.)

7. A friend and relation of Mennaeus, and a general in the service of Ptolemaeus Philopator. He was sent to oppose Antiochus and succour the city of Abila, but was defeated. (Polyb. v. 71.)

8. Praetor of the Achaean league in B. C. 207. (Liv. xxviii. 8.)

9. An officer in the service of Perseus, king of Macedonia. He seems to have been in command at Pella. When the fortunes of Perseus appeared desperate, in a moment of bewilderment he gave directions to Nicias to throw his treasures into the sea, and to Andronicus to burn his fleet. The former executed the commands of the king, though a large part of the treasure was afterwards recovered. But Perseus, to get rid of the witnesses of such an act of folly, had both Nicias and Andronicus put to death, B. C. 169. (Liv. xliv. 10.)

10. A native of Cos, who made himself tyrant for a short time. He was a contemporary of Strabo. (Strab. xiv. p. 658.) [C. P. M.]

NI'CIAS (Νικίας), literary. 1. Of Eleia. To him some attributed the Βακχικά, a poem generally ascribed to Orpheus. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. i. pp. 164, 172.)

2. A rhetorician of Syracuse, who, with Tisias, instructed Lycias, B. C. 443. (Suid. s. v. Λυσίας.) Westermann (Gesch. der Griech. Bered. p. 38) suggests that the separate mention of a Syracusan Nicias may have arisen from the confusion of names. For though many writers mention him along with Tisias, they seem to have all drawn from one common source.

3. A slave of Epicurus, manumitted along with Mys and Lycon, B. C. 278. (Diog. Laërt. p. 272, ed. Lond. 1664.)

4. Of Nicaea, repeatedly referred to by Athenaeus, who names three works of his. These are, 1. Διαδοχαί, which seem to have been memoirs of the various schools of philosophy (vi. p. 273, d., xiii. p. 592, a.). 2. Ἀρκαδικά, which may have been an account of Arcadian usages, perhaps a portion of a larger work on Greek local usages (xiii. p. 609, e., where Athenaeus simply speaks of him as Νικίας). 3. A history Περὶ τῶν φιλοσοφῶν (iv. p. 162, e.). But by comparing this passage, wherein he quotes Sotion, as the writer of the Διαδοχαί, with another (xi. p. 505, b. c.), where he mentions their names together, we think that we may justly conclude, that, through inadvertence, or an error in the text, the names of Nicias and Sotion have become interchanged, and that the history is to be transferred to Sotion. We have no means of ascertaining his age, except that he must have lived after Plato. (Athen. ll. cc.; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iii. p. 770.)

5. A Coan grammarian, who lived at Rome in the time of Cicero, with whom he was intimate. Suetonius (de Illustr. Gramm. 14) calls him, if the ordinary reading be correct, Curtius Nicia. He also mentions (l. c.) that he originally belonged to the party of Pompey, but that, having endeavoured to involve Pompey's wife in an intrigue with Memmius, he was betrayed by her, and disgraced by his former patron. From the scattered notices of him found in Cicero, we may conclude that he was of an amiable disposition, but soft and effeminate. We nowhere read of his having any great reputation. In one passage (ad Attic. vii. 3) Cicero does not seem to trust much to his authority as to the question, whether Piraeea was the name of a locus or of an oppidum. If we may trust a corrupt passage in Suetonius (l. c.), he wrote a treatise on the writings of Lucilius. (Sueton. l. c.; Cic. ad Fam. ix. 10, ad Att. l. c. xii. 26, 53, xiii. 28; Clinton, F. H. vol. iii. p. 207.) Cicero's letters that mention him extend from B. C. 50 to 45.

6. A monk, who lived A. D. 601. He wrote: 1. Against the διαιτητὴς of Philoponus. 2. Against Severus, the Eutychian. 3. Against the Pagans. He is not to be confounded with NICAEAS. (Cave, Hist. Lit. Sc. Ec. vol. i. p. 695; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. x. p. 494.) His writings are not extant. [W. M. G.]

NI'CIAS (Νικίας), the name of at least two physicians.

1. The physician of Pyrrhus, king of Epeirus, who, during his master's war with the Romans, went to C. Fabricius Luscinus, the consul, B. C. 278, and offered for a certain reward to take off the king by poison. (Claud. Quadrigar. ap. Aul. Gell. Noct. Att. iii. 8; Zonaras, Annal. vol. ii. p. 48, ed Basel, 1557.*) Fabricius not only rejected his base offer with indignation, but immediately sent him back to Pyrrhus with notice of his treachery, who, upon receiving the information, is said to have cried out, "This is that Fabricius whom it is harder to turn aside from justice and honour than to divert the sun from its course." (Eutrop. ii. 14.) Zonaras adds (l. c. p. 50), that the traitor was put to death, and his skin used to cover the seat of a chair.

2. A native of Nicopolis, in the second century after Christ, introduced by Plutarch in his Symposiaca (vii. 1. § 1), as one of the speakers in the discussion, whether what is drunk enters the lungs. Nicias rightly maintained that it did not.

The writer on stones, Περὶ Λίθων, quoted by Plutarch (Parall. § 13, De Fluv. c. 20. § 4) and Stobaeus (Floril. tit. 100. § 12. p. 541), is a different person, and does not appear to have been a physician, though so classed by Fabricius (Bibl. Gr. vol. xiii. p. 346, ed. vet.) [W. A. G.]

NI'CIAS, a celebrated Athenian painter, was the son of Nicomedes, and the disciple of Antidotus (Plin. xxxv. 11. s. 40. § 28). On this ground Sillig argues that since Antidotus was the pupil of Euphranor, who flourished about the 104th Olympiad, Nicias must have flourished about Ol. 117 or about B. C. 310. And this agrees with the story of Plutarch about the unwillingness of Nicias to sell one of his pictures to Ptolemy, king of Egypt, if we suppose Ptolemy I. to be meant (Non poss. suav. viv. sec. Epicureos, 11). On the other hand, Pliny tells us that Nicias assisted Praxiteles in statuis circumlinendis, that is, covering marble statues with a sort of encaustic varnish, by which a beautifully smooth and tinted surface was given to them (see Dict. of Antiq. PAINTING, § viii.). Now Praxiteles flourished in the 104th Olympiad, B. C. 364—360. We must therefore either suppose that Nicias thus painted the statues of Praxiteles a considerable time after they were made, which is not very probable in itself, and is opposed to Pliny's statement; or else that Pliny has confounded two different artists, indeed he himself suggests that there may have been two artists of the name. (See Sillig, Catal. Artif. s. v.) But, plausible as this argument is, it is not conclusive, for the division of a master and pupil by seven or eight Olympiads is an arbitrary assumption. A pupil may be, and often is, nearly the same age as his teacher, and sometimes even older. Again, Pliny's dates are very loosely given; we can never tell with certainty whether they are meant to mark the early or the middle or the latter part of an artist's career. In the case of Praxiteles, we know that he executed great works considerably later than the date assigned by Pliny. Supposing then that Nicias, as a young man, assisted Praxiteles when in the height of his fame (and it is not likely that Nicias would have been so employed after he had obtained an independent reputation), and that his refusal to sell his picture to Ptolemy occurred when he was old, and had gained both reputation and wealth enough, there remains no positive anachronism in supposing only one artist of this name.

* Aelian calls the physician by the name of Cineas (Var. Hist. xii. 33); and Ammianus Marcellinus (xxx. 1), Valerius Antias (ap. Aul. Gell. l. c.), and Valerius Maximus (vi. 5. § 1), tell the story of one of the friends of Pyrrhus, whom the first-named author calls Democharis, and the two others Timocharis.

Nicias was the most celebrated disciple of Euphranor. He was extremely skilful in painting female figures, careful in his management of light and shade, and in making his figures stand out of the picture (Plin. l. c.). The following works of his are enumerated by Pliny (l. c.): they seem to have been all painted in encaustic. A painting of Nemea, sitting on a lion, holding a palm in her hand, with an old man standing by with a staff, over whose head was a picture of a biga. This last point is not very intelligible; Lessing has endeavoured to clear it up (Laocoön, p. 280, note): Nicias placed on this picture the inscription, Νικίας ἐνέκαυσεν: the picture was carried from Asia to Rome by Silanus, and Augustns had it fastened into the wall of the curia which he dedicated in the comitium (Plin. H. N. xxxv. 4. s. 10). Father Liber in the temple of Concord. A Hyacinthus, painted as a beautiful youth, to signify the love of Apollo for him (comp. Paus. iii. 19. § 4); Augustus was so delighted with the picture that he carried it to Rome after the taking of Alexandria, and Tiberius dedicated it in the temple of Augustus. A Diana, probably at Ephesus, as Pliny mentions in immediate connection with it the sepulchre of Megabyzus, the priest of Diana, at Ephesus, as painted by Nicias. Lastly, what appears to have been his master-piece, a representation of the infernal regions as described by Homer (Νεκυία, Necromantia Homeri); this was the picture which Nicias refused to sell to Ptolemy, although the price offered for it was sixty talents (Plutarch, loc. sup. cit.): Pliny tells the same story of Attalus, which is a manifest anachronism. Plutarch also tells that Nicias was so absorbed in the work during its progress, that he used often to have to ask his servants whether he had dined. From the above pictures, Pliny distinguishes the following as grandes picturas: Calypso, Io, Andromeda, an admirable Alexander (Paris), and a sitting Calypso, in the porticoes of Pompey. Some pictures of animals were attributed to him: he was particularly happy in painting dogs.

Pausanias (vii. 22. § 4) gives a full description of his paintings in a tomb outside Tritaea in Achaea.

There is an interesting passage in Demetrius Phalereus (Eloc. 76), giving the opinion of Nicias respecting the art of painting, in which he insists on the importance of choosing subjects of some magnitude, and not throwing away skill and labour on minute objects, such as birds and flowers. The proper subjects for a painter, he says, are battles both on land and on sea; in which the various attitudes and expressions of horses and of men afford rich materials for the painter: the subject of the action was, he thought, as important a part of painting as the story or plot was of poetry.

Nicias was the first painter who used burnt ochre, the discovery of which was owing to an accident (Plin. H. N. xxxv. 6. § 20). He had a disciple, Omphalion, who was formerly his slave and favourite (Paus. iv. 31. § 9). He himself was buried at Athens, by the road leading to the academy (Paus. i. 29. § 15). [P. S.]

NICIPPE (Νικίππη). 1. A daughter of Pelops, and the wife of Sthenelus, by whom she became the mother of Alcinoë, Medusa, and Eurystheus. (Apollod. ii. 4. § 5.) It should be remarked that some call her Leucippe, Archippe, or Astydameia. (Heyne, ad Apollod. l. c.; Schol. ad Thucyd. i. 9.)

2. A daughter of Thespius, the mother of Antimachus, by Heracles. (Apollod. ii. 7. § 8.) [L. S.]

NICIPPUS (Νίκιππος). 1. A Coan mentioned by Aelian (V. H. i. 29), who succeeded in making himself tyrant.

2. A friend and disciple of Theophrastus. (Diog. Laërt. v. 53.)

3. One of the ephors of the Messenians in B. C. 220. With some other leading men amongst them, who held oligarchical views, he was a strenuous supporter of peace, even to the detriment of the public interests. When the envoys from the congress held at Corinth, at which war had been resolved on against the Aetolians, came to Messenia, Nicippus and his party, contrary to the feelings and wishes of the people generally, by means of some degree of compulsion got the reply returned to the envoys, that the Messenians would not enter into the war until Phigalea, a town on their borders, had been wrested from the Aetolians. Polybius, in a digression, finds great fault with the policy of this faction among the Messenians. (Polyb. iv. 31; Thirlwall, Hist. of Greece, vol. viii. p. 233, &c.) [C. P. M.]

NI'CO. [NICON.]

NICOBU'LA (Νικοβούλη), a Greek lady, quoted by Athenaeus (x. p. 434, c. xii. p. 537, d.), though with some doubt (Νικ. ἢ ὁ ἀναθεὶς ταύτῃ τὰ συγγράμματα), as the author of a work about Alexander the Great. In the MSS. of Pliny the name Nicobulus is found, and Harduin (Index Auctorum, vol. i. p. 63) supposes that he accompanied Alexander in his expeditions. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iii. p. 47.) [C. P. M.]

NICOBU'LUS, an Athenian who was involved in a dispute arising out of some mine-property with a man named Pantaenetus, and was sued by him. The speech of Demosthenes against Pantaenetus was written for him on this occasion. (Dem. Παραγραφὴ πρὸς Πανταίνετον.) [C. P. M.]

NICOBU'LUS, a friend and relative of Gregorius Nazianzenus. He was the author of a poem, addressed to his son of the same name, in reply to one written by Gregory, in which the latter had begged him to allow his son to leave his native country for the purpose of studying eloquence. The poem of Nicobulus is found amongst those of Gregory, beginning Τέκνον ἐμὸν, μύθους ποθέων ποθέεις τὰ φέριστα. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ix. p. 311.) [C. P. M.]

NICO'CHARES (Νικοχάρης), an Athenian poet of the Old Comedy, the son of Philonides, also a comic poet. He was contemporary with

Aristophanes (Suidas, s. v. Νικοχάρης), and of the ward Κυδαθήναιον (Steph. Byz. s. v. Κυδαθήναιον). If the conjecture of Böckh be correct (Corp. Inscript. vol. i. p. 354), he was alive so far down as B. C. 354. The names of his plays, as enumerated by Suidas (l. c.), are, Ἀμυμώνη, Πέλοψ, Γαλάτεια, Ἡρακλῆς γαμῶν, Ἡρακλῆς χορηγός, Κρῆτες, Λακωνες, Λήμνιαι, Κένταυροι, Χειρογάστορες. Meineke (Com. Graec. Frag. vol. i. p. 253) ingeniously conjectures that the two first are but different names for the same comedy, from the fact that Πέλοψ does not occur in its alphabetical place, like the rest, and from the name Oenomaüs occurring in a quotation from the Ἀμυμώνη, given by Athenaeus (two lines, x. p. 426, e.). Of the Galatea two small fragments are preserved. (Pollux, x. 93 ; Schol. in Aristoph. Plut. vv. 179, 303.) To "Heracles marrying," reference is made, Pollux vii. 40, x. 135. In the former passage the play is spoken of ἐν Ἡρακλεῖ γαμουμένῳ ; this use of the verb, perhaps, like the Latin nubo, indicating the hero's unhusband-like subjection to Omphale. And in the latter passage the poet is spoken of thus: κατὰ Νικόχαριν. Of the Lacones, we learn from the Argument to the Plutus III. of Aristophanes, that it was represented B. C. 388, in competition with the Πλουτος β′. of Aristophanes. Reference is made to it, Athen. xv. p. 667, e. Of the Lemniae, the subject of which seems to have been the loves of Jason and Hypsipyle, we have two lines preserved by Athenaeus (vii. p. 328, e.). Other short fragments, but without the names of the plays, are preserved by Athenaeus (as i. p. 34, d.), Pollux, and others. From these fragments we can only infer that he treated in the style of the Old Comedy—sometimes rising into tragic dignity—the legends and local traditions of his country, no doubt ridiculing the peculiarities of the neighbouring states. (Meineke, l. c. and vol. ii. p. 842 ; Athen. Suid. Steph. Byz. ll. cc.; Clinton, F. H. vol. ii. pp. 42, 101 ; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. 471.)

Aristotle mentions (Art. Poet. ii. 7) one Nicochares as the author of a poem called the Δηλιάς, in which he represents men as worse than they are. Whether the comic Nicochares be the author or not, as Aristotle mentions this poem in connection with the parody of Hegemon, and, immediately after, expressly distinguishes between the characters represented in tragedy and in comedy as a separate illustration, the Deliad cannot have been a comedy, as Fabricius (Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. p. 471) inadvertently states. Δειλιάς, "the Poltroniad," has been suggested as the probable name. But, looking at the practice of the comic poet to amuse himself with local peculiarities, it seems probable enough that he wrote a satirical extravaganza on the inhabitants of Delos. (Aristot. l. c.; Twining's transl. vol. i. p. 266, 2d ed.; Meineke, Com. Graec. Fr. vol. i. p. 256 ; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. l. c.) [W. M. G.]

NICOCLES (Νικοκλῆς), historical. 1. King of Salamis in Cyprus, was the son and successor of Evagoras I. Some authors have supposed that he had participated in the conspiracy to which his father Evagoras fell a victim ; but there is no authority for this supposition, which has indeed been adopted only by way of explaining the strange error into which Diodorus has fallen, who represents Nicocles himself as the eunuch by whom Evagoras was assassinated (Diod. xv. 47, intpp. ad loc.). It is certainly incredible that had this been the case, Isocrates should have addressed to him a long panegyric upon his father's virtues, in which he also dwells particularly upon the filial piety of Nicocles, and the honours paid by him to the memory of Evagoras (Isoc. Evag. init.).

Scarcely any particulars are known of the reign of Nicocles, but it appears to have been one of peace and prosperity. If we may trust the statement of his panegyrist Isocrates (who addressed to him two of his orations, and has made him the subject of another), he raised the cities under his rule to the most flourishing condition, replenished the treasury, which had been exhausted by his father's wars, without oppressing his subjects by exorbitant taxes, and exhibited in all respects the model of a mild and equitable ruler (Isocr. Nicocl. p. 32, &c.). The same author extols him also for his attachment to literature and philosophy (id. Evag. p. 207), of which he afforded an additional proof by rewarding Isocrates himself for his panegyric with the magnificent present of twenty talents (Vit. X. Orat. p. 838, a.). The orator also praises him for the purity of his domestic relations ; but we learn from Theopompus and Anaximenes (ap. Athen. xii. p. 531), that he was a person of luxurious habits, and used to vie with Straton, king of Sidon, in the splendour and refinement of his feasts and other sensual indulgences. According to the same authorities he ultimately perished by a violent death, but neither the period nor circumstances of this event are recorded.

The annexed coin may be safely assigned to this Nicocles. See Borrell, Notice sur quelques médailles Grecques des Rois de Chypre, 4to., Paris, 1836.

COIN OF NICOCLES, OF SALAMIS.

2. Prince or ruler of Paphos, in Cyprus, during the period which followed the death of Alexander. He was at first one of those who took part with Ptolemy, the son of Lagus, against Antigonus (Diod. xix. 59 ; Droysen, Hellenismus, vol. i. p. 339), but at a subsequent period, B. C. 310, after Ptolemy had established his power over the whole island, Nicocles appears to have changed his views, and entered into secret negotiations with Antigonus. Hereupon, the Egyptian monarch, alarmed lest the spirit of disaffection should spread to the other cities, immediately despatched two of his friends, Argaeus and Callicrates, to Cyprus, who surrounded the palace of the unhappy prince with an armed force, and commanded him to put an end to his own life, an order with which, after a vain attempt at explanation, he was obliged to comply. His example was followed by his wife Axiothea, as well as by his brothers and their wives, so that the whole family of the princes of Paphos perished in this catastrophe (Diod. xx. 21 ; Polyaen. viii. 48). Wesseling (ad Diod. l. c.) has erroneously identified this Nicocles with Nicocreon, king of Salamis [NICOCREON], from whom he is certainly distinct. (See Droysen, vol. i. p. 404, not.) A coin of this prince, bearing the inscription ΝΙΚΟΚΛΕΟΥΣ

ΠΑΦΙΟΝ, has been mentioned by Eckhel (vol. iii. p. 87).

3. Of Soli, son of Pasicrates, an officer in the army of Alexander, was appointed to the command of a trireme during the voyage down the Indus. (Arr. Ind. 18.)

4. An Athenian, who was put to death together with Phocion (B. C. 318), to whom he had always been attached by the warmest personal friendship: on which account he begged as a last favour to be allowed to drink the poison before his illustrious friend, a request which Phocion unwillingly conceded. (Plut. Phoc. 35, 36.)

5. Tyrant of Sicyon, to which position he raised himself by the murder of Paseas, who had succeeded his son Abantidas in the sovereign power [ABANTIDAS]. He had reigned only four months, during which period he had already driven into exile eighty of the citizens, when the citadel of Sicyon (which had narrowly escaped falling into the hands of the Aetolians shortly before) was surprised in the night by a party of Sicyonian exiles, headed by young Aratus. The palace of the tyrant was set on fire, but Nicocles himself made his escape by a subterranean passage, and fled from the city. Of his subsequent fortunes we know nothing. (Plut. Arat. 3—9; Paus. ii. 8 § 3; Cic. de Off. ii. 23.)

6. A Syracusan, whose daughter was married to Hieron I., and became the mother of Deinomenes. (Schol. ad Pind. Pyth. i. 112.) [E. H. B.]

NICOCLES (Νικοκλῆς), literary. 1. A comic writer mentioned by Athenaeus (viii. p. 327), where, however, the name is incorrect, and should be altered into Timocles. [TIMOCLES.]

2. A Lacedaemonian, was the teacher of grammar to the emperor Julian (Socrat. iii. 1). From the words of Socrates we may infer that he was a Christian. This Nicocles is perhaps the same as the one mentioned in the Etymologicum Magnum (s. v. σκάλοψ). Libanius (vol. i. p. 24) likewise mentions a rhetorician of Constantinople of this name. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vi. p. 373; Westermann, Geschichte der Griechischen Beredtsamkeit, § 102, n. 1.) [L. S.]

NICO'CRATES (Νικοκράτης). 1. A Cyprian of this name collected an extensive library, in very early times. (Athen. i. p. 3, a.)

2. Archon of Athens, B. C. 333. (Diod. xvii. 29; Dionys. Deinarch. vol. ii. p. 116.) Deinarchus pleaded against him, in behalf of Nicomachus. (Dionys. Deinarch. vol. ii. p. 118.)

3. A Lacedaemonian rhetorician twice referred to by Seneca. (Suasor. ii. ad extr. Controver. iii. 20, ad extr.) In the latter passage, he calls him aridus et exsiccus declamator. Westermann (Gesch. der Griech. Beredt. p. 188) calls him Nicocratus.

4. A writer, otherwise unknown, quoted regarding a report that no one could sleep on the island of Aegae, sacred to Poseidon, on account of the god's appearance on the island, by the Scholiast on Apoll. Rhod. i. 831. [W. M. G.]

NICO'CREON (Νικοκρέων), 1. King of Salamis in Cyprus, at the time of Alexander's expedition into Asia. He submitted to the conqueror in common with the other princes of Cyprus, without opposition; and in B. C. 331, after the return of Alexander from Egypt, repaired to Tyre to pay homage to that monarch, where he distinguished himself by the magnificence which he displayed in furnishing the theatrical exhibitions. (Plut. Alex. 29.) After the death of Alexander he took part with Ptolemy against Antigonus, and in B. C. 315, we find him actively co-operating with Seleucus and Menelaus, the generals of Ptolemy, in effecting the reduction of those cities of Cyprus which had espoused the opposite cause. In return for these services he subsequently obtained from Ptolemy the territories of Citium, Lapethus, Ceryneia, and Marion, in addition to his own, and was entrusted with the chief command over the whole island. (Diod. xix. 59, 62, 79.) We know nothing of the fortunes of Nicocreon after this: but as no mention occurs of his name during the memorable siege of Salamis, by Demetrius (B. C. 306), or the great sea-fight that followed it, it seems probable that he must have died before those events. The only personal anecdote transmitted to us of Nicocreon is his putting to death in a barbarous manner the philosopher Anaxarchus in revenge for an insult which the latter had offered him on the occasion of his visit to Alexander. (Cic. Tusc. ii. 22, de Nat. Deor. iii. 33; Plut. de Virt. p. 449; Diog. Laërt. ix. 59.)

2. A Cyprian who formed a design against the life of Evagoras I., king of Salamis: he was detected and arrested, but subsequently escaped. (Theopomp. ap. Phot. p. 120, a.) [E. H. B.]

NICODA'MUS (Νικόδαμος), a statuary of Maenalus in Arcadia, made statues of the Olympic victors Androsthenes, Antiochus, and Damoxenidas; one of Athena, dedicated by the Eleians; and one of Hercules, as a youth, killing the Nemean lion with his arrows, dedicated at Olympia by Hippotion of Tarentum. (Paus. v. 6. § 1, 26, § 5, vi. 6. § 1, 3. § 4, x. 25. § 4.) Since Androsthenes conquered in the pancratium in the 90th Olympiad, B. C. 420 (Thuc. v. 49), the date of Nicodamus may be placed about that time. [P. S.]

NICODE'MUS (Νικόδημος), historical. 1. A tyrant of Centoripa in Sicily, who was driven out by Timoleon, B. C. 339. (Diod. xvi. 82.)

2. An Athenian of the deme Aphidnae, a partizan of Eubulus. He was murdered by Aristarchus, the son of Moschus. Demosthenes, for no other reason apparently than that he was opposed to the party of Eubulus, was suspected of having been privy to the murder (Dem. Meid. p. 549; Schol. Ulpian. ad p. 548; Deinarch. c. Dem. p. 24, ed. Reiske).

A man of the name of Nicodemus also figures in the speech of Isaeus, περὶ τοῦ Πύῤῥου κλήρου.

3. A Messenian, mentioned by Plutarch (Dem. p. 852, a.), who contrasts his political tergiversation (he had first espoused the cause of Cassander, afterwards that of Demetrius) with the conduct of Demosthenes.

4. A native of Elis, sent by Philopoemen at the head of an embassy to Rome, B. C. 187. (Polyb. xxiii. 1, 7.) [C. P. M.]

NICODE'MUS (Νικοδήμος), of Heracleia. Seven epigrams written by him have by an inadvertence of Brunck been attributed to Nicodemus, the physician of Smyrna. They are of the childish class of epigrams, called ἀντιστρέφοντα, or ἀνακυκλίκα, in which the sense is the same, though each distich be read from end to beginning, instead of from beginning to end. The epigrams of Nicodemus consist of two lines each, in the elegiac measure, and seem to have been principally inscriptions for statues and pictures. (Anth. Graec. vol. iii. p. 91, vol. xiii. p. 923, ed. Jacobs.) [W. M. G.]

NICODO'RUS (Νικόδωρος), a native of Mantineia, who, with the advice of Diagoras the Melian, acted as lawgiver in his native city. (Aelian, V. H. ii. 23.) [C. P. M.]

NICOLA'US (Νικόλαος, Νικολέως), historical.

1. Father of Bulis, the Spartan. (Herod. vii. 134.)

2. Son of Bulis, was associated with Aneristus in his embassy to Persia, in B. C. 430, and, together with him, was put to death by the Athenians. [Aneristus.]

3. A Syracusan, who lost two sons in the war with Athens, but at its conclusion, in B. C. 413, endeavoured to persuade his countrymen to spare the Athenian prisoners. (Diod. xiii. 19—27.)

4. An Aetolian, and a general of Ptolemy IV. (Philopator). In B. C. 219 we find him besieging Ptolemaïs, which was held by the traitor Theodotus, who had revolted from Ptolemy to Antiochus the Great. Nicolaus, however, abandoned the siege on the approach of the Syrian king [Lagoras]. In the same year he did much towards baffling the attempt of Antiochus on Dura or Dora in Phoenicia, by sending constant succours to the besieged. In B. C. 218 he was invested by Ptolemy with the supreme command in Coele-Syria, an appointment fully warranted, according to Polybius, by his military experience and bravery. He was, however, dislodged by Antiochus and his generals from a strong position which he had taken up between the range of Mount Libanus and the sea near the town of Porphyreon, and was obliged to seek safety in a precipitate flight towards Sidon. It may be conjectured that after this he deserted to Antiochus: at least, we find the name of Nicolaus of Aetolia mentioned among the generals of the Syrian king in his campaign in Hyrcania, B. C. 209. (Polyb. v. 61, 66, 68, 69, x. 29.) [E. E.]

NICOLA'US (Νικόλαος), literary. Nicolaus is the name of a great many writers and ecclesiastics in the times of the Byzantine empire, but only the most important of them are mentioned below. A full list of them is given in Fabricius (Bibl. Graec. vol. xi. p. 286).

1. Artabasda ('Αρταβάσδης), of Smyrna, of uncertain but late age, is called in a Vatican manuscript 'Αρταβάσδης, ἀριθμητικὸς καὶ γεωμέτρης ὁ 'Ραβδᾶ. He was the author of a work on the art of counting with the fingers ('Εκφρασις τοῦ δακτυλικοῦ μέτρου), which has been published by F. Morel, Paris, 1614; Possin. Catena Graec. Patrum in Marcum, p. 449, Rome, 1673; J. A. Fabric. Observ. in varia Loca Novi Testam. p. 159, Hamb. 1712; and J. G. Schneider, Eclogae physicae, p. 477. (Schöll, Geschichte der Griechischen Litteratur, vol. iii. pp. 345—347.)

2. Cabasilas. [Cabasilas.]

3. Chalcocondyles. [Chalcocondyles.]

4. Of Constantinople, of which he was patriarch from A. D. 1084 to 1111, wrote several decrees and letters, of which an account is given by Cave. (Cave, Hist. Lit. vol. ii. p. 156, ed. Basil.; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. xi. p. 285.)

5. Damascenus. [Damascenus.]

6. Euboicus. [Secundinus.]

7. Hagiotheodoretus, was archbishop of Athens in the twelfth century, in the reign of Manuel Comnenus. He is known as a jurist, who wrote a commentary upon the Basilica. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. xi. p. 633.)

8. Hydruntius, lived at the beginning of the thirteenth century, in the reign of Alexius IV. Comnenus, and was distinguished by his opposition to the Latin church, against which he published several works, of which an account is given by Cave (ad ann. 1201) and Fabricius (Bibl. Graec. vol. xi. p. 287).

9. Of Methone in the Peloponnesus, of which place he was archbishop, lived probably in the twelfth century, and also wrote many works against the Latin church, for an account of which we must again refer to Fabricius (vol. xi. p. 290) and the authorities which he cites. Nicolaus of Methone also deserves to be mentioned as one of the opponents of the Neo-Platonic philosophers. He published a work in reply to the Στοιχείωσις Θεολογική of Proclus: this work of Nicolaus was published for the first time by J. Th. Voemel, under the title of Nicolai Methonensis Refutatio Institutionis Theologicae Procli Platonici, Francf. 1825.

10. Of Myrae. [See No. 17.]

11. Myrepsus. [See below, No. 3.]

12. Pepagomenus. [Pepagomenus.]

13. Praepositus. [See below, No. 4.]

14. Rhabda. [See No. 1, and Rhabda.]

15. Secundinus. [Secundinus.]

16. Of Smyrna. [See No. 1.]

17. The Sophist, lived under Leo I., and down to the reign of Anastasius, consequently in the latter half of the fifth century, was a pupil of Proclus. Suidas (s. v. Νικ.) mentions two works of his, Προγυμνάσματα and Μελέται ῥητορικαί. Part of the Προγυμνάσματα had been previously published as the work of Libanius, but has more recently appeared as the work of Nicolaus, in Walz's Rhetor. Graec. vol. i. pp. 266—420. Suidas (s. v.) mentions another sophist, a native of Myrae in Cilicia, and a pupil of Lachares, who taught at Constantinople, and was the author of a Τέχνη ῥητορική and Μελέται. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vi. p. 134; Westermann, Geschichte der Griech. Beredtsamkeit, § 104, n. 10.)

NICOLA'US (Νικόλαος), the name of several physicians, who are often confounded, and whom it does not seem possible to distinguish with certainty.

1. The person quoted by Galen (De Compos. Medicam. sec. Gen. v. 11, vol. xiii. p. 831) must have lived in or before the second century after Christ. He may, perhaps, be the physician, of whose medical formulae one is quoted by Paulus Aegineta (iv. 37, vii. 17. pp. 520, 678) and Nicolaus Myrepsus (x. 143, p. 579). A pharmaceutical author of the same name is said by Fabricius (Bibl. Gr. vol. xiii. pp. 5, 346, ed. vet.) to be quoted by Aëtius, but the writer has not been able to find the name in the place referred to (x. 27).

2. A native of Laodiceia, who lived, according to Abú-l-Faraj (Hist. Dynast. p. 88), in the latter half of the fourth century after Christ. He wrote a work "De Summa Philosophiae Aristotelicae," which was translated into Syriac by Honain Ibn Ishak; another "De Plantis," which is quoted by 'Abdú-l-Latíf (Histor. Aegypti Compend. pp. 19, 27); and a third, "Liber Responsionis ad illos qui Rem unam esse statuunt Intellectum et Intelligibilia." To these Wenrich (De Auctor. Graecor. Version. et Comment. Syriac. Arab. Armen. et Pers. Lips. 1842, p. 294) adds two others, viz. "Compendium Philosophiae Aristoteleae," and "Aristotelis Historia Animalium in Compendium redacta." (See also De Sacy's Note on Abdu l-Latíf

p. 77.) This is no doubt the Nicolaus, whose work "De Philosophia Aristotelis" is quoted by Rhazes (Contin. xi. 4, vol. i. p. 228, ed. 1506).

3. Nicolaus Myrepsus (Νικόλαος ὁ Μυρεψός, or the ointment-maker), the author of a Greek pharmaceutical work, which is still extant. He is probably the same physician who is mentioned by Georgius Acropolita as being eminent in his profession, but very ignorant of natural philosophy. (Hist. Byzant. c. 39, p. 34, ed. Paris. 1651.) He was at the court of Joannes III. Vatatzes at Nicaea, when the eclipse of the sun took place (Oct. 6. 1241), that shortly preceded the death of the empress Irene. Here he was held in great esteem by the emperor, and attained the dignity of Actuarius (id. ibid.; see Dict. of Ant. p. 611, b.). All this agrees very well with the scattered notices of his date and his personal history that we find in his own work. He mentions Mesue the younger (xxxii. 117, p. 706), who died A. D. 1015; "Michael Angelus regalis" (i. 295, p. 420), who is probably the first emperor of the family of the Palaeologi, and began to reign A. D. 1260; "Papa Nicolaus" (ii. 9, p. 469), who seems to be Pope Nicholas III., who began to reign A. D. 1277; and "Dominus Joannes" (x. 103, p. 575), and "Magister Johannes" (xxxii. 99, p. 703), who is probably Joannes Actuarius, who lived in the thirteenth century. He mentions his having visited or lived at Nicaea (xxiv. 12, p. 657), and also Alexandria (i. 241, xvii. 17, pp. 412, 612), whence he is sometimes called Nicolaus Alexandrinus.

His work has hitherto only been published in Latin with the title "Antidotarium," or "De Compositione Medicamentorum;" and has often been confounded with the similar work of Nicolaus Praepositus, from which however it may easily be distinguished. This consists of forty eight sections, containing more than 2500 medical formulae, arranged according to their form and object, while the other contains only about 150 formulae arranged alphabetically. The work of Nicolaus Praepositus has a short preface by the author, this has none: in this work there are sometimes mentioned several modes of preparing the same medicine, in the other never more than one: both works begin with the formula called "Aurea Alexandrina," but the composition of the different prescriptions does not always agree. The work of Nicolaus Myrepsus is evidently written later than the other, which it frequently copies, and does not appear to have been so popular in the middle ages. It is chiefly compiled from former writers, and contains several foolish and superstitious remedies. It was first published in an incomplete form in 1541. 4to. Ingolst. by J. Agricola Ammonius, and afterwards by Leonh. Fuchs, Basil. 1549, fol. translated from a much more complete MS. This translation is inserted in the second volume of H. Stephens's "Medicae Artis Principes," Paris, fol. 1567; and has been several times reprinted. (See Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. xiii. p. 4. &c. ed. vet.; Choulant, Handb. der Bücherkunde für die Aeltere Medicin.)

4. Nicolaus, commonly called Praepositus, to distinguish him from Nicolaus Myrepsus, was at the head of the celebrated medical school at Salerno, in the former half of the twelfth century, as appears from the fact of his work being commented on by Matthaeus Platearius. He is said to have belonged to a noble family, to have acquired considerable wealth, and to have been the principal physician of his age. He is sometimes said to be the author of two pharmaceutical works, a large one called "Antidotarium Magnum," or "Nicolaus Major" (or Magnus), for the use of druggists, and a smaller one, chiefly used by physicians, and called "Antidotarium Parvum," or "Nicolaus Minor" (or Parvus). This, however, appears to be a mistake that has arisen from confounding his work with that of Nicolaus Myrepsus, though (as we have seen) they are totally different books, though treating of the same subject. The "Antidotarium" is written in Latin, and was, during the middle ages, one of the most popular works on the subject. It was first published in 1471, 4to. Venet., and was frequently reprinted in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. Matthaeus Platearius wrote a commentary on the work, which is often printed with it. A very full account of the work, and the bibliographical questions relating to it, is to be found in the second edition of Choulant's Handb. der Bücherkunde für die Aeltere Medicin. [W. A. G.]

NICOLA'US, an Athenian sculptor, whose name is inscribed, together with that of Criton, on a colossal Caryatid, found in 1766 in the vineyard of the house Strozzi, near Rome, on the Appian road. Winckelmann ascribes the work to the time of Cicero, Müller to that of the Antonines. (Winckelmann, Gesch. d. Kunst, bk. xi. c. 1. § 14; Müller, Archäol. d. Kunst, § 204, n. 5.) [P. S.]

NICO'LOCHUS (Νικόλοχος). 1. A Lacedaemonian, whom Antalcidas left at Ephesus as vice-admiral (ἐπιστολεύς), in B. C. 388, while he went himself to negotiate with the Persian court [ANTALCIDAS]. Nicolochus, sailing from Ephesus to the aid of Abydus against the Athenians, stopped at Tenedos, where he ravaged the land and exacted a supply of money from the inhabitants. The Athenian generals, Iphicrates and Diotimus, were preparing to succour Tenedos, but, when they heard of the arrival of Nicolochus at Abydus, they sailed from the Chersonesus and blockaded him there. Antalcidas, however, on his return in B. C. 387, put an end to the blockade, and wrested from the enemy the command of the sea. In B. C. 375 Nicolochus was appointed admiral, and sent out to act against Timotheus in the Ionian sea. With a force inferior in number to that of the Athenians, he gave them battle near Alyzia, on the Acarnanian coast, and was defeated; but, soon after, he was reinforced with six Ambracian ships, and again challenged Timotheus. His challenge was not then accepted; but it was not long before Timotheus, having refitted his galleys and increased his fleet, by an addition from Corcyra, to seventy ships, decisively commanded the sea. (Xen. Hell. v. 1. §§ 6, 7, 25, &c., 4. §§ 65, 66; Schn. ad loc.; Polyaen. iii. 10; comp. Rehdantz, Vit. Iph. Chabr. Timoth. iii. § 7.)

2. Of Rhodes, a sceptic philosopher, and a disciple of Timon. (Diog. Laërt. ix. 115.) [E. E.]

NICOMA'CHIDES (Νικομαχίδης), an Athenian, whom Xenophon introduces in the Memorabilia (iii. 4), as not a little dissatisfied at the election of one Antisthenes to be general in preference to himself, and also as somewhat puzzled by the attempt of Socrates to show that a good house-keeper possesses the main qualifications for a military commander. [E. E.]

NICO'MACHUS (Νικόμαχος). 1. One of the sons of Machaon, the son of Aesculapius, by Anticleia, the daughter of Diocles, king of Pherae, in Messenia. According to Pausanias (iv. 30. § 2), he succeeded to the kingdom after the death of his grandfather, together with his brother Gorgasus, and is therefore placed by some in the twelfth century B. C. Both brothers followed the example of their father, by practising the art of healing, for which they received divine honours after their death, and had a sanctuary at Pherae, founded by Isthmius, the son of Glaucus (id. iv. 3. § 6). Suidas (s. v. Νικόμ.) says he was a native of Stageira, in Macedonia; but it is not likely that this city was then in existence. He also seems to say that he wrote six books on medicine (Ἰατρικά), and one on natural science (Φυσικά); but this is probably incorrect. In fact Nicomachus must be regarded as a purely mythical personage. According to Hermippus (ap. Diog. Laërt. v. 1. § 1), he was the ancestor of Nicomachus, the father of Aristotle.

2. The father of Aristotle, who belonged to the family of the Asclepiadae, and was descended from Nicomachus, the son of Machaon. He had another son named Arimnestus, and a daughter named Arimneste, by his wife Phaestis, or Phaestias, who was also descended from Aesculapius. He was a native of Stageira, and the friend and physician of Amyntas II., king of Macedonia, B. C. 393—369. He was perhaps the author of the works attributed (apparently) by Suidas to his ancestor, the son of Machaon. (Suid. s. v. Ἀριστοτέλης, Νικόμαχος; Ammon. in vita Aristot.; Diog. Laërt. v. 1. § 1.; Dionys. De Demosth. et Aristot. § 5; Joann. Tzetz. Chil. x. 727). [W. A. G.]

NICO'MACHUS (Νικόμαχος), a scribe at Athens (γραμματεύς), rose to citizenship from a servile origin, if we may believe the statements in the speech of Lysias against him. According to the same authority he was entrusted with a commission to transcribe the laws of Solon, a period of four months being allowed him for the purpose; but he extended the time, on various pretences, to six years, and drove a profitable trade by tampering with the laws, in the way of interpolation or omission, as it suited his several employers. In particular, he lent himself to the intrigues of the oligarchical party, in B. C. 405, and fabricated a law giving power to the council to take cognisance of the alleged offence of CLEOPHON. Notwithstanding, however, his services to the oligarchs, he was obliged to fly from Athens under the government of the Thirty. On the re-establishment of democracy he seems to have been again employed in the transcription and registering of the laws, and it was for misconduct in the execution of this duty that he was visited with the prosecution for which the speech of Lysias was written. (Xen. Hell. i. 7. § 35; Lys. c. Agor. p. 130, c. Nicom.) It was perhaps the same Nicomachus who is mentioned by Aristophanes (Ran. 1502) as a ποριστής —one of those whose business it was to levy extraordinary supplies (see Dict. of Ant. s. v.)—and to whom Pluto is made to send, through Aeschylus, a present of a rope, with an urgent demand for his early appearance in the regions below. The Nicomachus also mentioned by Isocrates (c. Callim. pp. 373, 374) may, perhaps, have been the same person. [E. E.]

NICO'MACHUS (Νικόμαχος), a son of Aristotle by the slave Herpyllis. We are destitute of any particulars of his life. The following points are merely indicated by their several authorities. From the will of Aristotle, as given by Laërtius, we infer that Nicomachus was a mere boy when the will was made, and that he was entrusted first to the care of tutors therein named, and then to the discretion of Nicanor, Aristotle's adopted son. We are told by the same authority that Theophrastus was his teacher. Eusebius (Praep. xv. 2) states that, while still young, he died in war. (Diog. Laërt. v. 1, 12, 35; Euseb. l. c.; Suid. s. v. Νικόμαχος.) He must have lived about B. C. 320.

His name, as an author, has become mixed up with that of his illustrious father. Cicero (de Fin. v. 5) and Laërtius (viii. 88) seem to attribute to him certain ethical writings that are generally ascribed to Aristotle. Some modern writers have assented to this, but on slender grounds. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iii. p. 262.) It is not difficult to see how the mistake may have arisen. A portion of the moral writings of Aristotle bears the name of Ἠθικὰ Νικομαχεῖα, why we cannot tell; whether the father so named them, as a memorial of his affection to his young son, or whether they derived their title from being afterwards edited and commented on by Nicomachus. [See Vol. I. of this work, p. 331, a. Ἠθικὰ Εὐδήμεια.] This last reason is rendered not improbable from the circumstance mentioned by Suidas (l. c.), that Nicomachus wrote six books (probably a comment) on ethics, and a comment on his father's work Περὶ τῆς φυσικῆς Ἀκροάσεως. Hence the confusion between the editor and commentator, and the original author. [W. M. G.]

NICO'MACHUS (Νικόμαχος), literary. Two dramatic poets of the name have been mentioned by Suidas (s. v.). The whole question regarding them has been examined minutely by Meineke (Frag. Com. Graec. vol. i. pp. 75, &c., 496, &c.), and we shall briefly give his views, as probable and well supported by his authorities.

1. A tragic poet of Alexandria in the Troad, according to Suidas. He was a contemporary of Euripides and Theognis, B. C. 425, with whom he competed, and successfully, contrary to universal expectation. We may infer from the language of Suidas that the play which gained the prize was on the subject of Oedipus. He wrote, according to Suidas, eleven tragedies. But his list evidently contains two comedies. As corrected by Meineke, it contains the following subjects:—Alexander, Eriphyle, Geryones, Aletides, Neoptolemus, Mysi, Oedipus, Ilii Excidium sive Polyxena, Tyndareus, Alcmaeon, and Teucer, the last three constituting a trilogy. He was of no great reputation, as the language of Suidas implies. Only four words remain that can be traced to him.

2. A comic poet of the time of Pherecrates, B. C. 420. To him are doubtfully assigned (Athen. viii. 364, a, where he designates him ὁ ῥυθμικὸς), the comedy of Χείρων, and (Harpocr. s. v. Μεταλλεῖς, p. 242) the comedy of Μεταλλεῖς, usually assigned to Pherecrates.

3. A poet of the new comedy. The Εἰλήθυια, perhaps the Μετεκβαίνουσαι, both attributed to the first Nicomachus, by Suidas, and another, the Ναυμαχία, were probably written by him. Of the first, we have an extract, consisting of forty-two lines, in Athenaeus (vii. p. 290, e.), containing a humorous dialogue, wherein a cook magnifies the requirements of his office. (Meineke, vol. v. p. 583, &c.) Of the last we have two lines preserved by Stobaeus, 38. 10. (Meineke, vol. v. p. 583; Stob. vol. ii. p. 59, ed. Gaisford.) Athenaeus gives (ii. p. 58, a.) three lines, and (xi. p. 781, f.) one line (Meineke, vol. v. p. 587, &c.), from plays of Nicomachus, whose titles he does not mention.

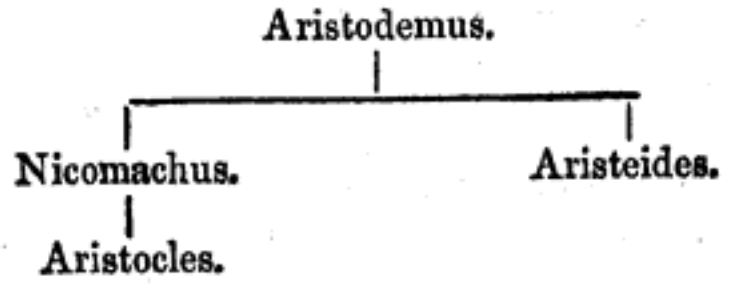
There are several other literary persons of this name. By one of them there is an epigram on an earthquake which desolated Plataea. The point of it lies in the ruins of Plataea, constituting the monument of those that perished. Of the date of the earthquake, or the writer of the epigram, we know nothing. (Anth. Graec. vol. ii. p. 258, ed. Jacobs.) Nor do we know who the Nicomachus is who wrote περὶ ἑορτῶν Αἰγυπτίων, quoted by Athenaeus (xi. p. 478, a.), though this work is sometimes attributed to Nicomachus Gerasenus. [W. M. G.]

NICO'MACHUS (Νικόμαχος Γερασηνός, or Γερασινός), called Gerasenus, from his native place, Gerasa in Arabia, was a Pythagorean, and the writer of a life of Pythagoras, now lost. His date is inferred from his mention of Thrasyllus, who lived under Tiberius. He wrote on arithmetic and music, and is the earliest, we believe, of those whose names became bye-words to express skill in computation. In the Philopatris is the phrase "you number like Nicomachus of Gerasa." This writer exercised no small influence on European studies, in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries; but indirectly. Boëthius, in his arithmetical work, is no more than the abbreviator of the larger work of Nicomachus, now lost. The never-ending distinction of specific ratios by names (see Numbers, old appellations of, in the Supplement to the Penny Cyclopaedia), is the remote consequence of Nicomachus having been a Pythagorean.

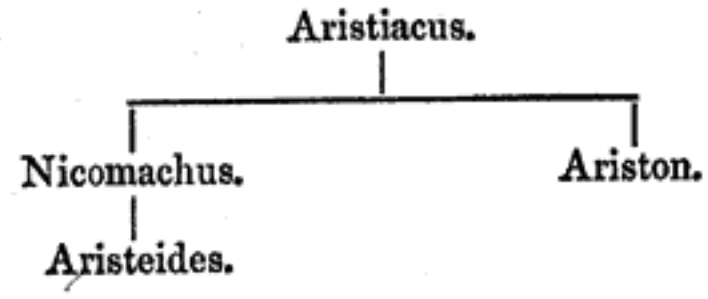
The extant works of Nicomachus are: — 1. Ἀριθμητικῆς εἰσαγωγῆς βιβλία β, the lesser work on arithmetic. It was printed (Gr.) by Christian Wechel, Paris, 1538, 4to; also, after the theologumena Arithmeticae, attributed to Iamblichus, Leipzig, 1817, 8vo. A Latin version by one Appuleius is lost, as also various commentaries, of which only fragments remain. 2. Ἐγχειρίδιον ἁρμονικῆς βιβλία β, a work on music, first printed (Gr.) by Joh. Meursius, in his collection, Leyden, 1616, 4to, and afterward in the collection of Meibomius, (Gr. Lat.), Amsterdam, 1652, 4to; and again in the works of Meursius by Lami, Florence, 1745, fol. The works which are lost are a collection of Pythagorean dogmata, referred to by Iamblichus; a larger work on music, promised by Nicomachus himself, and apparently referred to by Eutocius in his comment on the sphere and cylinder of Archimedes; θεολογούμενα ἀριθμητικῆς, mentioned by Photius, but a different work from that above alluded to; τέχνη ἀριθμητική, the larger work above noted, distinctively mentioned by Photius; a work on geometry, to which Nicomachus himself once refers; περὶ ἑορτῶν Αἰγυπτίων, mentioned by Athenaeus, but whether by this Nicomachus or another, uncertain. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. v. p. 629; Hoffman; Schweiger.) [A. De M.]

NICO'MACHUS (Νικόμαχος), artists. 1. A painter, of the highest distinction, was (according to the common text of Pliny) a Theban, the son and disciple of the painter Aristodemus, the elder brother and teacher of the great painter Aristeides, and the father and teacher of Aristocles. (Plin. H. N. xxxv. 10. s. 36. § 22.)

We have thus the following stemma:—



But the names vary in the MSS., and in the Bamberg MS. they are altogether different, giving the following stemma:—



To decide with certainty between the readings is impossible: it may, however, be remarked that there is no other passage in which the names of Aristodemus and Aristocles occur. (Comp. the Kunstblatt, for 1832, p. 188.)

Nicomachus flourished under Aristratus of Sicyon, and Philip of Macedonia. He may therefore be placed at B. C. 360, and onwards. He was an elder contemporary of Apelles and Protogenes.

He is frequently mentioned by the ancient writers in terms of the highest praise. Cicero says that in his works, as well as in those of Echion, Protogenes, and Apelles, every thing was already perfect. (Brutus, 18.) Plutarch mentions his paintings, with the poems of Homer, as possessing, in addition to their force and grace, the appearance of having been executed with little toil or effort. (Timol. 36.) Vitruvius mentions him as among the artists who were prevented from attaining to the very highest fame, not from any want of skill or industry, but from accidental circumstances (iii. Prooem. § 2).

Pliny tells us that Nicomachus was one of the artists who used only four colours (H. N. xxxv. 7. s. 32; comp. Dict. of Antiq. s. v. Colores), and that, like Parrhasius, he used the Eretrian ochre in his shadows (ibid. 6. s. 21). He was one of the most rapid of painters. As an example, Pliny relates that, having been commissioned by Aristratus to paint the monument which he was erecting to the poet Telestes, Nicomachus postponed the commencement of the work so long as to incur the anger of the tyrant, but, at last, beginning it only a few days before the time fixed for its completion, he fulfilled his engagement with no less skill than rapidity. (Plin. H. N. xxxv. 10. s. 36. § 22.)

As his works, Pliny mentions, the Rape of Proserpine, which once hung above the shrine of Youth (Juventas) in the temple of Minerva, on the Capitol: a Victory with a four-horsed chariot (quadrigam in sublime rapiens), also in the Capitol, where it had been placed by Plancus: Apollo and Diana: Cybele riding on a lion: a celebrated picture of female bacchanals, surprised by satyrs stealing upon them: and a Scylla, at Rome, in the temple of Peace (Plin. l. c.). He was the first who painted Ulysses with the pileus (ibid.). Pliny also mentions his unfinished picture of the Tyndaridae, among the examples of unfinished works by great masters, which were more highly admired than even their perfect paintings. (H. N. xxxv. 11. s. 40. § 41.) His disciples were his brother Aristeides, his son Aristocles, and Philoxenes of Eretria (Plin. l. c. 36. § 22; but compare the commencement of this article), and also Corybas (ibid. 40. § 42).

Stobaeus (Serm. 61) has preserved an interesting sayiug of Nicomachus. An amateur remarking to him that he could see no beauty in the Helen of Zeuxis, the painter, replied, "Take my eyes, and a goddess will be revealed to you." The same answer is ascribed by Aelian (V. H. xiv. 47) to a certain Nicostratus, who is not mentioned elsewhere, and whose name is therefore probably an error for Nicomachus.

2. A statuary or sculptor, whose name appears on a marble base recently discovered in Athens. From the form of the letters, the date of the inscription is supposed to fall in the time of the earliest successors of Alexander. (Ross and Thiersch, in the Kunstblatt for 1840, p. 48.)

3. The engraver of a gem representing a Faun sitting on a tiger's skin. (Bracci, tab. 87 ; Stosch, 44.) [P. S.]

NICO'MACHUS, ME'TIUS FALCO'NIUS, stood second on the roll of consular senators at the death of Aurelian. His speech, in which he urged Tacitus to accept the purple, has been preserved by Vopiscus. (Vopisc. Tacit. 6; TACITUS.) [W. R.]

NICOME'DES I. (Νικομήδης), king of Bithynia, was the eldest son of Zipoetes, whom he succeeded on the throne, B. C. 278. (Memnon, c. 20, ed. Orell. ; Clinton, vol. iii. p. 411.) Like many other Eastern potentates it appears that he commenced his reign by putting to death two of his brothers, but the third, Zipoetes, raised an insurrection against him, and succeeded in maintaining himself for some time in the independent sovereignty of a considerable part of Bithynia. Meanwhile, Nicomedes was threatened with an invasion from Antiochus I., king of Syria, who had already made war upon his father, Zipoetes, and to strengthen himself against this danger, he concluded an alliance with Heracleia, and shortly afterwards with Antigonus Gonatas. The threatened attack, however, passed over with little injury. Antiochus actually invaded Bithynia, but withdrew again without risking a battle. It was apparently as much against his revolted subjects as his foreign enemies that Nicomedes now called in the assistance of more powerful auxiliaries, and entered into an alliance with the Gauls, who, under Leonnorius and Lutarius, were arrived on the opposite side of the Bosporus, and were at this time engaged in the siege of Byzantium, B. C. 277. Having furnished them with the means of crossing over into Asia, he first turned the arms of his new auxiliaries against his brother, Zipoetes, whom he defeated and put to death, and thus reunited the whole of Bithynia under his dominion. (Memnon, c. 16, 18, 19 ; Liv. xxxviii. 16 ; Justin. xxv. 2.) Of the events that followed we have little information ; it is probable that the Gauls subsequently assisted Nicomedes against Antiochus (Trog. Pomp. prol. xxv ; comp. Droysen, Hellenism. vol. ii. p. 178), but no particulars are recorded either of the war or the peace that terminated it. It appears, however, that Nicomedes was left in the undisturbed possession of Bithynia, which he continued to govern from this time till his death, and which rose to a high degree of power and prosperity during his long and peaceful reign. In imitation of so many others of the Greek rulers of Asia, he determined to perpetuate his own name by the foundation of a new capital, and the site which he chose, in the immediate neighbourhood of the Megarian colony of Astacus, was so judiciously selected that the city of Nicomedeia continued for more than six centuries to be one of the richest and most flourishing in Asia. (Memnon, c. 20 ; Strab. xii. p. 563 ; Steph. Byz. v. Νικομήδεια, who erroneously calls Nicomedes son of Zeïlas ; Euseb. Chron. Ol. 129. 1 ; Paus. v. 12. § 7 ; Tzetz. Chil. iii. 950.) The foundation of Nicomedeia is placed by Eusebius (l. c.) in B. C. 264. The duration of the reign of Nicomedes himself after this event is unknown, but his death is assigned with much probability by the Abbé Sevin (Mém. de l'Acad. des Inscr. tom. xv. p. 34) to about the year B. C. 250. He had been twice married ; by his first wife, Ditizela, a Phrygian by birth (who had been accidentally killed by a favourite dog belonging to the king), he had two sons, Prusias and ZIELAS, and a daughter, Lysandra ; but his second wife, Etazeta, persuaded him to set aside his children by this former marriage, and leave his crown to her offspring. The latter were still infants at the time of his death, on which account he confided their guardianship by his will to the two kings, Antigonus Gonatas and Ptolemy, together with the free cities of Heracleia, Byzantium and Cius. But, notwithstanding this precaution, his son Zielas quickly established himself on the throne. [ZIELAS.] (Memnon, c. 22 ; Arrian ap. Tzetz. Chil. iii. 960 ; Plin. H. N. viii. 40 (61), who calls the first wife of Nicomedes, Consingis.) It is probably this Nicomedes who sought to purchase from the Cnidians the celebrated statue of Venus, by Praxiteles, by offering to remit the whole public debt of the city. (Plin. H. N. vii. 39, xxxvi. 4. § 21.) [E. H. B.]

NICOME'DES II., surnamed EPIPHANES, king of Bithynia, was son of Prusias II., and fourth in descent from the preceding. He is first mentioned as accompanying his father to Rome in B. C. 167, where they were favourably received by the senate (Liv. xlv. 44) At this time he must have been a mere child ; but, as he grew up, the popularity of the young prince incurred the jealousy of Prusias, who, wishing to remove him out of the sight of the Bithynians, sent him to Rome as a kind of hostage. Here we find him in B. C. 155, supporting the ambassadors of Prusias, who were sent to defend that monarch against the complaints of Attalus II., king of Bithynia. (Polyb. xxxii. 26.) Nicomedes remained at Rome till B. C. 149, and had, during his residence there, risen to a high place in the favour of the senate ; but this only served to increase the suspicions and enmity of Prusias, who at length despatched Menas to Rome with an embassy to the senate, but with secret instructions to effect the assassination of the prince. But Menas, on finding the favour which Nicomedes enjoyed at Rome, instead of executing his instructions, divulged them to the prince himself, and in conjunction with Andronicus, the ambassador of Attalus, urged him to dethrone his father, who had rendered himself by his vices the object of universal contempt and hatred. Nicomedes readily listened to their suggestions, and departing secretly from Rome landed in Epeirus, where he openly assumed the title of king, and proceeded to the court of Attalus, who received him with open arms, and prepared to support his pretensions with an army Prusias, abandoned by his subjects, took refuge in the citadel of Nicaea, from whence he wrote tc

Rome to solicit the intervention of the senate. But, although three deputies were despatched by the Romans to investigate the matter, they ultimately retired without effecting anything. The inhabitants of Nicomedeia, where Prusias had sought protection, opened the gates of the city to Nicomedes, and the old king was assassinated at the altar of Jupiter, by the express order of his son, B. C. 149. (Appian. Mithr. 4—7 ; Justin. xxxiv. 4 ; Zonar. ix. 28 ; Liv. Epit. l. ; Strab. xiii. p. 624 ; Diod. xxxii. Exc. Phot. p. 523, Exc. Vat. p. 92.)

Nicomedes retained, during a period of no less than fifty-eight years, the crown which he had thus gained by parricide. But of his long and tranquil reign very few events have been transmitted to us. He appears to have uniformly courted the friendship of the Romans, whom he assisted in the war against Aristonicus, B. C. 131. (Strab. xiv. p. 646 ; Oros. v. 10 ; Eutrop. iv. 20.) At a later period, B. C. 103, Marius applied to him for auxiliaries in the war against the Cimbri, which he, however, refused on account of the exactions and oppressions exercised by the Roman farmers of the revenue upon his subjects. (Diod. xxxvi. Exc. Phot. p. 531.) But it is clear that Nicomedes was not wanting in ambition when an opportunity of aggrandizement presented itself, and we find him uniting with Mithridates VI. (apparently about B. C. 102) in the conquest of Paphlagonia, the throne of which had been left vacant by the death of Pylaemenes. The Roman senate, indeed, quickly ordered the two kings to restore their new acquisition, but Nicomedes merely transferred the crown to one of his own sons, who had taken the name of Pylaemenes, and whom he pretended to regard as the rightful heir. (Justin. xxxvii. 4.) Not long after (about B. C. 96, see Clinton, vol. iii. p. 436), an opportunity seemed to offer itself of annexing Cappadocia also to his dominions, Laodice, the widow of Ariarathes VI., having thrown herself upon his protection in order to defend herself and her sons from the designs of Mithridates. Nicomedes (though he can hardly have been less than eighty years of age at this time) married Laodice, and established her in the possession of Cappadocia, from which, however, she was quickly again expelled by Mithridates. After the death of her two sons [ARIARATHES] Nicomedes had the boldness to set up an impostor, whom he alleged to be a third son of Ariarathes VI., and even sent Laodice herself to Rome to bear witness in his favour. The senate, however, rejected his claim, as well as that of Mithridates ; and while they compelled the latter to abandon Cappadocia, in order to preserve an appearance of fairness, they deprived Nicomedes also of Paphlagonia. (Justin. xxxviii. 1, 2.) This is the last event recorded of his reign ; his death must have taken place in or before B. C. 91. (Id. ib. 3 ; Clinton, vol. iii. p. 419.) There appears to be no foundation for the statement of some modern writers that he was murdered by his son, Socrates. (See Visconti, Iconogr. Grecque, vol. ii. p. 188.) [E. H. B.]

COIN OF NICOMEDES II.

NICOMEDES III., PHILOPATOR, king of Bithynia, was the son of Nicomedes II., by his wife Nysa (Memnon, c. 30), though his enemy Mithridates VI. pretended that he was the son of a concubine, a female dancer (Justin. xxxviii. 5. § 1). It was probably on this pretext that the latter set up against him his brother Socrates, surnamed the Good (ὁ Χρηστός), whom he persuaded to assume the title of king and the name of Nicomedes, and invade the territories of his brother at the head of an army furnished him by Mithridates. Nicomedes was unable to cope with a competitor thus supported, and was quickly driven out of Bithynia ; but he now had recourse to the protection of the Roman senate, who, it seems, had already ackowledged his title to the throne, and who now immediately issued a decree for his restoration, the execution of which was confided to L. Cassius and M'. Aquilius. To this Mithridates did not venture to offer any open opposition, and Nicomedes was quietly reseated on the throne of his father, B. C. 90 (Appian, Mithr. 7, 10, 11, 13 ; Memnon, c. 30 ; Justin. xxxviii. 3, 5 ; Liv. Epit. lxxiv.). But, not satisfied with this, the Roman deputies urged Nicomedes to make reprisals, by plundering excursions into the territories of Mithridates himself ; and the king, however unwilling to provoke so powerful an adversary, was compelled to listen to their suggestions, in order to gratify the avarice of his Roman allies. Mithridates at first sent ambassadors to complain of these aggressions, but, as may be supposed, without effect. Thereupon he assembled a large army, and prepared to invade Bithynia, B. C. 88. Nicomedes on his part gathered together a force of 50,000 foot and 6000 horse, with which he met the army of Mithridates under his generals Archelaus and Neoptolemus, at the river Amnius in Paphlagonia, but was totally defeated with great slaughter. The Roman officers, who had inconsiderately brought on this danger, without having a Roman army to support them, soon shared the same fate, and Nicomedes himself, after a vain attempt in conjunction with L. Cassius, to raise a fresh army in Phrygia, abandoned the contest without farther struggle, and took refuge at Pergamus, from whence he soon after fled to Italy (Appian, Mithr. 11—19 ; Memnon, c. 31 ; Justin. xxxviii. 3 ; Liv. Epit. lxxvi. ; Strab. xii. p. 562). Here he was compelled to be a passive spectator of the contest between his victorious adversary the Romans ; but in B. C. 84 the restoration of Nicomedes was one of the conditions of the peace concluded between Sulla and Mithridates, and C. Curio was deputed by the Roman general to reinstate the Bithynian monarch in the possession of his kingdom (App. Mithr. 60 ; Plut. Sull. 22, 24 ; Memnon, c. 35 ; Liv. Epit. lxxxiii.). Nicomedes reigned nearly ten years after this second restoration, but of the events of this period we know nothing, and it was probably one of peace and prosperity. The only occasion on which his name is mentioned is in B. C. 81, when Caesar, then very young, was sent to him by the praetor M. Minucius Thermus to obtain the assistance of the Bithynian fleet. The young man was received with the greatest favour by Nicomedes ; and the intercourse between them gave rise to the most injurious suspicions, which were never afterwards forgotten by the enemies of Caesar (Suet. Caes. 2, 49 ; Plut. Caes. 1). Nicomedes died at the beginning of the year B. C. 74, and having no children, by his will bequeathed his kingdom to the Roman people. Mithridates, however, set up an impostor, whom he pretended to be the legitimate son of Nicomedes, and whose claims to the throne he prepared to support by arms. For the events that followed see MITHRIDATES. (Eutrop. vi. 6 ; Liv. Epit. xciii.; App. Mithr. 71 ; Epist. Mithr. ad Arsac. ap. Sall. Hist. iv. p. 239, ed. Gerlach.)

Great confusion has been made by many modern writers in regard to the later kings of Bithynia, and it has been frequently supposed that there were not three but four kings of the name of Nicomedes. It is, however, certain from Appian (Mithr. 10), that Nicomedes III., who was expelled by Mithridates, was the grandson of Prusias II. ; nor is there any reasonable doubt that he was the same who bequeathed his kingdom to the Romans, and was consequently the last king of Bithynia. A passage of Appian (Mithr. 7) which seems to assert the contrary, is certainly either erroneous or corrupt ; and Syncellus (p. 276, c.), who reckons eight kings of Bithynia, beginning with Zipoetes, probably included Socrates, the brother of Nicomedes III., in his enumeration. (See on this subject Eckhel, vol. ii. pp. 444, 445 ; Visconti, Iconographie Grecque, vol. ii. p. 191 ; Orelli, Onomast. Tull. p. 420 ; and Clinton, F. H. vol. iii. p. 418—420.)

Nicomedes III., as well as his father, takes on his coins the title of Epiphanes. They can be distinguished only by the difference of physiognomy, and by the dates, which refer to an era commencing B. C. 288, during the reign of Zipoetes [ZIPOETES].

COIN OF NICOMEDES III.

NICOME'DES (Νικομήδης), literary. 1. A commentator on Orpheus. (Athen. xiv. p. 637, a. b.)

2. Of Acanthus, quoted regarding the age of Perdiccas. (Athen. v. 217, d.)

3. A commentator on Heracleitus. (Diog. Laërt. ix. 15.)

4. The writer of annotations on the Ἀναλυτικὰ πρότερα of Aristotle, which exist in some libraries, but are unedited. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iii. p. 215.)

5. Of Pergamus, a rhetorician, and a pupil of Chrestus, flourished in the second century of the Christian era. (Philost. Vit. Soph. ii. 11.)

6. Of Smyrna, a physician and epigrammatist. Brunck has inadvertently attributed to him eight epigrams that belong to Nicodemus. We have two epigrams written by him, both votive, and engraved on the same statue, which was one of Aesculapius, fabricated by the sculptor Boëthus. The style proves that they were written long after the time of Boëthus. Indeed the first epigram bears this expressly, χειρῶν δεῖγμα παλαιγενέων. We have also an epitaph on Nicomedes. (Anthol. Graec. vol. iii. p. 92, &c. x. p. 131, &c. xiii. p. 924. &c. ed. Jacobs.) [W. M. G.]

NICON (Νίκων), historical. 1. A Tarentine, who headed the insurrection of his fellow-citizens against Milon, the governor, who had been left by Pyrrhus in command of the citadel of Tarentum. (Zonar. viii. 6, p. 379, a.)

2. Another Tarentine, surnamed PERCON, who, together with Philemenus, betrayed his native city to Hannibal during the second Punic war, B. C. 212. The plan was formed by thirteen noble youths, of whom Nicon and Philemenus were the leaders. Having contrived to hold frequent conferences with Hannibal, and concert all their measures with him, without exciting any suspicion, they appointed a night for the execution of their scheme, on which the Roman governor, M. Livius, was to give a great feast: and Nicon admitted Hannibal with a body of troops at one gate, while Philemenus contrived to make himself master of another, by which he introduced 1000 select African soldiers. The Romans were taken completely by surprise, and Hannibal made himself master, almost without opposition, of the whole of Tarentum, except the citadel. (Polyb. viii. 26—36 ; Liv. xxv. 8—10.) The latter was closely blockaded by the Carthaginians and Tarentines, and in 210 a Roman fleet of twenty ships, under D. Quinctius having advanced to its relief, was encountered by that of the Tarentines under Democrates, and a naval action ensued, in which Nicon greatly distinguished himself by boarding the ship of the Roman commander, and running Quinctius himself through the body with a spear: an exploit which decided the fortune of the day in favour of the Tarentines. (Liv. xxvi. 39.) The following year (B. C. 209) the Romans having in their turn surprised Tarentum, Nicon fell, fighting bravely, in the combat which ensued in the forum of the city. (Id. xxvii. 16.)

3. A relation of Agathocles, the infamous minister and favourite of Ptolemy Philopator, who was put to death, together with his kinsman, B. C. 205. (Polyb. xv. 33).

4. The treasurer of Perseus, who is called NICIAS by Livy and Appian, is named Nicon by Diodorus (xxx. Exc. Vales. p. 579).

5. A leader of the Cilician pirates, who was taken prisoner by P. Servilius Isauricus. (Cic. in Verr. v. 30. § 79.) He is probably the same person mentioned by Polyaenus, as having occupied the town of Pherae in Messenia, from whence he ravaged the neighbouring country ; but having at length been taken prisoner, he surrendered the town into the hands of the Messenians, in order to save his own life. (Polyaen. ii. 35.)

6. A Samian, who saved the ship of which he was steersman, by a dexterous stratagem. (Id. v. 34.) [E. H. B.]

NICON (Νίκων), literary. 1. A comic writer, assigned by Meineke to the new comedy. A fragment of three lines is preserved by Athenaeus, from his play Κιθαρωδός (xi. p. 487, c.), and Pollux gives a portion of the same passage (vi. 99). (Meineke, Frag. Poet. Com. vol. i. p. 495, v. p. 578.)

2. An Armenian abbot. He fled from his parents and was trained in a monastery on the confines of Pontus and Paphlagonia. About A. D. 961, he was sent by the abbot of his monastery on a missionary tour. In the course of it he visited Crete, recently freed from the Saracens, and reclaimed the inhabitants to Christianity. He was employed A. D. 981 to intercede with the Bulgarians, who were making inroads into the Grecian empire, and died, about A. D. 998. He was canonised, his name being in the calendar of both the Greek and Latin churches, on the 26th of November. From his life, written originally in Greek, and translated by Sirmondus, Baronius (Annales, vol. x.) has extracted the account of numerous miracles performed by him. Two treatises against the Armenians ascribed to him (Cave speaks doubtfully of the last), are printed, in Greek and Latin, by Cotelerius (Not. ad Patres Apostol. pp. 152, 237). Besides these, other unpublished works of Nicon are mentioned. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. x. p. 299, vol. xi. p. 275 ; Cave, Hist. Lit. vol. ii. p. 103.)

3. A monk of Rhaethus in Palestine. Under the reign of Constantine Ducas, about A. D. 1060, instigated, it is said, by the fear lest the Saracens should in their conquests obliterate the records of the Christian faith, he compiled a work entitled, Παν*δέκτης τῶν ἑρμηνειῶν τῶν θείων ἐντολῶν τοῦ* Κυρίου. It consists of two books, and sixty-three chapters, containing extracts from the Scriptures, the ecclesiastical canons, the fathers, and other ecclesiastical documents, besides the civil law. Except some extracts given by Cotelerius (Monument. Eccles. Graec.), no part has been published. Fabricius (Bibl. Graec. vol. xi. p. 275, &c.) gives an account of the sources from which Nicon has drawn his extracts, as well as of other writings attributed to him. [W. M. G.]

NICON (Νίκων), an architect and geometrician of Pergamus in Mysia, the father of the physician Galen. (Suid. s. v. Γάληνος ; Joann. Tzetz. Chil. xii. 9.) He himself superintended the early education of his son, by whom he is highly praised in several places, not only for his knowledge of astronomy, grammar, arithmetic, and various other branches of philosophy, but also for his patience, justice, benevolence, and other virtues. (Galen, De Dignosc. et Cur. Animi Morb. c. 8, vol. v. p. 41, &c., De Prob. et Prav. Aliment. Succ. c. 1, vol. vi. p. 755, &c., De Ord. Libror. suor. vol. xix. p. 59.) He died when his son was in his twentieth year, A. D. 149, 150. (l. c. vol. vi. p. 756.) [W. A. G.]

NICON (Νίκων), a physician, mentioned by Cicero, B. C. 45 (ad Fam. vii. 20), the tutor of Sextus Fadius, and the author of a work Περὶ Πολυφαγίας, De Edacitate.

He is perhaps the person quoted by Celsus (De Medic. v. 18. § 26, p. 87), and called in some editions Micon. [W. A. G.]

NICO'PHANES (Νικοφάνης), a native of Megalopolis. He was a man of distinction, and was connected with Aratus by the rites of hospitality. In accordance with a secret agreement entered into with Aratus, Nicophanes and Cercidas induced the Megalopolitans to send an embassy to the congress of the Achaeans, to induce them to join them in seeking for assistance from Antigonus. They were themselves deputed for this object, in which they were successful, B. C. 225. (Polyb. ii. 48, &c.) [C. P. M.]

NICO'PHANES, a Greek painter, who appears, from the way in which he is mentioned by Pliny (H. N. xxxv. 10. s. 36. § 23), to have been a younger contemporary or successor of Apelles. Pliny says that in beauty few could compare with him ; but it must have been that meretricious kind of beauty, into which the finished grace of Apelles might easily be degraded by an imitation, for Polemon numbered him among the πορνογράφοι. (Athen. xiii. p. 567, b.) * In apparent contradiction to this judgment are the words of Pliny (l. c.) : "Cothurnus ei et gravitas artis." But Sillig proposes to amend the passage by altering the punctuation, thus : "Annumeratur his et Nicophanes, elegans et concinnus, ita ut venustate ei pauci comparentur : cothurnus ei et gravitas artis multum a Zeuxide et Apelle abest." A simpler, and perhaps equally satisfactory explanation is, that this is one of the many examples of Pliny's want of the power of discrimination. [P. S.]

NICOPHON and NICOPHRON (Νικοφῶν, Νικόφρων). The former is undoubtedly the correct orthography ; Suidas is the only authority for the latter. He mentions the name four times (s. vv. Νικόφρων, ἀράχνη, σέρφος, κοιμίσαι.), in the two first of which he calls him Νικόφρων, but everywhere else, both by him and others, Νικοφῶν is the name given. He was the son of Theron, an Athenian, and a contemporary of Aristophanes at the close of his career. Athenaeus (iii. 126, e.) states that he belonged to the old, but he seems rather to have belonged to the middle comedy. 1. We learn from the argument to the Plutus III. of Aristophanes that he competed for the prize with four others, B. C. 388, Aristophanes exhibiting the second edition of his Plutus, and Nicophon a play called Ἄδωνις, of which no fragments remain, and which is nowhere else mentioned. 2. Suidas (s. v. Νικόφρων) and Eudocia alone mention another play of his, Ἐξ ᾅδου ἀνιών. Besides these, he wrote other four plays, which are more frequently mentioned. 3. Ἀφροδίτης γοναί (Suid. s. vv. Νικόφρων, ἀράχνη, σέρφος ; Pollux, x. 156 ; Schol. ad Aristoph. Aves, 82, 1283). 4. Πανδώρα (Suid. s. vv. Νικ., κοιμίσαι ; Athen. vii. p. 323, b. ; Pollux, vii. 33). 5. Χειρογάστορες (Athen. iii. p. 126, e. ix. p. 389, a. ; Schol. ad Aristoph. Aves, 1550). Suidas calls this play Ἐγχειρογάστορες. Meineke, on the authority of the Etym. M. p. 367, 32, gives to Nicophon three lines quoted by Athenaeus (xiv. p. 645, b.) from a play bearing the name of Χειρογάστορες, which had before been given to Nicochares, and in this he is followed by Dindorf. 6. Σειρῆνες (Suid.; Athen. iii. p. 80, b. vi. p. 269, e. ix. p. 368, b.). Besides these references there are others of less importance, collected by Meineke. No more than about twenty-seven lines of his writings remain ; and from these, we can only say, as to his merits as a comic writer, that he seems to have possessed no small fund of humour. (Meineke, Frag. Poet. Comic. vol. i. p. 256, &c. vol. ii. p. 848, &c. ; Clinton, F. H. vol. ii. p. 101.) [W. M. G.]

NICO'STHENES. 1. A Greek painter, of whom we only know that he was the teacher of Theodorus of Samos, and of Stadieus. (Plin. H. N. xxxv. 11. s. 40. § 42.) 2. A vase painter,

* A similar, or rather worse character is given by Plutarch (De Aud. Poet. p. 18. b.) of a painter Chaerephanes, who is not elsewhere mentioned, and whose name Sillig suspects to be a corruption of Nicophanes.

several works of whose have been recently discovered. (Raoul-Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorn, p. 9.) [P. S.]

NICO'STRATE (Νικόστρατη). 1. [CAMENAE.]

2. Wife of Oebalus, and mother of Hippocoon. (Schol. ad Eurip. Or. 447; OEBALUS.] [L. S.]

NICO'STRATUS (Νικόστρατος), a son of Menelaus by the slave Pieris. (Paus. iii. 18. § 7, 19. § 9.) According to others (Apollod. iii. 11. § 1), he was a son of Menelaus by Helena. [L. S.]

NICO'STRATUS (Νικόστρατος), historical. 1. An Athenian general, the son of Diitrephes. We first hear of him in B. C. 427. The struggle between the oligarchical and democratical parties in Corcyra had commenced, when Nicostratus arrived from Naupactus with twelve ships and a body of 500 Messenians. Through his mediation a compact was entered into between the contending parties, and a defensive and offensive alliance with the Athenians was formed. As Nicostratus was about to depart the leaders of the commonalty persuaded him to leave five of his vessels, promising to man five for him instead. On board these they attempted to place their enemies, but the latter fled for refuge to the temple of the Dioscuri. Nicostratus strove to allay their fears, but to no purpose. About 400 of the party took refuge in the temple of Here, and were thence carried over to the island of Ptychia. A few days afterwards, before the Athenians had departed, the Peloponnesian fleet under Alcidas and Brasidas arrived. The democratical party were thrown into consternation. The Athenian squadron set out in good order to meet the enemy, and skilfully sustained the attack of thirty-three vessels of the Peloponnesian fleet; and Nicostratus was beginning to repeat the manoeuvres of Phormio, which had been attended with such success off Naupactus, when the remaining part of the fleet, having routed the Corcyraeans, advanced against the Athenians, who were compelled to retire. (Thuc. iii. 75, &c.) In B. C. 424, Nicostratus was one of the colleagues of Nicias in the expedition in which Cythera was taken. (Thuc. iv. 53, &c.) He was one of the Athenians who took the oaths to the year's truce concluded between Sparta and Athens (Thuc. iv. 119); and later in the same year was the colleague of Nicias in the expedition to Chalcidice [NICIAS]. (Thuc. iv. 129, 130). In B. C. 418, Nicostratus and Laches led a body of 1000 heavy-armed soldiers and 300 cavalry to Argos, accompanied by Alcibiades as ambassador. The Athenian troops, accompanied by the allies of Argos, proceeded to attack Orchomenos, which made no resistance. From Orchomenos, having been joined by the Argives, the combined forces proceeded against Tegea. Agis marched to protect the place, and in the battle which ensued near Mantineia Nicostratus and his colleague were both slain. (Thuc. v. 61—74).

2. An Athenian, known by the surname ὁ καλός, was slain in an engagement with the forces of Thrasybulus, in a descent which the latter made from Phyle (Xen. Hellen. ii. 4. § 6).

3. Two different persons of the name of Nicostratus are mentioned in the speech of Demosthenes against Eubulides; one, the son of Niciades, the other a foreigner, who was surreptitiously enrolled amongst the citizens through the agency of Eubulides. (Dem. adv. Eubul, pp. 1305, 1317, ed. Reiske.)

4. An Athenian, against whom Demosthenes wrote a speech for Apollodorus, who charges him with a good deal of ingratitude and unneighbourly conduct. Nothing more is known of him than the incidents mentioned in the speech itself, which are not worth detailing here.

5. An Athenian, who died away from Attica, leaving some property; for one of the parties in a law-suit about which Isaeus wrote the speech, Περὶ τοῦ Νικοστράτου κλήρου.

6. An Argive, who, according to Diodorus (xvi. 44), was not only possessed of uncommon strength and courage, but was equally distinguished for his prudence and discretion both in the council and in the field. In battle he wore a lion's skin and carried a club in imitation of Hercules. He conducted a body of 3000 Argives to the assistance of the Persian king, Ochus, for his expedition against Egypt; the king having specially requested that the Argives would send him at the head of such troops as they could furnish. Nicostratus seems to have taken a conspicuous part in the military operations of the king. (Diod. xvi. 48.) Plutarch (Apophth. p. 192. a., de Vit. Pud. p. 535) records a saying of his in reply to Archidamus, king of Sparta, who promised him a large sum of money and any Spartan woman whom he might choose as a wife to induce him to deliver up to him a fortress of which he had the command.

7. An officer in the service of Alexander the Great. He was one of those who joined with Sostratus in entering into a conspiracy to assassinate Alexander in revenge for an insult offered to Hermolaus. The conspiracy, happily, miscarried. (Curt. viii. 6. § 9, &c.)

8. A native of Trichone, in Aetolia, who is spoken of more than once by Polybius as having, in conjunction with a man named Lattabus, in violation of treaties and in time of peace, made an outrageous attack upon the congress of the Pamboeotians. (Polyb. iv. 3, ix. 34.)

9. A Rhodian, who commanded a vessel in the naval battle with Philip off Chios, B. C. 201. In B. C. 168 he was one of the ambassadors sent by the Rhodians to L. Aemilius and to Perseus. (Polyb. xvi. 5, xxix. 4.)

10. Praetor of the Achaean league in B. C. 197. He was present at the meeting held at Mycenae, at the invitation of Nabis, at which Flamininus and Attalus were also present. On the part of the Achaeans he entered into a truce for four months with Nabis. (Liv. xxxii. 39, 40.) Later in the same year, being at Sicyon with a body of troops, by a skilfully devised stratagem he inflicted a severe defeat on the forces of Philip, stationed at Corinth under the command of Androsthenes [ANDROSTHENES], while they were ravaging the lands of Pellene, Sicyon, and Phlius. (Liv. xxxiii. 14, 15.)

11. A native of Cilicia, and a man of distinguished family. The period when he lived may be gathered from the statement of Quinctilian (Inst. Orat. ii. 8. § 14), that in his youth he had seen Nicostratus, who was then an old man. When a boy, Nicostratus was carried off by pirates, and taken to Aegeae, where he was purchased from them by some person. He was renowned for his strength and prowess, and at one of the Olympic festivals gained the prize on the same day in the wrestling match and the pancratium. (Paus. v. 21. § 11; Tacit. de Orat. 10.) [C. P. M.]

NICO'STRATUS, literary. 1. The youngest of the three sons of Aristophanes, according to Apollodorus. He was himself a comic poet. By Athenaeus (xiii. p. 597, d.) he is expressly called a poet of the middle comedy. But he belonged also in part to the new comedy. Harpocration (p. 266) speaks of his play called Ὀρνιθευτής, as belonging to that species of comedy; and some of the characters which he introduced in other dramas demonstrate the same. In his Βασιλεῖς he introduced a boasting soldier (Athen. vi. p. 230, d.); in his Τοκιστής, an avaricious money-lender (Athen. xv. p. 685, f.) and a vaunting cook (Athen. xiv. p. 664, b.). Photius (Cod. 190, p. 153, ed. Bekk.) has got a story that Nicostratus being inflamed with a mad passion for some one named Tettigidaea, leapt off the Leucadian rock.

The titles of nineteen of the plays of Nicostratus have come down to us. Three of these, the Ἄντυλλος (Athen. iii. 108, c. 118, e.), the Οἰνοπίων (Athen. iv. p. 169, e. vii. p. 280, d.; Suidas, s. v. Φιλέταιρος), and the Πάνδροσος (Athen. xiii. p. 587, d. xv. p. 693, a. b.) were also attributed to Philetaerus, who, according to some authorities (Schol. ad Plat. Apol. Socr. p. 331), was the third son of Aristophanes [PHILETAERUS]. The remaining plays of Nicostratus were: 7. Ἱεροφάντης. 8. Κλίνη. 9. Ἄβρα. 10. Ἡσίοδος. 11. Διάβολος. 12. Ἀντερῶσα. 13. Ἑκάτη. 14. Μάγειρος. 15. Ὦτις. 16. Πλοῦτος. 17. Σύρος. 18. Ἀπελαυνόμενος. 19. Ψευδοστιγματίας. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. p. 472; Meineke, Hist. Crit. Com. Graec. pp. 346, &c.; Bode, Gesch. der Hellen. Dichtkunst, vol. iii. part. ii. p. 410.)

2. A dramatic writer mentioned by Diogenes Laërtius (iv. 18). He bore the nickname of Κλυταιμνήστρα, and is probably a different person from the preceding. Meineke is inclined to believe him to have been the author of the Theseis, mentioned by Diogenes Laërtius (ii. 59), though some MSS. there have the reading Πυθόστρατος.

3. A tragic actor, who lived before B. C. 420. He is confounded by Suidas (s. v.) with the son of Aristophanes. (Xen. Symp. iii. 11; Plut. Moral. p. 348, f., Append. Vatic. i. 65; Meineke, Hist. Crit. Com. Graec. p. 347.)

4. A rhetorician, a native of Macedonia. He lived in the time of M. Antoninus. According to Suidas (s. v.) he was the author of the following works: Δεκαμυθία, Εἰκόνες, Πολυμυθία, Θαλαττουργοί, and several other works, encomia on the emperor, and various others. Some of his μύθοι were in a dramatic form. Philostratus (de Vit. Sophist. ii. 31) praises the elegance of his style. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vi. p. 135.)

5. A native of Trapezus, who lived in the reign of Aurelian. He wrote an account of the exploits of Philippus, the successor of Gordianus among the Arabs; and also an account of Decius, Gallus, Valerianus, and the son of Gallienus, up to the time of the expedition of Valerianus against Sapor, the king of the Persians, A. D. 259. (Voss. de Hist. Graec. p. 288, ed. Westermann.)

6. A writer on music, mentioned in a fragment annexed to Censorinus, and attributed to him by many. (Voss. de Hist. Graec. p. 475.) [C. P. M.]

NICO'STRATUS (Νικόστρατος), a physician, mentioned by Antiphanes the younger (ap. Athen. xiii. 51, p. 586; Harpocr. s. v. Ἀντίκυρα) as having left to a courtezan, at his death, a large quantity of hellebore, whence she acquired the nick-name Anticyra. He is perhaps the same person whose medical formulae are frequently quoted by Andromachus (ap. Gal. De Compos. Medicam. sec. Loc. viii. 2, ix. 6, vol. xiii. pp. 139, 308, and Aët. iii. 1, 32, p. 478), and others, and who must, therefore, have lived in or before the first century after Christ. [W. A. G.]

NICO'STRATUS, artist. [NICOMACHUS.]

NIGER, a Latin writer (judging by his name) on Materia Medica, who lived later than Cratevas, and a little before Dioscorides (Dioscor. De Mat. Med. i. praef., vol. i. p. 2), and therefore probably about the beginning of the first century after Christ. He seems to have enjoyed some reputation as a writer, as he is mentioned by St. Epiphanius (adv. Haeres. i. 1. § 3. p. 3), and several times by Galen among eminent pharmaceutical authors (De Simplic. Medicam. Temper. ac Facult. vi. praef. vol. xi. p. 797, De Antid. i. 2. vol. xiv. p. 7, Gloss. Hippocr. praef. vol. xix. p. 64). Caelius Aurelianus calls him the friend of Tullius Bassus (De Morb. Acut. iii. 16. p. 233), and Galen says he was a follower of Asclepiades (l. c. vol. xi. p. 794.).* He is perhaps the person called Sextus Niger by Pliny (Index to H. N. xx.), and some suppose his name to have been Petronius Niger. [PETRONIUS.] [W. A. G.]

NIGER, AQUI'LLIUS, a writer referred to by Suetonius for a statement respecting the death of the consul Hirtius. (Suet. Aug. 11.)

NIGER, BRUTI'DIUS, aedile A. D. 22, and one of the accusers of D. Silanus (Tac. Ann. iii. 66). He appears to be the same as the Brutidius of whom Juvenal speaks (x. 82) in his account of the fall of Sejanus, and likewise the same as the Brutidius Niger, of whose writings the elder Seneca has preserved two passages relating to the death of Cicero. (Senec. Suas. 7.)

NIGER, Q. CAECI'LIUS, by birth a Sicilian and quaestor of Verres during his administration of Sicily, endeavoured to obtain the conduct of the accusation of Verres, pretending to be his enemy, but in reality desiring to deprive the Sicilians of the powerful advocacy of Cicero. The speech of Cicero, entitled Divinatio in Q. Caecilium, was delivered against this Caecilius, when the judices had to decide to which of the two the prosecution should be entrusted.

NIGER, LENTULUS. [LENTULUS, No. 33.]

NIGER, NO'VIUS, quaestor in B. C. 63, was appointed to investigate the cases of the Catilinarian conspirators, and Caesar, who was then praetor, was charged by L. Vettius as one of Catiline's conspirators. Caesar subsequently cast Novius into prison for permitting a magistrate of higher rank to be accused before him. (Suet. Caes. 17.)

NIGER, C. PESCE'NNIUS, was descended from a respectable family of equestrian rank, which had attained to provincial distinction at Aquinum. The name of his father was Annius Fuscus, his mother was Lampridia. After having long served as a centurion he passed with credit through the various stages of military advancement under Marcus Aurelius and his son, was raised by the latter to the consulship, and appointed to the command of the Syrian armies, chiefly, it is said, through the interest of Narcissus, the favourite athlete of the prince. After intelligence had reached the East of the death of Commodus, of the shameful elevation and of the miserable end of Julianus, Pescennius was saluted emperor by his troops, A. D. 193. Nor were his prospects altogether hopeless. Severus, his former friend, was, indeed, in possession of the capital, but it was well known that he was regarded with evil eyes by the senate, who, as well as the populace, had even before the death of Julianus openly declared their partiality to Niger. His chances of success, moreover, were perhaps rendered more complicated, but by no means diminished, by the pretensions of Clodius Albinus, who, although he had for the time being, acknowledged the claims of Severus, and professed himself satisfied with the second title of Caesar, was holding the armies of Gaul in hand, ready to take advantage of any opportunity which might offer. But Pescennius was no match for the vigorous activity of his rival. While still loitering listlessly in fancied security at Antioch, he received information that Severus was already marching to the East, at the head of a powerful force. Then, at length, he occupied Thrace and Northern Greece, threw strong garrisons into Byzantium and the most important cities of Asia, fortified the defiles of Taurus, and, at the same time, attempted, but without success, to open negotiations by offering to divide the empire. The first battle was fought by his chief legate Aemilianus, who having encountered the general of Severus in the vicinity of Cyzicus was routed and slain. This engagement was followed by a second near Nicaea in Bithynia, in which Pescennius commanded in person with no better fortune; the third encounter, which took place on the gulph of Issus near the Cilician gates, decided the war, for having been defeated after a bloody contest in which no less than 20,000 of his men are said to have fallen, and Antioch having soon after been captured, the pretender fled towards the Euphrates, was overtaken, brought back, and put to death A. D. 194. His wife, his sons, together with his whole family, shared the same fate, and his property was confiscated. His head, fixed upon a pole, was despatched to Byzantium, which still held out against the conqueror, and was exhibited to the besieged as a significant warning of what they might expect should they continue to offer an obstinate resistance.

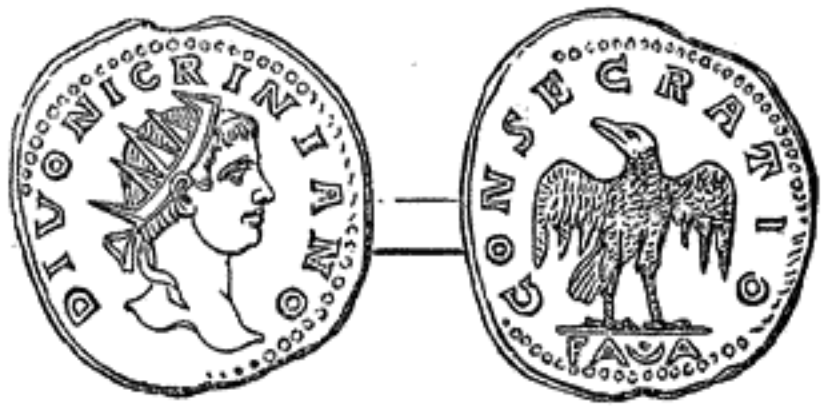
Dion Cassius speaks of Niger as a person not very conspicuous for good or for evil, deserving neither much censure nor much praise. His most marked characteristics, both physical and moral, were all of a military cast, and he is said to have set up Camillus, Annibal, and Marius as his models. He was tall of stature, muscular in limb, but graceful withal, a proficient in athletic exercises, and gifted with a voice so loud and clear, that he could be heard distinctly at the distance of a mile. His cognomen of Niger is said to have been derived from the extreme swarthiness of his throat, although otherwise fair skinned and of ruddy complexion. Spartianus has preserved many anecdotes of the firmness with which he enforced the most rigid discipline upon all under his command, but he preserved his popularity by the strict impartiality which he displayed, and by the bright example of frugality, temperance, and hardy endurance of toil which he exhibited in his own person. We are told that he proposed to M. Aurelius and to Commodus many salutary regulations for the better government of the provinces, and he might undoubtedly have proved most useful to the state could he have remained satisfied with filling a subordinate station, but he was led astray by the counsels of Severus Aurelianus whose daughters were betrothed to his sons, and who persuaded him to persevere, against his own better judgment, in the attempt to mount the throne. The invectives of the emperor Severus, who represented him as a hypocrite and a debauchee, must be attributed to jealous rancour; and, although he was but moderately versed in literature, harsh in his address, and under the dominion of strong and vehement passions, he is well entitled to the comprehensive praise of having been a good soldier, a good officer, and good general. (Dion Cass. lxxii. 8, lxxiii. 13, 14, lxxiv. 6—8; Spartian. Julian. 5, Sever. 6—9, Pescenn. Niger; Aur. Vict. de Caes. 20, Epit. 20; Eutrop. viii. 10.) [W. R.]

COIN OF PESCENNIUS NIGER.

NIGER, TRE'BIUS, one of the companions of L. Lucullus, proconsul in Hispania Baetica, B. C. 150, wrote a work on natural history which is referred to by Pliny (H. N. ix. 25. s. 41, 30. s. 48, xxxii. 2. s. 6).

NIGI'DIUS FI'GULUS. [FIGULUS.]

NIGRINIA'NUS, a Roman Caesar or Augustus, known to us from medals only, and these struck after his death. They are very rare, but exist in all the three metals, bearing upon the obverse a head, either bare or radiated, with the legend DIVO NIGRINIANO; on the reverse, a funeral pyre, or an eagle, or an altar, or an eagle upon an altar, with the word CONSECRATIO. It has been conjectured that he was the son of Alexander, who assumed the purple in Africa, A. D. 311, and was soon after destroyed by Maxentius. There is not, however, a jot of evidence in favour of this hypothesis. (Eckhel, vol. vii. p. 520.) [W. R.]



COIN OF NIGRINIANUS.

NIGRI'NUS, AVI'DIUS, was proconsul in a province in the reign of Domitian, but his name does not occur in the Fasti. (Plin. Ep. x. 71. s. 74, 72. s. 75.)

NIGRI'NUS, C. PETRO'NIUS PO'NTIUS, consul A. D. 37, the year in which the emperor Tiberius died. (Dion Cass. lviii. 27; Suet. Tib. 73; Tac. Ann. vi. 45.)

NILEUS (Νείλευς), a Greek physician, whose name is sometimes written Nilus (Νεῖλος) and Neleus (Νήλευς), though Νείλευς is probably the most correct form of the word, as it is the most common. He must have lived some time in or before the third century B. C., as he is mentioned by Heracleides of Tarentum (ap. Galen. Comment. in Hippocr. "De Artic." iv. 40, vol. xviii. pt. i. p. 736). He is quoted by Celsus (v. 18. § 9, vi. 6. §§ 8, 11, viii. 20. pp. 86, 120, 121, 185), Caelius Aurelianus (De Morb. Acut. ii. 29, p. 142), Galen (De Compos. Medicam. sec. Loc. ii. 2, iv. 8, viii. 5, ix. 2, vol. xii. pp. 568, 569, 765, 766, 806, vol. xiii. pp. 181, 182, 239, De Antid. ii. 10, vol. xiv. p. 165), Alexander Trallianus (viii. 12. p. 268), Oribasius (Synops. iii. p. 50; and Coll. Medic. in Mai's Class. Auct. e Codic. Vatic. Edit. vol. iv. pp. 123, 130, 131, 153, 155), Aëtius (i. 4, 10, ii. 3, 21, 24, 108, ii. 4, 2, iii. 1, 16, 17, pp. 166, 307, 308, 353, 365, 454, 455), and Paulus Aegineta (iii. 22, 37, 46, 49, vii. 16, 18, pp. 432, 458, 470, 473, 672, 684), and was celebrated for the invention of a machine for the reduction of dislocations, called πλινθίον, of which a description is given by Oribasius (De Machinam. c. 8. p. 167.) [W. A. G.]

NILO'XENUS (Νειλόξενος). 1. A native of Naucratis in Egypt, mentioned by Plutarch (Sept. Sap. Conv. 2) as a sage who lived in the time of Solon.

2. A Macedonian, son of Satyrus. He was a friend of Alexander the Great, and was left by him with an army to superintend the affairs of the province, when he founded Alexandria on Mount Caucasus. (Arr. iii. 28.) [C. P. M.]

NILUS (Νεῖλος), the god of the river Nile in Egypt, is said to have been a son of Oceanus and Thetys, and father of Memphis and Chione. (Hes. Theog. 338; Apollod. ii. 1. § 4; Serv. ad Aen. iv. 250.) Pindar (Pyth. iv. 90) calls him a son of Cronos. [L. S.]

NILUS or NEILUS (Νεῖλος), the name of several Byzantine writers. A full account of them is given by Leo Allatius, Diatribe de Nilis et eorum Scriptis, in the edition of the letters of Nilus [see below, No. 1], Rome, 1688, and by Harless (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. x. p. 3, &c.), to which writers we must refer for further particulars and authorities. It is only the most important of them, and the chief facts connected with them that can be mentioned here.

1. Asceta et Monachus (and Saint), lived in the fifth century of the Christian aera. Saxius places him about the year A. D. 420. He was descended from a noble family in Constantinople, and was eventually raised to the dignity of eparch, or governor of his native city; but being penetrated, we are told, with a deep feeling of the reality of divine things, he renounced his rank and dignities, and retired with his son Theodulus to a monastery on Mount Sinai, while his wife and daughter took refuge in a religious retreat in Egypt. His son is said to have perished in an attack made upon the convent by some barbarians; but Nilus himself escaped, and appears to have died about A. D. 450 or 451.

Nilus was the author of many theological works, several of which have been printed, though they have not yet been collected into one edition. Photius gives extracts from some of his works. (Bibl. Cod. 276.) Some of the works of Nilus were first published in Latin by P. F. Zinus, Venet. 1557, 8vo. Next some other works of Nilus, which had not been printed in the above-mentioned edition, were published by Possinus, Paris, 1639, 4to.; but the best edition of his miscellaneous works is that of Suaresius, entitled S. Nili Tractatus seu Opuscula, Rome, 1673, fol. The letters of Nilus, which are very numerous, being more than three hundred, were first published by Possinus, Paris, 1657, 4to.; but a better edition is the one published at Rome, 1668, fol., with the Latin version of Leo Allatius. Of the various works of Nilus the most important are, 1. Κεφάλαια ἢ Παραινέσεις, containing advice on the way in which a Christian should live; in fact, a summary of practical divinity. 2. Letters, for the most part on the same subject as the preceding work. 3. Ἐπικτήτου ἐγχειρίδιον, in which the Manual of Epictetus, as given by Arrian, is accommodated to the use of Christians. This manual, which appears in the edition of Suaresius mentioned above, is also published in the fifth volume of Schweighäuser's Epictetus, Lips. 1800. (Phot. l. c.; Niceph. H. E. xiv. 54; Allatius, Fabric. ll. cc.; Cave, Hist. Lit. vol. i. p. 428; Tillemont, Mém. de l'Hist. Eccl. vol. xiv. p. 189.)

2. Cabasilas. [Cabasilas.]

3. Of Rhodes, of which he was metropolitan, about A. D. 1360. He is stated, however, to have been a native of Chios. He was the author of several works, of which the most important was a short history of the nine oecumenical councils, published by H. Justellus as an appendix to the Nomocanon of Photius, Paris, 1615, 4to.; by Voellius and Justellus in Bibl. Juris Canonici, 1661, fol. vol. ii. p. 1155; and by Harduinus, Concilia, vol. v. p. 1479. Nilus also wrote some grammatical works, of which an account is given by F. Passow, De Nilo, grammatico adhuc ignoto, ejusque grammatica aliisque grammaticis Scriptis, Vratisl. 1831—32, 4to.

4. Scholasticus, of whom we know nothing, except that he is the author of an epigram in the Greek Anthology (vol. iii. p. 235, ed. Jacobs; Brunck, Anal. iii. p. 14).

NILUS, physician. [Nileus].

NI'NNIA GENS, plebeian, and of very little note. No persons of this name are mentioned at Rome till towards the end of the republic, when we read of L. Ninnius Quadratus, a warm friend of Cicero's [Quadratus]. But as early as the second Punic war there was a noble house of this name at Capua, and the Ninnii Celeres are mentioned among the noble and wealthy families with whom Hannibal resided during his stay in that city. (Liv. xxiii. 8.)

NI'NNIUS CRASSUS, is mentioned as one of the translators of the Iliad into Latin verse (Priscian, ix. p. 866, ed. Putschius), but the name is perhaps corrupt. (Wernsdorf, Poët. Latin. Minores, vol. iv. p. 569.)

NINUS (Νῖνος), the eponymous founder of the city of Ninus or Nineveh, must be regarded as a mythical and not an historical personage. His exploits are so much mixed up with those of Semiramis, his wife, whose name was much more celebrated in antiquity, that we refer the account of Ninus to the article Semiramis. [Semiramis.]

There is also another Ninus, who is represented by some authorities as the last king of Nineveh, and the successor of Sardanapalus, who is usually described as the last king. See Sardanapalus.

NI'NYAS (Νανύας), the son of Ninus and Semiramis, is spoken of under SEMIRAMIS.

NI'OBE (Νιόβη). 1. A daughter of Phoroneus, and by Zeus the mother of Argus and Pelasgus. (Apollod. ii. 1. § 1; Paus. ii. 22. § 6; Plat. Tim. 22, b.) In other traditions she is called the mother of Phoroneus and wife of Inachus.

2. A daughter of Tantalus by the Pleiad Taygete or the Hyad Dione (Ov. Met. vi. 174; Hygin. Fab. 9), or, according to others, a daughter of Pelops and the wife of Zethus or Alalcomeneus (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1367), while Parthenius relates quite a different story (Erot. 33), for he makes her a daughter of Assaon and the wife of Philottus, and relates that she entered into a dispute with Leto about the beauty of their respective children. In consequence of this Philottus was torn to pieces during the chase, and Assaon fell in love with his own daughter; but she rejected him, and he in revenge burnt all her children, in consequence of which Niobe threw herself down from a rock (comp. Schol. ad Eurip. Phoen. 159). But according to the common story, which represents her as a daughter of Tantalus, she was the sister of Pelops, and married to Amphion, king of Thebes, by whom she became the mother of six sons and six daughters. Being proud of the number of her children, she deemed herself superior to Leto, who had given birth only to two children. Apollo and Artemis, indignant at such presumption, slew all the children of Niobe. For nine days their bodies lay in their blood without any one burying them, for Zeus had changed the people into stones; but on the tenth day the gods themselves buried them. Niobe herself, who had gone to mount Sipylus, was metamorphosed into stone, and even thus continued to feel the misfortune with which the gods had visited her. (Hom. Il. xxiv. 603—617; Apollod. iii. 5. § 6; Ov. Met. vi. 155, &c.; Paus. viii. 2. in fin.) Later writers, and especially the dramatic poets have greatly modified and enlarged the simple story related by Homer. The number and names of the children of Niobe vary very much in the different accounts, for while Homer states that their number was twelve, Hesiod and others mentioned twenty, Alcman only six, Sappho eighteen, Hellanicus six, Euripides fourteen, Herodotus four, and Apollodorus fourteen. (Apollod. l. c.; Ov. Met. vi. 182; Aelian, V. H. xii. 36; Gellius, xx. 6; Schol. ad Eurip. Phoen. 159; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1367; Hygin. Fab. 11; Tzetz. ad Lyc. 520.) According to Homer all the children of Niobe fell by the arrows of Apollo and Artemis; but later writers state that one of her sons, Amphion or Amyclas, and one of her daughters, Meliboea, were saved, but that Meliboea, having turned pale with terror at the sight of her dying brothers and sisters, was afterwards called Chloris, and this Chloris is then confounded with the daughter of Amphion of Orchomenos, who was married to Neleus. (Apollod. l. c.; Hom. Od. xi. 282; Paus. ii. 21. in fin., v. 16. § 3.) The time and place at which the children of Niobe were destroyed are likewise stated differently. According to Homer, they perished in their mother's house; and, according to Apollodorus, the sons were killed by Apollo during the chase on mount Cithaeron (Hygin. Fab. 9, says on mount Sipylus), and the daughters by Artemis at Thebes, not far from the royal palace. According to Ovid, the sons were slain while they were engaged in gymnastic exercises in a plain near Thebes, and the daughters during the funeral of their brothers. Others, again, transfer the scene to Lydia (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1367), or make Niobe, after the death of her children, go from Thebes to Lydia, to her father Tantalus on mount Sipylus, where Zeus, at her own request, metamorphosed her into a stone, which during the summer always shed tears. (Ov. Met. vi. 303; Apollod. l. c.; Paus. viii. 2. § 3; Soph. Antig. 823, Electr. 147.) In the time of Pausanias (i. 21. § 5) people still fancied they could see the petrified figure of Niobe on mount Sipylus. The tomb of the children of Niobe, however, was shown at Thebes. (Paus. ix. 16. in fin., 17. § 1; but comp. Schol. ad Eurip. Phoen. 159.) The story of Niobe and her children was frequently taken as a subject by ancient artists (Paus. i. 21. § 5, v. 11. § 2); but none of the ancient representations is more celebrated than the group of Niobe and her children which filled the pediment of the temple of Apollo Sosianus at Rome, and was found at Rome in the year 1583. This group is now at Florence, and consists of the mother, who holds her youngest daughter on her knees, and thirteen statues of her sons and daughters, independent of a figure usually called the paedagogus of the children. It is, however, not improbable that several of the statues which now compose the group, originally did not belong to it. Some of the figures in it belong to the most masterly productions of ancient art. The Romans themselves were uncertain as to whether the group was the work of Scopas or Praxiteles. (Plin. H. N. xxxvi. 4; comp. Welcker, Zeitschrift für die alte Kunst, p. 589, &c.) [L. S.]

NIPHATES (Νιφάτης), one of the Persian generals in the battle of the Granicus. (Arrian, i. 12.) [C. P. M.]

NIREUS (Νιρεύς). 1. A son of Charopus and Aglaia, was, next to Achilles, the handsomest among the Greeks at Troy, but unwarlike. He came from the island of Syme (between Rhodes and Cnidus), and commanded only three ships and a small number of men. (Hom. Il. ii. 671; Hygin. Fab. 270.) According to Diodorus (v. 53), he also ruled over a part of Cnidus, and he is said to have been slain by Eurypylus or Aeneias. (Dict. Cret. iv. 17; Dar. Phryg. 21; Hygin. Fab. 113.) His beauty became proverbial. (Lucian, Dial. Mort. 9.)

2. A son, or favourite of Heracles, with whom he fought against the lion of mount Helicon. (Ptolem. Hephaest. 2.) [L. S.]

NISUS (Νῖσος). 1. A son of Pandion (or, according to others, of Deïon or Ares) and Pylia, was a brother of Aegeus, Pallas, and Lycus, and husband of Abrote, by whom he became the father of Scylla. He was king of Megara; and when Minos, on his expedition against Athens, took Megara, Nisus died, because his daughter Scylla, who had fallen in love with Minos, had pulled out the purple or golden hair which grew on the top of her father's head, and on which his life depended. (Apollod. iii. 15. §§ 5, 6, 8; Schol. ad Eurip. Hippol. 1090.) Minos, who was horrified at the conduct of the unnatural daughter, ordered Scylla to be fastened to the poop of his ship, and afterwards drowned her in the Saronic gulf. (Apollod. l. c.) According to others, Minos left Megara in disgust, but Scylla leaped into the sea, and swam after his ship; but her father, who had been changed into an eagle, perceived her, and shot down upon her, whereupon she was metamorphosed into either a fish or a bird called Ciris. (Ov. Met. viii. 6, &c.; Hygin. Fab. 198; Virg. Georg. i. 405, Eclog. vi. 74.) The tradition current at Megara itself knew nothing of this expedition of Minos, and called the daughter of Nisus Iphinoe, and represented her as married to Megareus. It is further added, that in the dispute between Sciron and Nisus Aeacus assigned the government to Nisus (Paus. i. 39. § 5), and that Nisa, the original name of Megara, and Nisaea, afterward the port town of Megara, derived their names from Nisus, and that the promontory of Scyllaeum was named after his daughter. (Paus. i. 39. § 4, ii. 34. § 7; Strab. viii. p. 373.) The tomb of Nisus was shown at Athens, behind the Lyceum. (Paus. i. 19. § 5.)

2. A son of Hyrtacus, a companion of Aeneias and friend of Euryalus, whose death he avenged by slaying Volscens, and then himself, in a dying state, threw himself upon the body of his friend and expired. (Virg. Aen. ix. 176, &c. 444.)

3. A noble of Dulichium, and father of Amphinomus, who was one of the suitors of Penelope. (Hom. Od. xvi. 395, xviii. 126, 412.) [L. S.]

NITOCRIS (Νίτωκρις). 1. A queen of Babylon, mentioned by Herodotus, who ascribes to her many important works at Babylon and its vicinity. According to his account she changed the course of the river above Babylon, built up with bricks the sides of the river at the city, and also threw a bridge across the river. He also relates that she was buried above one of the city gates, and that her tomb was opened by Dareius. (Herod. i. 185—189.) Who this Nitocris was has occasioned great dispute among modern writers, and is as uncertain as almost all other points connected with the early history of the East. Since Herodotus (i. 185) speaks of her as queen, shortly after the capture of Ninus or Nineveh by the Medes, which is placed in B. C. 606, it is supposed by most modern writers that she was the wife of Nebuchadnezzar, who began to reign in B. C. 604, and the mother or grandmother of Labynetus or Belshazzar, the last king of Babylon. See Clinton, F. H. vol. i. p. 278, note f, who brings forward some other arguments in support of this opinion.

2. A queen of Egypt. Herodotus relates that she was a native Egyptian, and the only female of the 330 Egyptian monarchs whose names were read to the historian by the priests from a papyrus manuscript. He further tells us that she was elected to the sovereignty in place of her brother, whom the Egyptians had killed, and that she devised the following scheme in order to take revenge upon the murderers of her brother. She built a very long chamber under ground, and when it was finished invited to a banquet in it those of the Egyptians who had had a principal share in the murder. While they were engaged in the banquet she let in upon them the waters of the Nile by means of a large concealed pipe and drowned them all, and then, in order to escape punishment, threw herself into a chamber full of ashes. (Herod. ii. 100.)

This Nitocris appears to have been one of the most celebrated personages in Egyptian legends. Even in the times of the Roman emperors we find her name mentioned as one of the old heroines of the East, as we see from the way in which she is spoken of by Dion Cassius, and the emperor Julian, both of whom class her with Semiramis (Dion Cass. lxii. 6; Julian. Orat. pp. 126, 127). Julius Africanus, and Eusebius (apud Syncell. pp. 58, 59), who borrow their account from Manetho, describe her as the most high-minded and most beautiful woman of her age, with a fair complexion, adding that she built the third pyramid. By this we are to understand, as Bunsen has shown, that she finished the third pyramid, which had been commenced by Mycerinus; and the same fact is intimated by the curious tale of Herodotus (ii. 134), which states that the erection of the pyramid was attributed by many to the Greek courtezan, Rhodopis, who must, in all probability, be regarded as the same person as Nitocris. [RHODOPIS.]

Bunsen makes Nitocris the last sovereign of the sixth dynasty, and states that she reigned for six years in place of her murdered husband (not her brother, as Herodotus states), whose name was Menthuôphis. The latter is supposed to be the son or grandson of the Moeris of the Greeks and Romans. The tale related by Herodotus of Nitocris constructing a subterraneous chamber for the punishment of the murderers of her brother is supposed by Bunsen, with much probability, to have reference to her erection of the third pyramid, though the waters of the Nile could not have been let into it, as the water of the river does not rise high enough for the purpose. (Bunsen, Aegyptens Stelle in der Weltgeschichte, vol. ii. pp. 236—242.)

NIXI DII, a general term, which seems to have been applied by the Romans to those divinities who were believed to assist women at the time when they were giving birth to a child. (Quos putabant praesidere parientium nixibus, Fest. p. 175, ed. Müller; Ov. Met. ix. 294; Nonius, p. 57.) Before the cella of Minerva, on the Capitol, there were three statues, which were designated as Dii Nixi. [L. S.]

NOBI'LIOR, the name of a family of the plebeian Fulvia gens. This family was originally called Paetinus [PAETINUS], and the name of Nobilior seems to have been first assumed by the consul of B. C. 255 [see below, No. 1], to indicate that he was more noble than any others of this name. His descendants dropped the name of Paetinus, and retained only that of Nobilior.

1. SER. FULVIUS M. F. M. N. PAETINUS NOBILIOR, was consul B. C. 255, with M. Aemilius Paullus about the middle of the first Punic war. In the beginning of this year Regulus had been defeated in Africa by the Carthaginians, and the remains of his army were besieged in Clypea. As soon as the senate heard of this disaster they sent both consuls with a fleet of at least three hundred ships, to bring off the survivors. After reducing Cossura the Romans met the Carthaginian fleet near the Hermaean promontory, and gained a most brilliant victory over it. The loss of the Carthaginians was very great, though the numbers are differently stated, and are evidently corrupt in Polybius. After the victory the consuls landed at Clypea, but did not remain long in Africa on account of the complete want of provisions. As it was near the summer solstice, in the month of July, when the Romans set out homewards, the pilots cautioned them to avoid the southern coast of Sicily, as violent gales from the south and south-west make that coast very dangerous at that time of the year. The consuls, however, disregarded their warning; and off Camarina they were surprised by a fearful storm, which destroyed almost the whole fleet, and strewed the coast from Camarina to Pachynus with wrecks and corpses. Both consuls, however, escaped, and celebrated a triumph as proconsuls in the following year (Polyb. i. 36, 37; Eutrop. ii. 22; Oros. iv. 9; Diod. xxiii. 14; Zonar. viii. 14). Respecting the date of this campaign, see Niebuhr, Hist. of Rome, vol. iii. p. 591, and Arnold, Hist. of Rome, vol. ii. p. 593. n. 67.

2. M. Fulvius M. f. Ser. n. Nobilior, grandson of the preceding, was curule aedile B. C. 195, and praetor B. C. 193, when he obtained Further Spain as his province, with the title of proconsul. He remained in this country two years, and fought with great success against the nations that still resisted the Roman supremacy. He gained a victory over the united forces of the Vaccaei, Tectones, and Celtiberi, near the town of Toletum (Toledo), and took their king, Hilermus, prisoner. He then obtained possession of the town of Toletum, which is the first time that this place is mentioned in history. On his return to Rome in B. C. 191 he was granted the honour of an ovation. (Liv. xxxiii. 42, xxxiv. 54, 55, xxxv. 7, 22, xxxvi. 21, 39.) In B. C. 189 he was consul with M. Fulvius Nobilior, and received the conduct of the war against the Aetolians. He captured the strong town of Ambracia, and then compelled the Aetolians to sue for peace, which was granted them on favourable terms. Shortly afterwards he obliged the island of Cephallenia, which had been excluded from the terms of the peace, to submit to the dominion of Rome. He remained in his province for the next year as proconsul; and on his return to Rome, in B. C. 187, celebrated a most splendid triumph. In the following year he exhibited for ten successive days the games which he had vowed in the Aetolian war, and which were the most magnificent that had yet been seen at Rome. There were venationes of lions and panthers; and contests of athletae were now for the first time exhibited in the city. The conquest of Aetolia by this consul is also commemorated in the inscription of a statue discovered at Tusculum, from which place the Fulvii originally came. [Fulvia Gens.] (Polyb. xxii. 8—15; Liv. xxxvii. 47, 48, 50, xxxviii. 3—11, 28, 30, 35, xxxix. 4, 5, 22; Aurel. Vict. de Vir. Ill. 52; Orelli, Inscr. No. 562.) In B. C. 179 he was censor with M. Aemilius Lepidus, the pontifex maximus. The two censors had previously been at feud, but were reconciled to one another upon their election, and discharged the duties of their office with unanimity and concord. They executed many public works, which are mentioned by Livy. (Liv. xl. 45, 46, 51, xli. 2; Val. Max. iv. 2. § 1; Cic. de Prov. Cons. 9.)

Fulvius Nobilior had a taste for literature and art; he was a patron of the poet Ennius, who accompanied him in his Aetolian campaign; and he belonged to that party among the Roman nobles who were introducing into the city a taste for Greek literature and refinement. He was, therefore, an object of the attacks of Cato the Censor, who actually reproached him with having taken Ennius with him into Aetolia, and insinuated that he was corrupting the old Roman discipline by bestowing military crowns upon the soldiers for trivial reasons. Cato also made merry with his name, calling him mobilior instead of nobilior. (Cic. Tusc. i. 2, Brut. 20, pro Arch. 11, de Orat. iii. 63.) Fulvius, in his censorship, erected a temple to Hercules and the Muses in the Circus Flaminius, as a proof that the state ought to cultivate the liberal arts, and adorned it with the paintings and statues which he had brought from Greece upon his conquest of Aetolia. He also set up Fasti in this temple, which are referred to by Macrobius. (Cic. pro Arch. l. c.; Plin. H. N. xxxv. 10. s. 36. § 4; Eumenius, Orat. pro Scholis Instaurand. 7. § 3; Macrob. Saturn. i. 12.) He left behind him two sons, both of whom obtained the consulship. [Nos. 3 and 4.] His brother, by his mother's side, was C. Valerius Laevinus, who accompanied him in his Aetolian campaign (Polyb. xxii. 12), and who was consul in B. C. 176.

3. M. Fulvius M. f. M. n. Nobilior, son of No. 2, was tribune of the plebs B. C. 171 (Liv. xlii. 32), curule aedile B. C. 166, the year in which the Andria of Terence was performed (Tit. Andr. Terent.), and consul B. C. 159, with Cn. Cornelius Dolabella. Of the events of his consulship we have no records; but as the triumphal fasti assign him a triumph in the following year over the Eleates, a Ligurian people, he must have carried on war in Liguria.

4. Q. Fulvius M. f. M. n. Nobilior, son of No. 2, was consul B. C. 153 with T. Annius Luscus. Livy mentions (xxxix. 44) a Q. Fulvius Nobilior who was appointed in B. C. 184 one of the triumviri for founding the colonies of Potentia and Pisaurum; and as Cicero says (Brut. 20) that Q. Nobilior, the son of the conqueror of the Aetolians, was a triumvir coloniae deducendae, though he does not mention the name of the colony, it would seem that the Q. Nobilior mentioned by Livy is the same as the one referred to by Cicero. But there are two objections to this natural conclusion: in the first place, it is exceedingly unlikely, and quite contrary to Roman practice, that such important duties as were involved in the foundation of a colony should have been entrusted to a person so young as Q. Nobilior must have been at that time, since he did not obtain the consulship for thirty-one years afterwards; and in the second place, the Q. Fulvius M. f. who, says Livy (xl. 42), was elected triumvir epulo in B. C. 180, while still a boy (praetextatus), can hardly mean any one else than the son of the great M. Fulvius whose name occurs so often in that part of the historian's writings. A consideration of dates will make it almost certain that this Q. Fulvius M. f. must be the same as the consul of B. C. 153; for supposing him to have been sixteen when he was enrolled in the college of the epulones, he would have been forty-three when he was elected consul, the age at which a citizen could first obtain this honour. We therefore conclude that the Q. Nobilior who was triumvir in B. C. 184 must be a different person from the consul of 153.

The consuls of the year B. C. 153 entered upon their office on the kalends of January, whereas up to this time the ides of March had been the day on which they took possession of their dignity. The formidable revolt of the Celtiberians is given as the reason of this alteration; but whatever may have been the cause, the kalends of January continued from this time forth to be the first day of the consular year. (Cassiodorus and Marianus, Chron.; Liv. Epit. 47, refers to this change, but the words are not intelligible as they stand. See the notes in Drakenborch's edition.) Since the conquest of the Celtiberians, in B. C. 179, by Gracchus, the father of the celebrated tribunes, this warlike nation had given the Romans no trouble, which, however, was more owing to the wise regulations of Gracchus, after his victories, than to the victories themselves. But in consequence of the Romans suspecting the Celtiberian town of Segida or Segeda, they embarked in a war against the whole nation, which was not brought to a conclusion till B. C. 134, by the capture of Numantia by Scipio. Fulvius was sent into Spain in his consulship with an army of nearly 30,000 men, but was very unsuccessful. He was first defeated by the enemy under the command of a native of Segida, called Carus, with a loss of 6000 men, on the day of the Vulcanalia, or the 23d of August; and the misfortune was looked upon as so severe, that no Roman general would afterwards fight on that day unless compelled. Fulvius retrieved, however, to some extent, the disaster, by an attack of the Roman cavalry, who checked the conquerors in their pursuit, and slew Carus and a considerable number of his troops. Shortly afterwards the consul received from Masinissa a reinforcement of Numidian cavalry and some elephants; and the latter caused such terror in the enemy, that they fled before the Romans, and shut themselves up in the town of Numantia. But under the walls of this place Fulvius experienced a new disaster: a restive elephant, whose example was imitated by his companions, threw the Roman army into confusion; and the Celtiberians, availing themselves of this circumstance, sallied from the town, slew 4000 Romans, and captured their elephants. After meeting with one or two other repulses, Fulvius closed his inglorious campaign, and retired to winter-quarters, where many of the troops perished of hunger and cold. He was succeeded in the command by Claudius Marcellus, the consul of the next year. (Appian, Hisp. 45—47; Polyb. xxxv. 4.)

Fulvius was censor in B. C. 136. (Fasti Capit.) Cicero tells us that he inherited his father's love for literature, and that he presented the poet Ennius with the Roman franchise when he was a triumvir for founding a colony (Cic. Brut. 20).

5. M. FULVIUS NOBILIOR, tribune of the soldiers, B. C. 180, and described as a brother of Q. Fulvius, was probably brother of the Quintus who was triumvir coloniae deducendae in B. C. 184. See the beginning of No. 4. (Liv. xl. 41.)

6. M. FULVIUS NOBILIOR is mentioned by Sallust (Cat. 17) as one of Catiline's conspirators. He is perhaps the same as the M. Fulvius Nobilior who was condemned in B. C. 54, but for what crime we do not know. (Cic. ad Att. iv. 16. § 12.)

NOCTUA, Q. CAEDI'CIUS, consul, B. C. 289, and censor 283, is only known from the Fasti.

NODOTUS or NODUTUS, is said to have been a divinity presiding over the knots in the stem of plants producing grain; but it seems more probable that originally it was only a surname of Saturnus. (Aug. De Civ. Dei, iv. 8; Arnob. adv. Gent. iv. 7.) [L. S.]

NOMENTA'NUS is mentioned several times by Horace as proverbially noted for extravagance and a riotous mode of living. He was one of the guests at the celebrated dinner of Nasidienus. The Scholiasts tell us that his full name was L. Cassius Nomentanus. (Hor. Sat. i. 1. 102, i. 8. 11, ii. 1. 22, ii. 3. 175, 224, ii. 8. 23, 25, 60.)

NO'MIA (Νομία), an Arcadian nymph, from whom mount Nomia, near Lycosura in Arcadia, was believed to have derived its name. (Paus. viii. 38. § 8, x. 31. § 2.) [L. S.]

NO'MIUS (Νόμιος), a surname of divinities protecting the pastures and shepherds, such as Apollo, Pan, Hermes, and Aristaeus. (Aristoph. Thesmoph. 983; Anthol. Palat. ix. 217; Callim. Hymn. in Apoll. 47.) [L. S.]

NOMOS (Νόμος), a personification of law, described as the ruler of gods and men. (Pind. Fragm. 151, p. 640, ed. Böckh; Plat. Gorg. p. 484, b.; Orph. Hymn. 63.) [L. S.]

NONACRIS (Νώνακρις), the wife of Lycaon, from whom the town of Nonacris in Arcadia was believed to have derived its name. (Paus. viii. 17. § 5.) From this town Hermes and Evander are called Nonacriates and Nonacrius, in the general sense of Arcadian. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Νώνακρις; Ov. Fast. v. 97.) [L. S.]

NO'NIA GENS, plebeian. Persons of this name are not mentioned till the very end of the republic, but occur frequently under the early emperors. The principal cognomens of the Nonii are ASPRENAS, BALBUS, GALLUS, QUINCTILIANUS, and SUFENAS, or SUFFENAS; but as one or two persons of the name of Asprenas are omitted under that head, they are given below under NONIUS. The only cognomens which occur on coins are Quinctilianus and Sufenas.

NONIA'NUS, CONSI'DIUS. There were two persons of this name who espoused Pompey's party in the civil war, and who are spoken of under CONSIDIUS, Nos. 8 and 9. The annexed coin, however, seems to refer to neither of them. It bears on the obverse the head of Venus, with C. CONSIDI NONIANI; and, on the reverse, a temple on the top of a mountain, on which is written, ERVC., the mountain itself being surrounded with fortifications. The coins seem to refer to the temple of Venus at Eryx, in Sicily, which was probably repaired by this C. Considius Nonianus, at the command of the senate.

COIN OF C. CONSIDIUS NONIANUS.

NONIA'NUS, M. SERVI'LIUS, was consul A. D. 35, with C. Sestius Gallus. (Dion Cass. lviii. 25; Tac. Ann. vi. 31; Plin. H. N. x. 43. s. 60.) In the passages just referred to he is called simply M. Servilius; but the Fasti give him the surname of Nonianus, and Pliny, in another passage (H. N. xxxvii. 6. s. 21), speaks of the consul, Servilius Nonianus, who was, he tells us, the grandson of the Nonius, proscribed by M. Antonius. [NONIUS, No. 4.] His name shows that he was adopted by one of the Servilii. The consul of A. D. 35 was, therefore, the same as the M. Servilius Nonianus, who was one of the most celebrated orators and historians of his time. The emperor Claudius listened to the recitation of his works; and Quinctilian also heard him, and speaks with commendation of his works, although he says he was "minus pressus, quam historiae auctoritas postulat." Pliny calls him "princeps civitatis;" and Tacitus, who mentions his death in A. D. 60, praises his character as well as his talents. (Quinctil. x. 1. § 102; Plin. Epist. 1. 13; Plin. H. N. xxviii. 2. s. 5; Tac. Ann. xiv. 19, Dial. de Orat. 23.)

NO'NIUS. 1. A. NONIUS, a candidate for the tribuneship of the plebs for B. C. 100, was murdered by Glaucia and Appuleius Saturninus, because he was opposed to their party. (Appian, B. C. i. 28; Plut. Mar. 29; Liv. Epit. 69.)

2. NONIUS, a friend of Fimbria, in whose army he was in B. C. 84, when Sulla was preparing to attack him; but when Fimbria wished his soldiers to renew their military oath to him, and called upon Nonius to do so first, he refused. (Appian, Mithr. 59.)

3. NONIUS STRUMA was raised to one of the curule magistracies by Julius Caesar, but appears to have been unworthy of the honour. Hence Catullus exclaims (Carm. 52):—

> "Quid est, Catulle, quid moraris emori?
> Sella in curuli Struma Nonius sedet."

4. NONIUS, the son of Nonius Struma [No. 3], was proscribed by M. Antonius in consequence of his possessing an opal stone of immense value. He was the grandfather of Servilius Nonianus [NONIANUS]. (Plin. H. N. xxxvii. 6. s. 21.)

5. NONIUS, a centurion of the soldiers, was murdered by his comrades in the Campus Martius, B. C. 41, because he endeavoured to put down some attempts at disorder and mutiny. (Appian, B. C. v. 16.)

6. NONIUS had the charge of one of the gates of Rome in what is called the Perusinian war, B. C. 41, and admitted L. Antonius into the city. (Appian, B. C. v. 30.)

7. NONIUS ASPRENAS had the title of proconsul in B. C. 46, and served under Caesar in the African war, in that year, and also in the Spanish war, B. C. 45. (Auct. B. Afr. 80, Hisp. 10.)

8. C. NONIUS ASPRENAS, probably a son of the preceding, was accused, in B. C. 9, of poisoning 130 guests at a banquet, but the number in Pliny is probably corrupt, and ought to be thirty. The accusation was conducted by Cassius Severus, and the defence by Asinius Pollio. The speeches of these orators at this trial were very celebrated in antiquity, and the perusal of them is strongly recommended by Quinctilian. Asprenas was an intimate friend of Augustus, and was acquitted through the influence of the emperor. (Plin. H. N. xxxv. 12. s. 46; Suet. Aug. 56; Dion Cass. lv. 4; Quinct. x. 1. § 23.) In his youth, Asprenas was injured by a fall while performing in the Ludus Trojae before Augustus, and received in consequence from the emperor a golden chain, and the permission to assume the surname of Torquatus, both for himself and his posterity. (Suet. Aug. 43.) The Torquatus, to whom Horace addresses two of his poems (Carm. iv. 7, Sat. i. 5), is supposed by Weichert and others, to be the same as this Nonius Asprenas, since all the Manlii Torquati appear to have perished, which was the reason probably why Augustus gave him the ancient and honourable surname of Torquatus. Some modern writers have supposed that the C. Asprenas, who was accused of poisoning, was the same as the proconsul of this name in the African war [No. 7]; but Weichert has brought forward sufficient reasons to render it much more probable that he was his son. (Weichert, De Lucii Varii et Cassii Parmensis Vita, &c., Grimae. 1836, pp. 197—199, and Excursus I., "De C. Nonio Asprenate," p. 301, &c.; comp. Meyer, Orator. Roman. Fragm. p. 492, &c., 2nd ed.) For the other persons of the name of Nonius Asprenas, see ASPRENAS.

9. NONIUS RECEPTUS, a centurion, remaining firm to Galba, when his comrades espoused the side of Vitellius, A. D. 69, was thrown into chains by them and shortly after put to death. (Tac. Hist. i. 56, 59.)

10. NONIUS ACTIANUS, an infamous delator under Nero, was punished at the beginning of Vespasian's reign, A. D. 70. (Tac. Hist. iv. 41.)

NO'NIUS MARCELLUS, the grammarian. [MARCELLUS.]

NO'NNOSUS (Νόννωσος), was sent by the emperor Justinian I. on an embassy to the Aethiopians, Ameritae, Saracens, and other Eastern nations. On his return he wrote a History of his embassy, which has perished, but an abridgment of it has been preserved by Photius (Bibl. Cod. 3). From the account of Photius we learn that the father of Nonnosus, whose name was Abraham, had been also sent on an embassy to the Saracens, and that his grandfather Nonnosus had likewise been sent on a similar embassy by the emperor Anastasius. The abridgment of Photius has been reprinted, in the Bonn collection of the Byzantine writers, in the volume containing the fragments of Dexippus, Eunapius, &c., edited by Niebuhr and Bekker, 1829. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vii. p. 543; Voss. de Hist. Graec. p. 326, ed. Westermann.)

NONNUS (Νόννος), a Greek poet, was a native of Panopolis in Egypt, and seems to have lived shortly before the time of Agathias (iv. p. 128), who mentions him among the recent (νέοι) poets. Whether he is the same person as the Nonnus whose son Sosena is recommended by Synesius to his friends Anastasius and Pylaemenes, is uncertain. (Synes. Ep. ad Anast. 43, ad Pylaem. 102.) Respecting his life nothing is known, except that he was a Christian, whence he cannot be confounded with the Nonnus mentioned by Suidas (s. v. Σαλούστιος). He is the author of an enormous epic poem, which has come down to us under the name of Διονυσιακά or Βασσαρικά, and consists of forty-eight books. As the subject of the poem is a pagan divinity and a number of mythological stories, some writers have supposed that it was written previous to his conversion to Christianity or that it was composed in ridicule of the theology of the pagans; but neither opinion appears to be founded on any sound argument, for it does not appear why a Christian should not have amused himself with writing a poem on pagan subjects. The poem itself shows that Nonnus had no idea whatever of what a poetical composition should be, and it is, as Heinsius characterises it, more like a chaos than a literary production. Although the professed subject of the poem is Dionysus, Nonnus begins with the story of Zeus carrying off Europa; he proceeds to relate the fight of Typhonus with Zeus; the story of Cadmus and the foundation of Thebes, the stories of Actaeon, Persephone, the birth of Zagreus and the deluge, and at length, in the seventh book, he relates the birth of Dionysus. The first six or seven books are so completely devoid of any connecting link, that any one of them might by itself be regarded as a separate work. The remaining books are patched together in the same manner, without any coherence or subordination of less important to more important parts. The style of the work is bombastic and inflated in the highest degree; but the author shows considerable learning and fluency of narration. The work is mentioned by Agathias, repeatedly by Eustathius in his commentary on Homer, and in the Etymologicum Magnum (s. v. Διόννσος). There is an epigram in which Nonnus speaks of himself as the author of a poem on the fight of the Gigantes, but it seems that this is not a distinct work, but refers to the fight of Zeus and the Gigantes related in the first books of the Dionysiaca. The first edition that was published is that of G. Falckenburg, Antwerp, 1569, 4to. In 1605 an octavo edition, with a Latin translation, appeared at Hanau. A reprint of it, with a dissertation by D. Heinsius, and emendations by Jos. Scaliger, was published at Leiden in 1510, 8vo. A new edition, with a critical and explanatory commentary, was edited by F. Graefe, Leipzig, 1819—1826, in 2 vols. 8vo.

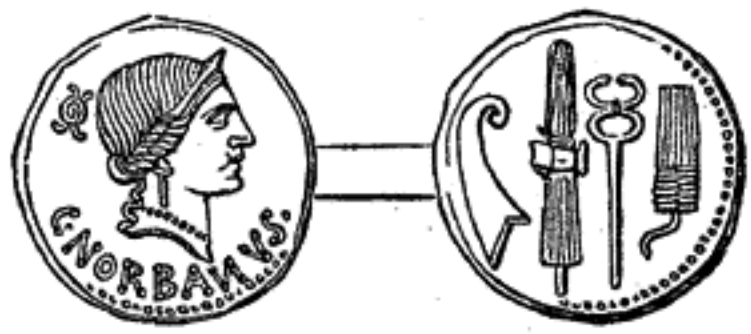
A second work of Nonnus, which has all the defects that have been censured in the Dionysiaca, is a paraphrase of the gospel of St. John in Hexameter verse. The first edition of it was published by Aldus Manutius, Venice, 1501, 4to.; and subsequently others appeared at Rome, 1508, Hagenau, 1527, 8vo. with an epistle of Phil. Melanchthon, Frankfort, 1541; Paris, 1541, 1556; Goslar, 1616; Cologne, 1566. It was also repeatedly translated into Latin, and several editions appeared with Latin versions. The most important of these is that of D. Heinsius, Lugd. Bat. 1627, 8vo.

There is further a collection and exposition of various stories and fables, bearing the titles of Συναγωγὴ καὶ ἐξήγησις ἱστοριῶν, which is ascribed to Nonnus, and was published at Eton in 1610, 4to. by R. Montacutius. But Bentley (Upon the Ep. of Phalaris, p. 17, &c.) has shown that this collection is the production of a far more ignorant person than Nonnus. (Comp. Fabricius, Bibl. Graec. vol. viii. p. 601, &c.; Ouwaroff, Nonnus von Panopolis der Dichter, ein Beitrag zur Gesch. der Griech. Poesie, Petersburg and Leipzig, 1817, 4to.) [L. S.]

NONNUS, THEO'PHANES, (Θεοφανὴς Νόννος,) sometimes called Nonus, a Greek medical writer who lived in the tenth century after Christ, as his work is dedicated to the emperor Constantinus Porphyrogenitus, A. D. 911—959, at whose command it was composed. Though commonly called Nonnus, it is supposed by some persons that his real name was Theophanes. His work is entitled Ἐπιτομὴ τῆς Ἰατρικῆς ἁπάσης Τέχνης, Compendium totius Artis Medicae, and consists of two hundred and ninety short chapters; it is compiled almost entirely from previous writers, especially Alexander Trallianus, Aëtius, and Paulus Aegineta, whom, however, he does not once mention by name. Almost the only point worthy of notice is that (according to Sprengel) he is the earliest Greek medical writer, who makes distinct mention of distilled rose-water, an article which his countrymen seem to have gained from the Arabians. It was first published by Jeremias Martius, Greek and Latin, Argent., 8vo. 1568; and afterwards, in a much improved form, in 1794, 1795, 8vo. two vols., Gothae et Amstel., edited by J. S. Bernard, and published after his death. (See Freind's Hist. of Physic, vol. i.; Sprengel, Hist. de la Méd., vol. ii.; Haller, Bibl. Medic. Pract. vol. i.; Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. xii. p. 685, ed. vet.; Choulant, Handb. der Bücherkunde für die Aeltere Med.) [W. A. G.]

NORAX (Νῶραξ), a son of Hermes and Erytheia, the daughter of Geryones, is said to have led an Iberian colony to Sardinia, and to have founded the town of Nora. (Paus. x. 17. § 4.) [L. S.]

NORBA'NUS, occurs as a name of several distinguished Romans towards the latter end of the republic, but they appear to have had no gentile name. Many modern writers suppose that C. Norbanus, who was consul B. C. 83 [see below, No. 1], belonged to the Junia gens, but for this there is no authority whatsoever. In fact, Norbanus came to be looked upon as a kind of gentile name, and hence a cognomen was attached to it. Thus, in some of the Fasti, the C. Norbanus just mentioned bears the cognomen Balbus or Bulbus; and subsequently several of the family are called by the surname of Flaccus. It is quite uncertain to which member of the family the following coin belongs. It bears on the obverse the head of Venus, and on the reverse ears of corn, a caduceus, and fasces with an axe. (Eckhel, vol. v. p. 262.)



COIN OF C. NORBANUS.

1. C. NORBANUS, was tribune of the plebs, B. C. 95, when he accused Q. Servilius Caepio of majestas, because he had robbed the temple of Tolosa in his consulship, B. C. 106, and had by his rashness and imprudence occasioned the defeat and destruction of the Roman army by the Cimbri, in the following year (B. C. 105). The senate, to whom Caepio had by a lex restored the judicia in his consulship, but of which they had been again deprived two years afterwards, made the greatest efforts to obtain his acquittal; but, notwithstanding these exertions, and the powerful advocacy of the great orator L. Crassus, who was then consul, he was condemned by the people, and went into exile at Smyrna. The disturbances, however, which took place at his trial, afforded the enemies of Norbanus a fair pretext for his accusation; and in the following year (B. C. 94), he was accordingly accused of majestas under the lex Appuleia. The accusation was conducted by P. Sulpicius Rufus; and the defence by the celebrated orator M. Antonius, under whom Norbanus had formerly served as quaestor, and who gives in the De Oratore of Cicero a very interesting account of the line of argument which he adopted on the occasion. Norbanus was acquitted. (Cic. de Orat. ii. 48, 49, iii. 21, 25, 39, 40, Orat. Part. 30; Val. Max. viii. 5. § 2; Meyer, Fragm. Rom. Orator p. 287, &c., 2d ed.)

In B. C. 90 or 89, Norbanus was praetor in Sicily during the Social or Marsic war, but no attempt at insurrection occurred in the island. (Cic. Verr. v. 4, comp. iii. 49.) In B. C. 88 he came to the assistance of the town of Rhegium, which was very nearly falling into the hands of the Samnites, who, taking advantage of the civil commotions at Rome, had formed the design of invading Sicily. (Diod. Eclog. xxxvii. p. 540, ed. Wesseling. The text of Diodorus has Γάϊος Ὀρβανός, for which we ought undoubtedly to read with Wesseling, Γάϊος Νορβανός.) In the civil wars Norbanus espoused the Marian party, and was consul in B. C. 83 with Scipio Asiaticus. In this year Sulla crossed over from Greece to Italy, and marched from Brundisium into Campania, where Norbanus was waiting for him, on the Vulturnus at the foot of Mount Tifata, not far from Capua. Sulla at first sent deputies to Norbanus under the pretext of treating respecting a peace, but evidently with the design of tampering with his troops; but they could not effect their purpose, and returned to Sulla after being insulted and maltreated by the other side. Thereupon a general engagement ensued, the issue of which was not long doubtful; the raw levies of Norbanus were unable to resist the first charge of Sulla's veterans, and fled in all directions, and it was not till they reached the walls of Capua that Norbanus was able to rally them again. Six or seven thousand of his men fell in this battle, while Sulla's loss is said to have been only seventy. Appian, contrary to all the other authorities, places this battle near Canusium in Apulia, but it is not improbable, as Drumann has conjectured (Geschichte Röms, vol. ii. p. 459), that he wrote Casilinum, a town on the Vulturnus. In the following year, B. C. 82, Norbanus joined the consul Carbo in Cisalpine Gaul, but their united forces were entirely defeated by Metellus Pius. [METELLUS, No. 19.] This may be said to have given the death-blow to the Marian party in Italy. Desertion from their ranks rapidly followed, and Albinovanus, who had been entrusted with the command of Ariminum, invited Norbanus and his principal officers to a banquet. Norbanus suspected treachery, and declined the invitation; the rest accepted it and were murdered. Norbanus succeeded in making his escape from Italy, and fled to Rhodes; but his person having been demanded by Sulla, he killed himself in the middle of the market-place, while the Rhodians were consulting whether they should obey the commands of the dictator. (Appian, B. C. i. 82, 84, 86, 91; Liv. Epit. 85; Vell. Pat. ii. 25; Plut. Sull. 27; Oros. v. 20; Flor. iii. 21. § 18.)

2. NORBANUS FLACCUS. [FLACCUS.]

3. APPIUS NORBANUS, who defeated Antonius in the reign of Domitian, is more usually called Appius Maximus. [MAXIMUS, p. 986, b.]

4. NORBANUS, praefectus praetorio under Domitian, was privy to the death of that emperor. (Dion Cass. lxvii. 15.)

5. NORBANUS LICINIANUS, one of the infamous servants of Domitian, was banished (relegatus) in the reign of Trajan. (Plin. Ep. iii. 9.)

6. NORBANUS, banished by Commodus. (Lamprid. Commod. 4.)

NO'RTIA or NU'RTIA, an Etruscan divinity, who was worshipped at Volsinii, where a nail was driven every year into the wall of her temple, for the purpose of marking the number of years. (Liv. vii. 3; Juvenal, x. 74.) [L. S.]

NOSSIS, a Greek poetess, of Locri in Southern Italy, lived about B. C. 310, and is the author of twelve epigrams of considerable beauty, extant in the Greek Anthology. From these we learn that her mother's name was Theuphila, and that she had a daughter called Melinna. Three of her epigrams were published for the first time by Bentley; and the whole twelve are given by J. C. Wolf, Poetriarum octo Fragm. &c., Hamb. 1734, by A. Schneider, Poetriarum Graec. Fragm. Giessae, 1802, by Brunck, Anal. vet. Poet. Gr. vol. i., and by Jacobs, Anth. Graec. vol. i. (Comp. Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. p. 133; Bentley, Dissertation upon the Epistles of Phalaris, pp. 256, 257, Lond. 1777.)

NOTHIPPUS, a tragic poet, with whom we are only acquainted through a fragment of the Morirae of the comic poet Hermippus, who describes Nothippus as an enormous eater. (Athen. viii. p. 344, c, d.)

NOVATIA'NUS, according to Philostorgius, whose statement, however, has not been generally received with confidence, was a native of Phrygia. From the accounts given of his baptism, which his enemies alleged was irregularly administered in consequence of his having been prevented by sickness from receiving imposition of hands, it would appear that in early life he was a gentile; but the assertion found in many modern works that he was devoted to the stoic philosophy is not supported by the testimony of any ancient writer. There can be no doubt that he became a presbyter of the church at Rome, that he insisted upon the rigorous and perpetual exclusion of the Lapsi, the weak brethren who had fallen away from the faith under the terrors of persecution, and that upon the election of Cornelius [CORNELIUS], who advocated more charitable opinions, to the Roman see in June, A. D. 251, about sixteen months after the martyrdom of Fabianus, he disowned the authority of the new pontiff, was himself consecrated bishop by a rival party, was condemned by the council held in the autumn of the same year, and after a vain struggle to maintain his position was obliged to give way, and became the founder of a new sect, who from him derived the name of Novatians. We are told, moreover, that he was a man of unsociable, treacherous, and wolf-like disposition, that his ordination was performed by three simple illiterate prelates from an obscure corner of Italy, whom he gained to his purpose by a most disreputable artifice, that these poor men quickly perceived, confessed, and lamented their error, and that those persons who had at first espoused his cause quickly returned to their duty, leaving the schismatic almost alone. We must observe that these adverse representations proceed from his bitter enemy Cornelius, being contained in a long letter from that pope to Fabius, of Antioch, preserved in Eusebius, that they bear evident marks of personal rancour, and that they are contradicted by the circumstance that Novatianus was commissioned in 250 by the Roman clergy to write a letter in their name to Cyprian which is still extant, by the respect and popularity which he unquestionably enjoyed after his assumption of the episcopal dignity, even among those who did not recognise his authority, and by the fact that a numerous and devoted band of followers espousing his cause formed a separate communion, which spread over the whole Christian world, and flourished for more than two hundred years. The career of Novatianus, after the termination of his struggle with Cornelius, is unknown; but we are told by Socrates (H. E. iv. 28) that he suffered death under Valerian; and from Pacianus, who flourished in the middle of the fourth century, we learn that the Novatians boasted that their founder was a martyr.

The original and distinguishing tenet of these heretics was, as we have indicated above, that no one who after baptism had, through dread of persecution or from any other cause, fallen away from the faith, could, however sincere his contrition, again be received into the bosom of the church, or entertain sure hope of salvation. It would appear that subsequently this rigorous exclusion was extended to all who had been guilty of any of the greater or mortal sins; and, if we can trust the expression of St. Ambrose (De Poen. iii. 3), Novatianus himself altogether rejected the efficacy of repentance, and denied that forgiveness could be granted to any sin, whether small or great. There can be no doubt that communion was refused to all great offenders, but we feel inclined to believe that Socrates (H. E. iv. 28) represents these opinions, as first promulgated, more fairly when he states, that Novatianus merely would not admit that the church had power to forgive and grant participation in her mysteries to great offenders, while at the same time he exhorted them to repentance, and referred their case directly to the decision of God — views which were likely to be extremely obnoxious to the orthodox priesthood, and might very readily be exaggerated and perverted by the intolerance of his own followers, who, full of spiritual pride, arrogated to themselves the title of Καθαροί, or Puritans, an epithet caught up and echoed in scorn by their antagonists.

It is necessary to remark that the individual who first proclaimed such doctrines was not Novatianus, but an African presbyter under Cyprian, named Novatus, who took a most active share in the disorders which followed the elevation of Cornelius. Hence, very naturally, much confusion has arisen between Novatus and Novatianus; and Lardner, with less than his usual accuracy, persists in considering them as one and the same, although the words of Jerome are perfectly explicit, distinguishing most clearly between "Novatianus Romanae urbis presbyter" and "Novatus Cypriani presbyter." Indeed, the tenth chapter of his Catalogue becomes quite unintelligible if we confound them.

Jerome informs us that Novatianus composed treatises De Pascha; De Sabbato; De Circumcisione; De Sacerdote; De Oratione; De Cibis Judaicis; De Instantia; De Attalo, and many others; together with a large volume De Trinitate, exhibiting in a compressed form the opinions of Tertullian on this mystery. Of all these the following only are now known to exist:—

I. De Trinitate s. De Regula Fidei, ascribed by some to Tertullian, by others to Cyprian, and inserted in many editions of their works. That it cannot belong to Tertullian is sufficiently proved by the style and by the mention made of the Sabellians, who did not exist in his time, while Jerome expressly declares that the volume De Trinitate was not the production of Cyprian, but of Novatianus. The piece before us, however, does not altogether answer his description, since it cannot be regarded as a mere transcript of the opinions of Tertullian, but is an independent exposition of the orthodox doctrine very distinctly embodied in pure language and animated style.

II. De Cibis Judaicis, written at the request of the Roman laity at a period when the author had, apparently, withdrawn from the fury of the Decian persecution (A. D. 249—257), probably towards the close of A. D. 250. If composed under these circumstances, as maintained by Jackson, it refutes in a most satisfactory manner the charges brought by Cornelius in reference to the conduct of Novatianus at this epoch. The author denies that the Mosaic ordinances, with regard to meats, are binding upon Christians, but strongly recommends moderation and strict abstinence from flesh offered to idols.

III. Epistolae. Two letters, of which the first is certainly genuine, written A. D. 250, in the name of the Roman clergy to Cyprian, when a vacancy occurred in the papal see in consequence of the martyrdom of Fabianus, on the 13th of February, A. D. 250.

The two best editions of the collected works of Novatianus are those of Welchman (8vo. Oxon. 1724), and of Jackson (8vo. Lond. 1728). The latter is in every respect superior, presenting us with an excellent text, very useful prolegomena, notes and indices. The tracts De Trinitate and De Cibis Judaicis will be found in almost all editions of Tertullian from the Parisian impression of 1545 downwards. (Hieronym. de Viris Ill. 10; Philostorg. H. E. viii. 15; Euseb. H. E. vi. 43; Pacian. Ep. 3; Ambros. de Poen. iii. 3; Cyprian. Ep. 44, 45, 49, 50, 55, 68; Socrat. H. E. iv. 28, v. 22, and notes of Valesius; Sozomen. H. E. vi. 24; Lardner, Credibility of Gospel History, c. xlvii; Schönemann, Bibliotheca Patrum Lat. vol. i. § 5; Bähr, Geschicht. des Röm. Litterat. Suppl. Band. 2te Abtheil. §§ 23, 24; with regard to Novatus, see Cyprian. Ep. 52.) [W. R.]

NOVATUS. [NOVATIANUS].

NOVA'TUS, JU'NIUS, published a libellous letter against Augustus under the name of Agrippa, but was punished only by a pecuniary fine. (Suet. Aug. 51.)

NOVE'LLIUS TORQUA'TUS. [TORQUATUS.]

NOVELLUS, ANTO'NIUS, was one of Otho's principal generals, but possessed no influence with the soldiery. (Tac. Hist. i. 87, ii. 12.)

NOVENSILES DII, are mentioned in the solemn prayer which the consul Decius repeated after the pontifex previous to his devoting himself to death for his country. (Liv. viii. 9.) Instead of Novensiles, we also find the form Novensides, whence we may infer that it is some compound of insides. The first word in this compound is said by some to be novus, and by others novem (Arnob. iii. 38, 39); and it is accordingly said that the Novensiles were nine gods, to whom Jupiter gave permission to hurl his lightnings. (Arnob. l. c.; Plin. H. N. ii. 52.) But this fact, though it may have applied to the Etruscan religion, nowhere appears in the religion of the Romans. We are therefore inclined to look upon Novensides as composed of nove and insides, so that these gods would be the opposite of Indigetes, or old native divinities; that is, the Novensides are the gods who are newly or recently introduced at Rome, after the conquest of some place. For it was customary at Rome after the conquest of a neighbouring town to carry its gods to Rome, and there either to establish their worship in public, or to assign the care of it to some patrician family. This is the explanation of Cincius Alimentus (ap. Arnob. iii. 38, &c.), and seems to be quite satisfactory. [L. S.]

NO'VIA GENS, plebeian, was of very little note. Persons of this name are first mentioned in the last century of the republic, but none of the Novii obtained the consulship till A. D. 78.

NO'VIUS. 1. Q. Novius, a celebrated writer of Atellane plays, was a contemporary of Pomponius, who wrote plays of the same kind, and of the dictator Sulla. (Macrob. Sat. i. 10; Gell. xv. 13.) The plays of Novius are frequently mentioned by Nonius Marcellus, and occasionally by the other grammarians. A list of the plays, and the fragments which are preserved, are given by Bothe. (Poët. Lat. Scenic. Fragmenta, vol. ii. p. 41, &c.)

2. L. Novius, a colleague and enemy of P. Clodius in his tribunate, B. C. 58. A fragment of a speech of his is preserved by Asconius (in Cic. Mil. p. 47, Orelli).

NOX. [Nyx.]

NU'CIUS, NICANDER (Νίκανδρος Νούκιος), a native of Corcyra, born about the beginning of the sixteenth century, who was driven from his own country by various misfortunes, and took refuge at Venice. Here he was taken into the service of Gerard Veltuyckus, or Veltwick (with whom he had been previously acquainted), who was going as ambassador from the emperor Charles V. to the court of the Sultan Solyman, A. D. 1545. He accompanied him not only to Constantinople, but also over several other parts of Europe, and wrote an account of his travels, which is still extant, and contains much curious and interesting matter. There is a MS. of this work in the Bodleian library at Oxford (containing two books, but not quite perfect at the end), from which the second book has been edited in Greek with an English translation under the direction of Dr. Cramer, small 4to., 1841, London, printed for the Camden Society. In his introduction, Dr. Cramer has given a short analysis of the contents of the first book. There is another and more complete MS. of Nucius's Travels preserved in the Ambrosian library at Milan, consisting of three books, from which there was, some years ago, an intention on the part of one of the officers of the library of editing the work, but the writer is not aware that this intention has ever been put into execution. (Compare Dr. Cramer's Introduction to his edition.) [W. A. G.]

NUMA MA'RCIUS. 1. The son of Marcus, is described in the legend of Numa Pompilius as the most intimate friend of that king. Marcius urged Numa to accept the Roman throne, accompanied him from his Sabine country to Rome, there became a member of the senate, and was chosen by his royal friend to be the first Pontifex Maximus, and the depository of all his religious and ecclesiastical enactments. It is related that Marcius aspired to the kingly dignity on the death of Pompilius, and that he starved himself to death on the election of Tullus Hostilius. (Plut. Num. 5, 6, 21; Liv. i. 20.)

2. The son of the preceding, is said to have married Pompilia, the daughter of Numa Pompilius, and to have become by her the father of Ancus Marcius. Numa Marcius was appointed by Tullus Hostilius praefectus urbi. (Plut. Num. 21, Coriol.; Tac. Ann. vi. 11.)

NUMA POMPI'LIUS, the second king of Rome. The legend of this king is so well told by Niebuhr (Hist. of Rome, vol. i. p. 237, &c.), from Livy and the ancient authorities, that we cannot do better than borrow his words. "On the death of Romulus the senate at first would not allow the election of a new king: every senator was to enjoy the royal power in rotation as interrex. In this way a year passed. The people, being treated more oppressively than before, were vehement in demanding the election of a sovereign to protect them. When the senate permitted it to be held, the Romans and Sabines disputed out of which nation the king should be taken. It was agreed that the former should choose him out of the latter: and all voices concurred in naming the wise and pious Numa Pompilius of Cures, who had married the daughter of Tatius.

"It was a very prevalent belief in antiquity that Numa had derived his knowledge from the Greek Pythagoras; Polybius and other writers attempted to show that this was impossible, for chronological reasons, inasmuch as Pythagoras did not come into Italy till the reign of Servius Tullius; but an impartial critic, who does not believe that the son of Mnesarchus was the only Pythagoras, or that there is any kind of necessity for placing Numa in the twentieth Olympiad, or, in fine, that the historical personality of Pythagoras is more certain than that of Numa, will be pleased with the old popular opinion, and will not sacrifice it to chronology.

"When Numa was assured by the auguries that the gods approved of his election, the first care of the pious king was turned, not to the rites of the temples, but to human institutions. He divided the lands which Romulus had conquered and had left open to occupancy. He founded the worship of Terminus. It was not till after he had done this that Numa set himself to legislate for religion. He was revered as the author of the Roman ceremonial law. Instructed by the Camena Egeria, who was espoused to him in a visible form, and who led him into the assemblies of her sisters in the sacred grove, he regulated the whole hierarchy; the pontiffs, who took care, by precept and by chastisement, that the laws relating to religion should be observed both by individuals and by the state; the augurs, whose calling it was to afford security for the councils of men by piercing into those of the gods; the flamens, who ministered in the temples of the supreme deities; the chaste virgins of Vesta; the Salii, who solemnised the worship of the gods with armed dances and songs. He prescribed the rites according to which the people might offer worship and prayer acceptable to the gods. To him were revealed the conjurations for compelling Jupiter himself to make known his will, by lightnings and the flight of birds: whereas others were forced to wait for these prodigies from the favour of the god, who was often silent to such as were doomed to destruction. This charm he learnt from Faunus and Picus, whom, by the advice of Egeria, he enticed and bound in chains, as Midas bound Silenus in the rose garden. From this pious prince the god brooked such boldness. At Numa's entreaty he exempted the people from the terrible duty of offering up human sacrifices. But when the audacious Tullus presumed to imitate his predecessor, he was killed by a flash of lightning during his conjurations in the temple of Jupiter Elicius. The thirty-nine years of Numa's reign, which glided away in quiet happiness, without any war or any calamity, afforded no legends but of such marvels. That nothing might break the peace of his days, the ancile fell from heaven, when the land was threatened with a pestilence, which disappeared as soon as Numa ordained the ceremonies of the Salii. Numa was not a theme of song, like Romulus; indeed he enjoined that, among all the Camenae, the highest honours should be paid to Tacita. Yet a story was handed down, that, when he was entertaining his guests, the plain food in the earthenware dishes were turned on the appearance of Egeria into a banquet fit for gods, in vessels of gold, in order that her divinity might be made manifest to the incredulous. The temple of Janus, his work, continued always shut: peace was spread over Italy; until Numa, like the darlings of the gods in the golden age, fell asleep, full of days. Egeria melted away in tears into a fountain."

The sacred books of Numa, in which he prescribed all the religious rites and ceremonies, were said to have been buried near him in a separate tomb, and to have been discovered by accident, five hundred years afterwards, by one Terentius, in the consulship of Cornelius and Baebius, B. C. 181. By Terentius they were carried to the city-praetor Petilius, and were found to consist of twelve or seven books, in Latin, on ecclesiastical law (de jure pontificum), and the same number of books in Greek on philosophy: the latter were burnt at the command of the senate, but the former were carefully preserved. The story of the discovery of these books is evidently a forgery; and the books, which were ascribed to Numa, and which were extant at a later time, were evidently nothing more than ancient works containing an account of the ceremonial of the Roman religion. (Plut. Numa; Liv. i. 18—21; Cic. de Rep. ii. 13—15; Dionys. ii. 58—66; Plin. H. N. xiii. 14. s. 27; Val. Max. i. 1. § 12; August. de Civ. Dei, vii. 34.)

It would be idle to inquire into the historical reality of Numa. Whether such a person ever existed or not, we cannot look upon the second king of Rome as a real historical personage. His name represents the rule of law and order, and to him are ascribed all those ecclesiastical institutions which formed the basis of the ceremonial religion of the Romans. Some modern writers connect his name with the word νόμος, "law" (Hartung, Die Religion der Römer, vol. i. p. 216), but this is mere fancy. It would be impossible to enter into a history of the various institutions of this king, without discussing the whole ecclesiastical system of the Romans, a subject which would be foreign to this work. We would only remark, that the universal tradition of the Sabine origin of Numa intimates that the Romans must have derived a great portion of their religious system from the Sabines, rather than from the Etruscans, as is commonly believed.

NUME'NIUS (Νουμήνιος), of Apameia in Syria, a Pythagoreo-Platonic philosopher, who was highly esteemed by Plotinus and his school, as well as by Origen. (Porphyr. Vit. Plot. 2, 17; Suid. s. vv. Ὠριγένης, Νουμήνιος.) He and Cronius, a man of a kindred mind and a contemporary, who is often spoken of along with him (Porphyr. De Antr. Nymph. p. 121 ed. Holsten.), probably belong to the age of the Antonines. He is mentioned not only by Porphyrius, but also by Clemens of Alexandria and Origen. Statements and fragments of his apparently very numerous works have been preserved by Origen, Theodoret, and especially by Eusebius, and from them we may with tolerable accuracy learn the peculiar tendency of this new Platonico-Pythagorean philosophy, and its approximation to the doctrines of Plato. Numenius is almost invariably designated as a Pythagorean, but his object was to trace the doctrines of Plato up to Pythagoras, and at the same time to show that they were not at variance with the dogmas and mysteries of the Brahmins, Jews, Magi and Egyptians. (See the Fragm. of the 1st book Περὶ τἀγαθοῦ, ap. Euseb. Praep. Evang. ix. 7.) Numenius called Plato "the Atticising Moses," probably on the supposition of some historical connexion between them. (Clem. Alex. Strom. i. 342; Euseb. Praep. Evang. xi. 10. p. 527; Suid. s. v.) In several of his works, therefore, he had based his remarks on passages from the books of Moses, and he had explained one passage about the life of our Saviour, though without mentioning him in a figurative sense. (Orig. adv. Cels. iv. p. 198, &c. Spenc.; comp. i. p. 13; Porphyr. De Antr. Nymph. p. 111, &c.) He had also endeavoured to inquire into the hidden meaning of the Egyptian, perhaps also of Greek mythology. (See his explanation of Serapis ap. Orig. Ibid. v. p. 258; Fr. ἐκ τοῦ περὶ τῶν παρὰ Πλάτωνι ἀποῤῥήτων, ap. Euseb. Praep. Ev. xiii. 5.) His intention was to restore the philosophy of Plato, the genuine Pythagorean and mediator between Socrates and Pythagoras (neither of whom he prefers to the other) in its original purity, cleared from the Aristotelian and Zenonian or Stoic doctrines, and purified from the unsatisfactory and perverse explanations, which he said were found even in Speusippus and Xenocrates, and which, through the influence of Arcesilas and Carneades, i. e. in the second and third Academy, had led to a bottomless scepticism. (See especially Euseb. Praep. Ev. xiv. 5.) His work on the apostacy of the Academy from Plato (Περὶ τῆς τῶν Ἀκαδημαϊκῶν πρὸς Πλάτωνα διαστάσεως), to judge from its rather numerous fragments (ap. Euseb. Praep. Ev. xiv. 5—9), contained a minute and wearisome account of the outward circumstances of those men, and was full of fabulous tales about their lives, without entering into the nature of their scepticism. His books Περὶ τἀγαθοῦ seem to have been of a better kind; in them he had minutely explained, mainly in opposition to the Stoics, that existence could neither be found in the elements because they were in a perpetual state of change and transition, nor in matter because it is vague, inconstant, lifeless, and in itself not an object of our knowledge; and that, on the contrary, existence, in order to resist the annihilation and decay of matter, must itself rather be incorporeal and removed from all mutability (Frag. ap. Euseb. Praep. Ev. xv. 17), in eternal presence, without being subject to the variation of time, simple and imperturbable in its nature by its own will as well as by influence from without. (Ib. xi. 10.) True existence, according to him, is identical with the first god existing in and by himself, that is, with good (τὸ ἀγαθόν), and is defined as spirit (νοῦς, ib. xi. 18, ix. 22). But as the first (absolute) god existing in himself and being undisturbed in his motion, could not be creative (δημιουργικός), he thought that we must assume a second god, who keeps matter together, directs his energy to it and to intelligible essences, and imparts his spirit to all creatures; his mind is directed to the first god, in whom he beholds the ideas according to which he arranges the world harmoniously, being seized with a desire to create the world. The first god communicates his ideas to the second, without losing them himself, just as we communicate knowledge to one another, without depriving ourselves of it. (Ibid. xi. 18.) In regard to the relation existing between the third and second god, and to the manner in which they also are to be conceived as one (probably in opposition to the vague duration of matter), no information can be derived from the fragments which have come down to us. [Ch. A. B.]

NUME'NIUS (Νουμήνιος). 1. A sceptical philosopher, and a pupil of Pyrrhon, must be distinguished from Numenius of Apameia. (Diog. Laërt. ix. 68, 102, 114.)

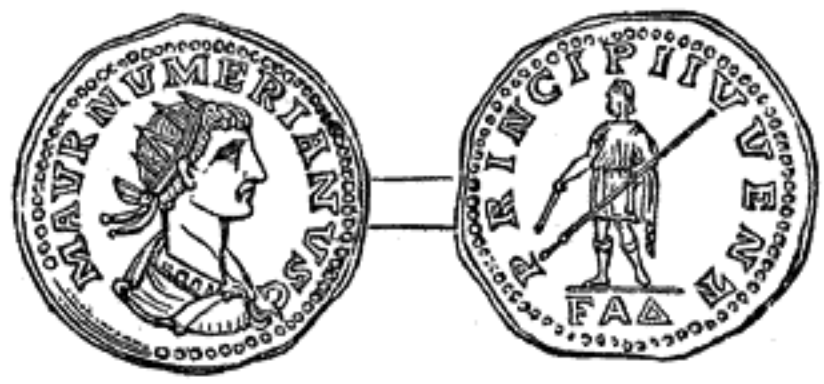
2. A rhetorician, who lived in the reign of Hadrian, to whom he addressed a consolatory discourse (παραμυθητικόν) on the death of Antinous. He also wrote Περὶ τῶν τῆς λέξεως σχημάτων, Χρειῶν συναγωγή, and arguments (ὑποθέσεις) to the works of Thucydides and Demosthenes. (Suid. s. v. and Eudoxia.) He was the father of the rhetorician Alexander, who is hence frequently called Alexander Numenius. [See Vol. I. p. 123, a.]

NUME'NIUS (Νουμήνιος), a medical writer, quoted by Celsus (v. 18. § 35, 21. § 4, pp. 88, 92) and Aëtius (iv. 1. § 20, p. 621, in which passage for Numius we should read Numenius). He is, perhaps, the native of Heracleia, who was a pupil of Dieuches, and lived probably in the fourth or third century B. C. (Athen. i. p. 5.) He wrote a poem on fishing, Ἁλιευτικά, which is frequently quoted by Athenaeus. A person of the same name, who wrote on venomous animals, Θηριακά, is quoted by the Scholiast on Nicander. (Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. ii. p. 627, ed. vet.) [W. A. G.]

NUME'RIA, the goddess. [NUMERIUS.]

NUMERIA'NUS, M. AURELIUS, the younger of the two sons of the emperor Carus, and his companion in the expedition against the Persians, undertaken in A. D. 283. After the death of his father, which happened in the following year, he was, without opposition, acknowledged as joint emperor with his brother Carinus. The idle fears of the army compelled him to abandon all hopes of prosecuting a campaign commenced with so much glory, and of extending the conquests already achieved. For terrified by the mysterious fate of Carus [CARUS], which they regarded as a direct manifestation of the wrath of heaven, and an evident fulfilment of the ancient prophecy which fixed the river Tigris as the limit of the Roman sway, the soldiers refused to advance. Yielding to their superstitious terrors, Numerianus commenced a retreat in the very hour of victory, and slowly retraced his steps towards the Thracian Bosporus. During the greater part of the march, which lasted for eight months, he was duly confined to his litter by an affection of the eyes, induced, it is said, by excessive weeping. After this seclusion had continued for a considerable period, dark reports began to circulate, and the excitement increasing by degrees, at length became so fierce that the soldiers forced their way into the Imperial tent, and discovered the dead body of their prince. The concealment practised by Arrius Aper, praefect of the praetorians, father-in-law of the deceased, and who had lately acted as his representative, gave rise to the worst suspicions. He was publicly arraigned of the murder in a military council, held at Chalcedon, and, without being permitted to speak in his own defence, was stabbed to the heart by Diocletian, whom the troops had already proclaimed emperor, and who on this occasion acted with a degree of hasty violence strangely at variance with the calmness of his well-regulated mind. [DIOCLETIANUS.]

The Augustan historian represents Numerianus as a prince remarkable alike for moral and intellectual excellence. He gained universal love and admiration by gentleness of temper, affability of address, and purity of life, while at the same time he bore away the palm in eloquence and poetry from all his contemporaries—virtues and accomplishments which shone the more conspicuous and bright when contrasted with the brutal profligacy and savage cruelty of his brother and colleague Carinus [CARINUS]. (Vopisc. Numerian.; Aur. Vict. Epit. 38, de Caes. 38; Eutrop. ix. 12; Zonar. xii. 30.) [W. R.]



COIN OF NUMERIANUS.

NUME'RIUS, a praenomen among the Romans of rather rare occurrence. Hence the copyists of munuscripts frequently changed N., its contracted form, into M. Varro says that this praenomen was given to those who were born quickly; and that women in childbirth were accustomed to pray to a goddess Numeria, who must have been a deity of some importance, as the pontifex mentioned her in the ancient prayers (Var. Fragm. p. 319, Bipont.; comp. Hartung, Die Religion der Römer, vol. ii. p. 240). As a Roman praenomen the feminine Numeria could not be used any more than Marca (Varr. L. L. ix. 55, ed. Müller). Festus relates that Numerius was never used as a praenomen by any patrician house, till the Fabius, who alone survived after the six and thirty had been slaughtered by the Etruscans, married the wealthy daughter of Otacilius Maleventanus, on the condition that the first child should receive the praenomen of its maternal grandfather, Numerius. (Festus, p. 171 ed. Müller.)

Numerius also occurs as the gentile name of a few persons:—

1. NUMERIUS, one of the friends of Marius, provided a vessel for him at Ostia, when he was proscribed by Sulla in B. C. 88 (Plut. Mar. 35). Numerius, however, is probably only the praenomen of the friend of Marius.

2. Q. NUMERIUS RUFUS, tribune of the plebs, B. C. 57. [RUFUS.]

3. NUMERIUS ATTICUS. [ATTICUS.]

NUME'STIUS, NUME'RIUS, was received by Cicero among his friends, upon the recommendation of Atticus. (Cic. ad Att. ii. 20, 22, 24.)

NUMI'CIA GENS, an ancient patrician house, a member of which, T. Numicius Priscus, obtained the consulship as early as B. C. 469. PRISCUS is the only cognomen in this gens.

NUMI'CIUS. 1. Tl. Numicius, tribune of the plebs, B. C. 320, was with his colleague, Q. Maelius, given over to the Samnites, when the Romans resolved not to adhere to the peace made at Caudium. Livy calls the colleague of Maelius, L. Julius and not Numicius (Cic. de Off. iii. 30 ; Liv. ix. 8). For further details, see Maelius, No. 3.

2. Numicius, to whom Horace addresses the sixth epistle of his first book, is otherwise a person quite unknown.

NU'MIDA, M'. AEMILIUS, was decemvir sacrorum, and died in B. C. 211. (Liv. xxvi. 23.)

NU'MIDA, PLO'TIUS, a friend of Horace, who addresses to him one of his odes (i. 36), to celebrate his safe arrival in Italy, after undergoing the perils of the war against the Cantabri in Spain.

NUMI'DICUS, the agnomen of Q. Metellus, who fought against Jugurtha. [Metellus, No. 14.]

NUMI'DIUS QUADRA'TUS. [Quadratus.]

NUMI'SIA GENS, is probably merely another orthography of Numicia Gens. [Numicia Gens.] In the time of the republic we find no Numisii with a cognomen [Numisius], but under the empire persons of this name occur, with the cognomens of Lupus and Rufus.

NUMISIA'NUS (Νουμισιανός, written also Νουμεσιανός, Νουμησιανός, or Νομισιανός, but more frequently in the first of these forms), an eminent physician at Corinth, whose lectures Galen attended about A. D. 150, having gone to Corinth for that express purpose (Galen, de Anat. Admin. i. 1, vol. ii. p. 217). He was, according to Galen (l. c.), the most celebrated of all the pupils of Quintus, and one of the tutors to Pelops (id. Comment. in Hippocr. "De Nat. Hom." ii. 6. vol. xv. p. 136), and distinguished himself especially by his anatomical knowledge. He wrote a commentary on the "Aphorisms" of Hippocrates (id. Comment. in Hippocr. "De Humor." i. 24, vol. xvi. p. 197, Comment. in Hippocr. "Aphor." iv. 69, v. 44, vol. xvii. pt. ii. pp. 751, 837), which appears to have been well thought of in Galen's time. He is also mentioned by Galen, de Ord. Libror. suor. vol. xix. p. 57, and de Anat. Admin. viii. 2, vol. ii. p. 660, and bk. xiv. (in MS. Arabic translation in the Bodleian library). [W. A. G.]

NUMI'SIUS. 1. L. Numisius of Circeii, was one of the two chief magistrates (praetores) of the Latins in B. C. 340, the year in which the great Latin war broke out, and was the principal commander in the war. (Liv. viii. 3, 11.)

2. C. Numisius, praetor B. C. 177, obtained Sicily as his province. (Liv. xli. 8.)

3. T. Numisius, of Tarquinii, was one of the ten commissioners sent into Macedonia in B. C. 167, to regulate its affairs after its conquest by Aemilius Paullus (Liv. xlv. 17). About the same time, or a little earlier, he was at the head of the embassy sent by the Roman senate to endeavour to mediate between Antiochus Epiphanes and the two Ptolemies (Philometor and Physcon). (Polyb. xxix. 10.)

4. Numisius, seems to have been the name of an architect, since Cicero speaks of Numisiana forma, that is, the plan of a house or villa designed by one Numisius. (Cic. ad Q. Fr. ii. 2. § 1.)

5. Numisius Tiro, is branded by Cicero as one of the cut-throats of M. Antonius, the triumvir. (Cic. Phil. ii. 4, v. 6, xii. 6.)

NUMI'SIUS, the architect of the theatre at Herculaneum. His name is preserved in an inscription on the building. [P. S.]

NU'MITOR. [Romulus.]

NUMITO'RIA. 1. The mother of Virginia. (Dionys. xi. 30.) [Numitorius, No. 2.]

2. The wife of M. Antonius Creticus, praetor B. C. 75, was the daughter of Q. Numitorius Pullus, who betrayed Fregellae. [Numitorius, No. 3.] She left no children. (Cic. Phil. iii. 6.)

NUMITO'RIA GENS, plebeian, was of considerable antiquity, but none of its members ever attained any of the higher offices of the state. Pullus is the only cognomen which occurs in this gens. The annexed coin belongs to this gens, but it is quite uncertain to whom it refers.

COIN OF NUMITORIA GENS.

NUMITO'RIUS. 1. L. Numitorius, is mentioned as one of the five tribunes who were first elected in the comitia tributa, B. C. 472 (Liv. ii. 58).

2. P. Numitorius, the maternal uncle of Virginia, attempted to resist the iniquitous sentence of the decemvir App. Claudius, and was elected tribune of the plebs upon the expulsion of the decemvir, B. C. 449. In his tribunate he accused Sp. Oppius, one of the late decemvirs. (Liv. iii. 45, 54 ; Dionys. xi. 28, 38, 46.)

3. Q. Numitorius Pullus, of Fregellae, betrayed his native town to the Roman praetor L. Opimius, B. C. 125, when it rose in revolt to obtain the Roman franchise. The town was taken and destroyed by Opimius (Cic. de Invent. ii. 34 ; comp. Cic. de Leg. Agr. ii. 33 ; Liv. Epit. 60 ; Vell. Pat. ii. 6). The daughter of this Numitorius married M. Antonius Creticus. [Numitoria, No. 2.]

4. C. Numitorius, was a distinguished man of the aristocratical party, who was put to death by Marius and Cinna, when they entered Rome at the close of B. C. 88. His body was afterwards dragged through the forum by the executioner's hook. (Appian, B. C. i. 72 ; Flor. iii. 21. § 14.)

5. C. Numitorius, a Roman eques, who was a witness against Verres. (Cic. Verr. v. 63.)

NU'MMIUS, is a name which occurs only in the Fasti and inscriptions of the time of the empire. Thus we find a T. Rusticus Nummius Gallus, consul suffectus, A. D. 26, a Nummius Sisenna, consul A. D. 133, and a M. Nummius Albinus, consul A. D. 206.

NUMO'NIUS VALA. [Vala.]

NYCTE'IS (Νυκτηΐς), a feminine patronymic of Nycteus, and applied to his daughter Antiope, the wife of Polydorus and mother of Labdacus. (Apollod. iii. 5. § 5 ; Nycteus.) [L. S.]

NYCTEUS (Νυκτεύς), a son of Hyrieus by the nymph Clonia, brother of Lycus and Orion, and husband of Polyxo, by whom he became the father of Antiope. (Apollod. iii. 10. § 1 ; Anton. Lib. 25.) According to others Antiope was the daughter of the river-god Asopus. (Apollod. l. c.; Hom. Od. xi. 259, &c.) Antiope was carried off by Epopeus, king of Aegialeia ; and Nycteus, who, as the guardian of Labdacus, was staying at Thebes, took revenge by invading with a Theban army the territory of Sicyon: but he was defeated; and being severely wounded, he was carried back to Thebes, where, previous to his death, he appointed his brother Lycus guardian of Labdacus, and at the same time demanded of him as a duty to take vengeance on Epopeus. But the latter died before Lycus could fulfil his promise. (Paus. ii. 6. § 2; Hygin. Fab. 7, 8.) When Labdacus had grown up, Lycus surrendered the government to him; but as Labdacus died soon after, Lycus again became the guardian of his son, Laius, but was expelled by his own great-nephews, Amphion and Zethus. (Paus. ix. 5. § 2; Eurip. Herc. Fur. 27.) A very different account is found in Apollodorus (iii. 5. § 5), for according to it, Nycteus and Lycus were the sons of Chthonius, and were obliged to quit their country on account of the murder of Phlegyas. They then settled at Hyria; but Lycus was chosen commander by the Thebans, and usurped the government which belonged to Laius, and in which he maintained himself for twenty years, until he was slain by Amphion and Zethus. Nycteus made away with himself in despair, because his daughter, who was with child by Zeus, fled to Epopeus at Sicyon; but before he died, he commissioned Lycus to take vengeance on Epopeus. Lycus promised, and kept his word, for he slew Epopeus, and kept Antiope as his prisoner. According to Hyginus (Fab. 157), Nycteus and Lycus were the sons of Poseidon and Celaeno. (Völcker, Mythol. des Japet. Geschlechts, p. 116.) [L. S.]

NYCTI'MENE, a daughter of Epopeus, king of Lesbos, or, according to others, of Nycteus. Pursued and dishonoured by her amorous father, she concealed herself in the shade of forests, where she was metamorphosed by Athena into an owl. (Hygin. Fab. 204; Ov. Met. ii. 590; Lutat. ad Stat. Theb. iii. 507; Serv. ad Virg. Georg. i. 403.) [L. S.]

NYMPHAE (Νύμφαι), the name of a numerous class of inferior female divinities, though they are designated by the title of Olympian, are called to the meetings of the gods in Olympus, and described as the daughters of Zeus. But they were believed to dwell on earth in groves, on the summits of mountains, in rivers, streams, glens, and grottoes. (Hom. Od. vi. 123, &c., xii. 318, Il. xx. 8, xxiv. 615.) Homer further describes them as presiding over game, accompanying Artemis, dancing with her, weaving in their grottoes purple garments, and kindly watching over the fate of mortals. (Od. vi. 105, ix. 154, xiii. 107, 356, xvii. 243, Il. vi. 420, xxiv. 616.) Men offer up sacrifices either to them alone, or in conjunction with other gods, such as Hermes. (Od. xiii. 350, xvii. 211, 240, xiv. 435.) From the places which they inhabit, they are called ἀγρονόμοι (Od. vi. 105), ὀρεστιάδες (Il. vi. 420), and νηϊάδες (Od. xiii. 104).

All nymphs, whose number is almost infinite, may be divided into two great classes. The first class embraces those who must be regarded as a kind of inferior divinities, recognised in the worship of nature. The early Greeks saw in all the phenomena of ordinary nature some manifestation of the deity; springs, rivers, grottoes, trees, and mountains, all seemed to them fraught with life; and all were only the visible embodiments of so many divine agents. The salutary and beneficent powers of nature were thus personified, and regarded as so many divinities; and the sensations produced on man in the contemplation of nature, such as awe, terror, joy, delight, were ascribed to the agency of the various divinities of nature. The second class of nymphs are personifications of tribes, races, and states, such as Cyrene, and many others.

The nymphs of the first class must again be subdivided into various species, according to the different parts of nature of which they are the representatives. 1. Nymphs of the watery element. Here we first mention the nymphs of the ocean, Ὠκεανῖναι or Ὠκεανίδες, νύμφαι ἅλιαι, who are regarded as the daughters of Oceanus (Hes. Theog. 346, &c., 364; Aeschyl. Prom.; Callim. Hymn. in Dian. 13; Apollon. Rhod. iv. 1414; Soph. Philoct. 1470); and next the nymphs of the Mediterranean or inner sea, who are regarded as the daughters of Nereus, whence they are called Nereides (Νηρεΐδες; Hes. Theog. 240, &c.). The rivers were represented by the Potameides (Ποταμηΐδες), who, as local divinities, were named after their rivers, as Acheloides, Anigrides, Ismenides, Amnisiades, Pactolides. (Apollon. Rhod. iii. 1219; Virg. Aen. viii. 70; Paus. v. 5. § 6, i. 31. § 2; Callim. Hymn. in Dian. 15; Ov. Met. vi. 16; Steph. Byz. s. v. Ἀμνισός.) But the nymphs of fresh water, whether of rivers, lakes, brooks, or wells, are also designated by the general name Naiades, Νηΐδες, though they have in addition their specific names, as Κρηναῖαι, Πηγαῖαι, Ἑλειονόμοι, Λιμνατίδες, or Λιμνάδες. (Hom. Od. xvii. 240; Apollon. Rhod. iii. 1219; Theocrit. v. 17; Orph. Hymn. 50. 6, Argon. 644.) Even the rivers of the lower regions are described as having their nymphs; hence, Nymphae infernae paludis and Avernales. (Ov. Met. v. 540, Fast. ii. 610.) Many of these presided over waters or springs which were believed to inspire those that drank of them, and hence the nymphs themselves were thought to be endowed with prophetic or oracular power, and to inspire men with the same, and to confer upon them the gift of poetry. (Paus. iv. 27. § 2, ix. 3. § 5, 34. § 3; Plut. Aristid. 11; Theocrit. vii. 92; comp. MUSAE.) Inspired soothsayers or priests are therefore sometimes called νυμφόληπτοι. (Plat. Phaedr. p. 421, e.) Their powers, however, vary with those of the springs over which they preside; some were thus regarded as having the power of restoring sick persons to health (Pind. Ol. xii. 26; Paus. v. 5. § 6, vi. 22. § 4); and as water is necessary to feed all vegetation as well as all living beings, the water nymphs (ὑδριάδες) were also worshipped along with Dionysus and Demeter as giving life and blessings to all created beings, and this attribute is expressed by a variety of epithets, such as καρποτρόφοι, αἰπολικαί, νόμιαι, κουροτρόφοι, &c. As their influence was thus exercised in all departments of nature, they frequently appear in connection with higher divinities, as, for example, with Apollo, the prophetic god and the protector of herds and flocks (Apollon. Rhod. iv. 1218); with Artemis, the huntress and the protectress of game, for she herself was originally an Arcadian nymph (Apollon. Rhod. i. 1225, iii. 881; Paus. iii. 10. § 8); with Hermes, the fructifying god of flocks (Hom. Hymn. in Aphrod. 262); with Dionysus (Orph. Hymn. 52; Horat. Carm. i. 1. 31, ii. 19. 3); with Pan, the Seileni and Satyrs, whom they join in their Bacchic revels and dances.

2. Nymphs of mountains and grottoes, are called Ὀροδεμνιάδες and Ὀρειάδες, but sometimes also by names derived from the particular mountains they inhabited, as Κιθαιρωνίδες, Πηλιάδες, Κορύκιαι, &c. (Theocrit. vii. 137 ; Virg. Aen. i. 168, 500 ; Paus. v. 5. § 6, ix. 3. § 5, x. 32. § 5 ; Apollon. Rhod. i. 550, ii. 711 ; Ov. Her. xx. 221; Virg. Eclog. vi. 56.)

3. Nymphs of forests, groves, and glens, were believed sometimes to appear to and frighten solitary travellers. They are designated by the names Ἀλσηΐδες, Ὕληωροί, Αὐλωνιάδες, and Ναπαῖαι. (Apollon. Rhod. i. 1066, 1227 ; Orph. Hymn. 50. 7 ; Theocrit. xiii. 44 ; Ov. Met. xv. 490 ; Virg. Georg. iv. 535.)

4. Nymphs of trees, were believed to die together with the trees which had been their abode, and with which they had come into existence. They were called Δρυάδες, Ἁμαδρυάδες or Ἀδρυάδες, from δρῦς, which signifies not only an oak, but any wild-growing lofty tree ; for the nymphs of fruit trees were called Μηλίδες, Μηλιάδες, Ἐπιμηλίδες, or Ἁμαμηλίδες. They seem to be of Arcadian origin, and never appear together with any of the great gods. (Paus. viii. 4. § 2 ; Apollon. Rhod. ii. 477, &c. ; Anton. Lib. 31, 32 ; Hom. Hymn. in Ven. 259, &c.)

The second class of nymphs, who were connected with certain races or localities (Νύμφαι χθόνιαι, Apollon. Rhod. ii. 504), usually have a name derived from the places with which they are associated, as Nysiades, Dodonides, Lemniae. (Ov. Fast. iii. 769, Met. v. 412, ix. 651 ; Apollod. iii. 4. § 3 ; Schol. ad Pind. Ol. xiii. 74.)

The sacrifices offered to nymphs usually consisted of goats, lambs, milk, and oil, but never of wine. (Theocrit. v. 12, 53, 139, 149 ; Serv. ad Virg. Georg. iv. 380, Eclog. v. 74.) They were worshipped and honoured with sanctuaries in many parts of Greece, especially near springs, groves, and grottoes, as, for example, near a spring at Cyrtone (Paus. ix. 24. § 4), in Attica (i. 31. § 2), at Olympia (v. 15. § 4, vi. 22. § 4), at Megara (i. 40. § 1), between Sicyon and Phlius (ii. 11. § 3), and other places. Nymphs are represented in works of art as beautiful maidens, either quite naked or only half-covered. Later poets sometimes describe them as having sea-coloured hair. (Ov. Met. v. 432.) [L. S.]

NYMPHIDIA'NUS (Νυμφιδιανός), of Smyrna, a Neo-Platonist, lived in the time of the emperor Julian, and was the brother of Maximus and Claudianus. The emperor Julian, who was greatly attached to Maximus, made Nymphidianus his interpreter and Greek secretary, though he was more fit to write declamations and disputations than letters. He survived his brother Maximus, and died at an advanced age. (Eunap. Vit. Soph. p. 137.) [L. S.]

NYMPHI'DIUS LUPUS, had served in the army, along with the younger Pliny, who warmly recommends his son to the emperor Trajan. (Plin. Ep. x. 19 or 56.)

NYMPHI'DIUS SABI'NUS, was commander of the praetorian troops, together with Tigellinus, towards the latter end of Nero's reign. He took an active part in suppressing the conspiracy of Piso against Nero, A. D. 66, and was in consequence rewarded by the emperor with the consular insignia. His mother was a freedwoman, who was accustomed to sell her favours to the servants of the imperial palace ; and as Caligula did not disdain such intercourse, Nymphidius claimed that emperor for his father. On the death of Nero in A. D. 68, Nymphidius attempted to seize the throne, but was murdered by the friends of Galba. (Tac. Ann. xv. 72, Hist. i. 5, 25, 37 ; Plut. Galb. 8—15.)

NYMPHIS (Νύμφις), the son of Xenagoras, a native of the Pontic Heracleia, lived in the middle of the second century, B. C., and was a person of distinction in his native land, as well as an historical writer of some note. He was sent as ambassador to the Galatians to propitiate that people, when the inhabitants of Heracleia had offended them by assisting Mithridates, the son of Ariobarzanes, with whom the Galatians were at war. (Memnon, c. 24, ed. Orelli.) As Ariobarzanes was succeeded by this Mithridates about B. C. 240, we may refer the embassy to this year. (Clinton, F. H. sub anno.) Memnon likewise mentions (c. 11) a Nymphis, as one of the exiles in B. C. 281, when Seleucus, after the death of Lysimachus, threatened Heracleia ; but notwithstanding the remark of Clinton (sub anno 281) the interval of forty-one years between the two events just mentioned, leads to the conclusion that the latter Nymphis was a different person from the historian, more especially as Memnon, in the former case, expressly distinguishes Nymphis by the epithet ὁ ἱστορικός. Nymphis was the author of three works, which are referred to by the ancient writers : —

1. Περὶ Ἀλεξάνδρου καὶ τῶν Διαδόχων καὶ Ἐπιγόνων, concerning Alexander, his successors, and their descendants, in twenty-four books. This work ended at the accession of the third Ptolemy, B. C. 247. (Suid. s. v. Νύμφις ; Aelian, H. N. xvii. 3.)

2. Περὶ Ἡρακλείας, in thirteen books, gave the history of his native city to the overthrow of the tyrants in B. C. 281. (Suid. l. c.; Athen. xii. pp. 536, a. 549, a. xiv. p. 619, e. ; Schol. ad Apoll. Rhod. ii. 650, 729, 752, iv. 247 ; Steph. Byz. s. v. Ὕπιος, Φρίξος ; Plut. Moral. p. 248, d. ; Schol. ad Aristoph. Av. 874.).

3. Περίπλους Ἀσίας. (Athen. xiii. p. 596, e.)

The fragments of Nymphis are collected by J. C. Orelli, in his edition of Memnon, Leipzig, 1816, pp. 95—102. (Voss. de Hist. Graecis, p. 140, ed. Westermann ; Clinton, F. H. vol. iii. p. 510.)

NY'MPHIUS, an Italian Greek, one of the chief men of Palaepolis, who, together with Charilaüs, betrayed the town to Q. Publilius Philo, the Roman proconsul, in the second Samnite war (B. C. 323), and drove out the Roman garrison. (Liv. viii. 25, 26.)

NYMPHODO'RUS (Νυμφόδωρος), a citizen of Abdera, whose sister married Sitalces, king of Thrace. The Athenians, who had previously regarded Nymphodorus as their enemy, made him their proxenus in B. C. 431, and, through his mediation, obtained the alliance of Sitalces, for which they were anxious, and conferred the freedom of their city on Sadocus, Sitalces' son. Nymphodorus also brought about a reconciliation between the Athenians and Perdiccas, king of Macedonia, and persuaded them to restore to him the town of Therma, which they had taken in B. C. 432 (see Thuc. i. 61). In B. C. 430 Nymphodorus aided in the seizure, at Bisanthe, of Aristeus and the other ambassadors, who were on their way to ask aid of the Persian king against the Athenians. (Herod. vii. 137 ; Thuc. ii. 29, 67 ; comp. Arist. Ach. 145.) [E. E.]

which he lived is unknown, but he was the author of a work entitled Νόμιμα Ἀσίας, that is, the Laws or Customs of Asia, of which the third book is mentioned by Clemens of Alexandria (Strom. i. p. 139 ; comp. Protrept. 19), who quotes from it a passage concerning some Egyptian customs. In the second of the passages here cited Clemens calls the work Νόμιμα βαρβαρικά, but there can be no doubt that it was the same production as the Νόμιμα Ἀσίας. Sometimes it is referred to under the brief title of Νόμοι. (Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. ii. 1010, 1031, iii. 202, iv. 1470.) The Scholiast on Sophocles (Oed. Col. 337) quotes the thirteenth book of this work ; but the whole is lost, and only a very few fragments have been transmitted to us.

2. Of Syracuse, likewise an historian, seems to have lived about the time of Philip and Alexander the Great of Macedonia. He was the author of a work entitled Ἀσίας Περίπλους (Athen. vi. p. 265, vii. p. 321, xiii. p. 609), and of a second entitled Περὶ τῶν ἐν Σικελίᾳ θαυμαζομένων (Athen. i. p. 19, xiii. p. 588), which is sometimes simply referred to by the title Περὶ Σικελίας. (Athen. viii. p. 331, x. p. 452 ; Schol. ad Theocrit. i. 69, v. 15, ad Hom. Od. μ. 301, where, instead of Μεμψήδωρος, we should read Νυμφόδωρος ; comp. Aelian, H. A. xi. 20.) Aelian (H. A. xvi. 34) quotes a statement from Nymphodorus relating to the use the Sardinians made of goat-skins, and from which it might be inferred that he also wrote on Sardinia, but this may have been a mere digression introduced into his work on Sicily. (Plin. Elench. libb. iii. v. vii. xxxiii. xxxiv. xxxv. ; Tertull. De An. 57 ; Steph. Byz. s. v. Ἀθύρας ; Harpocrat., Hesych. s. v. αἰγίδας ; comp. Ebert, Dissert. Sicul. pp. 155—222.) [L. S.]

NYMPHODO'RUS (Νυμφόδωρος), a Greek physician, who must have lived in or before the third century B. C., as he is mentioned by Heracleides of Tarentum (ap. Galen, Comment. in Hippocr. "De Artic." iv. 40, vol. xviii. pt. i. p. 736). He was celebrated for the invention of a machine for the reduction of dislocations, called γλωσσόκομον, which was afterwards somewhat modified by Aristion, and of which a description is given by Oribasius (de Machinam. c. 24, p. 179, &c.). He is mentioned by Celsus along with several other eminent surgeons (viii. 20, p. 185), and is perhaps the person quoted by Pliny, in the passages referred to in the preceding article.

Fabricius (Bibl. Gr. xiii. p. 351, 352, ed. vet.) and Haller (Bibl. Chirurg. and Bibl. Med. Pract.) suppose him to be the same person as Nymphodotus (Νυμφόδοτος), whose medical formulae are quoted by Andromachus (ap. Galen, de Compos. Medicam. sec. Gen. vi. 14, vol. xiii. p. 926), Aëtius (iii. 1. §§ 45, 49, pp. 500, 504, 505, 506), and Paulus Aegineta (vii. 12, p. 665), and who must have lived in or before the first century after Christ ; but this is quite uncertain. [W. A. G.]

NYMPHO'DOTUS. [NYMPHODORUS.]

NY'PSIUS (Νύψιος), a native of Neapolis, and a brave and skilful officer, who was sent by the younger Dionysius to the relief of the citadel at Syracuse, which was besieged by the Syracusans under Dion. He arrived just in time to prevent the garrison from surrendering the citadel, and, by a sudden sally in the night, defeated the Syracusans with great slaughter ; but the next day, Dion having returned to the city, Nypsius was defeated in his turn, and once more shut up within the citadel. (Diod. xvi. 18—20 ; Plut. Dion. 41—46.) [E. H. B.]

NYSA (Νῦσα), a daughter of Aristaeus, who was believed to have brought up the infant god Dionysus, and from whom one of the many towns of the name of Nysa was believed to have derived its name. (Diod. iii. 69.) [L. S.]

NYSA or NYSSA (Νύσα or Νύσσα). 1. Queen of Bithynia, wife of Nicomedes II., and mother of Nicomedes III. (Memnon, c. 30.) She is generally considered to have been originally a dancer, because Nicomedes III. is termed, by his rival Mithridates, "saltatricis filius" (Justin. xxxviii. 5) ; but it is more probable that the latter by such an expression meant to stigmatise Nicomedes as illegitimate, though he was in reality the son of Nysa.

2. Wife of Nicomedes III. Mithridates pretended that she was the mother of the impostor, whom he set up as a claimant to the throne of Bithynia, B. C. 74. (Mithr. Ep. ad Arsac. ap. Sall. Hist. iv. p. 239, ed. Gerlach.)

3. A daughter of Nicomedes III., whose cause was defended by J. Caesar, in gratitude for her father's friendship. (Suet. Caes. 49.)

4. A sister of Mithridates the Great, who was taken prisoner by Lucullus at Cabeira, which saved her from sharing the fate of the other sisters and wives of the king, who were put to death shortly after at Pharnacia. (Plut. Lucull. 18.)

5. A daughter of Mithridates the Great, who had been betrothed to the king of Cyprus, but accompanied her father in his flight to the kingdom of Bosporus, where she ultimately shared his fate, and put an end to her life by poison, B. C. 63. (Appian, Mithr. 111.) [E. H. B.]

NYSAEUS, NY'SIUS, NYSEUS, or NYSI'GENA (Νυσήϊος), a surname of Dionysus, derived from Nysa, a mountain or city, either in Thrace, Arabia, or India, where he was said to have been brought up by nymphs. According to some, it was derived from Nisus, who is said to have been his father, or at least to have educated him. (Hom. Il. vi. 133, Hymn. xxv. 5 ; Apollon. Rhod. ii. 905, iv. 431 ; Diod. i. 15, iii. 68 ; Cic. de Nat. Deor. iii. 23 ; Virg. Aen. vi. 806 ; Ov. Met. iv. 13.) [L. S.]

NYSAEUS (Νυσαῖος), son of the elder Dionysius, tyrant of Syracuse, by his wife Aristomache, the daughter of Hipparinus. (Diod. xvi. 6.) We know nothing of the steps by which he rose to the supreme power at Syracuse ; but it seems probable that he succeeded his brother Hipparinus in the sovereignty, which he held until B. C. 346, when he was expelled by his half-brother, the younger Dionysius. (Plut. Timol. 1.) He was chiefly remarkable for his love of drinking and his immoderate addiction to gross sensual indulgences. (Theopomp. ap. Athen. x. pp. 435, 436 ; Aelian, V. H. ii. 41.) [E. H. B.]

NYSEIDES or NYSIADES (Νύσιαι), the nymphs of Nysa, who are said to have reared Dionysus, and whose names are Cisseïs, Nysa, Erato, Eriphia, Bromia, and Polyhymno. (Hygin. Fab. 182, Poet. Astr. ii. 21 ; Apollod. iii. 4. § 3 ; Ov. Met. iii. 314, Fast. iii. 769 ; Orph. Hymn. 50. 14 ; Schol. ad Hom. Il. xviii. 486.) [L. S.]

NYX (Νύξ), Nox or Night personified. Homer (Il. xiv. 259, &c.) calls her the subduer of gods and men, and relates that Zeus himself stood in awe of her. In the ancient cosmogonies Night is one of the very first created beings, for she is described as the daughter of Chaos, and the sister of Erebus, by whom she became the mother of Aether and Hemera. (Hes. Theog. 123, &c.) According to the Orphics (Argon. 14) she was the daughter of Eros. She is further said, without any husband, to have given birth to Moros, the Keres, Thanatos, Hypnos, Dreams, Momus, Oizys, the Hesperides, Moerae, Nemesis, and similar beings. (Hes. Theog. 211, &c.; Cic. de Nat. Deor. iii. 17.) In later poets, with whom she is merely the personification of the darkness of night, she is sometimes described as a winged goddess (Eurip. Orest. 176), and sometimes as riding in a chariot, covered with a dark garment and accompanied by the stars in her course. (Eurip. Ion, 1150; Theocrit. ii. in fin.; Orph. Hymn. 2. 7; Virg. Aen. v. 721; Tibull. ii. 1. 87; Val. Flacc. iii. 211.) Her residence was in the darkness of Hades. (Hes. Theog. 748; Eurip. Orest. 175; Virg. Aen. vi. 390.) A statue of Night, the work of Rhoecus, existed at Ephesus (Paus. x. 38. § 3). On the chest of Cypselus she was represented carrying in her arms the gods of Sleep and Death, as two boys (v. 18. § 1). [L. S.]

LIST OF COINS ENGRAVED IN THE THIRD VOLUME.

In the following list AV indicates that the coin is of gold, Æ of silver, Æ of copper, 1Æ first bronze Roman, 2Æ second bronze Roman, 3Æ third bronze Roman. The weight of all gold and silver coins is given, with the exception of the aurei and denarii, which are for the most part of nearly the same weight respectively. When a coin has been reduced or enlarged in the drawing, the diameter of the original coin is given in the last column, the numbers in which refer to the subjoined scale: those which have no numbers affixed to them are of the same size in the drawing as the originals.

A DICTIONARY

GREEK AND ROMAN BIOGRAPHY

AND MYTHOLOGY.

OARSES. [ARSES.]

OAXES or OAXUS (Ὄαξος), the mythical founder of the town of Oaxus in Crete, is said by some to have been a son of Acacallis, the daughter of Minos (Steph. Byz. s. v. Ὄαξος), and by others a son of Apollo by Anchiale. (Serv. ad Virg. Ecl. i. 66.) [L. S.]

O'BLACUS. [OBSIDIUS.]

O'BODAS or O'BEDAS (Ὀβόδας, Ὀβέδας). 1. A king of the Arabs of Gaulonitis. Alexander Jannaeus invaded his territory in B. C. 92, but lost his army by an ambuscade in the mountains of Gadara, and escaped himself with difficulty. (Jos. Ant. xiii. 13. § 5. Bell. Jud. i. 4. § 4.)

2. A king of the Nabathaeans in Arabia Petraea. He appears to have been the successor of Malchus [No. 3], and is mentioned both by Strabo and Josephus as an indolent man, who left the management of all his affairs to Syllaeus. It was in his reign that the expedition of Aelius Gallus into Arabia took place, in B. C. 24. (Strab. xvi. p. 780, &c.; Jos. Ant. xv. 9. § 3, xvi. 7. § 6, Bell. Jud. i. 24. § 6.) [E. E.]

O'BRIMUS (Ὄβριμος), or O'MBRIMUS (Ὄμβριμος), a Greek rhetorician, probably of Asia, but of uncertain date, two of whose orations are quoted by Stobaeus, namely, Πρωτογόνου κρινομένου φαρμάκων, or ὑπὲρ Πρωτογόνου, and ὑπὲρ Σεβήρου. (Phot. Cod. 167; Stobaeus, Florileg. vol. ii. p. 277, vol. iii. p. 487, vol. ii. p. 286.)

O'BSEQUENS, JU'LIUS, the name prefixed to a fragment entitled De Prodigiis or Prodigiorum Libellus, containing a record for many years of those startling phenomena classed by the Romans under the general designation of Prodigia or Ostenta, which were universally believed to be miraculous manifestations of divine power, and to be intended as solemn warnings of coming events. The series is arranged in regular chronological order, and extends from the consulship of Scipio and Laelius, B. C. 190, to the consulship of Fabius and Aelius, B. C. 11. The materials are derived in a great measure from Livy, whose very words are frequently employed; and although we can in some places detect deviations from the narrative of the historian, these consist chiefly in repetitions, and in variations with regard to dates, discrepancies which may very probably have arisen from the interpolations or carelessness of transcribers. With regard to the compiler we know absolutely nothing, not even the country to which he belonged, nor the age when he flourished. He is mentioned by no ancient writer, and there is no internal evidence to guide us. The style is upon the whole tolerably pure, but certainly does not belong to the Augustan age. Vossius supposes that the author lived before Orosius, and Scaliger believes that he was consulted by St. Jerome; but no substantial arguments have been adduced in support of these assertions.

No MS. of Obsequens is known to exist. The first edition, printed by Aldus in 1508, was taken from a codex belonging to Jocundus of Verona, but this has disappeared, and no other has ever been discovered.

About the middle of the sixteenth century, Conrad Woolfhart, professor at Basle, who assumed the appellation of Conradus Lycosthenes, published a supplement, in which he collected from Livy, Dionysius, Eutropius, and other authorities, the prodigies which had been chronicled from the foundation of the city until the period when the fragment of Obsequens commences, making at the same time additions from the same sources to the text of Obsequens himself. From this time forward the original and the supplement have been usually printed together, and care must be taken in every case to keep the two portions perfectly distinct.

The Editio Princeps of Obsequens was published, as we have already stated, by Aldus, 8vo. Venet. 1508 (reprinted 1518), in a volume containing also the epistles of the younger Pliny; the second edition was that of Beatus Rhenanus, 8vo. Argentorat. 1514, in a volume containing also the epistles of Pliny, Aurelius Victor, De Viris Illustribus, and Suetonius De Claris Grammaticis et Rhetoribus; the third was from the press of Robert Stephens, 8vo. Paris, 1529, and, like the two former, combined with the epistles of Pliny. The first edition, which contained the supplement of Lycosthenes, was that which appeared at Basle. 8vo. 1552. The best are those of Scheffer, 8vo. Amst. 1679, and of Oudendorp, 8vo. Lug. Bat.

1720, especially the latter, to which we may add that of Hase, subjoined to the Valerius Maximus in Lemaire's edition of the Latin classics, 8vo. Paris, 1823, and containing the commentaries of both Scheffer and Oudendorp. No MS. having been employed since the time of Aldus, all the alterations introduced from time to time into the text are purely conjectural.

We have translations into French by George de la Bouthière, 8vo. Lyons, 1555, and by Victor Verger, 12mo. Paris, 1825, and into Italian by Damiano Maraffi, 8vo. Lione, 1554. The first and last of the above contain also translations of the three books by Polydore Virgil on the same topic. [W. R.]

OBSI'DIUS. 1. The commander of a Frentanian troop of horse, serving under the consul Laevinus in the campaign against Pyrrhus B. C. 280, distinguished himself in the battle fought at the river Siris in that year, by the daring attempt which he made upon the king's life. He unhorsed Pyrrhus, but was killed by the personal attendants of the king. He is called Oplacus (Ὄπλακος) in Plutarch, Oblacus Vulsinius (Ὄβλακος Οὐλσίνιος) in Dionysius, but Obsidius in Florus. (Flor. i. 18. § 7; Plut. Pyrrh. 16; Dionys. xviii. 2—4.)

2. Discovered in Aethiopia the stone which was named after him Obsidianus (Plin. H. N. xxxvi. 26. § 67). The name Obsidius Rufus occurs in inscriptions, but is not mentioned elsewhere.

OBULTRO'NIUS SABI'NUS, was quaestor aerarii in A. D. 57, when Nero transferred the charge of the public documents from the quaestors to the praefecti. He was slain by Galba, in Spain, on his accession to the imperial throne, A. D. 68. (Tac. Ann. xiii. 28, Hist. i. 37.)

OCALEIA (Ὠκάλεια), a daughter of Mantineus, and wife of Abas, by whom she became the mother of Acrisius and Proetus. (Apollod. ii. 2. § 1.) The Scholiast of Euripides (Orest. 953) calls her Aglaia. [L. S.]

O'CCIA, a vestal virgin, who died in the reign of Tiberius, A. D. 19, after discharging the duties of her priesthood for the long period of fifty-seven years. (Tac. Ann. ii. 58.)

OCEA'NIDES. [NYMPHAE.]

OCE'ANUS (Ὠκεανός), the god of the river Oceanus, by which, according to the most ancient notions of the Greeks, the whole earth was surrounded. An account of this river belongs to mythical geography, and we shall here confine ourselves to describing the place which Oceanus holds in the ancient cosmogony. In the Homeric poems he appears as a mighty god, who yields to none save Zeus. (Il. xiv. 245, xx. 7, xxi. 195.) Homer does not mention his parentage, but calls Tethys his wife, by whom he had three daughters, Thetis, Eurynome and Perse. (Il. xiv. 302, xviii. 398, Od. x. 139.) His palace is placed somewhere in the west (Il. xiv. 303, &c.), and there he and Tethys brought up Hera, who was conveyed to them at the time when Zeus was engaged in the struggle with the Titans. Hesiod (Theog. 133, 337, &c., 349, &c.) calls Oceanus a son of Uranus and Gaea, the eldest of the Titans, and the husband of Tethys, by whom he begot 3000 rivers, and as many Oceanides, of whom Hesiod mentions only the eldest. (Comp. Apollod. iii. 8. § 1, 10. § 1.) This poet (Theog. 282) also speaks of sources of Oceanus. Representations of the god are seen on imperial coins of Tyre and Alexandria. (Hirt, Mythol. Bilderb. p. 149.) [L. S.]

OCELLA, LI'VIUS. [GALBA, emperor, p. 206, b.]

OCELLA, SE'RVIUS, respecting whom Caelius tells Cicero that he was detected in adultery twice within three days. (Cic. ad Fam. viii. 17, ii. 15.) This Ocella seems to be the same person as Cicero speaks of more than once during the civil wars. (Ad Att. x. 10, 13, 17.)

OCELLA'TAE, sisters and vestal virgins, to whom the emperor, Domitian, gave the choice of the mode of their death, when they were proved to have been unfaithful to their vow of chastity. (Suet. Dom. 8.)

OCELLI'NA, LI'VIA. [GALBA, p. 206, b.]

OCELLUS or OCYLLUS (Ὄκελλος, Ὄκυλλος), a Lacedaemonian, was one of the three ambassadors who happened to be at Athens when Sphodrias invaded Attica, in B. C. 378. They were apprehended as having been privy to his design, but were released on their pointing out the groundlessness of the suspicion, and on their assurances that the Spartan government would be found to look with disapproval on the attempt of Sphodrias. In B. C. 369, we find Ocellus again at Athens, as one of the ambassadors who were negotiating an alliance between the Athenians and Spartans against Thebes. (Xen. Hell. v. 4. §§ 22, &c., vi. 5. §§ 33, &c.; comp. Diod. xv. 29, 63; Plut. Pelop. 14.) [E. E.]

OCELLUS LUCA'NUS (Ὄκελλος Λευκανός), as his name implies, was a Lucanian, and a Pythagorean in some sense. There were attributed to him a work, Περὶ Νόμου, or on Law; περὶ βασιλείας καὶ ὁσιότητος, on Kingly Rule and Piety; and περὶ τῆς τοῦ παντὸς φύσιος, on the Nature of the Whole, which last is extant, though whether it is a genuine work is doubtful, or, at least, much disputed.

Ocellus is mentioned in a letter from Archytas to Plato, which is preserved by Diogenes Laërtius (viii. 80), and in this letter the works above mentioned are enumerated. If the letter of Archytas is genuine, it proves that Ocellus lived some time before Archytas, for it speaks of the descendants of Ocellus. Nothing is said in the letter about Ocellus being a Pythagorean. Lucian (Pro Lapsu, &c. vol. i. p. 729, ed. Hemst.) speaks of Ocellus and Archytas as acquainted with Pythagoras, but we know that Archytas lived at least a hundred years after Pythagoras, and Lucian's historical facts are seldom to be relied on. Ocellus is mentioned by still later writers, but their evidence determines nothing as to his period.

As he was a Lucanian, Ocellus would write in the Doric dialect, and as the work attributed to him is in the Ionic, this has been made a ground for impugning its genuineness; but so far from being an argument against the genuineness of the work, this is in its favour, and only shows that some copyist had altered the dialect. Besides this, the fragments from this work, which Stobaeus cites, are in the Doric dialect. It is, however, always a doubtful matter as to early works, which are first mentioned by writers of a much later period, whether they are really genuine. If the existing work is not genuine we must suppose that when it was fabricated the original was lost. It is also possible that it is a kind of new modelled edition of the original; and it is also possible that the extant work is the original itself, which the brevity and simple close reasoning render a probable conclusion.

This small treatise is divided into four chapters. The first chapter shows that the whole (τὸ πᾶν, or ὁ κόσμος) had no beginning, and will have no end. He maintains that it is consistent with his views of the Cosmos that men have always existed, but he admits that the earth is subject to great revolutions, that Greece (Hellas) has often been and will be barbarous, and that it has sustained great physical changes. The object of the sexual intercourse, he says, is not pleasure, but the procreation of children and the permanence of the human race. Accordingly, the commerce of the sexes should be regulated by decency, moderation, and congruity in the male and female, in order that healthy beings may be produced, and that families may be happy; for families compose states, and if the parts are unsound, so will the whole be. The book appears to be a fragment. The physical philosophy is crude and worthless, but the fundamental ideas are clearly conceived and happily expressed.

The best editions are by A. F. W. Rudolphi, Leipzig, 1801—8, with copious notes and commentaries, and by Mullach; the latter edition bears the title, "Aristotelis de Melisso, Xenophane et Gorgia Disputationes cum Eleaticorum philosophorum fragmentis, et Ocelli Lucani, qui fertur, de universa natura libello." Berlin, 1846. There is another good edition by Batteux, Paris, 1768, three vols. 12mo. An edition was published at Berlin, 1762, 8vo., by the Marquis d'Argens, with a French translation, and a good commentary. Ocellus was translated into English by Thomas Taylor, 1831, 8vo. [G. L.]

O'CHIMUS (Ὄχιμος), a Rhodian king, a son of Helios and Rhodos. He was married to the nymph Hegetoria, and the father of Cydippe, who married Ochimus' brother Cercaphus. (Diod. v. 56, 57; Plut. Quaest. Graec. 27.) [L. S.]

OCHUS. [ARTAXERXES III.]

OCNUS, a son of Tiberis and Manto, and the reputed founder of the town of Mantua, though according to others he was a brother or a son of Auletes, and the founder of Cesena in Gaul. (Serv. ad Aen. x. 198.) [L. S.]

O'CREA, C. LU'SCIUS, a senator mentioned by Cicero in his speech for Roscius, the actor (c. 14).

OCRI'SIA or OCLI'SIA, the mother of Servius Tullius, according to the old Roman legends. She was one of the captives taken at the conquest of Corniculum by the Romans, and in consequence of her beauty and modesty was given by Tarquinius as a handmaid to his queen, Tanaquil. One day, in the royal palace, when she was presenting some cakes as an offering to the household genius, she saw in the fire the genitale of a man. Tanaquil commanded her to dress herself as a bride, and to shut herself up alone in the chapel, in which the miracle had occurred. Thereupon she became pregnant by a god, whom some regarded as the Lar of the house, others as Vulcan. The offspring of this connexion was Servius Tullius. The more prosaic account represents her as having been first the wife of Spurius Tullius in Corniculum or at Tibur, and relates that after she was carried to Rome she married one of the clients of Tarquinius Priscus, and became by him the mother of Servius Tullius. (Dionys. iv. 1, 2; Ov. Fast. vi. 625, &c.; Plin. H. N. xxxvi. 27. s. 70; Festus, s. v. Nothum; Plut. de Fort. Rom. 10; Niebuhr, Hist. of Rome, vol. i. p. 364.)

OCTACI'LIUS. [OTACILIUS.]

OCTAVE'NUS, a Roman jurist, who is cited by Valens (Dig. 36. tit. 1. s. 67), by Pomponius, who couples him with Aristo (Dig. 40. tit. 5. s. 20), and by Paulus, who joins him with Proculus (Dig. 18. tit. 6. s. 8), from which we may conclude that he lived after the time of Tiberius. It has been conjectured that he wrote on the Lex Julia et Papia, but the passages alleged in proof of this (Dig. 23. tit. 2. s. 44, 40. tit. 9. s. 32) are not decisive. He is also quoted by Ulpian and others. [G. L.]

OCTA'VIA, 1. The elder daughter of C. Octavius, praetor, B. C. 61, by his first wife, Ancharia, and half-sister of the emperor, Augustus. (Suet. Aug. 4.) Plutarch erroneously makes this Octavia the wife of Marcellus and of M. Antonius.

2. The younger daughter of C. Octavius, by his second wife, Atia, and own sister of the emperor, Augustus, was married first to C. Marcellus, consul, B. C. 50, and subsequently to the triumvir, M. Antonius. (Suet. l. c.) Plutarch (Anton. 31), as has been remarked above, makes the elder Octavia the wife of the triumvir; and he has lately found a supporter of his opinion in Weichert (De Cassio Parmensi, p. 348, &c.), though some modern scholars, adopting the views of Perizonius, have decided in favour of the authority of Suetonius. The question is fully discussed by Drumann (Geschichte Roms, vol. iv. p. 235), who adheres, on good reasons as it appears to us, to the opinion of Perizonius; but for the arguments adduced on each side of the question we must refer the reader to Drumann.

Octavia had been married to Marcellus before the year B. C. 54, for Julius Caesar, who was her great uncle, was anxious to divorce her from Marcellus that she might marry Pompey, who had then just lost his wife, Julia, the only daughter of Caesar. (Suet. Caes. 27.) Pompey, however, declined the proposal, and Octavia's husband continued to be one of the warmest opponents of Caesar. [MARCELLUS, No. 14.] But after the battle of Pharsalia he sued for and easily obtained the forgiveness of the conqueror; and Octavia appears to have lived quietly with her husband at Rome till the assassination of the dictator in B. C. 44. She lost her husband towards the latter end of B. C. 41; and as Fulvia, the wife of Antony, died about the same time, Octavianus and Antony, who had lately been at variance, cemented their reconciliation by the marriage of Octavia to Antony. Octavia was at the time pregnant by her former husband, but the senate passed a decree by which she was permitted to marry at once. This marriage caused the greatest joy among all classes, and especially in the army, and was regarded as a harbinger of a lasting peace. Octavianus was warmly attached to his sister, and she possessed all the charms, accomplishments and virtues likely to fascinate the affections and secure a lasting influence over the mind of a husband. Her beauty was universally allowed to be superior to that of Cleopatra, and her virtue was such as to excite even admiration in an age of growing licentiousness and corruption. Plutarch only expresses the feelings of her contemporaries when he calls her χρῆμα θαυ- μαστὸν γυναικός. (Plut. Ant. 31.) Nor at first did this union disappoint public expectation. By the side of Octavia, Antony for a time forgot Cleopatra, and the misunderstandings and jealousies which had again arisen between her brother and husband, and which threatened an open rupture in the year 36, were removed by her influence and intervention. But Antony had by this time become tired of his wife; a virtuous woman soon palled the sated appetite of such a profligate debauchee, and he now longed to enjoy again the wanton charms of his former mistress, Cleopatra. The war with the Parthians summoned him to the East, to which he went with all the greater pleasure, as in the East he would again meet with the Egyptian queen. Octavia accompanied him from Italy as far as Corcyra, but upon arriving at that island he sent her back to her brother, under the pretext of not exposing her to the perils and hardships of the war (Dion Cass. xlviii. 54); though, according to other authorities, he parted with her in Italy. (Plut. Ant. 35; Appian. B. C. v. 95.) On arriving in Asia, Antony soon forgot, in the arms of Cleopatra, both his wife and the Parthians, and thus sullied both his own honour and that of the Roman arms. Octavia, however, resolved to make an effort to regain the lost affections of her husband. In the following year, B. C. 35, she set out from Italy with reinforcements of men and money to assist Antony in his war against Artavasdes, king of Armenia; but Antony resolved not to meet the woman whom he had so deeply injured, and accordingly sent her a message, when she had arrived as far as Athens, requesting her to return home. Octavia obeyed; she was great-minded enough to send him the money and troops, and he mean enough to accept them. It is stated that Octavianus had supplied her with the troops because he foresaw the way in which Antony would act, and was anxious to obtain additional grounds to justify him in the impending war. On her return to Rome, Octavianus ordered her to leave her husband's house and come and reside with him, but she refused to do so, and would not appear as one of the causes of the war; she remained in her husband's abode, where she educated Antony's younger son, by Fulvia, with her own children. (Plut. Ant. 53, 54.) But this noble conduct had no effect upon the hardened heart of Antony, who had become the complete slave of Cleopatra; and when the war broke out in B. C. 32, he sent his faithful wife a bill of divorce. After the death of Antony she still remained true to the interests of his children, notwithstanding the wrongs she had received from their father. For Julus, the younger son of Antony, by Fulvia, she obtained the special favour of Augustus, and she even brought up with maternal care his children by Cleopatra. She died in B. C. 11, and was buried in the Julian heroum, where Augustus delivered the funeral oration in her honour, but separated from the corpse by a hanging. Her funeral was a public one; her sons-in-law carried her to the grave; but many of the honours decreed by the senate were declined by the emperor. (Dion Cass. liv. 35; Senec. ad Polyb. 34.)

Octavia had five children, three by Marcellus, a son and two daughters, and two by Antony, both daughters. Her son, M. Marcellus, was adopted by Octavianus, and was destined to be his successor, but died in B. C. 23. [MARCELLUS, No. 15.] Of her two daughters by her former husband, one was married to M. Agrippa, and subsequently to Julus Antonius [MARCELLA], but of the fate of the other daughter we have no information. The descendants of her two daughters by Antonius successively ruled the Roman world. The elder of them married L. Domitius Ahenobarbus, and became the grandmother of the emperor Nero; the younger of them married Drusus, the brother of the emperor Tiberius, and became the mother of the emperor Claudius, and the grandmother of the emperor Caligula. [ANTONIA, Nos. 5 and 6.] A complete view of the descendants of Octavia is given in the stemma on p. 7.

(The authorities for the life of Octavia are collected by Drumann, Geschichte Roms, vol. v. pp. 235—244. The most important passages are:—Appian, B. C. v. 64, 67, 93, 95, 138; Dion Cass. xlvii. 7, xlviii. 31, 54, xlix. 33, l. 3, 26, li. 15, liv. 35; Plut. Ant. 31, 33, 35, 57, 59, 87; Suet. Caes. 27, Aug. 4, 61.)

One of the most important public buildings erected in Rome in the reign of Augustus was called after Octavia, and bore the name of Porticus Octaviae. It must be carefully distinguished from the Porticus Octavia, which was built by Cn. Octavius, who commanded the fleet in the war against Perseus, king of Macedonia. [OCTAVIUS, No. 3.] The former was built by Augustus, in the name of his sister, whence some writers speak of it as the work of the emperor, and others as the work of Octavia. It lay between the Circus Flaminius and the theatre of Marcellus, occupying the same site as the porticus which was built by Q. Caecilius Metellus, after his triumph over Macedonia, in B. C. 146 [METELLUS, No. 5], and enclosing, as the porticus of Metellus had done, the two temples of Jupiter Stator and of Juno. The Porticus Octaviae contained a public library, which frequently served as a place of meeting for the senate, and is hence called Curia Octavia. The whole suite of buildings is sometimes termed Octaviae Opera. It contained a vast number of statues, paintings, and other valuable works of art, but they were all destroyed, together with the library, by the fire which consumed the building in the reign of Titus (Dion Cass. lxvi. 24). There is some doubt as to the time at which Augustus built the Porticus Octaviae. It is usually stated, on the authority of Dion Cassius (xlix. 43), that the building was erected by Octavianus, after the victory over the Dalmatians, in B. C. 33; but this appears to be a mistake; for Vitruvius, who certainly did not write his work so early as this year, still speaks (iii. 2. § 5, ed. Schneider) of the Porticus Metelli, and we learn from Plutarch (Marc. 30) that the dedication at all events of the Porticus did not take place till after the death of M. Marcellus in B. C. 23. (Vell. Pat. i. 11; Dion Cass. xlix. 43; Plut. l. c.; Liv. Epit. 138; Suet. Aug. 29; Plin. H. N. xxxvi. 4. s. 5; Festus, p. 178, ed. Müller; Becker, Hand- buch der Römischen Alterthümer, vol. i. pp. 608—612.)

3. The daughter of the emperor Claudius, by his third wife, the notorious Valeria Messalina, was born about A. D. 42 ; since Tacitus, speaking of her death in A. D. 62, says that she was then in the twentieth year of her age. (Tac. Ann. xiv. 64.) She was called Octavia after her great grandmother, the sister of Augustus [No. 2]. As early as the year 48, Octavia was betrothed by Claudius to L. Silanus, a youth of distinguished family and much beloved by the people ; but Agrippina, who had secured the affections of the weak-minded Claudius, resolved to prevent the marriage, in order that Octavia might marry her own son Domitius, afterwards the emperor Nero. She had no difficulty in rendering Silanus an object of suspicion to Claudius ; and as Silanus saw that he was doomed, he put an end to his life at the beginning of the following year (A. D. 49), on the very day on which Claudius was married to Agrippina. Octavia was now betrothed to the young Domitius, but the marriage did not take place till A. D. 53, the year before the death of Claudius, when Nero, as he was now called, having been adopted by Claudius, was only sixteen years of age, and Octavia but eleven. (Tac. Ann. xii. 58.) Suetonius, with less probability, places the marriage still earlier (Ner. 7). Nero from the first never liked his wife, and soon after his succession ceased to pay her any attention. He was first captivated by a freedwoman of the name of Acte, who shortly after had to give way to Poppaea Sabina, the wife of Otho, who was afterwards emperor. Of the latter he was so enamoured that he resolved to recognize her as his legal wife ; and accordingly in A. D. 62 he divorced Octavia on the alleged ground of sterility, and in sixteen days after married Poppaea. But Poppaea, not satisfied with obtaining the place of Octavia, induced one of the servants of the latter to accuse her of adultery with a slave ; but most of her slaves when put to the torture persisted in maintaining the innocence of their mistress. Notwithstanding this she was ordered to leave the city and retire to Campania, where she was placed under the surveillance of soldiers ; but in consequence of the complaints and murmurs of the people, Nero recalled her to Rome. The people celebrated her return with the most unbounded joy, which, however, only sealed her ruin. Poppaea again worked upon the passions and the fears of her husband ; Anicetus was induced to confess that he had been the paramour of Octavia ; and the unhappy girl was thereupon removed to the little island of Pandataria, where she was shortly after put to death. The scene of her death is painted by the masterly hand of Tacitus. She feared to die ; and as her terror was so great that the blood would not flow from her veins after they were opened, she was carried into a bath and stifled by the vapour. It is even added that her head was cut off and sent to Rome to glut the vengeance of Poppaea. Her untimely end excited general commiseration. (Tac. Ann. xi. 32, xii. 2—9, 58, xiii. 12, xiv. 60—64 ; Suet. Claud. 27, Ner. 7, 35 ; Dion Cass. lx. 31, 33, lxi. 7, lxii. 13.) Octavia is the heroine of a tragedy, found among the works of Seneca, but the author of which was more probably Curiatius Maternus. See Octavia Praetexta. Curiatio Materno vindicat. sdidit F. Ritter, Bonnae, 1843.

COIN OF OCTAVIA, THE WIFE OF NERO.

OCTA'VIA GENS, celebrated in history on account of the emperor Augustus belonging to it. It was a plebeian gens, and is not mentioned till the year B. C. 230, when Cn. Octavius Rufus obtained the quaestorship. This Cn. Octavius left two sons, Cneius and Caius. The descendants of Cneius held many of the higher magistracies, and his son obtained the consulship in B. C. 165 ; but the descendants of Caius, from whom the emperor Augustus sprang, did not rise to any importance, but continued simple equites, and the first of them, who was enrolled among the senators, was the father of Augustus. The gens originally came from the Volscian town of Velitrae, where there was a street in the most frequented part of the town, and likewise an altar, both bearing the name of Octavius (Suet. Aug. 1, 2 ; Vell. Pat. ii. 59 ; Dion Cass. xlv. 1). This is all that can be related with certainty respecting the history of this gens ; but as it became the fashion towards the end of the republic for the Roman nobles to trace their origin to the gods and to the heroes of olden time, it was natural that a family, which became connected with the Julia gens, and from which the emperor Augustus sprang, should have an ancient and noble origin assigned to it. Accordingly, we read in Suetonius (Aug. 2) that the members of this gens received the Roman franchise from Tarquinius Priscus, and were enrolled among the patricians by his successor Servius Tullius ; that they afterwards passed over to the plebeians, and that Julius Caesar a long while afterwards conferred the patrician rank upon them again. There is nothing improbable in this statement by itself ; but since neither Livy nor Dionysius make any mention of the Octavii, when they speak of Velitrae, it is evident that they did not believe the tale ; and since, moreover, the Octavii are nowhere mentioned in history till the latter half of the third century before the Christian aera, we may safely reject the early origin of the gens. The name of Octavius, however, was widely spread in Latium, and is found at a very early time, of which we have an example in the case of Octavius Mamilius, to whom Tarquinius Superbus gave his daughter in marriage. The name was evidently derived from the praenomen Octavus, just as from Quintus, Sextus, and Septimus, came the gentile names of Quintius, Sextius, and Septimius. In the times of the republic none of the Octavii, who were descended from Cn. Octavius Rufus, bore any cognomen with the exception of Rufus, and even this surname is rarely mentioned. The stemma on page 7. exhibits all the descendants of Cn. Octavius Rufus. The descendants of the emperor Augustus by his daughter Julia are given in Vol. I. p. 430, and a list of the descendants of his sister Octavia is annexed here ; so that the two together present a complete view of the imperial family. In consequence of the intermarriages in this family, part of this stemma repeats a portion of the stemma in Vol. I. p. 430, and also of the stemma of the Drusi given in Vol. I. p. 1076; but it is thought better for the sake of clearness to make this repetition.

There are a few other persons of the name of Octavii, who were not descended from Cn. Octavius Rufus, or whose descent cannot be traced. Most of them bore cognomens under which they are given, namely, BALBUS, LIGUR, MARSUS, NASO: those who have no cognomens are given under Octavius after the descendants of Cn. Octavius Rufus.

OCTAVIA'NUS. [AUGUSTUS.]

OCTAVIUS. 1. CN. OCTAVIUS RUFUS, quaestor about B. C. 230, may be regarded as the founder of the family. [OCTAVIA GENS.] Suetonius calls him Caius; but this is probably a mistake, as Drumann has remarked, since the name of his eldest son was Cneius, and it was the rule among the Romans for the eldest son to inherit the praenomen of his father. (Suet. Aug. 2.)

2. CN. OCTAVIUS, son of the preceding, was plebeian aedile in B. C. 206 with Sp. Lucretius, and was with him elected to the praetorship for the following year, B. C. 205. Octavius obtained Sardinia as his province, and captured off the island eighty Carthaginian ships of burden. In the following year, B. C. 204, he handed over the province to his successor Tib. Claudius, but his imperium was extended for another year, and he was commanded by the senate to keep watch over the coasts in those parts with a fleet of forty ships. He was also employed in this year in carrying to the Roman army in Africa supplies of provisions and clothes. Next year, B. C. 203, his command was again prolonged, and the protection of the coasts of Sardinia was again entrusted to him; and while he was employed, as he had been in the preceding year, in carrying supplies to Africa, he was surprised off the coast of Africa by a fearful storm, which destroyed the greater part of his fleet, consisting of 200 transport vessels and 30 ships of war. Octavius himself, with the ships of war, obtained shelter under the promontory of Apollo. Octavius was present at the battle of Zama, in B. C. 202, and Scipio placed so much confidence in him that he commanded him after the battle to march upon Carthage with the land forces, while he himself blockaded the harbour with the fleet. In B. C. 201 Octavius returned with part of the fleet to Italy, and handed over to the propraetor, M. Valerius Laevinus, thirty-eight ships for the prosecution of the war against Philip of Macedon. But he was not long allowed to remain inactive. In B. C. 200 he was sent into Africa as one of the three ambassadors to Carthage, Masinissa, and Vermina, the son of Syphax. In B. C. 194 he was one of the commissioners for founding a colony at Croton in Southern Italy, and two years afterwards, B. C. 192, just before the breaking out of the war with Antiochus the Great, he was sent into Greece in order to support the Roman interests in those parts. (Liv. xxviii. 38, 46, xxix. 13, 36, xxx. 2, 24, 36, xxxi. 3, 11, xxxiv. 45, xxxv. 23, xxxvi. 16.)

3. CN. OCTAVIUS, son of No. 2. In the winter of B. C. 170 he was sent into Greece as ambassador, with C. Popillius Laenas, and on his return to Rome in 169, he was elected one of the decemviri sacrorum. He was praetor in B. C. 168, and had as his province the command of the fleet in the war against Perseus. After the defeat of Perseus at Pydna, by the consul Aemilius Paullus, Octavius sailed to Samothrace, where the king had taken refuge. Perseus surrendered himself to Octavius, who thereupon conducted him to the consul at Amphipolis. In the following year, 167, Octavius sailed to Rome with the booty which had been gained in the war, and on the 1st of December, in that year, he obtained the honour of a naval triumph. (Liv. xliii. 17, xliv. 17, 18, 21, 35, xlv. 5, 6, 33; Polyb. xxviii. 3, 5; Vell. Pat. i. 9; Plut. Aemil. Paull. 26; Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 3. s. 7; Festus, s. v. Octaviae.)

The wealth which Octavius had obtained in Greece enabled him to live in great splendour on his return to Rome. He built a magnificent house on the Palatine, which, according to Cicero (de Off. i. 39), contributed to his election to the consulship, and he also erected a beautiful porticus, which is spoken of below. He was consul with T. Manlius Torquatus in B. C. 165, being the first member of his family who obtained this dignity. In B. C. 162 Octavius was sent with two colleagues into Syria, which was in a state of great confusion in consequence of the contentions for the guardianship of the young king Antiochus V.; and the Romans therefore considered it a favourable opportunity for enforcing the terms of the peace made with Antiochus the Great, by which the Syrian monarchs were prevented from having a fleet and rearing elephants. But this embassy cost Octavius his life, for he was assassinated in the gymnasium at Laodiceia, by a Syrian Greek of the name of Leptines, at the instigation, as was supposed, of Lysias, the guardian of the young king. [LEPTINES.] A statue of Octavius was placed on the rostra at Rome, where it was in the time of Cicero. (Terent. Hecyr. titul.; Cic. de Fin. i. 7, Philipp. ix. 2; Obsequ. 72; Polyb. xxxi. 12, 13, 19—21; Appian, Syr. 46; Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 6. s. 11, who confounds the last embassy of Octavius with a different one: comp. LAENAS, No. 5.)

The porticus erected by Cn. Octavius was called Porticus Octavia, and must be carefully distinguished from the Porticus Octaviae, built by Augustus in the name of his sister. [OCTAVIA, No. 2.] The former was near the theatre of Pompey, by the Flaminian circus. It contained two rows of columns of the Corinthian order with brazen capitals, and was hence also called the Porticus Corinthia. It was rebuilt by Augustus, who allowed it to retain its ancient name, but it appears to have been destroyed, or to have perished in some way, before the time of Pliny, as he speaks of it only from what he had read. (Vell. Pat. ii. 1; Festus, s. v. Octaviae; Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 3. s. 7; Monumentum Ancyranum, p. 32. l. 43, &c., ed. Franzius, Berol. 1845; Müller, Praefatio ad Festum, p. xxix.; Becker, Römisch. Alterthüm. vol. i. p. 617.)

4. CN. OCTAVIUS, son of No. 3, was consul B. C. 128, and was accustomed to speak in the courts of justice. (Cic. de Orat. i. 36.)

5. M. OCTAVIUS, may be, as Drumann has stated, a younger son of No. 3, so far as the time at which he lived is concerned, but no ancient writer speaks of him as his son. It would appear from Obsequens (c. 130) that he bore the surname of Caecina, but the reading is perhaps faulty. He was the colleague of Tib. Gracchus in the tribunate of the plebs, B. C. 133, and opposed his tribunitian veto to the passing of the agrarian law. The history of his opposition, and the way in which he was in consequence deposed from his office by Tib. Gracchus, are fully detailed in the life of the latter. [Vol. II. p. 292, a.] Octavius is naturally either praised or blamed according to the different views entertained by persons of the laws of Gracchus. Cicero (Brut. 25) calls Octavius civis in rebus optimis constantissimus, and praises him for his skill in speaking. We learn from Plutarch that Octavius was a personal friend of Gracchus, and that it was with considerable reluctance that the nobles persuaded him to oppose his friend, but to this course he was probably also prompted by possessing a large tract of public land. Plutarch likewise adds that though Octavius and Gracchus opposed one another with great earnestness and rivalry, yet they are said never to have uttered a disparaging word against one another. (Plut. Tib. Gracch. 10.) Dion Cassius, on the contrary, says (Fragm. 87, ed. Reimarus) that Octavius opposed Gracchus of his own accord, through jealousy springing from their relationship to one another: and that they were related in some way may also be inferred from another passage of Plutarch (C. Gracch. 4), from which we learn that C. Gracchus dropped a measure directed against Octavius at the request of his mother Octavia.

6. CN. OCTAVIUS, son of No. 4. He was one of the staunch supporters of the aristocratical party, which was perhaps the reason that he failed in obtaining the aedileship. (Cic. pro Planc. 21.) He was consul in B. C. 87 with L. Cornelius Cinna, the year after the consulship of Sulla and the banishment of Marius and his leading partisans. Sulla was now absent in Greece, engaged in the war against Mithridates, and upon Octavius, therefore, devolved the support of the interests of his party. Immediately after Sulla's departure from Italy, Cinna attempted to obtain the power for the Marian party by incorporating the new Italian citizens among the thirty-five tribes. Octavius offered the most vehement resistance, and, in the contentions which ensued, he displayed an amount of eloquence for which previously credit had not been given him. (Cic. Brut. 47.) But from words the two parties soon came to blows. A dreadful conflict took place in the forum, and Cinna was driven out of the city with great slaughter. The senate followed up their victory by depriving Cinna of his consulship, and appointing L. Cornelius Merula in his stead. But Cinna soon collected a considerable army, with which he marched against Rome, and Marius, as soon as he heard of these changes, returned from Africa and levied some troops, with which he likewise proceeded against the city. The soldiers of Octavius seem to have had no confidence in their general, and therefore offered to place themselves under the command of Metellus Pius, who had been summoned to Rome by the senate. [METELLUS, No. 19.] But when Metellus refused to take the command, and numbers of the soldiers therefore deserted to the enemy, the senate had no other course left them but submission. Metellus fled from the city, and the friends of Octavius begged him to do the same; but, trusting to the promises of Marius and Cinna, and still more to the assurances of the diviners, that he would suffer no harm, he remained in Rome, declaring that being consul he would not abandon his country. Accordingly, when the troops of Marius and Cinna began to march into the city, he stationed himself on the Janiculum, with the soldiers that still remained faithful to him, and there, seated on his curule throne, was killed by Censorinus, who had been sent for that purpose by the victorious party. His head was cut off and suspended on the rostra. This is the account of Appian, but the manner of his death is related somewhat differently by Plutarch. Octavius seems, upon the whole, to have been an upright man, but he was very superstitious, slow in action and in council, and did not possess remarkable abilities of any kind. (Appian, B. C. i. 64, 68—71; Plut. Mar. 41, 42; Val. Max. i. 6. § 10; Dion Cass. Fragm. 117, 118, ed. Reimarus; Liv. Epit. 79, 80; Flor. iii. 21. § 9; Cic. in Cat. iii. 10, de Harusp. Resp. 24, Philipp. xiii. 1, xiv. 8, Tuscul. v. 19, pro Sest. 36, de Divin. i. 2, de Nat. Deor. ii. 5.)

7. M. OCTAVIUS, described by Cicero as Cn. f., must be the younger son of No. 4. In his tribunate of the plebs, the year of which is not stated, he brought forward a law for raising the price at which corn was sold to the people by the Frumentaria lex of C. Gracchus, since it was found that the treasury was quite drained by the law of Gracchus. Cicero attributes the enactment of the law to the influence and eloquence of Octavius, although he adds that he was, properly speaking, not an orator. (Cic. de Off. ii. 21, Brut. 62.) This M. Octavius should be carefully distinguished from the M. Octavius who was the colleague of Tib. Gracchus. [See No. 5.]

8. L. OCTAVIUS CN. F. CN. N. (Fasti Capit.), the son of No. 6, was consul B. C. 75 with C. Aurelius Cotta. He died in B. C. 74, as proconsul of Cilicia, and was succeeded in the command of the province by L. Lucullus. (Cic. Verr. i. 50, iii. 7; Obsequ. 121; Plut. Lucull. 6.) Many writers confound this L. Octavius with L. Octavius Balbus, the jurist. [BALBUS, p. 458.]

9. CN. OCTAVIUS M. F. CN. N. (Fasti Capit.), son of No. 7, was consul B. C. 76, with C. Scribonius Curio. He is described as a man of a mild temper, although he was a martyr to the gout, in consequence of which he appears to have lost the use of his feet. As an orator he was of little account. (Cic. Brut. 60, 62, de Fin. ii. 28; Sall. Hist. ii. p. 205, ed. Gerl. min.; Obseq. 121.)

10. M. OCTAVIUS CN. F. M. N. (Cic. ad Fam. viii. 2. § 2), the son of No. 9. He was a friend of Ap. Claudius Pulcher, consul B. C. 54, and accompanied the latter into Cilicia, but left the province before Claudius in order to become a candidate for the aedileship. He was curule aedile B. C. 50 along with M. Caelius; and as both of them were friends of Cicero, they begged the orator, as he was then in Cilicia, to send them panthers for the games they had to exhibit. (Cic. ad Fam. iii. 4, ad Att. v. 21, vi. 1. § 21.) On the breaking out of the civil war in B. C. 49, Octavius, true to the hereditary principles of his family, espoused the aristocratical party. He was appointed, along with L. Scribonius Libo, to the command of the Liburnian and Achaean fleets, serving as legate to M. Bibulus, who had the supreme command of the Pompeian fleet. He and Libo did good service to the cause; they defeated Dolabella on the Illyrian coast, and compelled C. Antonius to surrender at the island of Coricta (Caes. B. C. iii. 5; Dion Cass.

xli. 40; Florus, iv. 2. § 31; Oros. vi. 15.) Octavius afterwards proceeded to attack the town of Salonae in Dalmatia, but was repulsed with considerable loss, and thereupon joined Pompey at Dyrrhachium. After the battle of Pharsalia, Octavius, who still possessed a considerable fleet, set sail for Illyricum with the hope of securing it for the Pompeian party. At first he met with great success, and defeated Gabinius, who had been sent by Caesar into Illyricum with reinforcements for the army, which was already there; but he was soon afterwards driven out of the country (B. C. 47) by Cornificius and Vatinius, and compelled to fly to Africa, where the Pompeian party were making a stand. (Hirt, B. Alex. 42—46; Dion Cass. xlii. 11.) After the battle of Thapsus (B. C. 46), Octavius was in the neighbourhood of Utica in command of two legions, and claimed to have the supreme command with Cato. (Plut. Cat. min. 65.) He is not mentioned again till the battle of Actium (B. C. 31), when he commanded along with M. Insteius the middle of Antony's fleet. (Plut. Ant. 65.)

11. C. OCTAVIUS, the younger son of No. 1, and the ancestor of Augustus, remained a simple Roman eques, without attempting to rise any higher in the state. (Suet. Aug. 2; Vell. Pat. ii. 59.)

12. C. OCTAVIUS, son of the preceding, and great-grandfather of Augustus, lived in the time of the second Punic war, in which he served as tribune of the soldiers. He was present at the fatal battle of Cannae (B. C. 216), and was one of the few who survived the engagement. When the Carthaginians were forcing into the lesser Roman camp, Octavius and another tribune, Sempronius Tuditanus, cut their way through the enemy, with a few soldiers, and arrived in safety at Canusium. (Frontin. Strat. iv. 5. § 7; comp. Liv. xxii. 52.) Octavius also served in Sicily under the praetor L. Aemilius Papus (B. C. 205), but what part he took in the other campaigns in the war is not mentioned. When M. Antonius wished to throw contempt upon Augustus, he called this C. Octavius a freedman and a rope-maker (restio), but whether he or his family ever had any thing to do with a manufactory of ropes, is quite uncertain. (Suet. Aug. 2.)

13. C. OCTAVIUS, son of the preceding, and grandfather of Augustus, lived quietly at his villa at Velitrae, content with the municipal honours of his native town, and not aspiring to the dignities of the Roman state. He possessed considerable property, which he probably augmented by money-lending, since Antonius and Cassius Parmensis called Augustus the grandson of a banker or money-lender. (Suet. Aug. 2, 4, 6.)

14. C. OCTAVIUS, son of the preceding and father of Augustus, was likewise said by the enemies of Augustus to have been a money-lender, and to have been employed in the Campus Martius as one of the agents for bribing the electors. But there is probably no truth in these reports. The riches left him by his father enabled him, without difficulty, to obtain the public offices at Rome, although he was the first of his family who had aspired to them. We learn from an inscription, which is given below, that he was successively tribune of the soldiers twice, quaestor, plebeian aedile with C. Toranius, judex quaestionum, and praetor. Of his history up to the time of his praetorship we have no further information; we are only told that he filled the previous dignities with great credit to himself and obtained a reputation for integrity, ability, and uprightness. Velleius Paterculus characterizes him (ii. 59) as gravis, sanctus, innocens, and dives, and adds that the estimation in which he was held gained for him, in marriage, Atia, the daughter of Julia, who was the sister of Julius Caesar. Thus, although a novus homo, he was chosen first praetor in B. C. 61, and discharged the duties of his office in so admirable a manner that Cicero recommends him as a model to his brother Quintus. (Cic. ad Qu. F. i. 1. § 7.) In the following year he succeeded C. Antonius in the government of Macedonia, with the title of proconsul, and on his way to his province he cut to pieces, in the Thurine district, in consequence of orders from the senate, a body of runaway slaves, who had been gathered together for Catiline, and had previously belonged to the army of Spartacus. He administered the affairs of his province with equal integrity and energy. The manner in which he treated the provincials was again recommended by Cicero as an example to his brother Quintus. He routed the Bessi and some other Thracian tribes, who had disturbed the peace of the province, and received in consequence the title of imperator from his troops. He returned to Italy at the latter end of B. C. 59, in full expectation of being elected to the consulship, but he died suddenly at the beginning of the following year, B. C. 58, at Nola, in Campania, in the very same room in which Augustus afterwards breathed his last. Octavius was married twice, first to Ancharia, by whom he had one daughter [ANCHARIA], and secondly to Atia, by whom he had a daughter and a son [ATIA]. His second wife, and his three children, survived him. (Suet. Aug. 3, 4; Nicol. Damasc. Vit. August. c. 2, ed. Orelli; Vell. Pat. ii. 59; Cic. ad Att. ii. 1, ad Qu. F. i. 1. § 7, ii. 2. § 7, Philipp. iii. 6; Tac. Ann. i. 9.) The following is the inscription which has been above referred to:—

C. OCTAVIVS. C. F. C. N. C. P. R(VFVS). PATER AVGVSTI. TR. MIL. BIS. Q. AED. PL. CVM. C. TORANIO. IVDEX QVAESTIONVM. PR. PROCOS. IMPERATOR APPELLATVS EX PROVINCIA MACEDONIA.

16. OCTAVIA, the younger daughter of No. 14, by Atia. [OCTAVIA, No. 2.]

17. C. OCTAVIUS, the son of No. 14, by Atia, was subsequently called C. Julius Caesar Octavianus, in consequence of his adoption by his great-uncle, C. Julius Caesar. The senate, at a later period, conferred upon him the title of Augustus, under which name his life is given. [AUGUSTUS.]

18. CN. OCTAVIUS RUFUS, quaestor, B. C. 107, was sent into Africa with pay for the army of Marius, and returned to Rome, accompanied by the ambassadors, whom Bocchus sent to the senate. (Sall. Jug. 104.) The cognomen in most of the MSS. of Sallust is Ruso, for which, however, we ought probably to read Rufus, as the former cognomen is unknown in the Octavia gens. From the fact that this Cn. Octavius filled the office of quaestor, it is not impossible that he may be the same Cn. Octavius, who was consul B. C. 87. [See above, No. 6.]

19. L. OCTAVIUS, a legate of Pompey in the war against the pirates, B. C. 67, was sent by Pompey into Crete to receive the submission of the Cretan towns, and to supersede Q. Metellus Creticus in the command of the island. (Dion Cass. xxxvi. 1, 2 ; Plut. Pomp. 29.) For further details see METELLUS, No. 23, p. 1064.

25. SER. OCTAVIUS LAENAS PONTIANUS, consul with M. Antonius Rufinus, in the reign of Hadrian, A. D. 131. (Fasti.)

26. OCTAVIUS RUFUS was a friend of the younger Pliny, who addresses two letters to him, in which he presses Octavius to publish the poems he had composed. (Plin. Ep. i. 7, ii. 10.) In another letter (ix. 38) Pliny praises a work of one Rufus, who may, perhaps, be the same as this Octavius Rufus.

ODATIS (Ὀδάτις), daughter of Omartes, a Scythian king. According to a story recorded by Chares of Mytilene (ap. Ath. xiii. p. 575), Odatis and Zariadres (king of the country between the Caspian gates and the Tanäis) fell mutually in love from the sight of one another's image in a dream. But Omartes, having no son, wished his daughter to marry one of his own relatives or near friends. He therefore summoned them all to a banquet, whereat he desired Odatis to fill a cup with wine, and present it to whomsoever she chose for her husband. Meanwhile, however, Zariadres had received notice from her of her father's intentions, and, being engaged in a military expedition near the banks of the Tanäis, he set out with only one attendant, and, having travelled a distance of 800 stadia, arrived in the banquet-hall of Omartes, disguised in a Scythian dress, just as Odatis, reluctantly and in tears, was mixing the wine at the board where the goblets stood. Advancing close to her side, he whispered, "Odatis, I am here at thy desire, I, Zariadres." Looking up, she recognised with joy the beautiful youth of her dream, and placed the cup in his hands. Immediately he seized and bore her off to his chariot ; and so the lovers escaped, favoured by the sympathising attendants of the palace, who, when Omartes ordered them to pursue the fugitives, professed ignorance of the way they had taken. This love story, we are told, was most popular in Asia, and a favourite subject for paintings ; and Odatis was a prevalent female name in noble families. [E. E.]

ODENA'THUS, the husband of the heroic Zenobia [ZENOBIA], according to Zosimus, was of a noble family of Palmyra, according to Procopius (Persic. ii. 5) the prince of a Saracenic tribe dwelling upon the banks of the Euphrates, according to Agathias (lib. iv.) of humble origin. He is included by Trebellius Pollio in his catalogue of the thirty tyrants [see AUREOLUS], but unlike the great majority of these usurpers, deserves to be considered as the saviour rather than the destroyer of the Roman power. At the moment when all seemed lost in the East, in consequence of the capture of Valerian, and the dispersion of his army, Odenathus having collected a powerful force marched boldly against the victorious Sapor, whom he drove out of Syria, recovered Nisibis, together with all Mesopotamia, captured the harem of the Persian monarch, and pursued him up to the very walls of Ctesiphon. Returning loaded with plunder, he next turned his arms against Quietus, son of Macrianus, and shut up the pretender in Emesa, where he perished upon the capture of the city. In gratitude for these important services, Gallienus bestowed upon his ally the title of Augustus, and acknowledged him as a colleague in the empire, but Odenathus did not long enjoy his well-earned dignity, for he was slain by the domestic treachery of his cousin, or nephew, Maeonius, not without the consent, it is said, of Zenobia, about the year A. D. 266. Little is known with regard to the history of this warlike Arab, except the naked facts detailed above, and that from his earliest years he took great delight in the chase, and willingly endured the severest hardships. [MAEONIUS.] [W. R.]

ODI'TES, the name of two mythical beings, one a centaur, and the other an Ethiopian, who was slain by Clymenus at the wedding of Perseus. (Ov. Met. xii. 457, v. 97.) [L. S.]

O'DIUS. (Ὄδιος). 1. The chief of the Halizones, assisted the Trojans against the Greeks, but was slain by Agamemnon. (Hom. Il. ii. 856, v. 38; Strab. xvi. p. 551.)

2. A herald in the camp of the Greeks at Troy. (Hom. Il. ix. 170.) [L. S.]

ODOA'CER (Ὀδόακρος), King of Italy, from A. D. 476—493. He was the son of one Edeco, who was undoubtedly the same Edecon who was minister of Attila and his ambassador at Constantinople. Odoacer had a brother, Onulf, who likewise became conspicuous. It appears that Odoacer was by origin a Scyrrus, and that after the dispersion of the Scyrri by the East Goths, he was chosen the chief of the remnants of that broken tribe, but he is also called a Rugian, an Herulian, and a king of the Turcilingi, perhaps because he was in after years at the head of an army composed of those nations. His father Edecon having been slain in the battle with the East Goths, where the power of the Scyrri was broken (about 463), Odoacer, now at the head of the reduced tribe, led the life of a robber in Pannonia and Noricum, but finally entered the imperial guard at Rome and rose to eminence. In 475 Orestes had his son Romulus Augustulus chosen emperor of Rome. The countless bands of barbarians of all nations, with the aid of which Orestes had accomplished his object, demanded in reward one third of the soil of Italy to be divided among them. When Orestes declined to comply with their wishes, Odoacer turned the discontent of the mercenaries to his own profit, and promised to allot them the desired portion of Italy, if they would assist him to wrest the whole from the nominal emperor Romulus Augustulus and his father Orestes, a condition which the majority of those reckless warriors readily accepted. Thus arose a war between Odoacer and Orestes. The latter, after suffering some defeats, retired within the walls of Pavia; but Odoacer took the town by assault, made Orestes prisoner, and put him to death. St. Epiphanius, bishop of Pavia, was present at the siege, whence his life by Ennodius becomes an important source for the history of these times. Paul, the brother of Orestes, was slain at Ravenna. Romulus Augustulus was now deposed and banished by the victor, who henceforth reigned over Italy with the title of king, for he never assumed that of emperor (476). With the deposition of Romulus Augustulus, the Roman empire in the West came to an end. [AUGUSTULUS.]

In order to establish himself the better on the throne, Odoacer sent ambassadors to the emperor Zeno, requesting the latter to grant him the title of patrician, and acknowledge him as regent of the diocese of Italy. Pleased with the seeming submissiveness of the conqueror of that country, Zeno granted the request, though after some hesitation. Odoacer took up his residence at Ravenna, and, according to his promise, divided one third of the soil of Italy among his barbarian followers, a measure which was perhaps less cruel towards the Italians than it would appear, since the country was depopulated, and many estates without an owner and lying waste. On the whole, Odoacer, who was the first barbarian that sat on the throne of Italy, was a wise, well-disposed, and energetic ruler, and knew how to establish order within and peace without his dominions, as far as the miserable moral condition of the Romans, the reckless spirit of their barbarian masters, and the daring rapacity of their neighbours were compatible with a settled state of things. Among his measures at home we may mention the re-establishment of the consulate as a proof of his wisdom, as his intention was to reconcile the remains of the old Romans to the new government. Odoacer reunited Dalmatia with the kingdom of Italy after a sharp contest, in which he employed both a fleet and an army. He also made a successful campaign in 487 against the Rugians, who endeavoured to make themselves independent in Noricum: their king Feletheus (Pheba or Fava) and many of their nobles were taken prisoners, and the rest yielded to his rule. Unfortunately for him there rose among the barbarians beyond the Alps a man still greater than Odoacer. Theodoric, king of the East Goths, who, secretly, and perhaps openly, supported by the emperor Zeno, resolved to wrest Italy from him, and establish the Gothic power at Rome. Theodoric opened his first campaign in 489, and in a bloody battle foiled his rival on the banks of the Isontius (Isonzo) not far from Aquileia (28th of August, 489). Odoacer, retreating, offered a second battle at Verona, and again lost the day, whereupon he hastened to Rome in order to persuade its inhabitants to rise for his defence. But the Romans, preferring to stand their own chance in the conflict, shut the gates of the city at his approach, and Odoacer consequently retraced his steps into Northern Italy, and threw himself into Ravenna. Thence he sallied out, defeated the van of the Gothic army, and compelled Theodoric to seek refuge within the walls of Pavia, but the Gothic king soon succeeded in rallying his forces, and vanquished Odoacer a third time in a decisive battle on the river Adda (490). Odoacer again took refuge in Ravenna, and Theodoric laid siege to that city, while his lieutenants gradually reduced the whole kingdom of Italy. After an obstinate defence of nearly three years Odoacer at last capitulated on condition that in future he and Theodoric should be joint kings of Italy: the treaty was confirmed by oaths taken by both parties (27th of February, 493). Theodoric, however, soon broke his oath; and on the 5th of March following, Odoacer was murdered by the hand, or command, of his more fortunate rival. Theodoric succeeded him as sole king of Italy. ODYSSEUS (Ὀδυσσεύς), or, as the Latin writers call him, Ulysses, Ulyxes or Ulixes, one of the principal Greek heroes in the Trojan war. According to the Homeric account, he was the grandson of Arcesius, and a son of Laërtes and Anticleia, the daughter of Autolycus, and brother of Ctimene. He was married to Penelope, the daughter of Icarius, by whom he became the father of Telemachus. (Od. i. 329, xi. 85, xv. 362, xvi. 118, &c.) But according to a later tradition he was a son of Sisyphus and Anticleia, who, when with child by Sisyphus, was married to Laërtes, and thus gave birth to him either after her arrival in Ithaca, or on her way thither. (Soph. Phil. 417, with the Schol., Ajax, 190; Ov. Met. xiii. 32, Ars Am. iii. 313; Plut. Quaest. Graec. 43; comp. Hom. Il. iii. 201.) Later traditions further state that besides Telemachus, Arcesilaus or Ptoliporthus was likewise a son of his by Penelope; and that further, by Circe he became the father of Agrius, Latinus, Telegonus and Cassiphone, and by Calypso of Nausithous and Nausinous or Auson, Telegonus and Teledamus, and lastly by Euippe of Leontophron, Doryclus or Euryalus. (Hes. Theog. 1013, &c.; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1796; Schol. ad Lycophr. 795; Parthen. Erot. 3; Paus. viii. 12. § 3; Serv. ad Aen. iii. 171.) According to an Italian tradition Odysseus was by Circe the father of Remus, Antias and Ardeas. (Dionys. i. 72.) The name Odysseus is said to signify the angry (Hom. Od. xix. 406, &c.), and among the Tyrrhenians he is said to have been called Nanus or Nannus. (Tzetz. ad Lycophr. 1244.)

When Odysseus was a young man, he went to see his grandfather Autolycus near the foot of Mount Parnassus. There, while engaged in the chase, he was wounded by a boar in his knee, by the scar of which he was subsequently recognized by Eurycleia. Laden with rich presents he returned from the palace of his grandfather to Ithaca. (Hom. Od. xix. 413, &c.) Even at that age he is described as distinguished for his courage, his knowledge of navigation, his eloquence and skill as a negotiator; for, on one occasion, when the Messenians had carried off some sheep from Ithaca, Laërtes sent him to Messene to demand reparation. He there met with Iphitus, who was seeking the horses stolen from him, and who gave him the famous bow of Eurytus. This bow Odysseus used only in Ithaca, regarding it as too great a treasure to be employed in the field, and it was so strong that none of the suitors was able to handle it. (Od. xxi. 14, &c.) On one occasion he went to the Thesprotian Ephyra, to fetch from Ilus, the son of Mermerus, poison for his arrows; but as he could not get it there, he afterwards obtained it from Anchialus of Taphus. (Od. i. 259, &c.) Some accounts also state that he went to Sparta as one of the suitors of Helen, and he is said to have advised Tyndareus to make the suitors swear, that they would defend the chosen bridegroom against any one that should insult him on Helen's accouut. Tyndareus, to show him his gratitude, persuaded his brother Icarius to give Penelope in marriage to Odysseus; or, according to others, Odysseus gained her by conquering his competitors in the footrace. (Apollod. iii. 10. § 9; Paus. iii. 12. § 2.) But Homer mentions nothing of all this, and he states that Agamemnon, who visited him in Ithaca, prevailed upon him only with great difficulty to join the Greeks in their expedition against Troy. (Od. xxiv. 116, &c.) Other traditions relate that he was visited by Menelaus and Agamemnon, and that more especially Palamedes induced him to join the Greeks. For when Palamedes came, it is said, Odysseus pretended to be mad: he yoked an ass and an ox to a plough, and began to sow salt. Palamedes, to try him, placed the infant Telemachus before the plough, whereupon the father could not continue to play his part. He stopped the plough, and was obliged to undertake the fulfilment of the promise he had made when he was one of the suitors of Helen. (Tzetz. ad Lyc. 818.) This occurrence is said to have been the cause of his hatred of Palamedes. (Hygin. Fab. 95.) Being now himself gained for the undertaking, he contrived to discover Achilles, who was concealed among the daughters of king Lycomedes, and without whom, according to a prophecy of Calchas, the expedition against Troy could not be undertaken. (Apollod. iii. 13. § 8; comp. ACHILLES.) Before, however, the Greeks set out against Troy, Odysseus, in conjunction with Menelaus (and Palamedes, Dict. Cret. i. 4.), went to Troy, where he was hospitably received, for the purpose of inducing the Trojans by amicable means to restore Helen and her treasures. (Il. iii. 205, &c.)

When the Greeks were assembled in the port of Aulis, he joined them with twelve ships and men from Cephallene, Ithaca, Neriton, Crocyleia, Zacynthus, Samos, and the coast of Epeirus (Il. ii. 303, 631, &c.). When Agamemnon was unwilling to sacrifice Iphigeneia to Artemis, and the Greeks were in great difficulty, Odysseus, feigning anger, threatened to return home, but went to Mycenae, and induced Clytaemnestra by various pretences to send Iphigenia to Aulis (Dict. Cret. i. 20; comp. Eurip. Iph. Aul. 100, &c.). On his voyage to Troy he wrestled in Lesbos with Philomeleides, the king of the island, and conquered him (Od. iv. 342). According to others, Odysseus and Diomedes slew him by a stratagem. During the siege of Troy he distinguished himself as a valiant and undaunted warrior (Il. iv. 494, v. 677, vii. 168, xi. 396, 404, &c. xiv. 82), but more particularly as a cunning, prudent, and eloquent spy and negotiator, and many instances are related in which he was of the greatest service to the Greeks by these powers. Several distinguished Trojans fell by his hand. After the death of Achilles he contended for his armour with the Telamonian Ajax, and gained the prize (Od. xi. 545; Ov. Met. xiii. init.). He is said by some to have devised the stratagem of the wooden horse (Philostr. Her. x. 12), and he was one of the heroes that were concealed in its belly, and prevented them answering Helen, that they might not be discovered (Od. iv. 280, &c. viii. 494, xi. 525). When the horse was opened he and Menelaus were the first that jumped out and hastened to the house of Deiphobus, where he conquered in the fearful struggle (Od. viii. 517). He is also said to have taken part in carrying off the palladium. (Virg. Aen. ii. 164.)

But no part of his adventures is so celebrated in ancient story as his wanderings after the destruction of Troy, and his ultimate return to Ithaca, which form the subject of the Homeric poem called after him the Odyssey. After the taking of Troy one portion of the Greeks sailed away, and another with Agamemnon remained behind on the Trojan coast. Odysseus at first joined the former, but when he had sailed as far as Tenedos, he returned to Agamemnon (Od. iii. 163). Afterwards, however, he determined to sail home, but was thrown by a storm upon the coast of Ismarus, a town of the Cicones, in Thrace, north of the island of Lemnos. He there ravaged and plundered the town, and as he was not able to induce his men to depart in time, the Cicones hastened towards the coast from the interior, and slew 72 of his companions (Od. ix. 39, &c.). From thence he was driven by a north wind towards Maleia and to the Lotophagi on the coast of Libya. Some of his companions were so much delighted with the taste of the lotus that they wanted to remain in the country, but Odysseus compelled them to embark again, and continued his voyage (Od. ix. 67, 84, 94, &c.). In one day he reached the goat-island, situated north of the country of the Lotophagi (Od. ix. 116). He there left behind eleven ships, and with one he sailed to the neighbouring island of the Cyclopes (the western coast of Sicily), where with twelve companions he entered the cave of the Cyclops Polyphemus, a son of Poseidon and Thoosa. This giant devoured one after another six of the companions of Odysseus, and kept the unfortunate Odysseus and the six others as prisoners in his cave. In order to save himself Odysseus contrived to make the monster drunk with wine, and then with a burning pole deprived him of his one eye. He now succeeded in making his escape with his friends, by concealing himself and them under the bodies of the sheep which the Cyclops let out of his cave; and Odysseus, with a part of the flock, reached his ship. The Cyclops implored his father Poseidon to take vengeance upon Odysseus, and henceforth the god of the sea pursued the wandering king with implacable enmity (Od. i. 68, &c. ix. 172—542). Others represent Poseidon as angry with Odysseus on account of the death of Palamedes (Philostr. Her. ii. 20; comp. PALAMEDES). On his further voyage he arrived at the island of Aeolus, probably in the south of Sicily, where he stayed one month, and is said to have been in love with Polymela, the daughter of Aeolus (Parthen. Erot. 2). On his departure Aeolus provided him with a bag of winds, which were to carry him home, but his companions, without Odysseus' knowing it, opened the bag, and the winds escaped, whereupon the ships were driven back to the island of Aeolus, who was indignant and refused all further assistance (Od. x. i. &c.). After a voyage of six days he arrived at Telepylos, the city of Lamus, in which Antiphates ruled over the Laestrygones, a sort of cannibals. This place must probably be sought somewhere in the north of Sicily. Odysseus escaped from them with only one ship (x. 80, &c.), and his fate now carried him to a western island, Aeaea, inhabited by the sorceress Circe. A part of his people was sent to explore the island, but they were changed by Circe into swine. Eurylochus alone escaped, and brought the sad news to Odysseus, who, when he was hastening to the assistance of his friends, was instructed by Hermes by what means he could resist the magic powers of Circe. He succeeded in liberating his companions, who were again changed into men, and were most hospitably treated by the sorceress. When at length Odysseus begged for leave to depart, Circe desired him to descend into Hades and to consult the seer Teiresias (x. 135, &c.). He now sailed westward right across the river Oceanus, and having landed on the other side in the country of the Cimmerians, where Helios does not shine, he entered Hades, and consulted Teiresias about the manner in which he might reach his native island. Teiresias informed him of the danger and difficulties arising from the anger of Poseidon, but gave him hope that all would yet turn out well, if Odysseus and his companions would leave the herds of Helios in Thrinacia uninjured (Od. xi.). Odysseus now returned to Aeaea, where Circe again treated the strangers kindly, told them of the dangers that yet awaited them, and of the means of escaping (xii. 1, &c.). The wind which she sent with them carried them to the island of the Seirens, somewhere near the west coast of Italy. The Seirens sat on the shore, and with their sweet voices attracted all that passed by, and then destroyed them. Odysseus, in order to escape the danger, filled the ears of his companions with wax, and fastened himself to the mast of his ship, until he was out of the reach of the Seirens' song (xii. 39, &c. 166, &c.). Hereupon his ship came between Scylla and Charybdis, two rocks between Thrinacia and Italy. As the ship passed between them, Scylla, the monster inhabiting the rock of the same name, carried off and devoured six of the companions of Odysseus (xii. 73, &c. 235, &c.). From thence he came to Thrinacia, the island of Helios, who there kept his sacred herds of oxen. Odysseus, mindful of the advice of Teiresias and Circe, wanted to pass by, but his companions compelled him to land. He made them swear not to touch any of the cattle; but as they were detained in the island by storms, and as they were hungry, they killed the finest of the oxen while Odysseus was asleep. After some days the storm abated, and they sailed away, but soon another storm came on, and their ship was destroyed by Zeus with a flash of lightning. All were drowned with the exception of Odysseus, who saved himself by means of the mast and planks, and was driven by the wind again towards Scylla and Charybdis. But he skilfully avoided the danger, and after ten days he reached the woody island of Ogygia, inhabited by the nymph Calypso (xii. 127, &c. 260, &c.). She received him with kindness, and desired him to marry her, promising immortality and eternal youth, if he would consent, and forget Ithaca. But he could not overcome his longing after his own home (i. 51, 58, iv. 82, &c. 555, &c. vii. 244, &c. ix. 28, 34). Athena, who had always been the protectress of Odysseus, induced Zeus to promise that Odysseus, notwithstanding the anger of Poseidon, should one day return to his native island, and take vengeance on the suitors of Penelope (i. 48, &c. v. 23, xiii. 131, comp. xiii. 300, &c.). Hermes carried to Calypso the command of Zeus to dismiss Odysseus. The nymph obeyed, and taught him how to build a raft, on which, after a stay of eight years with her, he left the island (v. 140, &c. 234, 263). In eighteen days he came in sight of Scheria, the island of the Phaeacians, when Poseidon, who perceived him, sent a storm, which cast him off the raft. On the advice of Leucothea, and with her and Athena's assistance, he reached Scheria by dint of swimming (v. 278, &c. 445, vi. 170). The exhausted hero slept on the shore, until he was awoke by the voices of maidens. He found Nausicaa, the daughter of king Alcinous and Arete; she gave him clothing and allowed him to follow her to the town, where he was kindly received by her parents. He was honoured with feasts and contests, and the minstrel Demodocus sang of the fall of Troy, which moved Odysseus to tears, and being questioned about the cause of his emotion, he related his whole history. At length he was honoured with presents and sent home in a ship.

One night as he had fallen asleep in his ship, it reached the coast of Ithaca; the Phaeacians who had accompanied him, carried him and his presents on shore, and left him. He had now been away from Ithaca for twenty years, and when he awoke he did not recognise his native land, for Athena, that he might not be recognised, had enveloped him in a cloud. As he was lamenting his fate the goddess informed him where he was, concealed his presents, and advised him how to take vengeance upon the enemies of his house. During his absence his father Laërtes, bowed down by grief and old age, had withdrawn into the country, his mother Anticleia had died of sorrow, his son Telemachus had grown up to manhood, and his wife Penelope had rejected all the offers that had been made to her by the importunate suitors from the neighbouring islands (Od. xi. 180, &c. xiii. 336, &c. xv. 355, &c. xvi. 108, &c.). During the last three years of Odysseus' absence more than a hundred nobles of Ithaca, Same, Dulichium, and Zacynthus had been suing for the hand of Penelope, and in their visits to her house had treated all that it contained as if it had been their own (i. 246, xiii. 377, xiv. 90, xvi. 247). That he might be able to take vengeance upon them, it was necessary that he should not be recognised, in order to avail himself of any favourable moment that might present itself. Athena accordingly metamorphosed him into an unsightly beggar, in which appearance he was kindly treated by Eumaeus, the swineherd, a faithful servant of his house (xiii. 70, &c. xiv.). While he was staying with Eumaeus, his son Telemachus returned from Sparta and Pylos, whither he had gone to obtain information concerning his father. Odysseus made himself known to him, and with him deliberated upon the plan of revenge (xvi. 187, &c. 300). In the disguise of a beggar he accompanied Telemachus and Eumaeus to the town; on his arrival he was abused and insulted by the goat-herd Melantheus and the suitors, who even tried to kill Telemachus; but his old dog and his nurse Eurycleia recognised him, and Penelope received him kindly.

The plan of revenge was now carried into effect. Penelope, with great difficulty, was made to promise her hand to him who should conquer the others in shooting with the bow of Odysseus. As none of the suitors was able to manage it, Odysseus himself took it up, and having ordered all the doors to be shut, and all arms to be removed, he began his contest with the suitors, in which he was supported by Athena, his son, and some faithful servants. All fell by his hands, the faithless male and female servants as well as the suitors; the minstrel and Medon, the herald, alone were saved (xxii.). Odysseus now made himself known to Penelope, and went to see his aged father. In the meantime the report of the death of the suitors was spread abroad, and their relatives now rose in arms against Odysseus; but Athena, who assumed the appearance of Mentor, brought about a reconciliation between the people and the king (xxiii. xxiv.).

It has already been remarked that in the Homeric poems, Odysseus is represented as a prudent, cunning, inventive and eloquent man, but at the same time as a brave, bold, and persevering warrior, whose courage no misfortune or calamity could subdue, but later poets describe him as a cowardly, deceitful, and intriguing personage (Virg. Aen. ii. 164; Ov. Met. xiii. 6, &c.; Philostr. Her. ii. 20). Respecting the last period of his life the Homeric poems give us no information, except the prophecy of Teiresias, who promised him a painless death in a happy old age (Od. xi. 119); but later writers give us different accounts. According to one, Telegonus, the son of Odysseus by Circe, was sent out by his mother to seek his father. A storm cast him upon Ithaca, which he began to plunder in order to obtain provisions. Odysseus and Telemachus attacked him, but he slew Odysseus, and his body was afterwards carried to Aeaea (Hygin. Fab. 127; Dict. Cret. vi. 15; Horat. Carm. iii. 29. 8). According to some Circe called Odysseus to life again, or on his arrival in Tyrrhenia, he was burnt on Mount Perge (Tzetz. ad Lyc. 795, &c.). In works of art Odysseus was commonly represented as a sailor, wearing the semi-oval cap of a sailor. (Plin. H. N. xxxv. 36; Paus. x. 26. § 1, 29. § 2; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 804.) [L. S.]

OEAGRUS (Οἴαγρος) a tragic actor at Athens, who appears to have been particularly successful in the character of Niobe. (Arist. Vesp. 579; Schol. ad loc.) [E. E.]

OEAGRUS (Οἴαγρος), a king of Thrace, and father of Orpheus and Linus (Apollod. i. 3. § 2; Orph. Argon. 73; Ov. Ib. 484). Hence the sisters of Orpheus are called Oeagrides, in the sense of the Muses. (Mosch. iii. 37.) [L. S.]

OEAX (Οἴαξ), a son of Nauplius and Clymene, and brother of Palamedes and Nausimedon (Apollod. ii. 1. in fin. iii. 2. § 2; Eurip. Orest. 432). [L.S.]

OE'BALUS (Οἴβαλος). 1. A son of Cynortas, and husband of Gorgophone, by whom he became the father of Tyndareos, Peirene, and Arene, was king of Sparta, where he was afterwards honoured with an heroum (Paus. iii. 1. § 3, 15. § 7, ii. 2. § 3, iv. 2. § 3). According to others he was a son of Perieres and a grandson of Cynortas, and was married to the nymph Bateia, by whom he had several children (Apollod. iii. 10. § 4; Schol. ad Eurip. Orest. 447). The patronymic Oebalides is not only applied to his descendants, but to the Spartans generally, and hence it occurs as an epithet or surname of Hyacinthus, Castor, Pollux and Helena (Ov. Ib. 590, Fast. v. 705, Her. xvi. 126.)

2. A son of Telon by a nymph of the stream Sebethus, near Naples. Telon, originally a king of the Teleboans, had come from the island of Taphos to Capreae, in Italy; and Oebalus settled in Campania. (Virg. Aen. vii. 734, with Serv. note.) [L. S.]

OEBARES (Οἰβάρης). 1. A Persian, an officer of Cyrus. According to Ctesias (ap. Phot. Bibl. 72), when Astyages was taken at Ecbatana, whither he had fled from Cyrus, Oebares threw him into chains, from which, however, Cyrus released him. Ctesias further tells us that, at the siege of Sardis, Oebares advised Cyrus to terrify the citizens by images of Persians placed on high poles and made to look like gigantic soldiers, and that the fear thus caused mainly led to the capture of the town. When Cyrus sent Petisaces to bring Astyages to court from his satrapy (the country of the Barcanii), Oebares instigated the messenger to leave the old king to perish in a desert place, and, when the deed was discovered, starved himself to death to avoid the vengeance of Amytis (Astyages's daughter), in spite of all the assurances of protection which Cyrus gave him.

2. A groom of Dareius Hystaspis. According to Herodotus, when the seven conspirators, after slaying Smerdis, had decided on the continuance of monarchy, they agreed to ride forth together at sunrise, and to acknowledge as king any one of their number whose horse should be the first to neigh. Oebares, by a stratagem, caused the horse of Dareius to neigh before the rest, and thus secured the throne for his master. (Herod. iii. 84—87.)

3. Son of Megabazus, was viceroy of Dascyleium, in Bithynia. He received the submission of the Cyzicenes to Dareius Hystaspis, about B. C. 494. (Herod. vi. 33; comp. Aesch. Pers. 980, ed. Schütz.) [E. E.]

OEBO'TAS (Οἰβώτας), the son of Oenias, of Dyme in Achaea, was victorious in the foot-race at Olympia, in the sixth Olympiad, B. C. 756. His countrymen, however, having conferred upon him no distinguished mark of honour, although he was the first Achaean who had gained an Olympic victory, he imprecated upon them the curse that no Achaean should ever again conquer in the games; and, in fact, for three hundred years, not a single Achaean was among the victors. At length the Achaeans consulted the Delphic oracle, and, in obedience to its response, they erected a statue of Oebotas in the Altis at Olympia, Ol. 80. B. C. 460; soon after which a victory was gained in the boys' foot-race, by Sostratus of Pellene. Hence the custom was established for the Achaean athletes to sacrifice to Oebotas before engaging in an Olympic contest, and, when victorious, to crown his statue. (Paus. vii. 17. §§ 6, 7, 13, 14, Bekker; comp. vi. 3. § 8). [P. S.]

OECUME'NIUS (Οἰκουμένιος), a Greek commentator on various parts of the New Testament. Of this writer scarcely any thing is known: even the time in which he lived is not ascertained. He is cited very often in a MS. Catena in Epistolas Pauli, formerly in the Coislinian library at Paris, which Montfaucon (Biblioth. Coislin. cod. xxvii. p. 82) ascribes to the tenth century; and, as in his own Commentaries Oecumenius has cited Photius, who belongs to the latter half of the ninth century, Lardner is perhaps correct (Credib. bk. i. c. clxii.) in assigning him to the year 950. Cave's date (A. D. 990) is somewhat too late, if we can rely on Montfaucon's judgment of the age of the Coislinian MS. Dupin places him in the eleventh century, later than Theophylact, which appears to be altogether too late. In a MS. cited by Montfaucon (ib. cod. ccxxiv. p. 277) he is styled bishop of Tricca in Thessaly. The following commentaries are, or have been, ascribed to Oecumenius: — 1. Commentaria in Sacrosancta quatuor Christi Evangelia, ... Autore quidem (ut plurimi sentiunt) Oecumenio interprete vero Joanne Hentenio, fol. Lovan. 1543. This is a Latin version of the Commentary now generally ascribed to Euthymius Zigabenus [EUTHYMIUS ZIGABENUS]. Hentenius himself seems to have been convinced of the authorship of Euthymius very soon after the publication of the work, and after a few months added to the copies not issued a new title-page, with the date 1544 and an Admonitio Studioso Lectori, vindicating the claim of Euthymius. This version has been repeatedly reprinted. It may be as well here to correct the statement given elsewhere [EUTHYMIUS], that this commentary has been published only in Latin. The Greek text was published by C. F. Matthaei, in 3 vols. 8vo., Leipzig, 1792. Comparatively few copies of the edition of Hentenius, in the original form, appear to have got abroad, and few writers appear to have been aware of its real date (1543), and of its having borne the name of Oecumenius on the title-page. The editor of the Oxford edition of Cave's Historia Litteraria (1740—43), in a note, and Lardner in his Credibility, notice that Le Long had, in his Bibliotheca Sacra, ascribed a Commentary on the Gospels to Oecumenius; but they evidently knew not which was the work referred to. Fabricius merely observes that some had conjecturally ascribed the Commentary of Euthymius to Oecumenius. Hamberger, with more sagacity, inferred from the Admonitio of Hentenius, which indeed speaks plainly enough, that the work had been issued in 1543, and probably under the name of Oecumenius; but Matthaei gravely disputes the correctness of his deduction. (See Harles, not. i. ad Fabric. vol. viii. p. 344.) A copy of the work in its original form, and with the date 1543, is in the library of the British Museum. It is to be observed that the ascription of this commentary, either to Oecumenius or Euthymius, rests only on internal evidence. In one MS. it bears the name of Nicetas of Serrae, or, as he is usually termed, Nicetas of Heracleia; in another of Theophylact. The authorship of Euthymius is inferred from the resemblance of the work to his Commentary on the Psalms. The editor of Cave states that Oecumenius himself refers in a passage in his commentary on St. Paul's Epistles, Ad Hebraeos, c. 6, to a commentary which he had written on the Gospels, but we have not been able to find the place. 2. Ἐξηγήσεις εἰς τὰς πράξεις τῶν Ἀποστόλων, Enarrationes (s. Commentarii) in Acta Apostolorum, compiled from the earlier Greek fathers, especially Chrysostom, with many additions by the compiler. 3. Ἐξηγήσεις εἰς τὰς Παύλου ἐπιστολὰς πάσας, Commentarii in Epistolas Pauli omnes, of similar character to the Commentary on the Acts of the Apostles. 4. Ἐξηγήσεις εἰς τὰς ἑπτὰ καθολικὰς λεγομένας ἐπιστολάς, Commentarii in septem Epistolas quae Catholicae dicuntur. 5. Εἰς τὴν Ἰωάννου ἀποκάλυψιν, In Joannis Apocalysim. These various commentaries have been published. Those on the Acts and the Epistles, both the Pauline and the Catholic, were published by Donatus, together with the Commentary of Arethas of Caesareia on the Apocalypse, fol. Verona, 1532. They were again published at Paris, 2 vols. fol. 1631. A Latin version of these Commentaries on the Acts and Epistles, and of Arethas on the Apocalypse, by Hentenius, was published at Antwerp, fol. 1545. This version was reprinted, 4to. Frankfort, 1610; and with the Greek text of Oecumenius and Arethas in the Parisian edition of 1631. Another Latin version, by Felicianus, of the Commentaries on the Acts and the Catholic Epistles, was published, 8vo. Basel, 1552, and Venice, 1556; and one by Maximus Florentinus of the Commentary on the Epistles of Paul, 2 vols. 8vo. Basel, 1553. The Commentary on the Apocalypse has been lately published with a Catena in Catholicas Epistolas, and another Commentary on the Apocalypse, compiled from those of Andreas and Arethas of Caesareia, and of Oecumenius, by J. A. Cramer, 8vo. Oxford, 1840. The proem of this commentary of Oecumenius on the Apocalypse had been previously published by Montfaucon (Biblioth. Coislin. p. 277) with a Latin version. The title of Oecumenius to the authorship of the Commentaries on the Acts and the Epistles is doubted by Possevino on the authority of Fronto Ducaeus, who regarded Oecumenius simply as one of the writers from whom the work had been compiled; but Hentenius has shown good reason for believing him to be the author. Sixtus Senensis speaks of a Commentary of Oecumenius on the Pentateuch; but nothing is known of such a work: Sixtus refers to some notice of it by Oecumenius himself in his Commentary on the Hebrews. Oecumenius has the reputation of a judicious commentator, careful in compilation, modest in offering his own judgment, and neat in expression. (Hentenius, *Praef. ad Oecumen. OE'DIPUS (Οἰδίπους), the son of Laius and Iocaste of Thebes. The tragic fate of this hero is more celebrated than that of any other legendary personage, on account of the frequent use which the tragic poets have made of it. In their hands it also underwent various changes and embellishments; but the common story is as follows. Laius, a son of Labdacus, was king of Thebes, and husband of Iocaste, a daughter of Menoeceus (or Creon, Diod. iv. 64), and sister of Creon. As Laius had no issue, he consulted the oracle, which informed him that if a son should be born to him he would lose his life by the hand of his own child. When, therefore, at length Iocaste gave birth to a son, they pierced his feet, bound them together, and then exposed the child on Mount Cithaeron. There he was found by a shepherd of king Polybus of Corinth, and he was called from his swollen feet Oedipus. When he was brought to the palace, the king and his wife Merope (or Periboea, Apollod. iii. 5. § 7) brought him up as their own child. Once, however, Oedipus was taunted by a Corinthian with not being the king's son, whereupon he proceeded to Delphi to consult the oracle. The answer he there obtained was that he should slay his father and commit incest with his own mother. Thinking that Polybus was his father, he resolved not to return to Corinth; but on his road between Delphi and Daulis he met his real father Laius, and as Polyphontes (or Polyphetes, or Polypoetes, Schol. ad Eurip. Phoen. 39), the charioteer of Laius, wanted to push him out of the way, a scuffle ensued in which Oedipus slew both Laius and Polyphontes, and one part of the oracle was fulfilled. The two corpses are said to have been buried on the same spot by Damasistratus, king of Plataeae (Apollod. iii. 5. § 8; Paus. x. 5. § 2). In the mean time the celebrated Sphinx had appeared in the neighbourhood of Thebes. She had settled on a rock, and put a riddle to every Theban that passed by, and whoever was unable to solve it was killed by the monster. This calamity induced the Thebans to make known that whoever should deliver the country of it should be made king, and receive Iocaste as his wife. Oedipus was one of those that came forward, and when he approached the Sphinx she gave the riddle as follows: "A being with four feet has two feet and three feet, and only one voice; but its feet vary, and when it has most it is weakest." Oedipus solved the riddle by saying that it was man, and the Sphinx thereupon threw herself from the rock. Oedipus now obtained the kingdom of Thebes, and married his mother, by whom he became the father of Eteocles, Polyneices, Antigone, and Ismene. In consequence of this incestuous alliance of which no one was aware, the country of Thebes was visited by a plague, and the oracle ordered that the murderer of Laius should be expelled. Oedipus accordingly pronounced a solemn curse upon the unknown murderer, and declared him an exile; but when he endeavoured to discover him, he was informed by the seer Teiresias that he himself was both the parricide and the husband of his mother, Iocaste now hung herself, and Oedipus put out his own eyes (Apollod. iii. 5. § 8; Soph. Oed. Tyr. 447, 713, 731, 774, &c.). From this point traditions again differ, for according to some, Oedipus in his blindness was expelled from Thebes by his sons and brother-in-law, Creon, who undertook the government, and he was guided and accompanied by Antigone in his exile to Attica; but according to others he was imprisoned by his sons at Thebes, in order that his disgrace might remain concealed from the eyes of the world. The father now cursed his sons, who agreed to rule over Thebes alternately, but became involved in a dispute, in consequence of which they fought in single combat, and slew each other. Hereupon Creon succeeded to the throne, and expelled Oedipus. After long wanderings Oedipus arrived in the grove of the Eumenides, near Colonus, in Attica; he was there honoured by Theseus in his misfortune, and, according to an oracle, the Eumenides removed him from the earth, and no one was allowed to approach his tomb (Soph. Oed. Col. 1661, &c.; Eurip. Phoen. init.; Apollod. iii. 5. § 9; Diod. iv. 64; Hygin. Fab. 67). According to Homer, Oedipus, tormented by the Erinnyes of his mother, continued to reign at Thebes after her death; he fell in battle, and was honoured at Thebes with funeral solemnities (Od. xi. 270, &c., Il. xxiii. 679). Some traditions mention Euryganeia as the mother of the four children of Oedipus above-mentioned (Paus. ix. 5. § 5; Schol. ad Eurip. Phoen. 63), and previous to his connection with her, he is said to have been the father of Phrastor and Laonytus by Iocaste, and to have in the end married Astymedusa, a daughter of Sthenelus (Schol. ad Eurip. l. c.). Oedipus himself is sometimes called a son of Laius by Eurycleia, and is said to have been thrown in a chest into the sea when yet an infant, to have been carried by the waves to the coast of Sicyon, to have been received by Polybus, and afterwards to have been blinded by him (Schol. ad Eur. Phoen. 13, 26). His tomb was shown at Athens, where he also had an heroum. (Paus. i 28. § 7, 30, in fin.) [L. S.]

OENANTHE (Οἰνάνθη), mother of Agathocles, the infamous minister of Ptolemy Philopator, and Agathoclea, his equally infamous mistress. Oenanthe seems to have introduced her children to the king, and through them she possessed, until his death, the greatest influence in the government. When, after the accession of the young Epiphanes, the people rose up against Agathocles and his party, Oenanthe fled for refuge to the Thesmophorium (the temple of Demeter and Persephone), and here she implored the aid of the goddesses with superstitious enchantments, and drove away with threats and curses some noble ladies who had come to console her. On the next day she was dragged from the altar, and, having been brought naked on horseback into the stadium, was delivered up, with the rest of the family of Agathocles, to the fury of the multitude, by whom they were torn in pieces. (Polyb. xiv. 11, xv. 29, 33; Plut. Cleom. 33; Just. xxx. 2; Athen. vi. p. 251, e.) [E. E.]

OENEUS (Οἰνεύς). 1. One of the sons of Aegyptus. (Apollod. ii. 1. § 5.)

2. A son of Pandion, and one of the eponymic heroes at Athens. (Paus. i. 5. § 2.)

3. A son of Portheus, brother of Agrius and Melas, and husband of Althaea, by whom he became the father of Tydeus and Meleager, and was thus the grandfather of Diomedes. He was king of Pleuron and Calydon in Aetolia (Hom. Il. v. 813, ix. 543, xiv. 115, &c.). According to the tragic poets he was a son of Porthaon and Euryte, and besides the two brothers mentioned above, Alcathous, Laocoon, Leucopeus, and Sterope, are likewise called his brothers and sister (Apollod. i. 7. § 10 ; Apollon. Rhod. i. 192 ; Hygin. Fab. 14). His children are said to have been Toxeus, whom he himself killed, Thyreus (Phereus), Clymenus, Periphas, Agelaus, Meleager, Gorge, Eurymede, Melanippe, Mothone, and Deianeira (Apollod. i. 8. § 1 ; Paus. iv. 35. § 1 ; Anton. Lib. 2). His second wife was Melanippe, the daughter of Hipponous, and by her he is said by some to have become the father of Tydeus, who according to others was his son by his own daughter Gorge (Apollod. i. 8. § 4, &c.; Diod. iv. 35 ; comp. TYDEUS). He is said to have been deprived of his kingdom by the sons of Agrius, who imprisoned him and ill used him. But he was subsequently avenged by Diomedes, who slew Agrius and his sons, and restored the kingdom either to Oeneus himself, or to his son-in-law Andraemon, as Oeneus was too old. Diomedes took his grandfather with him to Peloponnesus, but some of the sons who lay in ambush, slew the old man, near the altar of Telephus in Arcadia. Diomedes buried his body at Argos, and named the town of Oenoe after him (Apollod. i. 8. § 5, &c.; Anton. Lib. 37 ; Diod. iv. 65). According to others Oeneus lived to a very old age with Diomedes at Argos, and died a natural death (Paus. ii. 25. § 2). Homer knows nothing of all this ; he merely relates that Oeneus once neglected to sacrifice to Artemis, in consequence of which she sent a monstrous boar into the territory of Calydon, which was hunted by Meleager (Il. ix. 532, &c.). The hero Bellerophon was hospitably received by him, and received a costly girdle as a present from him (vi. 216, &c.). At the time of the Trojan war the race of Oeneus had become extinct, and hence Thoas, the son of Andraemon, the son-in-law of Oeneus, led the Aetolians against Troy (ii. 638, &c.). [L. S.]

OENIAS, a Greek painter, of whom nothing more is known than that he painted a family group, syngenicon. (Plin. H. N. xxxv. 11. s. 40. § 37.) [P. S.]

OENOA'TIS (Οἰνωάτις), a surname of Artemis, who was worshipped at Oenoe in Argolis. (Eurip. Herc. Fur. 376.) [L. S.]

OE'NOE (Οἰνόη). 1. The name given by Antoninus Liberalis (16) to a person commonly called Gerana. [GERANA].

2. A sister of Epochus, from which the Attic demus of Oenoe was believed to have derived its name. (Paus. i. 33, in fin.)

3. An Arcadian nymph, who is said to have been one of those that brought up the infant Zeus. (Paus. viii. 47. § 2.) [L. S.]

OENOMARCHUS (Οἰνόμαρχος), of Andros, one of the numerous pupils of Herodes Atticus, did not possess any great celebrity, and was fond of the florid style of eloquence, which received the name of the Ionic or Asiatic. (Philostr. Vit. Soph. ii. 18.)

OENO'MAUS (Οἰνόμαος), a son of Ares and Harpinna, the daughter of Asopus, and husband of the Pleiad Sterope, by whom he became the father of Hippodameia, was king of Pisa in Elis (Apollod. iii. 10. § 1 ; Paus. v. 10. § 2, 22. § 5, vi. 21. § 6). According to others he was a son of Ares and Sterope (Schol. ad Hom. Il. xviii. 486 ; Hygin. Fab. 84, 159), or a son of Alxion (Paus. v. 1. § 5), or of Hyperochus and Sterope (Tzetz. ad Lyc. 149). An oracle had declared that he should die if his daughter should marry, and he therefore made it a condition that those who came forward as suitors for Hippodameia's hand should contend with himself in the chariot-race, and he who conquered should receive her, whereas those that were conquered should suffer death. The race-course extended from Pisa to the altar of Poseidon, on the Corinthian isthmus. At the moment when a suitor started with Hippodameia, Oenomaus sacrificed a ram to Zeus at Pisa, and then armed himself and hastened with his swift chariot and four horses, guided by Myrtilus, after the suitor. He thus overtook many a lover, whom he put to death, until Pelops, the son of Tantalus, came to Pisa. Pelops bribed Myrtilus, and using the horses which he had received from Poseidon, he succeeded in reaching the goal before Oenomaus, who in despair made away with himself. Thus Pelops obtained Hippodameia and the kingdom of Pisa (Diod. iv. 73 ; Hygin. Fab. 84 ; Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. i. 752, ad Pind. Ol. i. 114 ; Ov. Ib. 365, &c.). There are some variations in this story, as e. g. that Oenomaus was himself in love with his daughter, and for this reason slew her lovers (Tzetz. ad Lyc. 156 ; Hygin. Fab. 253). Myrtilus also is said to have loved her, and as she wished to possess Pelops, she persuaded Myrtilus to take the nails out of the wheels of her father's chariot ; and as Oenomaus was breathing his last he pronounced a curse upon Myrtilus, and this curse had its desired effect, for as Pelops refused to give to Myrtilus the reward he had promised, or as Myrtilus had attempted to dishonour Hippodameia, Pelops thrust him down from Cape Geraestus. But Myrtilus, while dying, likewise pronounced a curse upon the house of Pelops, which was afterwards the cause of the fatal occurrences in the life of Atreus and Thyestes (Tzetz. ad Lyc. 156). All the suitors that had been killed by Oenomaus, were buried in one common tomb (Paus. vi. 21. § 6, &c.). The tomb of Oenomaus himself was shown on the river Cladeus in Elis (vi. 21. § 3). His house was destroyed by lightning, and only one pillar of it remained standing (v. 20. § 3, 14. § 5 ; comp. v. 17. § 4, 10. § 2 ; Soph. Elect. 504, &c.; Völcker, Mythol. des Japet. Geschl. p. 361). [L. S.]

OENO'MAUS (Οἰνόμαος), of Gadara, a cynic philosopher, who flourished in the reign of Hadrian, or somewhat later, but before Porphyry. (Syncell. p. 349, b. ; Suid. s. v.) He was one of those later cynics whose philosophy consisted not so much in any definite system of doctrine, as in a free and unrestrained tone of thought and life. Thus the emperor Julian charges him with sensuality and profaneness ; and his sarcasms upon the old cynic doctrines have led some to suppose, but without reason, that he belonged to some other sect. (Julian, Orat. vi. p. 199, vii. p. 209, ed. Spanheim.) Suidas mentions, as his works, Περὶ Κυνισμοῦ, Πολιτεία, Περὶ τῆς καθ' Ὁμηρον Φιλοσοφίας, Περὶ Κράτητος καὶ Διογένους καὶ τῶν λοιπῶν. This list, however, does not include the work which is best known to us, namely, his exposure of the oracles, which is sometimes entitled Κατα τῶν χρηστηρίων, but the proper title seems to have been Γοήτων Φωρά, i. e. Detectio Praestigiatorum. Considerable extracts from this work are preserved by Eusebius, who tells us that Oenomaus was provoked to write it in consequence of having been himself deceived by an oracle. (Euseb. Praep. Evang. v. 18, foll., vi. 7; Socrat. H. E. iv. 13; Niceph. x. 36; Theodoret. Therap. vi. p. 86, x. p. 141, a.) Julian also speaks of tragedies by Oenomaus (Orat. vii. p. 210).

2. An epigrammatic poet, the author of a single distich upon Eros, inscribed on a drinking vessel. There is nothing to determine whether or no he was the same person as the philosopher (Brunck, Anal. vol. ii. p. 402; Jacobs, Anth. Graec. vol. iii. p. 110.)

3. A tragic poet. [DIOGENES, p. 1023.] [P.S.]

OENO'NE (Οἰνώνη), a daughter of the river-god Cebren, and the wife of Paris. (Apollod. iii. 12. § 6; Parthen. Erot. 4; Strab. xiii. p. 596; comp. PARIS.) [L. S.]

OENO'PIDES (Οἰνοπίδης), a distinguished astronomer and mathematician, a native of Chios. Plato (Erastae, c. 1) mentions him in conjunction with Anaxagoras, from which it has been concluded that he was a contemporary of the latter. It may have been so, but there is nothing else to confirm the conjecture. He is spoken of in connection with Pythagoras and his followers, so that he seems to have been regarded as a Pythagorean. Oenopides derived most of his astronomical knowledge from the priests and astronomers of Egypt, with whom he lived for some time. Diodorus (i. 98) mentions in particular that he derived from this source his knowledge of the obliquity of the ecliptic, the discovery of which he is said to have claimed (in the treatise de Plac. Phil. ii. 12, ascribed to Plutarch). Aelian (V. H. x. 7) attributes to Oenopides the invention of the cycle of fifty-nine years for bringing the lunar and solar years into accordance, of which Censorinus (c. 19) makes Philolaus to have been the originator. The length of the solar year was fixed by Oenopides at 365 days, and somewhat less than nine hours. (As Censorinus expresses it, the fifty-ninth part of twenty-two days.) Oenopides set up at Olympia a brazen tablet containing an explanation of his cycle. He had a notion that the milky-way was the original path of the sun, from which he had been frightened into his present path by the spectacle of the banquet of Thyestes. (Achilles Tatius, Isag. in Arat. c. 24.) Proclus, in his commentary on Euclid, attributes to Oenopides the discovery of the twelfth and twenty-third propositions of the first book of Euclid, and the quadrature of the meniscus. Oenopides is also mentioned more than once by Sextus Empiricus. (Hypot. iii. 4, adv. Math. p. 367.) He had a theory of his own about the rise of the Nile, which was this, that in the summer the waters beneath the earth are cold, in the winter warm; a fact which he said was proved by the temperature of deep wells. So that in the winter the heat shut up in the earth carries off the greater part of the moisture, while there are no rains in Egypt. In the summer, on the contrary, the moisture is no longer carried off in that way, so that there is enough to fill the bed of the Nile and cause it to overflow. Diodorus (i. 41) objects to that theory, that other rivers of Libya, which correspond in position and direction to the Nile, are not so affected. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. i. p. 860; Ideler, Handbuch der Chronologie, vol. i. p. 302.) [C. P. M.]

OENO'PION (Οἰνοπίων), a son of Dionysus and husband of the nymph Helice, by whom he became the father of Thalus, Euanthes, Melas, Salagus, Athamas, and Merope, Aerope or Haero (Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. iii. 996; Paus. vii. 4. § 6; Parthen. Erot. 20). Some writers call Oenopion a son of Rhadamanthys by Ariadne, and a brother of Staphylus (Plut. Thes. 20); and Servius (ad Aen. i. 539; comp. x. 763) also calls him the father of Orion. From Crete he emigrated with his sons to Chios, which Rhadamanthys had assigned to him as his habitation (Paus. vii. 4. § 6; Diod. v. 79). While he was king of Chios, he received a visit from the giant Orion, who for a long time sued for the hand of Merope. Once Orion being intoxicated violated Merope, in consequence of which Oenopion blinded him and expelled him from his island. Orion, however, went to Lemnos, where Hephaestus gave to him Cedalion as a guide, or according to others stole a boy whom he carried on his shoulders, and who told him the roads. Orion was afterwards cured of his blindness, and returned to Chios to take vengeance on Oenopion. But the latter was not to be found in Chios, for his friends had concealed him in the earth, so that Orion, unable to discover him, went to Crete (Apollod. i. 4. § 3; Hygin. Poet. Astr. ii. 34; Eratosth. Catast. 32; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1623). The tomb of Oenopion continued to be shown at Chios even in the days of Pausanias (vii. 5. § 6; comp. ORION; Völcker, Mythol. des Japet. Geschl. p. 112, &c.). [L. S.]

OENO'TROPAE (Οἰνοτρόπαι), that is, the changers of or into wine, was the name of the three or four daughters of king Anius in Delos, because they had received from Dionysus the power of changing water into wine, and any thing else they chose into corn and olives (Tzetz. ad Lyc. 750). When Agamemnon heard this, he wanted to carry them off by force from their father, that they might provide for the army of the Greeks at Troy; but they implored Dionysus for assistance, and were accordingly metamorphosed into doves. (Ov. Met. xiii. 640; Serv. ad Aen. iii. 80.) [L. S.]

OENO'TRUS (Οἴνωτρος), the youngest son of Lycaon who emigrated with a colony from Arcadia to Italy, and called the district in which he settled, after himself, Oenotria (Paus. viii. 3. § 2; Virg. Aen. i. 532, iii. 165, vii. 85; Strab. vi. p. 253, &c.). According to Varro, he was a king of the Sabines, and not a Pelasgian, and his brother was called Italus (Serv. ad Aen. i. 536). According to Dionysius (i. 11, &c. ii. 1), Oenotrus was accompanied by his brother Peucetius, and landed in the bay of Ausonia. [L. S.]

OEOBA'ZUS (Οἰόβαζος). 1. A Persian, who, when Dareius Hystaspis was on the point of marching from Susa on his Scythian expedition, besought him to leave behind with him one of his three sons, all of whom were serving in the army. Dareius answered that, as Oeobazus was a friend, and had preferred so moderate a request, he would leave him all three. He then ordered them all to be put to death. (Her. iv. 84; comp. vii. 38, 39; Senec. de Ira, iii. 16, 17.)

2. Father of Siromitres, who led the Paricanians in the Greek expedition of Xerxes. (Her. vii. 68.)

3. A noble Persian, who, when the Greek fleet arrived in the Hellespont after the battle of Mycale (B. C. 479), fled from Cardia to Sestus, as the place of all most strongly fortified. Sestus was besieged by the Athenians under Xanthippus, and, on the famine becoming unendurable, Oeobazus, with most of the Persians, made his escape from the town; but he fell into the hands of the Apsinthian Thracians, and was sacrificed by them to Pleistorus, one of their gods (Her. ix. 115, 118, 119). [E.E.]

OEOCLUS (Οἴοκλος), a son of Poseidon by Ascra, who in conjunction with the Aloadae, is said to have built the town of Ascra in Boeotia. (Paus. ix. 29. § 1.)

OEO'LYCUS (Οἰόλυκος), a son of Theras of Sparta, and brother of Aegeus, was honoured at Sparta with an heroum. (Herod. iv. 149; Paus. iii. 15. § 6.) [L. S.]

OEO'NUS (Οἰωνός), a son of Licymnius of Midea in Argolis, was the first victor at Olympia, in the foot-race. (Pind. Ol. xi. 76, &c.; Apollod. ii. 7. § 3; Paus. iii. 15. § 3.) He is said to have been killed at Sparta by the sons of Hippocoon, but was avenged by Heracles, whose kinsman he was, and was honoured with a monument near the temple of Heracles. (Paus. l. c.) [L. S.]

OESALCES, brother of Gala, king of the Numidian tribe of the Massylians, whom he succeeded on the throne, according to the Numidian law of inheritance. He was at the time of very advanced age, and died shortly after, leaving two sons, Capusa and Lacumaces. (Liv. xxix. 29.) [E. H. B.]

OETOLINUS. [LINUS.]

OETOSYRUS (Οἰτόσυρος), the name of a Scythian divinity whom Herodotus identifies with the Greek Apollo. (Herod. iv. 59.) [L. S.]

OE'TYLUS (Οἴτυλος), a son of Amphianax, and grandson of Antimachus of Argos. The Laconian town of Oetylus was believed to have received its name from him, and he there enjoyed heroic honours. (Paus. iii. 25. § 7.) [L. S.]

OFELLA, a man of sound sense and of a straightforward character, whom Horace contrasts with the Stoic quacks of his time. (Hor. Sat. ii. 2. 3.) The old editions of Horace have Ofellus, which Bentley proposed to change into Ofella, remarking that Ofella and Ofellius were known Roman names, but that Ofellus occurs nowhere else. The conjecture of Bentley is now confirmed by manuscript authority.

OFELLA, Q. LUCRE'TIUS, originally belonged to the Marian party, but deserted to Sulla; and although he had not hitherto distinguished himself in any way (Dion Cass. xxxiv. Fragm. 134), Sulla appointed him to the command of the army employed in the blockade of Praeneste, where the younger Marius had taken refuge in B.C. 82. Praeneste was obliged to surrender in the course of the year, and the younger Marius put an end to his own life. Relying on these services, Ofella became a candidate for the consulship in the following year, although he had not yet been either quaestor or praetor, thus acting in defiance of Sulla's law De Magistratibus. Sulla at first attempted to dissuade him from becoming a candidate; but as he persisted in his purpose, and entered the forum supported by a large party, Sulla sent a centurion to kill him in the middle of the forum, and informed the people that he had commanded the execution of Ofella, because he refused to obey his commands. After saying this, Sulla told them the following tale, which is preserved by Appian:—"The lice were very troublesome to a countryman, as he was ploughing. Twice he stopped his ploughing, and purged his jacket. But he was still bitten; and in order that he might not be hindered in his work, he burnt the jacket. And I advise those who have been twice humbled not to make fire necessary the third time." (Appian, B. C. i. 88, 94, 101; Plut. Sull. 29, 33; Liv. Epit. 88, 89; Vell. Pat. ii. 27, who erroneously says that Ofella had been praetor.) The name of the centurion that put Ofella to death was L. Bellienus. He was afterwards brought to trial for this murder by Julius Caesar and condemned. (Ascon. in Tog. Cand. p. 92, ed. Orelli; Dion Cass. xxxvii. 10.) The orator, who is characterised by Cicero (Brut. 48) as contionibus aptior quam judiciis, is probably the same as the subject of this article, though the name in Cicero is corrupt.

OFELLUS. [OFELLA.]

OFI'LIUS or OFE'LLIUS. The name occurs in inscriptions in both forms; but in writers we generally find Ofilius.

1. OFILIUS CALAVIUS, a Campanian in the time of the Samnite wars. [CALAVIUS, No. 3.]

2. OFILLIUS (Ὀφίλλιος), as he is called by Appian (B. C. v. 128), a tribune of the soldiers in the army of Octavian, B.C. 38.

3. M. OFILIUS HILARUS, whose painless death is recorded at length by Pliny. (H. N. vii. 53. s. 54.)

4. OFELLIUS (Ὀφέλλιος), a philosopher mentioned by Arrian (Epict. iii. 22. § 27).

OFI'LIUS, A., a Roman jurist, is named by Pomponius (Dig. 1. tit. 2. s. 2. § 44) Gaius Aulus Ofilius, but the praenomen Gaius appears to be some blunder of a copyist. Ofilius was one of the pupils of Servius Sulpicius, and the master of Tubero, Capito and Labeo. He was a friend of Cicero, who, on one occasion, cites his opinion as opposed to that of Trebatius (ad Fam. vii. 21, ad Att. xiii. 37). He was also a friend of the Dictator Caesar. Ofilius belonged to the equestrian order, but he obtained a high reputation for legal knowledge. "He wrote," says Pomponius (Dig. 1. tit. 2. s. 2. § 44), "many treatises on the Jus Civile," among which De Legibus vicesimae (manumissionum), and De Jurisdictione. The fifth book of his Jus Partitum is cited (Dig. 32. s. 55), and the sixteenth book of a work on actions (33. tit. 9. s. 3. §§ 5, 8), and a treatise addressed to Atticus (50. tit. 16. s. 234. § 2), who is probably T. Pomponius Atticus. Ofilius is often cited in the Digest. "Ofilius," says Pomponius, "edictum praetoris primus diligenter composuit," which probably means an arrangement of the edictal law, like the later work of Julian, or it might be a commentary upon it. Caesar had conceived a design of arranging the Jus Civile, to which his connection with Ofilius may have contributed. (Zimmern, Geschichte des Röm. Privatrechts; Puchta. Cursus, &c. vol. i. p. 427; Grotius, Vit. Jurisconsult.) [G. L.]

OGO'A (Ὀγώα), the Carian name of Zeus at Mysala, in whose temple a sea-wave was seen from time to time. (Paus. viii. 10. § 3.) Strabo (xiv. p. 659) calls the god of Mysala, in the Carian dialect, Osogo. [L. S.]

OGU'LNIA GENS, plebeian, is most known through one of its members being the proposer of the law, which opened the two great ecclesiastical corporations to the plebeians. The first and only person in this gens who obtained the consulship is Q. Ogulnius Gallus, who was consul B. C. 269. GALLUS is the only cognomen of the Ogulnii: the others, who have no surname, are given below.

The annexed coin belongs to this gens, but by whom it was struck is uncertain. The names on the obverse, Q. OGVL. CAR. VER., are those of triumvirs of the mint, and are probably abbreviations of Q. Ogulnius, Carvilius, and Verginius or Virgilius.

COIN OF OGULNIA GENS.

OGU'LNIUS. 1, 2. Q. and CN. OGULNII, tribunes of the plebs, B. C. 300, proposed and carried a law by which the number of the pontiffs was increased from four to eight, and that of the augurs from four to nine, and which enacted that four of the pontiffs and five of the augurs should be taken from the plebs. (Liv. x. 6—9.) Besides these eight pontiffs there was the pontifex maximus, who is generally not included when the number of pontiffs is spoken of. The pontifex maximus continued to be a patrician down to B. C. 254, when Tib. Coruncanius was the first plebeian who was invested with this dignity.

In B. C. 296 Q. and Cn. Ogulnii were curule aediles. They prosecuted several persons for violating the usury laws; and with the money accruing from the fines inflicted in consequence they executed many public works (Liv. x. 23). The name of Cn. Ogulnius does not occur again after this year.

In B. C. 294 Q. Ogulnius was sent at the head of an embassy to Epidaurus, in order to fetch Aesculapius to Rome, that the plague might be stayed which had been raging in the city for more than two years. The legend relates that, upon the arrival of the ambassadors at Epidaurus, the god in the form of a gigantic serpent issued from the sanctuary, and settled in the cabin of Q. Ogulnius. (Val. Max. i. 8 § 2; Aur. Vict. de Vir. Ill. 22; Liv. Epit. 11; Oros. iii. 22; Ov. Met. xv. 622, &c.)

In B. C. 273 Q. Ogulnius was again employed on an embassy, being one of the three ambassadors sent by the senate to Ptolemy Philadelphus, who had sought the friendship and alliance of the Romans in consequence of their conquest of Pyrrhus. The ambassadors were received with great distinction at the Egyptian court, and loaded with presents. These they were obliged to accept; but the golden crowns which had been given them, they placed on the heads of the king's statues; and the other presents they deposited in the treasury immediately upon their arrival at Rome, but the senate restored them to them. (Val. Max. iv. 3. § 9; Justin, xviii. 3; Dion Cass. Fragm. 147, with the note of Fabricius.)

3. M. OGULNIUS was sent into Etruria with P. Aquillius in B. C. 210, in order to purchase corn to be sent to Tarentum. (Liv. xxvii. 3.)

4. M. OGULNIUS, tribune of the soldiers in the second legion, fell in battle against the Boii, B. C. 196. (Liv. xxxiii. 36.)

OGY'GUS or OGY'GES (Ὠγύγης), is sometimes called a Boeotian autochthon, and sometimes a son of Boeotus, and king of the Hectenes, and the first ruler of the territory of Thebes, which was called after him Ogygia. In his reign the waters of lake Copais rose above its banks, and inundated the whole valley of Boeotia. This flood is usually called after him the Ogygian. (Paus. ix. 5. § 1; Apollon. Rhod. iii. 1177; Serv. ad Virg. Ecl. vi. 41.) The name of Ogyges is also connected with Attic story, for in Attica too an Ogygian flood is mentioned, and he is described as the father of the Attic hero Eleusis, and as the father of Daeira, the daughter of Oceanus. (Paus. i. 38. § 7.) In the Boeotian tradition he was the father of Alalcomenia, Thelxinoea and Aulis (Suid. s. v. Πραξιδίκη; Paus. ix. 33. § 4.) Polybius (iv. 1) and Strabo (viii. p. 384) call Ogyges the last king of Achaia, and some traditions even described him as an Egyptian king. (Tzetz. ad Lyc. 1206.) [L. S.]

OICLES or OICLEUS (Οἰκλῆς, Οἰκλεύς), a son of Antiphates, grandson of Melampus and father of Amphiaraus, of Argos. (Hom. Od. xv. 241, &c.) Diodorus (iv. 32) on the other hand, calls him a son of Amphiaraus, and Pausanias (vi. 17. § 4), a son of Mantius, the brother of Antiphates. Oicles accompanied Heracles on his expedition against Laomedon of Troy, and was there slain in battle. (Apollod. ii. 6. § 4; Diod. iv. 32.) According to other traditions he returned home from the expedition, and dwelt in Arcadia, where he was visited by his grandson Alcmaeon, and where in later times his tomb was shown. (Apollod. iii. 7. § 5; Paus. viii. 36. § 4.) [L. S.]

OILEUS (Οἰλεύς.) 1. A Trojan, charioteer of Bianor, was slain by Agamemnon. (Hom. Il. xi. 93.)

2. A son of Hodoedocus and Laonome, grandson of Cynus, and great-grandson of Opus, was a king of the Locrians, and married to Eriopis, by whom he became the father of Ajax, who is hence called Oïlides or Oïliades. Oïleus was also the father of Medon by Rhene. (Hom. Il. ii. 527, 725, xiii. 697, 712; Propert. iv. 1. 117.) He is also mentioned among the Argonauts. (Apollod. v. 10. § 8; Apollon. Rhod. i. 74; Orph. Argon. 191.) [L. S.]

O'LBIADES (Ὀλβιάδης), the painter of a picture in the senate-house of the Five Hundred, in the Cerameicus, at Athens, representing Calippus, the commander of the army which repulsed the invading Gauls under Brennus, at Thermopylae, B. C. 279. (Paus. i. 3. § 4. s. 5.) [P. S.]

OLEN (Ὠλήν), a mythical personage, who is represented as the earliest Greek lyric poet, and the first author of sacred hymns in hexameter verse. He is closely connected with the worship of Apollo, of whom, in one legend, he was made the prophet. His connection with Apollo is also marked by the statement of the Delphian poetess Boeo, who represents him as a Hyperborean, and one of the establishers of oracles; but the more common story made him a native of Lycia. In either case, his coming from the extreme part of the Pelasgian world to Delos intimates the distant origin of the Ionian worship of Apollo, to which, and not to the Dorian, Olen properly belongs. His name, according to Welcker (Europa und Kadmos, p. 35), signifies simply the flute-player. Of the ancient hymns, which went under his name, Pausanias mentions those to Here, to Achaeïa, and to Eileithyia; the last was in celebration of the birth of Apollo and Artemis. (Herod. iv. 35; Paus. i. 18. § 5, ii. 13. § 3, v. 7. § 8, ix. 27. § 2, x. 7. § 8; Callim. Hymn. in Del.

304; Creuzer, Symbolik, vol. ii. pp. 116, 130, 136; Klausen, in Ersch and Gruber's Encyklopädie; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. i. p. 134.) [P. S.]

OLE'NNIUS, one of the chief centurions (e primipilaribus), was placed about A. D. 28 over the Frisii, whom Drusus had subdued. (Tac. Ann. iv. 72.)

O'LENUS. (Ὦλενος.) 1. A son of Hephaestus, and father of the nymphs Aege and Helice, who brought up Zeus, and from whom the town of Olenus in Aetolia was believed to have derived its name. (Hygin. Poet. Astr. 13; Steph. Byz. s. v.)

2. A son of Zeus and the Danaïd Anaxithea, from whom the town of Olenus in Achaia derived its name. (Steph. Byz. s. v.; Strab. viii. p. 386.)

3. A person living on Mount Ida, who wanted to take upon himself the punishment which his wife had deserved by her pride of her beauty, and was metamorphosed along with her into stone. (Ov. Met. x. 68, &c.) [L. S.]

T. O'LLIUS, the father of Poppaea Sabina, was put to death at the latter end of the reign of Tiberius on account of his intimacy with Sejanus. (Tac. Ann. xiii. 45.)

OLOPHERNES or OROPHERNES (Ὀλοφέρνης, Ὀροφέρνης, Ὀρροφέρνης). 1. Son of Ariamnes I., brother of Ariarathes I., and father of Ariarathes II., kings of Cappadocia. He was much beloved by his brother, who advanced him to the highest posts, and sent him to aid Artaxerxes III. (Ochus) in his subjugation of Egypt, B. C. 350. From this expedition Olophernes returned home, loaded by the Persian king with great rewards for his services, and died in his native land. His brother Ariarathes adopted his elder son of the same name. He left also a younger son, named Aryses or Arysis. (Diod. Ecl. 3; Phot. Bibl. 244.)

2. One of the two supposititious sons whom Antiochis at first imposed upon her husband, Ariarathes IV., king of Cappadocia. On the birth, however, of a real son, named Mithridates (afterwards Ariarathes V.), Olophernes, that he might not set up pretensions to the throne, was sent away into Ionia, where he does not appear to have improved his morals. When Ariarathes V. refused to marry the sister of Demetrius Soter, the latter supported the claims of Olophernes to the crown of Cappadocia. Olophernes, however, entered into a conspiracy with the people of Antioch to dethrone Demetrius, who, having discovered the design, threw him into chains, but spared his life that he might still keep Ariarathes in alarm with his pretensions. In B. C. 157, when Ariarathes had been deposed, and had fled to Rome, Olophernes sent thither two unscrupulous ambassadors (Timotheus and Diogenes) to join the emissaries of Demetrius in opposing his (so called) brother. According to Appian the Romans decided that the two claimants should share the throne between them. We are told, however, that Olophernes did not hold the kingdom long, and that his reign was signalized by a departure from the more simple customs of his ancestors, and by the introduction of systematic debauchery, like that of the Ionians. To supply his lavish extravagance, he oppressed and pillaged his subjects, putting many to death, and confiscating their property. Four hundred talents he deposited with the citizens of Priene, as a resource in case of a reverse of fortune, and these they afterwards restored to him. We read also that, when his affairs were on the decline, and he became alarmed lest his soldiers should mutiny, if their arrears remained unpaid, he plundered a very ancient temple of Zeus, to which great sanctity was attached, to enable him to satisfy their demands. (Diod. Ecl. 3, Exc. de Virt. et Vit. p. 588, &c.; Phot. l. c.; Polyb. xxxii. 20; App. Syr. 47; Liv. Epit. xlvii.; Just. xxxv. 1; Athen. x. p. 440, b; Dalechamp and Casaub. ad loc.; Ael. V. H. ii. 41; see above, Vol. I. p. 284.) [E. E.]

O'LORUS or O'ROLUS (Ὄλορος, Ὄρολος) 1. A King of Thrace, whose daughter Hegesipyla, was married to Miltiades (Herod. vi. 39, 41; Marcellin. Vit. Thuc.)

2. Apparently grandson of the above, and son of Hegesipyla, was probably the offspring of a second marriage contracted by her after the death of Miltiades. This Olorus was the father of Thucydides, the historian (Thuc. iv. 104; Marcellin. Vit. Thuc.; Suidas, s. v. Θουκυδίδης). [E. E.]

O'LTHACUS (Ὀλθακός), a chief of the Scythian tribe of the Dandarians, who served in the army of Mithridates the Great, and enjoyed a high place in the favour of that prince, but subsequently deserted to the Romans. This was, however, according to Plutarch, a mere feint, for the purpose of obtaining access to Lucullus, and thus effecting his assassination; but being accidentally foiled in this project, he again returned to the camp of Mithridates. (Plut. Lucull. 16.) Appian, who also relates the same story (Mithr. 79), writes the name Olcabas. [E. H. B.]

OLY'BRIUS, ANI'CIUS (Ὀλύβριος), Roman emperor in A. D. 472, was a descendant of the ancient and noble family of the Anicians. Down to 455 he lived in Rome, but left it after its sack by Genseric and the accession of Avitus, and went to Constantinople. In 464, he was made consul; and in the same year, or some time previously, married Placidia, the daughter of the emperor Valentinian III., the same princess who had been a captive of Genseric. It appears that Olybrius stood on very intimate terms with that king of the Vandals, who was active in helping him to the imperial crown of Italy. In 472, during the troubles occasioned by the dissensions between the Western emperor Anthemius and the powerful patrician Ricimer, Olybrius was sent to Italy by Zeno under the pretext of assisting Anthemius; but his real motive was to seize the supreme power, a scheme in which he was openly assisted by Genseric, and secretly by the emperor Zeno, who, it appears, stood in fear of Olybrius on account of his connections with the king of the Vandals. Instead, therefore, of promoting the interest of Anthemius, he entered into negotiations with Ricimer, and ere long he was proclaimed emperor by a strong faction, with the connivance of Ricimer, to whom the imperial power was of more value than the imperial title. Anthemius, however, was still in Rome, and enjoyed popularity. When Ricimer came to attack him, Anthemius, supported by Gothic auxiliaries under Gelimer, made a stout resistance, till at last the besieger gained the city in consequence of his victory at the bridge of Hadrian. Rome was once more plundered, and Anthemius was murdered by order of Ricimer (11th July, 472). Olybrius was now recognised as emperor without any opposition, and could exercise his power free from any control, since immediately after this catastrophe, Ricimer was attacked by a violent distemper which carried him off a few weeks afterwards. The only act of Olybrius during his short reign, which is recorded in history, is the raising of Gundobaldus, the nephew of Ricimer, to the patrician dignity. Olybrius died a natural death, as it appears, on the 23d of October 472, after a short and peaceful reign of three months and thirteen days. He left a daughter, Juliana Anicia, by his wife Placidia. His successor was Glycerius. (Marcellinus Comes, Cassiodorus, Victor, Chronica; Chron. Alexandr., Chron. Paschale; Ennodius, Vita Epiph. p. 380; Evagrius, ii. 16; Procop. Vand. i. 57; Zonar. vol. i. p. 40; Malchus, p. 95; Priscus in Excerpt. Legat. p. 74; Theophan. p. 102, in the Paris edit.; Jornandes, De Reb. Goth. p. 128, ed. Lindenbrog.) [W. P.]

OLY'MNIUS (Ὀλύμνιος), a physician of Alexandria, whose date is unknown, the author of a work on Critical Days, to be found in MS. in the king's library at Paris. (See Cramer's Anecd. Graeca Paris. vol. i. p. 394.) [W. A. G.]

OLYMPIACUS, physician. [OLYMPICUS.]

OLYM'PIAS (Ὀλυμπιάς). 1. Wife of Philip II., king of Macedonia, and mother of Alexander the Great. She was the daughter of Neoptolemus I., king of Epeirus, through whom she traced her descent to Pyrrhus, the son of Achilles. (Justin. vii. 6. § 10; Plut. Alex. 2; Diod, xix. 51; Paus. i. 11. § 1; Theopomp. fr. 232, ed. Didot.) Her temper, naturally vehement and passionate, led her to engage with wild enthusiasm in all the mystic rites and orgies of the Orphic and Bacchanalian worship; and we are told that it was on one of these occasions that Philip first met her at Samothrace, and became enamoured of her. (Plut. l. c.; Himerius ap. Phot. p. 367, a.) But it was not till some time after the accession of the latter to the throne of Macedonia, B. C. 359, that their nuptials took place. (Justin. l. c.) The marvellous stories circulated at a subsequent period of the circumstances connected with the birth of Alexander, B. C. 356, and which gave rise to, or rather were invented in support of, the idea that the latter was the son of Ammon and not of Philip, are too well known to require further notice. (Plut. Alex. 2, 3; Paus. iv. 14. § 7; Justin. xi. 11, xii. 16; Lucian. Alex. 7; Arr. Anab. iv. 10. § 3).

Plutarch and Justin absurdly ascribe to these suspicions the estrangement that subsequently arose between Philip and Olympias, for which the numerous amours of the former, and the passionate and jealous character of the latter are amply sufficient to account. It is certain that the birth of their second child Cleopatra was subsequent to that of Alexander; nor was it until many years after that event that the marriage of Philip with Cleopatra, the niece of Attalus (B. C. 337), led to an open rupture between him and Olympias. The latter took refuge at the court of her brother Alexander, king of Epeirus, whom she stimulated to engage in war with Macedonia, at the same time that she continued to foment the intrigues of her son and his partisans at the court of Philip. She appears to have been the prime mover of the scheme for the marriage of Alexander with the daughter of Pixodarus, which gave especial offence to Philip; and it was even generally believed that she lent her countenance and support to the assassination of the king by Pausanias, B. C. 336. It is, however, hardly credible that she evinced her approbation of that deed in the open manner asserted by some writers. (Plut. Alex. 2, 9, 10; Justin. ix. 5, 7 xi. 11; Athen. xiii. p. 557, c.)

After the death of Philip she returned to Macedonia, where she enjoyed the highest consideration and influence through the affection and filial reverence of Alexander; of which she soon after took an unworthy advantage by availing herself of the absence of the young king to put to death her rival Cleopatra, together with her infant daughter; an act of cruelty which excited the vehement indignation of Alexander. (Plut. Alex. 10; Justin. ix. 7; Paus. viii. 7. § 7). It is, indeed, a remarkable trait in the character of the latter that while he was throughout his life conspicuous for his warm attachment to his mother, he did not allow himself to be blinded to her faults: during his campaigns in Asia he maintained a constant correspondence with her, and lost no opportunity of showing her respect and attention; but her frequent complaints and representations against his personal friends, especially Hephaestion, remained unheeded, and he strictly forbade her to interfere in political affairs, or encroach upon the province of Antipater in the government of Macedonia. In this respect, however, his injunctions were ineffectual: Olympias and Antipater were continually engaged in the bitterest feuds, and their letters to Alexander in Asia were uniformly filled with complaints and recriminations against each other. Whether the representations of Olympias concerning the ambitious character and dangerous designs of the regent had really produced any effect upon the mind of the king, or that he deemed it best to put an end to these bickerings and jealousies by the separation of the parties, it is certain that Craterus had been appointed to succeed Antipater in the regency of Macedonia, while the latter was to conduct an army of fresh levies to Babylon, when the death of Alexander himself (B. C. 323) caused an entire change of arrangements. (Arr. Anab. vii. 12; Plut. Alex. 39, 68; Diod. xvii. 32, 114, 118; Justin. xii. 14.) By that event Antipater was placed in the undisputed control of affairs in Macedonia and Greece, and Olympias deemed it prudent to withdraw herself beyond the sphere of his power: she accordingly took refuge in Epeirus, where she urged her cousin Aeacides to join the league of the Greeks against Antipater. (Paus. i. 11. § 3.) But the Epeirots refused to follow their king, and the victory of Antipater and Craterus over their confederates for a time crushed the hopes of Olympias. Her restless ambition and her bitter hatred to the Macedonian regent soon prompted her to fresh schemes. Leonnatus, in whom she had hoped to raise up a rival to Antipater, had fallen in the Lamian war [LEONNATUS], and she now turned her views towards Perdiccas, to whom she offered the hand of her daughter Cleopatra, in order to withdraw him from his projected union with Nicaea, the daughter of Antipater. (Arrian, ap. Phot. p. 70, a.) Perdiccas, however, did not judge it prudent as yet to break off the proposed alliance, though he secretly determined to marry Cleopatra: but his death in Egypt the following year (B. C. 321), put an end to all hopes from that quarter. Olympias, in consequence, continued to live, as it were, in exile in Epeirus until the death of her old enemy Antipater (B. C. 319) presented a new opening to her ambition. Her very name, as the mother of Alexander, still carried much weight with the Macedonians, and her alliance was now eagerly courted by the new regent Polysperchon, who stood in need of her support against Cassander; and he sent her an honourable embassy, imploring her to return to Macedonia, and undertake the charge of the young prince Alexander, the son of Roxana. She, however, followed the advice of Eumenes, that she should remain in Epeirus until the fortune of the war was decided, and contented herself with interposing the weight of her name and authority in favour of Polysperchon in Greece, and of Eumenes in Asia. (Diod. xviii. 49, 57, 58, 62, 65.) For a time, indeed, fortune appeared to be unfavourable: the disasters of Polysperchon in Greece, and the alliance concluded by Eurydice with Cassander, gave a decided preponderance to the opposite party. But in B. C. 317, Olympias determined to take a more vigorous part in the contest, and took the field in person, together with Polysperchon, at the head of an army furnished by the king of Epeirus. Eurydice met them with equal daring; but when the mother of Alexander appeared on the field, surrounded by a train in bacchanalian style, the Macedonians at once declared in her favour, and Eurydice, abandoned by her own troops, fled to Amphipolis, where she soon after fell into the hands of her implacable rival, and was put to death, together with her unfortunate husband, the puppet king Arrhidaeus [EURYDICE]. Not content with this unnecessary act of cruelty, Olympias followed up her vengeance by the execution of Nicanor, the brother of Cassander, as well as of an hundred of his leading partisans among the Macedonian nobles, and even wreaked her fury upon the lifeless remains of his brother Iollas. (Diod. xix. 11; Justin. xiv. 5; Athen. xiii. p. 560, f.; Paus. i. 11. § 4; Plut. Alex. 77; Ael. V. H. xiii. 35.) But her sanguinary triumph was of short duration: her cruelties alienated the minds of the Macedonians, and Cassander, who was at that time in the Peloponnese, hastened to raise the siege of Tegea, in which he was engaged, and turn his arms against Macedonia. Olympias on his approach threw herself (together with Roxana and the young Alexander) into Pydna, where she trusted to be able to hold out until Polysperchon or Aeacides should come to her relief; but Cassander succeeded in cutting off all succours from without, and kept the city closely blockaded both by sea and land throughout the winter. At length in the spring of 316, after suffering the utmost extremities of famine, Olympias was compelled by the increasing discontent of the garrison to surrender to Cassander, stipulating only that her life should be spared. But notwithstanding this promise, the conqueror caused her to be arraigned before the assembly of the Macedonians for her late executions, and condemned to death without being allowed a hearing. Olympias in vain protested against the sentence, and demanded to be heard in her own defence. Cassander feared the effect which her personal appearance might produce, and despatched a body of soldiers to put her to death. Even these men, awed by her daring and majestic carriage, hesitated to fulfil their orders, but the friends of the Macedonians whom she had so lately put to death, rushed in and despatched her with many wounds. She met her fate with a fortitude and dignity worthy of the mother of Alexander. Cassander is said to have denied the rites of sepulture to her remains. (Diod. xix. 35, 36, 49—51; Justin. xiv. 6; Paus. ix. 7. § 2; Polyaen. iv. 11. § 3; Aelian. H. N. xii. 6; Euseb. Arm. p. 155.) Of her character it is unnecessary to speak, after the events above related: she was certainly not without something of the grandeur and loftiness of spirit which distinguished her son, but her ungovernable passions led her to acts of sanguinary cruelty that must for ever disgrace her name. Her life was made the subject of a separate biography by Amyntianus, a writer in the reign of M. Aurelius. (Phot. Bibl. p. 97, a.)

2. Daughter of Pyrrhus I. king of Epeirus, and wife of her own brother Alexander II. After his death she assumed the regency of the kingdom on behalf of her two sons, Pyrrhus and Ptolemy; and in order to strengthen herself against the Aetolians gave her daughter Phthia in marriage to Demetrius II. king of Macedonia. By this alliance she secured herself in the possession of the sovereignty, which she continued to administer till her sons were grown up to manhood, when she resigned it into the hands of Pyrrhus. But the deaths of that prince and his brother Ptolemy followed in quick succession, and Olympias herself died of grief for her double loss. (Justin. xxviii. 3.) Such is Justin's statement: according to another account Olympias had poisoned a Leucadian damsel named Tigris, to whom her son Pyrrhus was attached, and was herself poisoned by him in revenge. (Athen. xiii. p. 589, f; Helladius, ap. Phot. p. 530, a.)

3. Daughter of Polycletus of Larissa, was the wife of Demetrius, surnamed the Handsome, by whom she became the mother of Antigonus Doson, afterwards king of Macedonia. (Euseb. Arm. p. 161.) [E. H. B.]

OLY'MPIAS, a female painter, of whom Pliny knew nothing more than that she instructed Autobulus. (H. N. xxxv. 11. s. 40. § 43.) [P. S.]

OLY'MPICUS (Ὀλυμπικός), sometimes called Olympiacus, but probably incorrectly, a physician of Miletus, who belonged to the sect of the Methodici, though he did not embrace all their doctrines. (Galen, Introd. c. 4, vol. xiv. p. 684.) He was the tutor of Apollonius of Cyprus (Galen, De Meth. Med. i. 7, vol. x. p. 54), and therefore lived in the first century after Christ. Galen does not appear to have thought very highly of him, as he calls him "a frivolous (ληρώδης) person" (Ibid. p. 53), and criticizes severely his definition of the words ὑγιεία and πάθος. (Ibid. pp. 54, &c. 67, &c.) [W. A. G.]

OLY'MPION (Ὀλυμπίων), an ambassador sent by Gentius, the Illyrian king, to Perseus, in B.C. 168. (Polyb. xxix. 2, 3; Liv. xliv. 23.) [GENTIUS; PERSEUS.]

OLYMPIODO'RUS (Ὀλυμπιόδωρος), historical. 1. An Athenian, the son of Lampon. He commanded a body of 300 picked Athenian troops at the battle of Plataeae. When the Megarians were being hard pressed by the Persian cavalry before the general engagement, this body of Athenians undertook to relieve them, a service from which all the other Greeks shrank. (Herod. ix. 21; Plut. Aristid. p. 327, a.).

2. An Athenian, against whom a law-suit was brought by his brother-in-law, Callistratus, respecting an inheritance left by a man named Conon. Demosthenes wrote the speech κατὰ Ὀλυμπιοδώρου for Callistratus on this occasion. The particulars of the dispute are detailed in the speech, to which the reader is referred.

3. An Athenian general and statesman of considerable ability. When Cassander made his attempt upon Athens in B. C. 298, Olympiodorus sailed to Aetolia, and induced the Aetolians to send assistance to Athens; and Cassander was compelled to withdraw his forces. Shortly afterwards, when Elatea, which had been conquered by Cassander, revolted from him, it was mainly through Olympiodorus that it was enabled to hold out against his troops. Subsequently, in B. C. 288, when Demetrius was stripped of his kingdom by Lysimachus and Pyrrhus, a small number of the Athenians, with Olympiodorus at their head, resolved to rid the city of the Macedonian garrison which Demetrius had posted in Athens in the fortress of the Museum after his conquest of the city, and which still remained faithful to him. The Athenians readily joined Olympiodorus and his confederates, and the Museum was carried by storm. Peiraeus and Munychia were also recovered, and Olympiodorus, at the head of a small body of troops which he raised at Eleusis, put to flight a body of troops in the service of Demetrius, who were ravaging the plain. Demetrius invested Athens, but was compelled by the approach of Pyrrhus to raise the siege, and shortly afterwards crossed over into Asia Minor. It was probably this Olympiodorus who was archon eponymus in B. C. 294. There was a statue of him on the Acropolis. (Paus. i. 25. § 2, i. 29. § 13, x. 18. § 7, x. 34. § 3.) [C. P. M.]

OLYMPIODO'RUS (Ὀλυμπιόδωρος), literary. 1. A writer mentioned by Pliny amongst those from whom he drew materials for the 12th book of his Natural History.

2. A disciple of Theophrastus, with whom was deposited one of the copies of his will. (Diog. Laërt. v. 57.)

3. An historical writer, a native of Thebes in Egypt, who lived in the fifth century after Christ. He wrote a work in 22 books, entitled Ἱστορικοὶ λόγοι, which comprised the history of the Western empire under the reign of Honorius, from A. D. 407 to October, A. D. 425 (Clinton, Fast. Rom. anno 425). Olympiodorus took up the history from about the point at which Eunapius had ended. [EUNAPIUS.]

The original work of Olympiodorus is lost, but an abridgment of it has been preserved by Photius (Cod. 80), who describes the style of the work as being clear, but without force or vigour, loose, and descending to vulgarity, so as not to merit being called a history. Of this Photius thinks that the author himself was aware, and that for this reason he spoke of his work as being not a history, but a collection of materials for a history (ὕλη συγγραφῆς). It was dedicated to the emperor Theodosius II. Olympiodorus seems to have had better qualifications as a statesman than as a writer; and in various missions and embassies amongst barbarian states he rendered important services to the empire, for which the highest honours were conferred upon him by the Roman senate (Photius, Cod. 214. p. 171, ed. Bekker.) He was sent by Honorius on an embassy to the Huns, probably to Hungary. After the death of Honorius Olympiodorus removed to Byzantium, to the court of the emperor Theodosius. Hierocles dedicated to this Olympiodorus his work on providence and fate [HIEROCLES], the groundwork or idea of which he professes to have derived from him. Photius states that Olympiodorus was a ποιητής, that is, an alchymist. It has been supposed that this statement has arisen from a confusion between this and some other man of the same name. But Photius distinctly makes the statement on the authority of Olympiodorus himself (ὡς αὐτός φησι). It appears, from what Photius has preserved of his writings, that he was a heathen.

The abridgment by Photius has been several times published: by Phil. Labbeus, in his Eclogae Histor. de Rebus Byzant.; by Sylburg, in his Collectio Scriptorum Hist. Rom. Minorum; by Andreas Schottus, in his Eclogae Historicorum de Rebus Byzantinis; and, in conjunction with Dexippus, Eunapius, and other historical fragments, by Niebuhr, Bonn, 1829. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. x. pp. 632, 703.)

4. A peripatetic philosopher, who taught at Alexandria, where Proclus was one of his pupils and speedily attracted the attention of Olympiodorus, who was so much attached to him that he wished to betroth his daughter to him. Owing to the rapidity of his utterance and the difficulty of the subjects on which he treated, he was understood by very few. When his lectures were concluded, Proclus used to repeat the topics treated of in them for the benefit of those pupils who were slower in catching the meaning of their master. Olympiodorus had the reputation of being an eloquent man and a profound thinker. Nothing of his has come down to us in a written form. (Marinus, Vita Procli, c. 9; Suidas, s. v.; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. x. p. 628.)

5. A philosopher of the Platonic school, a contemporary of Isidorus of Pelusium, who in one of his letters (ii. 256) reproaches him for neglecting the precepts of Plato, and spending an indolent life. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iii. p. 180.)

6. The last philosopher of any celebrity in the Neo-Platonic school of Alexandria. He lived in the first half of the sixth century after Christ, in the reign of the emperor Justinian. He was a younger contemporary, and possibly a pupil, of Damascius; the partiality which he uniformly shows for him, and the preference which he gives him even above Proclus, seem to indicate this. Our knowledge of Olympiodorus is derived from those works of his which have come down to us. From a passage in his scholia to the Alcibiades Prior of Plato, Creuzer has acutely inferred that he taught before the Athenian school was finally suppressed by Justinian, that is, before A. D. 529; though the confiscations to which the philosophers were being subjected are alluded to. And in various other passages the philosophy of Proclus and Damascius is spoken of as still in existence. From what we have of the productions of Olympiodorus he appears to have been an acute and clear thinker, and, if not strikingly original, far from being a mere copyist, though he follows Damascius pretty closely. He was a man of extensive reading, and a great deal of valuable matter from the lost writings of other philosophers, as Iamblichus, Syrianus, Damascius, and others, with historical and mythological notices, have come down to us through him at second hand. In his sketches of the general plan and object of the dialogues of Plato, and of their dramatic construction and the characters introduced, he exhibited great ability. A great deal that is valuable is also to be found in his analyses of the philosophical expressions of Plato. His style, as might have been expected, is marked by several of the solecisms of his age, but exhibits in the main a constant endeavour after purity and accuracy. His scholia, as we have them, were put into a written form by his pupils, from notes which they took of his lectures, and are distributed into πράξεις, or lessons. The inscriptions which precede the scholia state that they were written ἀπὸ φωνῆς Ολυμπιοδώρου τοῦ μεγάλου φιλοσόφου. This will probably account for many of the defects of style observable in Olympiodorus. Of his compositions there have come down to us a life of Plato; a polemical work against Strato (in MS. at Munich); and scholia on the Gorgias, Philebus, Phaedo, and Alcibiades I. of Plato. Whether these were all the works of Plato on which he commented, or not, we do not know. The life of Plato was published in Wetstein's edition of Diogenes Laërtius, in 1692, from the posthumous papers of Is. Casaubon. It was again published by Etwall, in his edition of three of Plato's dialogues, Lond. 1771; and by Fischer, in his edition of some dialogues of Plato, Leipzig, 1783. Some of the more important scholia on the Phaedo were published by Nathan Forster, Oxford, 1752; by Fischer (l. c.); and in a more complete form, by Mystoxides and Schinas, in their Συλλογὴ Ἑλληνικῶν ἀνεκδότων, Venice, 1816. The scholia to the Gorgias were published by Routh, in his edition of the Euthydemus and Gorgias, Oxford, 1784; those to the Philebus by Stallbaum, in his edition of Plato, Leipzig, 1826; those on the Alcibiades by Creuzer, Frankfort, 1821. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. x. p. 631.)

7. An Aristotelic philosopher, the author of a commentary on the Meteorologica of Aristotle, which is still extant. He himself (p. 37, 6) speaks of Alexandria as his residence, and (p. 12, 6) mentions the comet which appeared in the 281st year of the Diocletian era (A. D. 565), so that the period when he lived is fixed to the latter half of the sixth century after Christ. His work, like the scholia of the Neo-Platonic philosopher of the same name, is divided into πράξεις; from which it would seem that the Aristotelic philosophy was taught at Alexandria even after the Neo-Platonic school had become extinct. Like Simplicius, to whom, however, he is inferior, he endeavours to reconcile Plato and Aristotle. Of Proclus he speaks with great admiration, styling him ὁ θεῖος; but his great authority is Ammonius. His commentary was published by the sons of Aldus, at Venice, 1551. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. x. p. 628, &c., who gives a list of the authors quoted by him.)

8. Surnamed Diaconus or Monachus, an ecclesiastic who lived in the sixth century. He sustained the office of diaconus in Alexandria. He is mentioned with commendation by Anastasius Sinaita, who flourished not later than A. D. 680—700. He wrote commentaries on the books of Job, Ezra, Jeremiah, and Ecclesiastes. The notes on Job, entitled Hypotheses in Librum Jobi, were published in a Latin translation, by Paulus Comitolus, Venice, 1587; and, with those on Jeremiah, in the Catenae Patrum Graecorum. The commentary on Ecclesiastes was published in Greek in the Auctarium Ducaeanum Bibliothecae Patrum, Paris, 1624. Latin translations of it have been several times published. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. x. p. 627; Hoffmann, Lex. Bibl. vol. ii. p. 158.) [C. P. M.]

OLYMPIO'STHENES (Ὀλυμπιοσθένης), a sculptor, whose country is unknown, made three of the statues of the Muses, which were set up on Mt. Helicon, and the other six of which were made by Cephisodotus and Strongylion. (Paus. ix. 30. § 1.) It may safely be inferred that the three artists were contemporary; but, looking only at the passage of Pausanias, it is doubtful whether the elder or the younger Cephisodotus is meant. It appears, however, from other evidence that Strongylion was a contemporary of Praxiteles, and therefore of the elder Cephisodotus. [STRONGYLION.] According to this, the date of Olympiosthenes would be about B. C. 370. [P. S.]

OLY'MPIUS (Ὀλύμπιος), the Olympian, occurs as a surname of Zeus (Hom. Il. i. 353), Heracles (Herod. ii. 44), the Muses (Olympiades, Il. ii. 491), and in general of all the gods that were believed to live in Olympus, in contradistinction from the gods of the lower world. (Il. i. 399; comp. Paus. i. 18. § 7, v. 14. § 6, vi. 20. § 2.) [L. S.]

OLY'MPIUS (Ὀλύμπιος), a lawyer, born probably at Tralles in Lydia, in the sixth century after Christ. His father's name was Stephanus, who was a physician (Alex. Trall. De Medic. iv. 1, p. 198); one of his brothers was the physician Alexander Trallianus; another the architect and mathematician Anthemius; and Agathias mentions (Hist. v. p. 149, ed. 1660) that his other two brothers, Metrodorus and Dioscorus, were both eminent in their several professions. [W. A. G.]

OLY'MPIUS NEMESIA'NUS. [NEMESIANUS.]

OLYMPUS (Ὄλυμπος). 1. A teacher of Zeus, after whom the god is said to have been called the Olympian. (Diod. iii. 73.)

2. The father of Marsyas. (Apollod. i. 4. § 2.)

3. A disciple of Marsyas, and a celebrated flute-player of Phrygia. For a further account of this personage, who is closely connected with the historical Olympus, see the following article.

4. The father of Cius, from whom Mount Olympus in Mysia was believed to have received its name. (Schol. ad Theocr. xiii. 30.)

5. A son of Heracles by Euboea. (Apollod. ii. 7. § 8.)

6. Olympus, the abode of the gods also requires a few words of comment in this place. Mount Olympus is situated in the north-east of Thessaly, and is about 6,000 feet high; on its summit which rises above the clouds of heaven, and is itself cloudless, Hephaestus had built a town with gates, which was inhabited by Zeus and the other gods. (Od. vi. 42, Il. xi. 76.) The palace of Zeus contained an assembly-hall, in which met not only the gods of Olympus, but those also who dwelt on the earth or in the sea. (Il. xx. 5.) This celestial mountain must indeed be distinguished from heaven; but as the gods lived in the city which rose above the clouds and into heaven, they lived at the same time in heaven, and the gates of the celestial city were at the same time regarded as the gates of heaven. (Il. v. 749, &c.) [L. S.]

OLYMPUS (Ὄλυμπος), the physician in ordinary to Cleopatra, queen of Egypt, who aided her in committing suicide, B. C. 30, and afterwards published an account of her death. (Plut. Anton. c. 82.) [W. A. G.]

of whom the first is mythical, and the last historical: the second probably owes his existence only to some mistake of Suidas, or the writer whom he copied, since Plutarch who is a much better authority only recognizes two musicians of the name; both of whom are connected with the auletic music, which had its origin in Phrygia. (Plut. de Mus. p. 1133, d. e.)

1. The elder Olympus belongs to the mythical genealogy of Mysian and Phrygian flute-players —Hyagnis, Marsyas, Olympus—to each of whom the invention of the flute was ascribed, and under whose names we have the mythical representation of the contest between the Phrygian auletic and the Greek citharoedic music: some writers made him the father (instead of son, or disciple, and favourite of Marsyas), but the genealogy given above was that more generally received. Olympus was said to have been a native of Mysia, and to have lived before the Trojan war. The compositions ascribed to him were νόμοι εἰς τοὺς θεούς, that is, old melodies appropriated to the worship of particular gods, the origin of which was so ancient as to be unknown, like those which were attributed to Olen and Philammon. Olympus not unfrequently appears on works of art, as a boy, sometimes instructed by Marsyas, and sometimes as witnessing and lamenting his fate. (Suid. s. v.; Plut. de Mus. pp. 1132, e., 1133, e.; Apollod. i. 4. § 2; Hygin. Fab. 165, 273; Ovid, Metam. vi. 393, Eleg. iii. 3; MARSYAS.) It may fairly be assumed that this elder and mythical Olympus was invented through some mistake respecting the younger and really historical Olympus. (Respecting this confusion, see Müller, History of Greek Literature, p. 156.)

2. The true Olympus was a Phrygian, and perhaps belonged to a family of native musicians, since he was said to be descended from the first Olympus. Müller supposes that there was an hereditary race of flute-players at the festivals of the Phrygian Mother of the Gods, who claimed a descent from the mythical Olympus. He is placed by Plutarch at the head of auletic music, as Terpander stood at the head of the citharoedic: and on account of his inventions in the art, Plutarch even assigns to him, rather than to Terpander, the honour of being the father of Greek music, ἀρχηγὸς τῆς Ἑλληνικῆς καὶ καλῆς μουσικῆς (De Mus. pp. 1133, e., 1135, c.). With respect to his age, Suidas places him under a king Midas, son of Gordius; but this tells us nothing, for these were alternately the names of all the Phrygian kings to the time of Croesus. Müller places him, for satisfactory reasons, after Terpander and before Thaletas, that is, between the 30th and 40th Olympiads, B. C. 660—620. Though a Phrygian by origin, Olympus must be reckoned among the Greek musicians; for all the accounts make Greece the scene of his artistic activity, and his subjects Greek; and he had Greek disciples, such as Crates and Hierax. (Plut. de Mus. pp. 1133, e., 1140, d.; Poll. iv. 79.) He may, in fact, be considered as having naturalized in Greece the music of the flute, which had previously been almost peculiar to Phrygia. This species of music admitted of much greater variations than that of the lyre; and, accordingly, several new inventions are ascribed to Olympus. The greatest of his inventions was that of the third system, or genus, of music, the Enharmonic, for an explanation of which see Dict of Ant. s. v. Music.

Of the particular tunes (νόμοι) ascribed to him, the most important was the Ἁρμάτιος νόμος, a mournful and passionate strain, of the rhythm of which we are enabled to form an idea from a passage in the Orestes of Euripides, which was set to it, as the passage itself tells us. A dirge, also, in honour of the slain Python, was said to have been played by Olympus, at Delphi, on the flute, and in the Lydian style. Aristophanes mentions a mournful strain, set to more flutes than one (ξυναυλία), as well known at Athens under the name of Olympus. (Equit. 9; comp. Schol. and Brunck's note). But it can hardly be supposed that his music was all mournful; the nome in honour of Athena, at least, must have been of a different character. Some ancient writers ascribe to him the Nomos Orthios, which Herodotus attributes to Arion.

Olympus was a great inventor in rhythm as well as in music. To the two existing species of rhythm, the ἴσον, in which the arsis and thesis are equal (as in the Dactyl and Anapaest), and the διπλάσιον, in which the arsis is twice the length of the thesis (as in the Iambus and Trochee), he added a third, the ἡμιόλιον, in which the length of the arsis is equal to two short syllables, and that of the thesis to three, as in the Cretic foot (⏑ – ⏑ –), the Paeons (⏑ – ⏑ ⏑, &c.), and the Bacchic foot (– ⏑ – ⏑), though there is some doubt whether the last form was used by Olympus.

There is no mention of any poems composed by Olympus. It is argued by some writers that the inseparable connection between the earliest compositions in music and poetry forbids the supposition that he composed music without words. Without entering into this difficult and extensive question, it is enough to observe that, whatever words may have been originally connected with his music, they were superseded by the compositions of later poets. Of the lyric poets who adapted their compositions to the nomes of Olympus, the chief was STESICHORUS of Himera. (Plutarch de Mus. passim; Müller, Ulrici, Bode, and a very elaborate article by Ritschl, in Ersch and Gruber's Encyklopädie.) [P. S.]

OLYMPUS (Ὄλυμπος), a statuary, whose country is unknown, and respecting whose date it can only be said that he lived later than the 80th Olympiad, B. C. 460 [OEBOTAS]. He made the statue at Olympia of the pancratiast Xenophon, the son of Menephylus, of Aegium of Achaea. (Paus. vi. 3. § 5. s. 14.) [P. S.]

OLY'NTHIUS, an architect, who is said to have assisted Cleomenes in the building of Alexandria. (Jul. Valer. de R. G. Alex. i. 21, 23; Müller, Archäol. d. Kunst, § 149, n. 2.) [P. S.]

OLYNTHUS (Ὄλυνθος), a son of Heracles and Bolbe, from whom the Thracian town of Olynthus, and the river Olynthus near the Chalcidian town of Apollonia, were believed to have received their name. (Steph. Byz. s. v.; Athen. viii. p. 334; Conon, Narrat. 4, where another person of the same name is mentioned.) [L. S.]

OMA'DIUS (Ὠμάδιος), that is, the flesh-eater, a surname of Dionysus, to whom human sacrifices were offered in Chios and Tenedos. (Orph. Hymn. 51. 7; Porphyr. de Abstin. ii. 55.) [L. S.]

OMIAS (Ὠμίας), a Lacedaemonian, was the chief of the ten commissioners who were sent to Philip V., king of Macedon, then at Tegea (B. C. 220), to give assurances of fidelity, and to represent the recent tumult at Sparta, in which the Ephor Adeimantus and others of the Macedonian party had been murdered, as having originated with Adeimantus himself. Philip, having heard Omias and his colleagues, rejected the advice of some of his counsellors, to deal severely with Sparta, and sent Petraeus, one of his friends, to accompany the commissioners back, and to exhort the Lacedaemonians to abide steadfastly by their alliance with him. (Polyb. iv. 22—25.) [E. E.]

O'MBRIMUS. [OBRIMUS.]

O'MBRIUS (Ὄμβριος), i. e. the rain-giver, a surname of Zeus, under which he had an altar on Mount Hymettus in Attica. (Paus. i. 32. § 3; comp. Hes. Op. et Di. 587, 620.) [L. S.]

O'MPHALE (Ὀμφάλη), a daughter of the Lydian king Jardanus, and wife of Tmolus, after whose death she undertook the government herself. When Heracles, in consequence of the murder of Iphitus, was ill of a serious disease, and received the oracle that he could not be released unless he served some one for wages for the space of three years, Hermes, accordingly, sold Heracles to Omphale, by whom he became the father of several children. (Apollod. i. 9. § 19, ii. 6. § 3, 7. § 8; Soph. Trach. 253; Dionys. i. 28; Lucian, Dial. Deor. xiii. 2; comp. HERACLES.) [L. S.]

OMPHA'LION (Ὀμφαλίων), painter, was originally the slave, and afterwards the disciple, of Nicias, the son of Nicomedes. He painted the walls of the temple of Messene with figures of personages celebrated in the mythological legends of Messenia. (Paus. iv. 31. § 9. s. 11, 12.) [P. S.]

ONAETHUS (Ὄναιθος), a statuary of unknown time and country, who, with his brother Thylacus and their sons, made the statue of Zeus, which the Megarians dedicated at Olympia. (Paus. v. 23. § 4. s. 5.) [P. S.]

ONASIAS. [ONATAS.]

ONASIME'DES (Ὀνασιμήδης), a statuary, who made a statue of Dionysus, of solid bronze, which Pausanias saw at Thebes. (Paus. ix. 12. § 3. s. 4). [P. S.]

ONA'SIMUS (Ὀνάσιμος), son of Apsines, was an historian, or rather a sophist, of Cyprus or Sparta, in the time of the emperor Constantine the Great. He wrote many works, some of which, bearing on the art of rhetoric, are enumerated by Suidas. (Suid. s. vv. Ἀψίνης, Ὀνάσιμος.) [E. E.]

O'NASUS (Ὄνασος), the author of a work on the Amazons, entitled Ἀμαζονίς or Ἀμαζονικά, which was supposed by Heyne (ad Apollod. ii. 5. § 9) and others to have been an epic poem; but it has been observed by Welcker (Epische Cyclus, p. 320) and Grote (Hist. of Greece, vol. i. p. 288), that we may infer from the rationalising tendency of the citation from it (Schol. ad Theocr. xiii. 46; Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. i. 1207, 1236), that it was in prose.

ONA'TAS (Ὀνάτας) of Aegina, the son of Micon, was a distinguished statuary and painter, contemporary with Polygnotus, Ageladas, and Hegias. From the various notices of him it may be collected that he flourished down to about Ol. 80, B. C. 460, that is, in the age immediately preceding that of Phidias. It is uncertain whether his father Micon was the great painter of that name.

The works of Onatas are frequently described by Pausanias, who is, however, the only ancient writer who mentions him, with the exception of a single epigram in the Greek anthology. Pausanias also says that, though he called himself an Aeginetan on his works, he was inferior to none of the artists from Daedalus and the Attic school (v. 25. § 7. s. 13: Τὸν δὲ Ὀνάταν τοῦτον ὅμως, καὶ τέχνης ἐς τὰ ἀγάλματα ὄντα Αἰγιναίας, οὐδενὸς ὕστερον θήσομεν τῶν ἀπὸ Δαιδάλου τε καὶ ἐργαστηρίου τοῦ Ἀττικοῦ). Pausanias mentions the following works of Onatas:—

1. A bronze statue of Heracles, on a bronze base, dedicated at Olympia by the Thasians. The statue was ten cubits high: in the right hand was a club, in the left a bow: and it bore the following inscription (Paus. l. c.):—

Υἱὸς μέν με Μίκωνος Ὀνάτας ἐξετέλεσσεν,
Αὐτὸς ἐν Αἰγίνῃ δώματα ναιετάων.

2. An Apollo at Pergamus, equally admired for its size and its art (viii. 42. § 4. s. 7). This statue was in all probability different from that of Apollo Boupais, attended by Eileithyia, on which we have an epigram by Antipater. (Anth. Pal. ix. 238; Brunck, Anal. vol. ii. p. 14.)

3. A Hermes, carrying a ram under his wing, wearing a helmet on his head, and clad in a chiton and chlamys. It was dedicated at Olympia by the people of Pheneus in Arcadia; and the inscription stated that it was made by Onatas the Aeginetan, in conjunction with Calliteles, whom Pausanias takes for a son or disciple of Onatas (v. 27. § 5. s. 8).

4. A bronze statue of the Black Demeter with the horse's head, whose legend is related by Pausanias (viii. 42). The seat of the legend was a cave in Mount Elaeus, near Phigaleia, which the Phigaleians had consecrated to the goddess, and had dedicated in it a wooden image, like a woman, except that it had the head and mane of a horse, and figures of dragons and other wild beasts were growing out about the head: it was clothed in a tunic down to the feet; and bore on the right hand a dolphin, and on the left a dove. This wooden image having been burnt at some unknown period, it was not only not replaced, but the worship of the goddess was neglected; until the Phigaleians, warned by the failure of their crops, and instructed by a Pythian oracle, employed Onatas to make a bronze statue of the goddess; in the execution of which he was assisted somewhat by a picture or a wooden copy of the old image, but still more by dreams. (Paus. l. c.) This story is one of several indications of the thoroughly archaic style of the works of Onatas.

Passing from the statues of gods to those of men and heroes, we have

5. The bronze statues of the Grecian heroes casting lots to determine which of them should accept the challenge of Hector. (Hom. Il. vii. 175—184.) The group was dedicated at Olympia by the Achaeans in common. It consisted originally of ten figures; but when Pausanias saw it, there were only nine, the statue of Ulysses having been carried to Rome by Nero. The chieftains, armed with spears and shields, stood together near the great temple, and opposite to them, on a separate base, stood Nestor, holding the helmet into which the lots had been thrown. The name of Agamemnon was inscribed on his statue, in letters from right to left. The other statues bore no names; but one, distinguished by a cock upon the shield, was taken by Pausanias for Idomeneus; and on the inside of the shield of this statue was the following inscription:—

Πολλὰ μὲν ἄλλα σοφοῦ ποιήματα καὶ τόδ' Ὀνάτα
Ἔργον, ὃς Αἰγίνῃ γείνατο παῖδα Μίκων.

There is no authority for ascribing to Onatas more than this one statue in the group. (Paus v. 25. § 5. s. 8—10.)

6. The bronze chariot, with a figure of a man in it, which was dedicated at Olympia by Deinomenes, the son of Hieron, in memory of his father's victories. On each side of the chariot were riding-horses, with figures of boys upon them; these were made by Calamis. (Paus. vi. 12. § 1, viii. 42. § 4. s. 8.) This work is one authority for the date of Onatas, since Hieron died B. C. 467.

7. A group dedicated at Delphi by the Tarentines, being the tithe of the booty taken by them in a war with the Peucetii. The statues, which were the work of Onatas and Calynthus (but the passage is here corrupt), represented horse and foot soldiers intermixed; Opis, the king of the Iapygians, and the ally of the Peucetians, was seen prostrate, as if slain in the battle, and standing over him were the hero Taras and the Lacedaemonian Phalanthus, near whom was a dolphin. (Paus. x. 13. § 5. s. 10.)

Onatas was a painter, as well as a statuary; but only one of his works is mentioned: this one, however, forms another authority for his date, and proves the estimation in which he was held; for he was employed in conjunction with Polygnotus to decorate the temple in which this picture was painted. The temple was that of Athena Areia at Plataeae, and the picture, which was painted on one of the walls of the portico (pronaos), represented the expedition of the Argive chieftains against Thebes; Euryganeia, the mother of Eteocles and Polyneices (according to the tradition which Pausanias followed), was introduced into the picture, lamenting the mutual fratricide of her sons. (Paus. ix. 4. § 1. s. 2, 5. § 5. s. 11): it should be observed, however, that in the second passage the MSS. have Ὀνασίας, which Sylburg corrected into Ὀνάτας, on the authority of the first passage; see also Müller, Aeginetica, p. 107: but Bekker and Dindorf, on the contrary, correct the former passage by the latter, and read Ὀνασίας in both.)

The scattered information of Pausanias respecting Onatas has been critically gathered up by Müller and Thiersch. Rathgeber has managed to extend the subject over thirty columns of Ersch and Gruber's Encyclopädie. [P. S.]

ONATAS, a Pythagorean philosopher of Croton, from whose work, Περὶ θεοῦ καὶ θείου, some extracts are preserved by Stobaeus. (Ecl. Phys. i. 38, p. 92, &c., ed. Heeren.)

ONCA (Ὄγκα), a surname of Athena, which she derived from the town of Oncae in Boeotia, where she had a sanctuary. (Aeschyl. Sept. 166, 489; Paus. ix. 12. § 2; Schol. ad Eurip. Phoen. 1062.) [L. S.]

ONCAEUS (Ὀγκαῖος), a surname of Apollo, derived from Onceium on the river Ladon in Arcadia, where he had a temple. (Paus. viii. 25. § 5, &c.) [L. S.]

ONCHESTUS (Ὀγχηστός), a son of Poseidon, and founder of the town of Onchestus, where the Onchestian Poseidon had a temple and a statue. (Paus. ix. 26. § 3; Steph. Byz. s. v.; Hom. Il. ii. 506.) Another tradition called this Onchestus a son of Boeotus. [L. S.]

ONCUS (Ὄγκος), a son of Apollo, and founder of Onceium in Arcadia. Demeter, after being metamorphosed into a horse, mixed among his herds, and gave him the horse Arion, of which she was the mother by Poseidon. (Paus. viii. 25. § 4, &c.; comp. Steph. Byz. s. v.) [L. S.]

ONEIROS (Ὄνειρος), a personification of dream, and in the plural of dreams. According to Homer Dreams dwell on the dark shores of the western Oceanus (Od. xxiv. 12), and the deceitful dreams come through an ivory gate, while the true ones issue from a gate made of horn. (Od. xix. 562, &c.) Hesiod (Theog. 212) calls dreams the children of night, and Ovid (Met. xi. 633), who calls them children of Sleep, mentions three of them by name, viz. Morpheus, Icelus or Phobetor, and Phantasus. Euripides called them sons of Gaea, and conceived them as genii with black wings. [L. S.]

ONE'SAS (Ὀνησᾶς), a gem engraver, whose name appears on a beautiful intaglio, representing a young Hercules, crowned with laurel, and on another gem, representing a girl playing the cithara, both in the Florentine collection. (Stosch. Pierres Gravées, No. 46; Bracci, tav. 89.) [P. S.]

ONESI'CRITUS (Ὀνησίκριτος), a Greek historical writer, who accompanied Alexander on his campaigns in Asia, and wrote a history of them, which is frequently cited by later authors. He is called by some authorities a native of Astypalaea, by others of Aegina (Diog. Laërt. vi. 75, 84; Arr. Ind. 18; Aelian, H. N. xvi. 39): it was probably to this island origin that he was indebted for the skill in nautical matters which afterwards proved so advantageous to him. He must have been already advanced in years, as we are told that he had two sons grown up to manhood, when his attention was accidentally attracted to the philosophy of Diogenes the Cynic, of which he became an ardent votary, so as to have obtained a name of eminence among the disciples of that master. (Diog. Laërt. l. c.; Plut. Alex. 65.) We have no account of the circumstances which led him to accompany Alexander into Asia, nor does it appear in what capacity he attended on the conqueror; but during the expedition into India he was sent by the king to hold a conference with the Indian philosophers or Gymnosophists, the details of which have been transmitted to us from his own account of the interview. (Strab. xv. p. 715; Plut. Alex. 65.) When Alexander constructed his fleet on the Hydaspes, he appointed Onesicritus to the important station of pilot of the king's ship, or chief pilot of the fleet (ἀρχικυβερνήτης), a post which he held not only during the descent of the Indus, but throughout the long and perilous voyage from the mouth of that river to the Persian gulf. In this capacity he discharged his duties so much to the satisfaction of Alexander that, on his arrival at Susa, he was rewarded by that monarch with a crown of gold, at the same time as Nearchus. (Arr. Anab. vi. 2. § 6, vii. 5. § 9, Ind. 18; Curt. ix. 10. § 3, x. 1. § 10; Plut. Alex. 66, de Fort. Alex. p. 331, f.) Yet Arrian blames him for want of judgment, and on one occasion expressly ascribes the safety of the fleet to the firmness of Nearchus in overruling his advice. (Anab. vii. 20, Ind. 32.) We know nothing of his subsequent fortunes; but from an anecdote related by Plutarch it seems probable that he attached himself to Lysimachus, and it was perhaps at the court of that monarch that he composed his historical work (Plut. Alex. 46), though, on the other hand, a passage of Lucian (Quomodo hist. conscr. c. 40), might lead us to infer that this was at least commenced during the lifetime of Alexander himself.

We learn from Diogenes Laërtius (vi. 84) that the history of Onesicritus comprised the whole life of Alexander, including his youth and education (πῶς Ἀλέξανδρος ἤχθη); but it is most frequently cited in regard to the campaigns of that prince in Asia, or to the geographical description of the countries that he visited. Though an eye-witness of much that he described, it appears that he intermixed many fables and falsehoods with his narrative, so that he early fell into discredit as an authority. Strabo is especially severe upon him, and calls him "Οὐκ Ἀλεξάνδρου μᾶλλον ἢ τῶν παραδόξων ἀρχικυβερνήτης." (xv. p. 698, comp. ii. p. 70.) Plutarch cites him as one of those who related the fable of the visit of the Amazons to Alexander, for which he was justly ridiculed by Lysimachus (Alex. 46), and Arrian accuses him of falsely representing himself as the commander of the fleet, when he was in truth only the pilot. (Anab. vi. 2. § 6; comp. Suid. s. v. Νέαρχος). Aulus Gellius (ix. 4) even associates him with Aristeas of Proconnesus, and other purely fabulous writers. But it is clear that these censures are overcharged; and though some of the statements cited from him are certainly gross exaggerations (see for instance Strab. xv. p. 698; Aelian. H. N. xvi. 39, xvii. 6), his work appears to have contained much valuable information concerning the remote countries for the first time laid open by the expedition of Alexander. In particular he was the first author that mentioned the island of Taprobane. (Strab. xv. p. 691; Plin. H. N. vi. 24.) He is said to have imitated Xenophon in his style, though he fell short of him as a copy does of the original. (Diog. Laërt. vi. 84; Suid. s. v. Ὀνησίκριτος.) Some authors have held that besides this general history, Onesicritus had composed a separate Paraplus, or narrative of the voyage, in which he bore so prominent a part: but Geier has shown that there is no foundation for such a supposition: and it seems certain that Pliny, whose words might lead to such an inference (H. N. vi. 23 (26)), had in fact used only an extract from the work of Onesicritus, abridged or translated by Juba. Still less reason is there to infer (with Meier in Ersch and Gruber, Encycl. sect. iii. pt. iii. p. 457) that he wrote a history of the early kings of Persia, because we find him cited by Lucian (Macrob. 14) concerning the age of Cyrus.

(All the facts known concerning Onesicritus are fully discussed, and the passages quoted from his writings by various authors collected together by Geier, Alexandri Historiar. Scriptores, lib. iii. p. 74—108. See also Vossius, de Historicis Graecis, p. 94, ed Westermann; Ste Croix, Examen Critique, p. 38, &c.; and Meier, l. c.) [E. H. B.]

ONE'SILUS (Ὀνήσιλος), of Salamis in Cyprus, the son of Chersis, grandson of Siromus, and great-grandson of Evelthon. He had frequently urged his brother Gorgus, who was king of Salamis in Cyprus, to desert from the Persians; but as he was unable to persuade him to do so, he finally drove him from the city, and set up the standard of revolt with the Ionians, in B. C. 499. Gorgus fled to the Persians; Onesilus became king of Salamis, and persuaded all the other cities in Cyprus, with the exception of Amathus, to renounce their allegiance to the Persians. Thereupon Onesilus laid siege to Amathus; and as Dareius sent a large force to its relief under the command of Artybius, Onesilus begged aid of the Ionians. They readily complied with his request; and in the following year, B. C. 498, two battles were fought between the contending parties, one by sea, in which the Ionians defeated the Phoenician fleet, and the other by land, in which the Cyprians were beaten by the Persians. Onesilus fell in the battle; his head was cut off by the inhabitants of Amathus, and hung over their city-gates. At a later period, however, an oracle commanded them to take down his head and bury it, and also to offer sacrifices to him as a hero. (Herod. v. 104, 108—110.) [GORGUS, No. 2.]

ONE'SIMUS, the son of Python, a Macedonian noble, who passed over to the Romans, when Perseus resolved to declare war against the latter, B. C. 169, and received in consequence magnificent rewards from the senate. (Liv. xliv. 16.)

ONESTES, or ONESTUS (Ὀνέστης, Ὄνεστος) The Greek Anthology contains ten epigrams, inscribed Ὀνέστου in the Vatican MS.; but, as the heading of the sixth and seventh is Ὀνέστου Κορινθίου, and that of the ninth Ὀνέστου Βυζαντίου, it would seem that there were two poets of the name; but concerning neither of them have we any further information. Brunck even suspected the correctness of the name altogether; and thought it might be a mistake for Ὀνεσίας, but this supposition is founded on no evidence. Wine, love, and music are the subjects of the epigrams, which are distinguished by no particular beauty. (Brunck, Anal. vol. ii. p. 289; Jacobs, Anth. Graec. vol. iii. p. 3, vol. xiii. p. 926; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iv. p. 485.) [P. S.]

ONE'TOR (Ὀνήτωρ), the name of two mythical personages, one a priest of Zeus on Mount Ida (Hom. Il. xvi. 605), and the other the father of Phrontis, the steersman of Menelaus. (Paus. x. 25. § 2.) [L. S.]

ONOMACLES (Ὀνομακλῆς), an Athenian, was joined with Phrynichus and Scironides, B. C. 412, in the command of an Athenian and Argive force, which, after a battle with the Milesians, who were supported by Chalcideus and Tissaphernes, prepared to besiege Miletus, but on the arrival of a Peloponnesian and Sicilian fleet, sailed away to Samos, by the advice of Phrynichus. Shortly after, in the same year, when the Athenians at Samos had been reinforced, Onomacles was sent with part of the armament, and with Strombichides and Euctemon for his colleagues, to act against Chios (Thuc. viii. 25—27, 30, 33, 34, 38, 40, 55, 61). It was probably the same Onomacles who was afterwards one of the thirty tyrants, in B. C. 404 (Xen. Hell. ii. 3. § 2). We find mention made also of another Onomacles, who, together with Archeptolemus, was involved in the condemnation of ANTIPHON (Anon. Vit. Thuc.). A Spartan of the same name is recorded by Xenophon (Hell. ii. 3. § 10) as ephor ἐπώνυμος, in the eighth year of the Peloponnesian war. [E. E.]

ONOMA'CRITUS (Ὀνομάκριτος), an Athenian, who occupies an interesting position in the history of the early Greek religious poetry. Herodotus calls him χρησμολόγον τε καὶ διαθέτην χρησμῶν τῶν Μουσαίου, and informs us that he had enjoyed the patronage of Hipparchus, until he was detected by Lasus of Hermione (the dithyrambic poet) in making an interpolation in an oracle of Musaeus, for which Hipparchus banished him. He seems to have gone into Persia, where the Peisistratids, after their expulsion from Athens, took him again into favour, and employed him to persuade Xerxes to engage in his expedition against Greece, by reciting to him all the ancient oracles which seemed to favour the attempt, and suppressing those of a contrary tendency. (Herod. vii. 6.) It has been amply proved by Lobeck (Aglaoph. p. 332) and Nitzsch (Hist. Hom. p. 163), that the words of Herodotus, quoted above, mean that Onomacritus was an utterer of ancient oracles, however preserved, and that he had made a collection and arrangement of the oracles ascribed to Musaeus. And this is quite in keeping with the literary character of the age of the Peisistratidae, and with other traditions respecting Onomacritus himself, as, for example, that he made interpolations in Homer as well as in Musaeus (Schol. in Hom. Od. xi. 604*), and that he was the real author of some of the poems which went under the name of Orpheus. The account of Herodotus fixes the date of Onomacritus to about B. C. 520—485, and shows the error of those ancient writers who placed him as early as the fiftieth Olympiad, B. C. 580. (Clem. Alex. Strom. i. p. 143, Sylb.; Tatian. adv. Graec. 62, p. 38, Worth.) The account of Herodotus, respecting the forgeries of Onomacritus, is confirmed by Pausanias, who speaks of certain verses (ἔπη), which were ascribed to Musaeus, but which, in his opinion, were composed by Onomacritus, for that there was nothing which could be ascribed with certainty to Musaeus, except the hymn to Demeter which he composed for the Lycomidae. (Paus. i. 22. § 7; comp. iv. 1. § 6.) In three other passages Pausanias cites the poems of Onomacritus (ἐν τοῖς ἔπεσι), but without any intimation that they were or pretended to be any others than his own (viii. 31. § 3, 37. § 4. s. 5, ix. 35. § 1. s. 5). That Pausanias does not refer in these last passages to poems which went under the names of the old mythological bards, but were in reality composed by Onomacritus, is rendered probable by the manner in which he generally refers to such supposititious works, as in the passage first quoted (i. 22. § 7; comp. i. 14. § 3, εἰ δὴ Μουσαίου καὶ ταῦτα, and i. 37. § 4, τὰ καλούμενα Ὀρφικά): and, moreover, in two of the three passages he quotes Onomacritus in comparison with Homer and Hesiod. But if, for these reasons, the poems so quoted must be regarded as having been ascribed to Onomacritus in the time of Pausanias, it does not follow that they were, in any proper sense, the original compositions of Onomacritus; but it rather seems probable that they were remnants of ancient hymns, the authors of which were unknown, and that the labours of Onomacritus consisted simply in editing them, no doubt with interpolations of his own.

The last of the three passages quoted from Pausanias gives rise to a curious question. Pausanias quotes Hesiod as saying that the Graces were the daughters of Zeus and Eurynome, and that their names were Euphrosyne and Aglaïa and Thalia, and then adds that the same account is given in the poems of Onomacritus. Now we find in the fifty-ninth Orphic Hymn the Graces addressed thus:—

Θυγατέρες Ζηνός τε καὶ Εὐνομίης βαθυκόλπου, Ἀγλαΐη τε, Θάλεια, καὶ Εὐφροσύνη πολύολβε.

Some writers have hastily taken this as a proof that the true author of the still extant Orphic hymns was Onomacritus, or else, as others more cautiously put it, that Onomacritus was one of the authors of them, and that this hymn at least is to be ascribed to him. It proves, if anything, the direct contrary of this; for, had the hymn in question borne the name of Orpheus in the time of Pausanias, he would have so quoted it, to say nothing of the difference between the name Eurynome in Pausanias and Eunomia in the hymn. The truth is that the date of the extant Orphic hymns is centuries later than the time of Onomacritus [ORPHEUS]. That Onomacritus, however, did publish poems under the name of Orpheus, as well as of Musaeus, is probable from several testimonies, among which is that of Aristotle, who held that there never was such a poet as Orpheus, and that the poems known under his name were fabricated partly by Cercops, and partly by Onomacritus. (Cic. de Nat. Deor. i. 38; Philopon. ad Aristot. de Anim. i. 5; Suid. s. v. Ὀρφεύς; Schol. ad Aristeid. Panath. p. 165; Sext. Empir. Pyrrh. Hypotyp. iii. 4; Euseb. Praep. Evan. x. 4; Tatian. adv. Graec. 62.)

From these statements it appears that the literary character of Onomacritus must be regarded as quite subordinate to his religious position; that he was not a poet who cultivated the art for its own sake, but a priest, who availed himself of the ancient religious poems for the support of the worship to which he was attached. Of what character that worship was, may be seen from the statement of Pausanias, that "Onomacritus, taking from Homer the name of the Titans, composed (or, established, συνέθηκεν) orgies to Dionysus, and represented in his poems (ἐποίησεν) the Titans as the authors of the sufferings of Dionysus." (Paus. viii. 37. § 4. s. 5.) Here we have, in fact, the great Orphic myth of Dionysus Zagreus, whose worship it thus seems was either established or re-arranged by Onomacritus, who must therefore be regarded as one of the chief leaders of the Orphic theology, and the Orphic societies. [ORPHEUS.] Some modern writers, as Ulrici, think it probable that Onomacritus was the real author of the Orphic Theogony, to which others again assign a still earlier date. (Grote, History of Greece, vol. i. pp. 25, 29.)

There is an obscure reference in Aristotle (Polit. ii. 9) to "Onomacritus, a Locrian," the first distinguished legislator, who practised gymnastic exercises in Crete, and travelled abroad on account of the art of divination, and who was a contemporary of Thales. (See Hoeckh, Creta, vol. iii. pp. 318, &c.)

For further remarks on the literary and religious position of Onomacritus, see the Histories of Greek Literature by Müller, Bernhardy, Ulrici, and Bode; Müller, Proleg. zu einer Wissenschaftlichen Mythologie; Lobeck, Aglaophamus, and Ritschl, in Ersch and Gruber's Encyklopädie. [P. S.]

ONOMARCHUS (Ὀνόμαρχος), general of the Phocians in the Sacred War, was brother of Philomelus and son of Theotimus (Diod. xvi. 56, 61; Paus. x. 2. § 2; but see Arist. Pol. v. 4, and

* For an elaborate discussion of the relation of Onomacritus to the literary history of the Homeric poems, see Nitzsch, Erklärende Anmerkungen zu Homer's Odyssee, vol. iii. pp. 336, &c.

Thirlwall's Greece, vol. v. p. 275, not.). He commanded a division of the Phocian army under Philomelus, in the action at Tithorea, in which the latter perished ; and after the battle gathered together the remains of the Phocian army, with which he effected his retreat to Delphi. An assembly of the people was now held, in which Onomarchus strongly urged the prosecution of the war, in opposition to the counsels of the more moderate party, and succeeded in obtaining his own nomination to the chief command in the place of Philomelus, B. C. 353. He was, however, far from imitating the moderation of his predecessor: he confiscated the property of all those who were opposed to him, and squandered without scruple the sacred treasures of Delphi. The latter enabled him not only to assemble and maintain a large body of mercenary troops, but to spend large sums in bribing many of the leading persons in the hostile states ; by which means he succeeded in prevailing on the Thessalians to abandon their allies, and take up a neutral position. Thus freed from his most formidable antagonists, he was more than a match for his remaining foes. He now invaded Locris, took the town of Thronium, and compelled that of Amphissa to submit ; ravaged the Dorian Tetrapolis, and then turned his arms against Boeotia, where he took Orchomenus and laid siege to Chaeroneia, but was compelled to retreat without effecting anything more. His assistance was now requested by Lycophron, tyrant of Pherae, who was attacked by Philip, king of Macedonia ; and he at first sent his brother Phayllus into Thessaly with an army of 7000 men. But Phayllus having been defeated by Philip, Onomarchus marched with his whole forces to the support of Lycophron, defeated Philip in two successive battles, and drove him out of Thessaly. He next turned his arms a second time against the Boeotians, whom he defeated in a battle, and took the city of Coroneia, when he was recalled once more to the assistance of Lycophron, against Philip, who had again invaded Thessaly. Onomarchus hastened to support his ally with an army of 20,000 foot and 500 horse, but was met by Philip at the head of a force still more numerous, and a pitched battle ensued, in which the superiority of the Thessalian cavalry decided the victory in favour of the king. Onomarchus himself, with many of the fugitives, plunged into the sea in hopes to reach by swimming the Athenian ships under Chares, which were lying off the shore, but perished in the waves, or, according to Pausanias, by the darts of his own soldiers. His body fell into the hands of Philip, who caused it to be crucified, as a punishment for his sacrilege. His death took place in B. C. 352 (Diod. xvi. 31—33, 35, 56, 61 ; Paus. x. 2. § 5 ; Justin. viii. 1, 2 ; Polyaen. ii. 38 ; Ephorus, fr. 153, ed. Didot ; Oros. iii. 12 ; Wesseling, ad Diod. xvi. 35 ; Dem. de Fals. Leg. p. 443). We are told that Onomarchus was a man of luxurious habits, and that he made use of the sacred treasures, not only for the purposes of the state, but to minister to his own pleasures (Theopomp. ap. Athen. xiii. p. 605) ; but it is difficult to know what value to attach to such statements ; the religious character assumed by the enemies of the Phocians having led them to load with obloquy the memory of all the leaders of that people. [E. H. B.]

ONOMASTUS (Ὀνόμαστος), a confidential officer of Philip V. of Macedon, for whom he held the government of the sea-coast of Thrace, and whose instrument he was, together with CASSANDER [No. 4], in the massacre of the Maronites. Appius Claudius, and the other Roman commissioners, required that Philip should send Onomastus and Cassander to Rome to be examined about the massacre ; whereupon the king despatched Cassander, and had him poisoned on the way, but persisted in declaring that Onomastus had not been in or near Maroneia at the time ; the fact being (as Polybius and Livy tell us) that he was too deep in the royal secrets to be trusted at Rome. We hear again of Onomastus as one of the two assessors of Philip at the private trial of DEMETRIUS, for the alleged attempt on the life of his brother Perseus, B. C. 182. (Polyb. xxiii. 13, 14 ; Liv. xxxix. 34, xl. 8.) [E. E.]

ONOSANDER (Ὀνόσανδρος), the author of a celebrated work on military tactics, entitled Στρατηγικὸς λόγος, which is still extant. All subsequent Greek and Roman writers on the same subject made this work their text-book (the emperors Mauricius and Leon did little more than express in the corrupt style of their age what they found in Onosander, whom Leon calls Onesander), and it is even still held in considerable estimation. Count Moritz of Saxony professed to have derived great benefit from the perusal of a translation of it. Onosander appears to have lived about the middle of the first century after Christ. His work is dedicated to Q. Veranius, who is generally supposed to be identical with the Q. Veranius Nepos who was consul in A. D. 49. Onosander also remarks in his preface that his work was written in time of peace. It might very well have been written, therefore, between A. D. 49 and A. D. 59. If the consul of A. D. 49 was the person to whom the work was dedicated, it would agree very well with all the other data, that this Veranius accompanied Didius Gallus into Britain, and died before the expiration of a year.

Onosander was a disciple of the Platonic school of philosophy, and, according to Suidas, besides his work on tactics, wrote one Περὶ στρατηγημάτων (unless, as some suppose, the words τακτικὰ περὶ στρατηγημάτων in Suidas are a description of one and the same work, the one still extant), and a commentary on the Republic of Plato. The two latter have perished. In his style he imitated Xenophon with some success. Nothing further is known of his personal history. It is conjectured that he must himself have been engaged in military service.

Onosander's work appeared first in a Latin translation by Nicolaus Saguntinus, Rome, 1494. A French translation by Jehan Charrier appeared at Paris in 1546 ; an Italian translation by Fabio Cotta, Venice, 1546 ; and another Latin translation by Joachim Camerarius, in 1595. It was not till 1599 that the Greek text was published, together with the ἐπιτήδευμα of Urbicius, published by Nic. Rigaltius, Paris, 1599. The best edition is that by Nic. Schwebel, Nürnberg, 1761, folio. This edition contains the French translation by M. le Baron de Zur-Lauben. In this edition the editor availed himself of the manuscript notes by Jos. Scaliger and Is. Vossius, which are preserved in the library at Leyden. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iv. p. 336, &c. ; Schöll, Geschichte der Griech. Lit. vol. ii. p. 712, &c. ; Hoffmann, Lex. Bibl.) [C. P. M.]

OPE'LIUS DIADUMENIA'NUS. [DIADUMENIANUS.]

OPE'LIUS MACRI'NUS. [MACRINUS.]

OPHE'LION (Ὠφελίων). 1. An Athenian comic poet, probably of the Middle Comedy, of whom Suidas says that Athenaeus, in his second book, mentions the following as being his plays:—Δευκαλίων, Κάλλαισχρος, Κένταυρος, Σάτυροι, Μοῦσαι, Μονότροποι, or rather, according to the emendation of Toup, Μονότροπος. The last three of these titles are elsewhere assigned by Suidas to Phrynichus. In the second book of Athenaeus, which Suidas quotes, none of the titles are mentioned, but Ophelion is thrice quoted, without the name of the play referred to (Athen. ii. pp. 43, f. 66, d. 67, a.); and, in the third book, Athenaeus quotes the Callaeschrus, and also another play, which Suidas does not mention (iii. p. 106, a.). The reasons for assigning him to the Middle Comedy are, the reference to Plato in Athen. ii. p. 66, d., and the statement that he used some verses which were also found in Eubulus (Athen. ii. p. 43, f., where the name of Ophelion is rightly substituted by Porson for that of Philetas). Who may have been the Callaeschrus, whose name formed the title of one of his plays, we cannot tell; but if he was the same as the Callaeschrus, who formed the subject of one of the plays of Theopompus, the date of Ophelion would be fixed before the 100th Olympiad, B. C. 380. There is, perhaps, one more reference to Ophelion, again corrupted into Philetas, in Hesychius, s. v. Ἴσις. (Meineke, Frag. Com. Graec. vol. i. p. 415, vol. iii. p. 330; Praef. ad Menand. pp. x. xi.)

2. A Peripatetic philosopher, the slave and disciple of Lycon (Diog. Laërt. v. 73). [P. S.]

OPHE'LION (Ὠφελίων). 1. A painter of unknown time and country, on whose pictures of Pan and Aërope there are epigrams in the Greek Anthology. (Anth. Pal. vi. 315, 316; Brunck, Anal. vol. ii. p. 382.)

2. A sculptor, the son of Aristonides, was the maker of a statue of Sextus Pompeius, in the Royal Museum of Paris. (Clarac, Catal. No. 150.) [P. S.]

OPHELLAS (Ὀφέλλας), king or ruler of Cyrene, was a native of Pella in Macedonia: his father's name was Seilenus. He appears to have accompanied Alexander during his expedition in Asia, but his name is first mentioned as commanding one of the triremes of the fleet of that monarch on the Indus, B. C. 327. (Arrian, Ind. 18.) After the death of the Macedonian king, he followed the fortunes of Ptolemy, by whom he was sent, in B. C. 322, at the head of a considerable army, to take advantage of the civil war which had broken out in the Cyrenaica. [THIMBRON.] This object he successfully accomplished, totally defeated Thimbron and the party that supported him, and established the supremacy of Egypt over Cyrene itself and its dependencies. But shortly after, the civil dissensions having broken out again led Ptolemy himself to repair to Cyrene, which he this time appears to have reduced to complete subjection. (Diod. xviii. 21; Arrian, ap. Phot. p. 70, a.) The subsequent proceedings of Ophellas are involved in great obscurity. It seems certain that he was still left by Ptolemy at this time in the government of Cyrene, which he probably continued to hold on behalf of the Egyptian king until about the year B. C. 313: but no mention is found of his name in the account given by Diodorus (xviii. 79) of the revolt of the Cyrenaeans in that year, which was suppressed by Agis, the general of Ptolemy. Yet it could not have been long after that he availed himself of the continued disaffection of that people towards Egypt to assume the government of Cyrene as an independent state. The continual wars in which Ptolemy was engaged against Antigonus, and the natural difficulties of assailing Cyrene, secured him against invasion; and he appears to have continued in undisputed possession of the country for near five years. (Paus. i. 6. § 8; Droysen, Hellenism, vol. i. pp. 414, 417.) The power to which Ophellas had thus attained, and the strong mercenary force which he was able to bring into the field, caused Agathocles, during his expedition in Africa (B. C. 308) to turn his attention towards the new ruler of Cyrene as likely to prove an useful ally against the Carthaginians. In order to gain him over he promised to cede to him whatever conquests their combined forces might make in Africa, reserving to himself only the possession of Sicily. The ambition of Ophellas was thus aroused: he put himself at the head of a powerful army, and notwithstanding all the natural obstacles which presented themselves on his route, succeeded in reaching the Carthaginian territories after a toilsome and perilous march of more than two months' duration. He was received by his new ally with every demonstration of friendship, and the two armies encamped near each other: but not many days had elapsed when Agathocles took an opportunity treacherously to surprise the camp of the Cyrenaeans, and Ophellas himself perished in the confusion. His troops, thus left without a leader, joined the standard of Agathocles. (Diod. xx. 40—42; Justin, xxii. 7; Oros. iv. 6; Polyaen. v. 3. § 4; Suid. s. v. Ὀφέλλας.) Justin styles Ophellas "rex Cyrenarum," but it seems improbable that he had really assumed the regal title. He was married to an Athenian, Eurydice, the daughter of Miltiades, and appears to have maintained friendly relations with Athens. (Diod. xx. 40; Plut. Demetr. 14.) [E. H. B.]

OPHELTES (Ὀφέλτης). 1. A son of Lycurgus, who was killed by a snake at Nemea, as his nurse Hypsipyle had left him alone. (Apollod. i. 9. § 14; Paus. ii. 15. § 3; comp. ADRASTUS.)

2. One of the Tyrrhenians who wanted to carry off Dionysus, and were therefore metamorphosed into dolphins. (Hygin. Fab. 134.)

3. The son of Peneleus and father of Damasichthon, king of Thebes. (Paus. ix. 5. § 8.) [L.S.]

OPHION (Ὄφιων), a Titan, was married to Eurynome, with whom he shared the supremacy previous to the reign of Cronos and Rhea; but being conquered by the latter, he and Eurynome were thrown into Oceanus or Tartarus. (Apollon. Rhod. i. 503, &c.; Tzetz, ad Lyc. 1191.) There are two other mythical beings of the same name. (Ov. Met. xii. 245; Claudian. Rapt. Pros. iii. 348.) [L. S.]

OPI'LIUS. [OPELIUS.]

OPI'LIUS, AURE'LIUS, the freedman of an Epicurean, taught at Rome, first philosophy, then rhetoric, and, finally, grammar, and is placed by Suetonius next in order to Saevius Nicanor [NICANOR]. He gave up his school upon the condemnation of Rutilius Rufus, whom he accompanied to Smyrna, and there the two friends grew old together in the enjoyment of each other's society. He composed several learned works upon various subjects; one of these in particular, divided into nine parts, and named Musae, is referred to by A. Gellius (i. 25), who quotes from it an explanation of the word Induciae, accompanied by a most foolish derivation. To another piece termed Pinax an acrostic was prefixed on his own name which he there gave as Opillius. (Sueton. de Illustr. Gramm. 6; Lersch, Sprachphilosophie der Alten, iii. p. 150.) [W. R.]

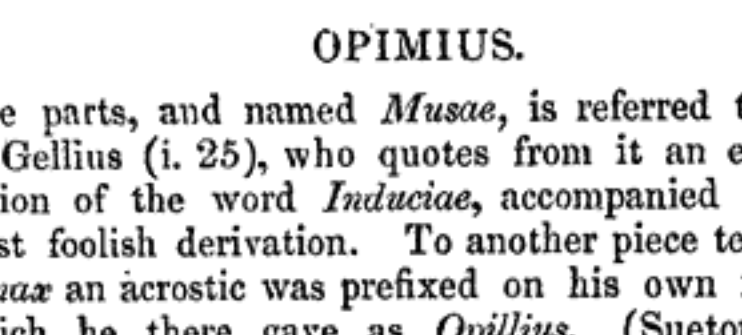
OPI'MIA, a vestal virgin in the time of the second Punic War, was unfaithful to her vow of chastity, and was in consequence buried alive at the Colline gate. (Liv. xxii. 57.)

OPI'MIA GENS, plebeian, is first mentioned in the time of the Samnite wars. The first member of the gens who obtained the consulship, was Q. Opimius, in B. C. 154. The only cognomen of the Opimii is Pansa, but the more distinguished persons of this name are mentioned without any surname. On coins the name is always written Opeimius, as in the annexed specimen, which represents on the obverse the head of Pallas, and on the reverse Apollo in a chariot bending his bow, with M. OPEIM. ROMA. None of the coins of this gens can be referred with certainty to any particular person.



COIN OF THE OPIMIA GENS.

OPI'MIUS. 1. C. OPIMIUS PANSA, quaestor B. C. 294, was killed in the quaestorium or quaestor's tent, in an attack made by the Samnites upon the Roman camp. (Liv. x. 32.)

2. Q. OPIMIUS Q. F. Q. N., was consul B. C. 154, with L. Postumius Albinus. Opimius in his consulship carried on war with the Oxybii and Deciatae, Ligurian tribes on the northern side of the Alps, who had attacked the territory of the people of Massilia, the allies of the Roman people, and had laid waste the towns of Antipolis and Nicaea, which belonged to Massilia. Opimius subdued these people without any difficulty, and obtained in consequence the honour of a triumph. (Polyb. xxxiii. 5, 7, 8; Liv. Epit. 47; Fasti Capit.; Obsequ. 76.) This Opimius seems to have been a man of as little principle as his son, and was notorious in his youth for his riotous living. Lucilius described him as "formosus homo et famosus" (Nonius, iv. s. v. Fama, p. 658, ed. Gothofred.), and Cicero speaks of him as "qui adolescentulus male audisset." (De Orat. ii. 68, fin.) In the same passage Cicero relates a joke of Opimius.

3. L. OPIMIUS Q. F. Q. N., son of the preceding, was praetor B. C. 125, in which year he marched against Fregellae, which had risen in revolt, in order to obtain the Roman franchise. The town was betrayed to Opimius by one of its citizens, Q. Numitorius Pullus, and severe vengeance was taken upon the inhabitants. (Liv. Epit. 60; Cic. De Invent. ii. 34; Ascon. in Pison. p. 17, ed. Orelli; Vell. Pat. ii. 6; Plut. C. Gracch. 3.) Opimius belonged to the high aristocratical party, and possessed great influence in the senate. He was one of the most violent and, at the same time, one of the most formidable opponents of C. Gracchus; and accordingly when he first became a candidate for the consulship, C. Gracchus used all his influence with the people to induce them to prefer C. Fannius Strabo in his stead. (Plut. C. Gracch. 11.) Gracchus succeeded in his object, and Fannius was consul in B. C. 122; but he was unable to prevent the election of Opimius for the following year, and had only rendered the latter a still bitterer enemy by the affront he had put upon him. Opimius's colleague was Q. Fabius Maximus Allobrogicus. The history of the consulship of Opimius, B. C. 121, is given at length in the life of C. Gracchus. It is only necessary to state here in general, that Opimius entered, with all the zeal of an unscrupulous partisan and the animosity of a personal enemy, into the measures which the senate adopted to crush Gracchus, and forced on matters to an open rupture. As soon as he was armed by the senate with the well-known decree, "That the consuls should take care that the republic suffered no injury," he resolved to make away with Gracchus, and succeeded, as is related in the life of the latter. Opimius and his party abused their victory most savagely, and are said to have killed more than three thousand persons. [For details see Vol. II. pp. 197, 198, and the authorities there quoted.]

In the following year, B. C. 120, Opimius was accused by Q. Decius, tribune of the plebs, of having put Roman citizens to death without a trial. He was defended by the consul, C. Papirius Carbo, who had formerly belonged to the party of Gracchus, but had gone over to that of the aristocracy. Although the judices now belonged to the equestrian order by one of the laws of Gracchus, they were too much terrified by the events of the preceding year to condemn the person who had been the prime mover in them, and accordingly acquitted the accused. (Liv. Epit. 61; Cic. de Orat. ii. 25.) Opimius thus escaped for the present, but his venality and corruption brought him before the judices again a few years afterwards, when he met with a different fate. He had been at the head of the commission which was sent into Africa in B. C. 112, in order to divide the dominions of Micipsa between Jugurtha and Adherbal, and had allowed himself to be bribed by Jugurtha, to assign to him the better part of the country. This scandalous conduct had passed unnoticed at the time; but when the defeat of the Roman army, through the misconduct of Albinus, in B. C. 109, had roused the indignation of the Roman people, the tribune, C. Mamilius Limetanus, brought forward a bill for inquiry into the conduct of all those who had received bribes from Jugurtha. By this law Opimius was condemned along with many others of the leading members of the aristocracy. He went into exile to Dyrrhachium in Epeirus, where he lived for some years, hated and insulted by the people, and where he eventually died in great poverty. He richly deserved his punishment, and met with a due recompense for his cruel and ferocious conduct towards C. Gracchus and his party. Cicero, on the contrary, who, after his consulship, had identified himself with the aristocratical party, frequently laments the fate of Opimius, and complains of the cruelty shown towards a man who had conferred such signal services upon his country as the conquest of Fregellae and the destruction of Gracchus. He calls him the saviour of the commonwealth, and characterises his condemnation as a blot upon the Roman dominion, and a disgrace to the Roman people. (Sall. Jug. 16, 40; Vell. Pat. ii. 7; Plut. C. Gracch. 18; Cic. pro Planc. 28, Brut. 34, in Pison. 39, pro Sest. 67; Schol. Bob. pro Sest. p. 311, ed. Orelli.)

The year in which Opimius was consul (B. C. 121) was remarkable for the extraordinary heat of the autumn, and thus the vintage of this year was of an unprecedented quality. This wine long remained celebrated as the Vinum Opimianum, and was preserved for an almost incredible space of time. Cicero speaks of it as in existence when he wrote his Brutus, eighty-five years after the consulship of Opimius (Brut. 83). Velleius Paterculus, who wrote in the reign of Tiberius, says (ii. 7) that none of the wine was then in existence; but Pliny, who published his work in the reign of Vespasian, makes mention of its existence even in his day, two hundred years afterwards. It was reduced, he says, to the consistence of rough honey; and, like other very old wines, was so strong, and harsh, and bitter, as to be undrinkable until largely diluted with water. (Plin. H. N. xiv. 4. s. 6; Dict. of Ant. s. v. Vinum.)

4. L. OPIMIUS, served in the army of L. Lutatius Catulus, consul B. C. 102, and obtained great credit by killing a Cimbrian, who had challenged him (Ampelius, c. 22).

5. Q. OPIMIUS L. F. Q. N. was brought to trial before Verres in his praetorship (B. C. 74), on the plea that he had interceded against the Lex Cornelia, when he was tribune in the preceding year (B. C. 75); but, in reality, because he had in his tribunate opposed the wishes of some Roman noble. He was condemned by Verres, and deprived of all his property. It appears from the Pseudo-Asconius that Opimius had in his tribunate supported the law of the consul C. Aurelius Cotta, which restored to the tribunes the right of being elected to the other magistracies of the state after the tribunate, of which privilege they had been deprived by a Lex Cornelia of the dictator Sulla. (Cic. Verr. i. 60; Pseudo-Ascon. in Verr. p. 200, ed. Orelli.)

6. OPIMIUS, is mentioned as one of the judices by Cicero (ad Att. iv. 16. § 6) in B. C. 54. The word which follows Opimius, being either his cognomen or the name of his tribe, is corrupt. (See Orelli, ad loc.) This Opimius may be the same as the following.

7. M. OPIMIUS, praefect of the cavalry in the army of Metellus Scipio, the father-in-law of Pompey, was taken prisoner by Cn. Domitius Calvinus, B. C. 48. (Caes. B. C. iii. 38.)

8. OPIMIUS, a poor man mentioned by Horace (Sat. ii. 3. 124), of whom nothing is known.

OPIS. [UPIS.]

O'PITER, an old Roman praenomen, given to a person born after the death of his father, but in the lifetime of his grandfather. (Festus, p. 184, ed. Müller; Val. Max. de Nom. Rat. 12; Placidus, p. 491.) We find this praenomen in the Virginia Gens, for instance.

L. OPITE'RNIUS, a Faliscan, a priest of Bacchus, and one of the prime movers in the introduction of the worship of this god into Rome B. C. 186. (Liv. xxxix. 17.)

OPLACUS. [OBSIDIUS.]

O'PPIA. 1. A Vestal virgin, put to death in B. C. 483 for violation of her vow of chastity. (Liv. ii. 42.)

2. VESTIA OPPIA, a woman of Atella in Campania, resided at Capua during the second Punic war, and is said to have daily offered up sacrifices for the success of the Romans, while Capua was in the hands of the Carthaginians. She was accordingly rewarded by the Romans in B. C. 210, when the city fell into their power. (Liv. xxvi. 33, 34.)

3. The wife of L. Minidius or Mindius. (Cic. ad Fam. xiii. 28.) [MINIDIUS.]

O'PPIA GENS, plebeian. This gens belonged to the tribus Terentina, and was one of considerable antiquity, and some importance even in early times, since a member of it, Sp. Oppius Cornicen, was one of the second decemvirate, B. C. 450. We even read of a Vestal virgin of the name of Oppia as early as B. C. 483 (Liv. ii. 43), but it is difficult to believe that a plebeian could have filled this dignity at so early a period. None of the Oppii, however, ever obtained the consulship, although the name occurs at intervals in Roman history from the time of the second decemvirate to that of the early emperors. [Compare however OPPIUS, No. 19.] The principal cognomens in this gens are CAPITO, CORNICEN or CORNICINUS, and SALINATOR; but most of the Oppii had no surname. Those of the name of Capito and Salinator are given below. [OPPIUS.] On coins we find the surnames Capito and Salinator.

OPPIA'NICUS, the name of three persons, two of whom play a prominent part in the oration of Cicero for Cluentius. 1. STATIUS ALBIUS OPPIANICUS, was accused by his step-son A. Cluentius of having attempted to procure his death by poisoning, B. C. 74, and was condemned. 2. OPPIANICUS, the son of the preceding, accused Cluentius himself in B. C. 66, of three distinct acts of poisoning. 3. C. OPPIANICUS, the brother of No. 1, said to have been poisoned by him (Cic. pro Cluent. 11). A full account of the two trials is given under CLUENTIUS.

OPPIA'NUS, a person to whom M. Varro wrote a letter, which is referred to by A. Gellius (xiv. 7).

OPPIA'NUS (Ὀππιανός). Under this name there are extant two Greek hexameter poems, one on fishing, Ἁλιευτικά, and the other on hunting, Κυνηγετικά; as also a prose paraphrase of a third poem on hawking, Ἰξευτικά. These were, till towards the end of the last century, universally attributed to the same person; an opinion which not only made it impossible to reconcile with each other all the passages relating to Oppian that are to be found in ancient writers, but also rendered contradictory the evidence derived from the perusal of the poems themselves. At length, in the year 1776, J. G. Schneider in his first edition of these poems threw out the conjecture that they were not written by the same individual, but by two persons of the same name, who have been constantly confounded together; an hypothesis, which, if not absolutely free from objection, certainly removes so many difficulties, and moreover affords so convenient a mode of introducing various facts and remarks which would otherwise be inconsistent and contradictory, that it will be adopted on this occasion. The chief (if not the only) objection to Schneider's conjecture arises from its novelty, from its positively contradicting some ancient authorities, and from the strong negative fact that for nearly sixteen hundred years no writer had found any trace of more than one poet of the name of Oppian. But the weight of this antecedent difficulty is probably more than counterbalanced by the internal evidence in favour of Schneider's hypothesis; and with respect to the ancient testimonies to be adduced on either side, it will be seen that he pays at least as much deference to them as do those who embrace the opposite opinion. The chief reason in favour of his opinion is the fact that the author of the "Halieutica" was not born at the same place as the author of the "Cynegetica," an argument which some persons have vainly attempted to overthrow by altering the text of the latter poem. The other, which is scarcely less convincing, though not so evident to everybody's comprehension, arises from the difference of style and language observable in the two poems, which is so great as to render it morally impossible that they could have been written by the same person: for, though it may be said that this difference only shows that the author improved in writing by practice, this answer will not bear examination, as in the first place the inferior poem (viz. the "Cynegetica") was written after, not before, the other; and secondly, the author is commonly said to have died at the early age of thirty, which scarcely affords sufficient time for so great an alteration and improvement to have taken place. The points relating to each poem separately will therefore be first mentioned, and afterwards some historical facts commonly related concerning one of the authors, though it is difficult to determine which.

I. The writer of the "Halieutica," Ἁλιευτικά, is said by (probably) all authorities to have been born in Cilicia, though they are not so well agreed as to the name of his native city. The author of an anonymous Greek Life of Oppian says it was either Corycus or Anazarba, Suidas says Corycus, and this is probably confirmed by Oppian himself, in the following passage: —

> Ἀνθιέων δὲ πρώτα περίφρονα πεύθεο θήρην,
> Οἵην ἡμετέρης ἐρικυδέος ἐντύνονται
> Πάτρης ἐνναετῆρες ὑπὲρ Σαρπηδόνος ἄκρης,
> Ὅσσοι θ' Ἑρμείαο πόλιν, ναυσίκλυτον ἄστυ
> Κωρύκιον, ναίουσι καὶ ἀμφιρύτην Ἐλεοῦσαν.
> (iii. 205, &c.)

This passage, however, can hardly be fairly said to determine the point, for (as if to show the uncertainty of almost everything relating to Oppian) while Schneider considers that it proves that the poet was born at Corycus, Fabricius and others have adduced it as evidence to show that he was not. Respecting his date there has been equal difference of opinion. Athenaeus says (i. p. 13) he lived shortly before his own time, and Athenaeus flourished, according to Mr. Clinton (Fasti Rom. A. D. 194), about the end of the second century. This testimony may be considered as almost conclusive with respect to Oppian's date, though it has been attempted to evade it, either by placing Athenaeus more than thirty years later*, or by considering the passage in question to be a spurious interpolation. It is also confirmed by Eusebius (Chron. ap. S. Hieron. vol. viii. p. 722, ed. Veron. 1736) and Syncellus (Chronogr. pp. 352, 353, ed. Paris. 1652), who place Oppian in the year 171 (or 173), and by Suidas, who says he lived in the reign of "Marcus Antoninus," i. e. not Caracalla, as Kuster and others suppose, but M. Aurelius Antoninus, A. D. 161—180. If the date here assigned to Oppian be correct, the emperor to whom the "Halieutica" are dedicated, and who is called (i. 3) γαίης ὕπατον κράτος, Ἀντωνῖνε, will be M. Aurelius; the allusions to his son (i. 66, 78, ii. 683, iv. 5, v. 45) will refer to Commodus; and the poem may be supposed to have been written after A. D. 177, which is the year when the latter was admitted to a participation of the imperial dignity. If the writer of the "Halieutica" be supposed to have lived under Caracalla, the name "Antoninus" will certainly suit that emperor perfectly well, as the appellation "Aurelius Antoninus" was conferred upon him when he was appointed Caesar by his father, A. D. 196. (Clinton's Fasti Rom.) But if we examine the other passages above referred to, the difficulty of applying them to Caracalla will be at once apparent, as that emperor (as far as we learn from history) had no son, — though some persons have even gone so far as to conjecture that he must have had one, because Oppian alludes to him! (Schneider's first ed. p. 346.)

The "Halieutica" consist of about 3500 hexameter lines, divided into five books, of which the first two treat of the natural history of fishes, and the other three of the art of fishing. The author displays in parts considerable zoological knowledge, but inserts also several fables and absurdities, — and that not merely as so much poetical ornament, but as grave matter of fact. In this respect, however, he was not more credulous than most of his contemporaries, and many of his stories are copied by Aelian and later writers.

The following zoological points in the poem are perhaps the most worthy of notice. He mentions (i. 217, &c.) the story of the remora, or sucker (ἐχενηΐς) being able to stop a ship when under full sail by sticking to the keel, and reproves the incredulity of those who doubt its truth (cf. Plut. Sympos. ii. 7); he was aware of the peculiarity of the cancellus, or hermit-crab (καρκινάς), which is provided with no shell of its own, but seizes upon the first empty one that it can find (i. 320, &c.); he gives a beautiful and correct description of the nautilus (i. 338, &c.); he says that the murena, or lamprey, copulates with land-serpents, which, for the time, lay aside their venom (i. 554, &c.); he notices (ii. 56, &c. and iii. 149, &c.) the numbness caused by the touch of the torpedo (νάρκη); and the black fluid emitted by the sepia, or cuttle-fish, by means of which it escapes its pursuers (iii. 156, &c.); he says that a fish called "sargus" copulates with goats, and that it is caught by the fisherman's dressing himself up in a goat's skin, and so enticing it on shore (iv. 308, &c.); he several times mentions the dolphin, calls it, for its swiftness and beauty, the king among fishes, as the eagle among birds, the lion among beasts, and the serpent among reptiles (ii. 533, &c.), and relates (v. 448, &c.) an anecdote, somewhat similar to those mentioned by Pliny (H. N. ix. 8), and which he says happened about his own time, of a dolphin that was so fond of a little boy that it used to come to him whenever he called it by its name, and suffered him to ride upon its back, and at last was supposed to have pined away with grief on account of his death. (Penny Cyclop. s. v.) In point of style and language, as well as poetical embellishment, the "Halieutica" are so much superior to the "Cynegetica," that Schneider (as we have seen) considers this fact to furnish one of the strongest proofs in favour of his hypothesis; and it is probable that the greater part of the praise that has been bestowed upon Oppian in a poetical point of view should be considered as referring to this poem only. A paraphrase of the "Halieutica" in Greek prose, bearing the name of Eutecnius, is still in existence in several European libraries, but has never been published. (See Lambec. Bibl. Vindob. vol. ii. p. 260, &c. vii. 488, &c. ed. Kollar.) The two poems attributed to Oppian have generally been published together. The only separate edition of the Greek text of the "Halieutica" is the "editio princeps," by Phil. Junta, Florent. 1515, 8vo., a book that is valuable not only for its rarity, but also for the correctness of the text. A Latin translation in hexameter verse by Laur. Lippius was published in 1478, 4to. Florent. (of which not uncommon volume a particular account is given by Dibdin in his Biblioth. Spencer. vol. ii. p. 183), and several times reprinted. It was translated into English verse by — Diaper and J. Jones, Oxford, 8vo. 1722; into French by J. M. Limes, Paris, 8vo. 1817, and into Italian by A. M. Salvini, Firenze, 8vo. 1728.

* Fabricius, Schweighaeuser, and others, have first confounded the author of the "Halieutica" with the author of the "Cynegetica," and have then made use of the date of the second Oppian in order to determine the date of Athenaeus. [ATHENAEUS].

II. The author of the "Cynegetica," Κυνηγετικά, was a native of Apameia or Pella in Syria, as he himself plainly tells us in the following passage, where, speaking of the river Orontes, he says:—

> Αὐτὸς δ' ἐν μεσάτοισιν ἐπαιγίζων πεδίοισιν,
> Αἰὲν ἀεξόμενος καὶ τείχεος ἐγγὺς ὀδεύων,
> Χέρσον ὁμοῦ καὶ νῆσον, ἐμὴν πόλιν, ὕδατι χεύων.
> (ii. 125, &c.)

And again, after speaking of the temple of Memnon in the neighbourhood of Apameia, he proceeds:—

> Ἀλλὰ τὰ μὲν κατὰ κόσμον ἀείσομεν εὐρέα κάλλη,
> Πάτρης ἡμετέρης ἐρατῇ Πιμπληΐδι μολπῇ.
> (ii. 156.)

In order to avoid the conclusion to which these passages lead respecting the birth-place of their author, it has been proposed to alter in the former, ἐμήν into ἔθη, and, in the latter, ἡμετέρης into ὑμετέρης; but these emendations, which are purely conjectural, have not been received into the text by any one but the proposer. The author addresses his poem to the emperor Caracalla, whom he calls (i. 3) and the tenth and eleventh lines have been brought forward as a presumptive evidence that he wrote it after Caracalla had been associated with his father in the empire, A. D. 198, and before the death of the latter, A. D. 211.

> Ἀντωνῖνε,
> Τὸν μεγάλη μεγάλῳ φιτύσατο Δόμνα Σεβήρῳ:

The "Cynegetica" consist of about 2100 hexameter lines, divided into four books. The last of these is imperfect, and perhaps a fifth book may also have been lost, as the anonymous author of the Life of Oppian says the poem consisted of that number of books, though Suidas mentions only four. There is probably an allusion in this poem to the "Halieutica" (i. 77—80), which has been thought to imply that both poems were written by the same person; but this is not the necessary explanation of the passage in question, which may merely mean (as Schneider suggests) that the writer of the "Cynegetica" was acquainted with the other poem, and meant his own to be a sort of continuation of it. It has also been supposed that in two other passages (i. 27, 31) the author alludes to some of his own earlier poems. There are certainly several points of similitude between this poem and the "Halieutica"; for here, too, the author's knowledge of natural history appears to have been quite equal to that of his contemporaries (though not without numerous fables), while the accuracy of some of his descriptions has been often noticed. The following zoological points are perhaps the most interesting. He says expressly that the tusks of the elephant are not teeth, but horns (ii. 491, &c.), and mentions a report that these animals are able to speak (ii. 540); he states that there is no such thing as a female rhinoceros, but that all these animals are of the male sex (ii. 560); that the lioness when pregnant for the first time brings forth five whelps at a birth, the second time four, the next three, then two, and lastly only one (iii. 58); that the bear brings forth her cubs half-formed and licks them into shape (iii. 159); that so great is the enmity between the wolf and the lamb, that even after death if two drums be made of their hides, the wolf's hide will put to silence the lamb's (iii. 282); that the hyaenas annually change their sex (iii. 288); that the boar's teeth contain fire inside them (iii. 379); that the ichneumon leaps down the throat of the crocodile, while lying asleep with its mouth wide open, and devours its viscera (iii. 407). He thinks it necessary to state expressly that it is not true that there are no male tigers (iii. 357). He gives a very spirited description of the giraffe (iii. 461), "the exactness of which," says Mr. Holme (Trans. of the Ashmolean Society, vol. ii.), "is in some points remarkable; particularly in the observation that the so-called horns do not consist of horny substance (οὔτι κέρας κερόεν), and in the allusion to the pencils of hair (ἀβληχραὶ κεραῖαι) with which they are tipped." He adds, "That the animal must have been seen alive by Oppian is evident from his remark on the brilliancy of the eyes and the halting motion of the hinder limbs" (Penny Cyclop.). In style, language, and poetical merit, the "Cynegetica" are far inferior to the "Halieutica." Schneider, indeed, calls the poem "durum, inconcinnum, forma tota incompositum, et saepissime ab ingenio, usu, et analogia Graeci sermonis abhorrens" (Pref. to second ed. p. xiv.), and thinks that when Dan. Heinsius spoke of the Latinisms that deformed Oppian's style (Dissert. de Nonni "Dionys." ap. P. Cunaei Animadvers. p. 196), he was alluding especially to the "Cynegetica." The earliest edition of the Greek text of this poem, apart from the "Halieutica," appeared in 1549, 4to. Paris, ap. Vascosanum. It was also published by Belin de Ballu, Argentor. 1786, large 8vo, Gr. et Lat., with learned notes, too often deformed by personal controversy with Schneider. The editor intended to publish the "Halieutica" in a second volume, but of this only forty pages were printed, which are rarely to be met with. It was translated into Latin verse by Joannes Bodinus, Paris, 1555, 4to.

and also by David Peifer, whose translation was made in 1555, but first published in Schneider's second edition, Lips. 1813. There is a French translation by Florent Chrestien, Paris, 1575, 4to., and by Belin de Ballu, Strasb. 1787, 8vo.; an English version of the first book by J. Mawer, Lond. 1736, 8vo.; and a German one by S. H. Lieberkühn, Leipz. 1755, 8vo. An anonymous Greek prose paraphrase of part of the poem was published by Andr. Mustoxydes and Dem. Schinas, in their Συλλογὴ Ἀποσπασμάτων Ἀνεκδοτῶν Ἑλληνικῶν, Venet. 1817, 8vo., which is probably the same as that which is commonly attributed to Eutecnius (see Lambec. Biblioth. Vindob. l. c.). The earliest edition of both poems is the Aldine, Venet. 1517, 8vo., containing the Greek text, with the Latin translation of the "Halieutica," by Laur. Lippius. The most complete edition that has hitherto been published is that by J. G. Schneider, Argent. 1776, 8vo. Gr. et Lat., with copious and learned notes, containing also a Greek paraphrase of the "Ixeutica" that will be mentioned below. The editor published some additional notes and observations in his "Analecta Critica," Francof. 1777, 8vo. fasc. i. p. 31, &c. This edition was executed when Schneider was a young man, in conjunction with Brunck, who assisted him in the "Cynegetica;" and accordingly it exhibits many bold corrections of the text, which he withdrew in his second edition, published in 1813, Lips. 8vo. This edition is unfinished, and contains only the Greek text of the two poems, Peifer's Latin translation of the "Cynegetica," mentioned above, some short notes relating to the text, and a preface, in which Schneider repeats his conviction that the "Halieutica" and "Cynegetica" were written by two different persons, and replies to the objections of Belin de Ballu. The last edition of the two poems is that published by F. Didot, together with Nicander and Marcellus Sidetes, in his collection of Greek classical authors, Paris, large 8vo. 1846, edited by F. S. Lehrs. It contains a Latin prose translation and the Greek paraphrase of the "Ixeutica," but (it is believed) is at present unfinished. A Latin translation of both poems was published in 1555, Paris, 4to., that of the "Halieutica" in verse by Laur. Lippius, and that of the "Cynegetica" in prose, by Adr. Turnebus; and an Italian translation of both poems by A. M. Salvini was published in 1728, Firenze, 8vo.

III. If we assume that there were two poets of the name of Oppian, there are two other questions relating to them that require to be examined into: 1. To which are we to refer the biographical particulars contained in the anonymous Greek Life of Oppian? and 2. Which, if either, was the author of the poem on hawking, Ἰξευτικά.

1. The Greek Life states that Oppian was a native of Cilicia, and that his father's name was Agesilaus, and his mother's Zenodota. He received an excellent education in all the liberal sciences, especially music, geometry, and grammar, under the personal superintendence of his father, who was one of the principal persons in his native city, and who suffered himself to be so engrossed by his philosophical studies, that, when on one occasion the emperor Severus visited his city, he neglected to pay his respects to him along with the other chief magistrates of the place. For this offence Agesilaus was banished to the island of Melita, and was accompanied in his exile by his son, who was then about thirty years of age. Here Oppian wrote (or perhaps rather finished) his poems, which he took to Rome after the death of Severus, A. D. 211, and presented to his son "Antoninus" (i. e. Caracalla), or, according to Sozomen (Hist. Eccles. praef.), to Severus himself. The emperor is said to have been so much pleased with the poems, that he not only repealed, at his request, the sentence of his father's banishment, but also presented him with a piece of gold (στατὴρ χρυσοῦς, or νόμισμα χρυσοῦν, probably about fifteen shillings and sixpence) for each verse they contained. Shortly after his return to his native country he died of some pestilential disease, at the early age of thirty. His countrymen raised a monument in his honour, and inscribed on it five verses (which are preserved), which lament his early death, and allude to his poems, but not in such definite terms as to enable us to decide which are the poems intended. The anonymous biographer does not mention the "Halieutica," but only the "Cynegetica" and "Ixeutica."

It is quite clear (if the hypothesis adopted in this article be correct) that the whole of these particulars cannot apply to either of the poets of the name of Oppian, nor, perhaps, is it possible to decide for certain how they are to be apportioned to each. Probably the epitaph and the early death belong to the Cilician, that is, to the author of the "Halieutica"; and the anecdote respecting the "golden verses" may relate to the other poet.

2. With respect to the poem on hawking, Ἰξευτικά, if it is to be attributed to either of the Oppians, it probably belongs to the younger; but Schneider considers that it is more probably the work of Dionysius. The poem itself, which is said to have consisted of five books, is no longer extant, but there is a Greek prose paraphrase of three books by Eutecnius. This was first published with a Latin translation by Eras. Windingius, Hafniae, 1702, 8vo., and is inserted in Schneider's former edition, and in Didot's. The first book treats of tame birds and birds of prey; the second of waterfowls; and the third of the various modes of catching birds. Of the poetical merits of the work, as it no longer exists in the form of a poem, it is scarcely possible to judge. (See Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. v. p. 590, &c. ed. Harles; J. G. Schneider's preface and notes to his first edition, and the preface to the second; Hoffmann's Lex. Bibliograph. art. "Oppianus," by F. Ritter, in Ersch and Gruber's Encyclopädie.) [W. A. G.]

OPPI'DIUS, SE'RVIUS, a wealthy Roman of Canusium, whose dying advice to his two sons, Aulus and Tiberius, is related by Horace. (Sat. ii. 1. 168, &c.)

O'PPIUS. 1. M. Oppius, was elected, with Sext. Manilius, as the commander of the soldiers, in their secession to the Aventine during the second decemvirate, B. C. 449 (Liv. iii. 51; Dionys. xi. 43, 44).

2. C. Oppius, was elected one of the tribunes of the plebs on the overthrow of the second decemvirate, B. C. 449 (Liv. iii. 54).

3. C. Oppius, tribune of the plebs, B. C. 213, in the middle of the second Punic war, carried a law to curtail the expenses and luxuries of Roman women. It enacted that no woman should have more than half an ounce of gold, nor wear a dress of different colours, nor ride in a carriage in the city, or in any town, or within a mile of it, unless on account of public sacrifices. This law was repealed in B.C. 195, notwithstanding the vehement opposition of the elder Cato (Liv. xxxiv. 1—8; Val. Max. ix. 1. § 3; Tac. Ann. iii. 33, 34).

4. C. OPPIUS, a praefect of the allies, was sent by the consul P. Aelius Paetus, in B.C. 201, with some raw levies to attack the territories of the Boii, but was cut off by the enemy with a large number of his men (Liv. xxxi. 2).

5. L. OPPIUS, tribune of the plebs, B.C. 197 (Liv. xxxii. 28), is probably the same as L. Oppius Salinator [No. 6], though Livy omits his praenomen.

6. L. OPPIUS SALINATOR, plebeian aedile, B.C. 193, was sent in the following year to convey a fleet of twenty ships to Sicily. He was praetor in B.C. 191, and obtained Sardinia as his province. (Liv. xxxv. 23, 24, xxxvi. 2).

7. Q. OPPIUS, one of the Roman generals in the Mithridatic war, B.C. 88. He is called proconsul in the Epitome of Livy, from which we may infer that he had been praetor, and was afterwards sent, as was frequently the case, with the title of proconsul to take the command of an army. He had possession of the city of Laodiceia in Phrygia, near the river Lycus; but when Mithridates had conquered the whole of the surrounding country, the inhabitants of Laodiceia gave up Oppius to the king on the promise of their receiving pardon by so doing. Mithridates did no injury to Oppius, but carried him with him in his various campaigns, exhibiting to the people of Asia a Roman general as a prisoner. Mithridates subsequently surrendered him to Sulla. (Liv. Epit. 78; Athen. v. p. 213, a; Appian, Mithr. 17, 20, 112.)

8. OPPIUS, stated by an ancient scholiast to have been praetor in Achaia, and to have been accused at the instigation of Verres. We may therefore place his praetorship about B.C. 80. (Schol. in Cic. Verr. p. 389; Pseudo-Ascon. in Cic. Verr. pp. 128, 171, ed. Orelli.)

9. P. OPPIUS, was quaestor in Bithynia to M. Aurelius Cotta, who was consul in B.C. 74, and who remained in Bithynia for the next three or four years. Oppius appears to have appropriated to his own use many of the supplies intended for the troops; and when he was charged with this by Cotta, he forgot himself so far as to draw his sword upon the proconsul. Cotta accordingly dismissed him from the province, and sent a letter to the senate, in which he formally accused Oppius of malversation, and of making an attempt upon the life of his imperator. He was brought to trial in B.C. 69, and was defended by Cicero. The speech which Cicero delivered in his favour is lost, but it seems to have been one of considerable merit, as it is referred to several times by Quintilian. (Dion Cass. xxxvi. 23; Quintil. v. 10. § 69, v. 13. § 17; Sall. Hist. iii. p. 218. ed. Gerlach; Cic. Fragm. vol. iv. p. 444, ed. Orelli; Drumann, Geschichte Roms, vol. v. p. 343.)

10. C. OPPIUS, one of the most intimate friends of C. Julius Caesar. Together with Cornelius Balbus, with whose name that of Oppius is usually coupled, he managed most of Caesar's private affairs, and was well acquainted with all his plans and wishes. In the time of A. Gellius (xvii. 9) there was extant a collection of Caesar's letters to Oppius and Balbus, written in a kind of cipher. The regard which Caesar had for Oppius is shown by an anecdote related both by Plutarch (Caes. 17) and Suetonius (Caes. 72), who tell us, that when Caesar with his retinue was on one occasion overtaken by a storm and compelled to take refuge in a poor man's hut, which contained only a single chamber, and that hardly large enough for one person, he made Oppius, who was in delicate health, sleep in the hut, while he and the rest of his friends slept in the porch. On the breaking out of the civil war in B.C. 49, the name of Oppius often occurs in Cicero's letters. Oppius and Balbus had frequent correspondence with Cicero, in which they endeavoured to quiet his apprehensions as to Caesar's designs, and used all their efforts to persuade him to espouse the cause of the latter. There is in the collection of Cicero's letters a letter written to him in the joint names of Oppius and Balbus, accompanied by a letter of Caesar's to them, in which the great Roman at the very commencement of the civil war promises to use his victory with moderation, and says that he will try to overcome his enemies by mercy and kindness, a promise which he faithfully kept to the end of his life. (Cic. ad Att. ix. 7; comp. ad Att. ix. 13, ad Fam. ii. 16, ad Att. xi. 17, 18, xii. 19.) To the death of Caesar, Oppius continued to hold the same place in his favour and esteem, and in the year before his death we read that Oppius and Balbus had the management and control of all affairs at Rome during the absence of the dictator in Spain, though the government of the city was nominally in the hands of M. Lepidus as magister equitum. (Cic. ad Fam. vi. 8, 19.) After the death of the dictator, Oppius espoused the cause of the young Octavian, and exhorted Cicero to do the same (ad Att. xvi. 15).

Oppius was the author of several works, which are referred to by the ancient writers, but all of which have perished. The authorship of the histories of the Alexandrine, African, and Spanish wars was a disputed point as early as the time of Suetonius, some assigning them to Oppius and others to Hirtius. (Suet. Caes. 56.) But the similarity in style and diction between the work on the Alexandrine war and the last book of the Commentaries on the Gallic war, leads to the conclusion that the former, at all events, was the work of Hirtius. The book on the African war may have been written by Oppius, to whom it is confidently assigned by Niebuhr, who remarks, "that the work is very instructive and highly trustworthy, but that the language is quite different from that of the work on the Alexandrine war; there is a certain mannerism about it, and it is on the whole less beautiful." (Lectures on Roman History, vol. v. p. 47.) Oppius also wrote the lives of several of the most distinguished Romans. The following are expressly mentioned as his composition: 1. A Life of Scipio Africanus the elder. (Charisius, p. 119, ed. Putschius; Gell. vii. 1.) 2. A Life of Cassius. (Charisius, l. c.) 3. A Life of Marius. (Plin. H. N. xi. 45. s. 104.) 4. A Life of Pompey, quoted by Plutarch (Pomp. 10), who observes, "that when Oppius is speaking of the enemies or friends of Caesar, it is necessary to be very cautious in believing what he says." 5. Probably a Life of Caesar, from which Suetonius and Plutarch appear to have derived some of their statements. (Comp. Suet. Caes. 53; Plut. Caes. 17.) After Caesar's death, Oppius wrote a book to prove that Caesarion was not the son of Julius Caesar by Cleopatra, as the latter pretended. (Suet. Caes. 52. Comp. Vossius, De Historicis Latinis, i. 13, pp. 67, 68, Lugd. Bat. 1651.)

11. L. Oppius, a Roman eques, was a witness on behalf of Flaccus, whom Cicero defended in B. C. 59. (Cic. pro Flacc. 13.) He is probably the same as the L. Oppius, M. f., whom Cicero recommended to Quintius Gallius, and whom he calls homo mihi familiaris, and familiarissimus (ad Fam. xiii. 43), and also the same as the L. Oppius, whom Cicero recommended to Q. Philippus, proconsul in Asia, B. C. 54 (ad Fam. xiii. 73, 74).

12. P. or Sp. Oppius, praetor, B. C. 44. (Cic. Philipp. iii. 10.)

13. M. Oppius, was proscribed together with his father in B. C. 43. The father was unable to leave the city of his own accord on account of his great feebleness through old age, but his son carried him on his shoulders and reached Sicily with him in safety. This instance of filial piety excited such admiration among the people, that he was afterwards elected aedile; and as he had not sufficient property to discharge the duties of the office, the people contributed the requisite money for the purpose, and on his death further testified their affection towards him by burying him in the Campus Martius. (Appian, B. C. iv. 41; Dion Cass. xlviii. 53.) He is often said to be the same as the M. Oppius, whom Cicero calls in a letter to Pompeius (ad Att. viii. 11, B) "vigilans homo et industrius," but the modern editions have M. Eppius and not M. Oppius.

14. M. Oppius Capito, occurs on the coins of M. Antonius, struck about B. C. 40, as propraetor and praefectus classis. (Eckhel, vol. v. p. 264.) He may be the same as the Oppius Capito, a man of praetorian rank, of whom Pliny (H. N. vii. 13. s. 15) relates that he had a scirrhus in his stomach.

15. Oppius Chares, sometimes but erroneously called Cares, a Latin grammarian, who taught in the province of Gallia togata towards the end of the republic, and continued his instructions to extreme old age, when he had lost not only the power of movement, but even of sight. (Suet. de Ill. Gramm. 3.) This grammarian may be the Oppius, whose work De Silvestribus Arboribus is referred to by Macrobius. (Saturn. ii. 14, 15.) Oppius is also quoted by Festus (p. 182, ed. Müller), in explanation of the meaning of the word ordinarius.

16. Oppius Gallus, whose scandalous treatment by M. Popilius is related by Valerius Maximus (vii. 8. § 9).

17. Oppius Statianus, legate of M. Antonius in his unfortunate campaign against the Parthians in B. C. 36. When Antonius hastened forward to besiege Phraata, he left Oppius with two legions and the baggage to follow him; but Oppius was surprised by the enemy, and he and all his men were cut to pieces. (Dion Cass. xlix. 25, 44; Plut. Ant. 38.)

18. Oppius Sabinus, a man of consular rank, was sent against the Dacians in the reign of Domitian, and perished in the expedition. (Eutrop. vii. 23; Suet. Dom. 6.) The name, however, does not occur in any of the consular fasti, whence some have proposed to read Appius, instead of Oppius in Eutropius and Suetonius.

19. Q. Oppius, known only from the annexed coin, cannot be identified with certainty with any of the persons previously mentioned. The PR. after the name of Q. OPPIVS may signify either praetor or praefectus. The obverse represents the head of Venus, and the reverse Victory: the coin was probably struck in one of the provinces. (Eckhel, vol. v. pp. 264, 265.)

COIN OF Q. OPPIUS.

OPS, a female Roman divinity of plenty and fertility, as is indicated by her name, which is connected with opimus, opulentus, inops, and copia. (Fest. p. 186, &c. ed. Müller.) She was regarded as the wife of Saturnus, and, accordingly, as the protectress of every thing connected with agriculture. Her abode was in the earth, and hence those who invoked her, or made vows to her, used to touch the ground (Macrob. Sat. i. 10), and as she was believed to give to human beings both their place of abode and their food, newly-born children were recommended to her care. (August. de Civ. Dei, iv. 11, 21.) Her worship was intimately connected with that of her husband Saturnus, for she had both temples and festivals in common with him; she had, however, also a separate sanctuary on the Capitol, and in the vicus jugarius, not far from the temple of Saturnus, she had an altar in common with Ceres. (Liv. xxxix. 22; P. Vict. Reg. Urb. viii.) The festivals of Ops are called Opalia and Opiconsivia, from her surname Consiva, connected with the verb serere, to sow. (Fest. l. c.; Macrob. Sat. i. 10, 12.) [L. S.]

O'PSIUS, had previously been praetor, and was one of the accusers of Titius Sabinus in A. D. 28, on account of the friendship of the latter with Germanicus. (Tac. Ann. iv. 68, 71.)

OPTATIANUS. [Porphyrius].

OPTA'TUS ELIPE'RTIUS, praefectus classis in the reign of Claudius, brought the scar or char fish (scari) from the Carpathian sea, and scattered them along the coasts of Latium and Campania. For Elipertius Gelenius proposed to read e libertis ejus. (Plin. H. N. ix. 17. s. 29.) Macrobius calls this Optatus, Octavius. (Macrob. Saturn. ii. 12.)

OPTA'TUS, bishop of Milevi in Numidia, and hence distinguished by the epithet Milevitanus, flourished under the emperors Valentinian and Valens, and must have been alive at least as late as A. D. 384, if the passage (ii. 3) be genuine in which mention is made of pope Siricius, who in that year succeeded Damasus in the Roman see. Of his personal history we know nothing except that he was by birth a gentile, and that he is classed by St. Augustine with Cyprian, Lactantius, Victorinus, and Hilarius, as one who came forth from Egypt (i. e. from the bondage of paganism) laden with the treasures of learning and eloquence.

He published a controversial treatise, still extant, entitled De Schismate Donatistarum adversus Parmenianum, comprised, as we gather from the introduction and are expressly told by Jerome, in six books. Upon this testimony, which is fully confirmed by internal evidence, the seventh book now found in our copies has been deservedly pronounced spurious by the best judges, although some scholars still maintain that it ought to be regarded as an appendix added by the author himself upon a revision of his work. It is certainly not a modern forgery, and was very probably composed, as Dupin suggests, by some African, as a supplement, not long after the publication of the original.

Optatus addresses his production to Parmenianus, the Donatist bishop of Carthage, in reply to an attack made by that prelate upon the Catholics, and explains at the outset the method he intends to pursue in refuting his opponent. The object of the first book is, to ascertain what class of persons may justly be branded as traditors and schismatics, the former being the term uniformly applied by the Donatists to their antagonists; of the second, to ascertain what the Church is, and where it is to be found; of the third, to prove that some acts of violence and cruelty on the part of the soldiery had not been committed by the orders or with the approbation of the Catholics; of the fourth, to point out who is really to be accounted the Sinner, whose sacrifice God rejects, from whose unction we must flee; of the fifth, to inquire into the nature of baptism; of the sixth, to expose the errors and projects of the Donatists. This performance was long held in such high estimation on account of the learning, acuteness, and orthodoxy displayed, not only in reference to the particular points under discussion, but upon many general questions of doctrine and discipline, that the author was esteemed worthy of the honours of canonization, his festival being celebrated on the fourth of June. Even now the book must be regarded as a valuable contribution to the ecclesiastical history of the fourth century, and constitutes our principal source of information with regard to the origin and progress of the heresy which distracted Africa for three hundred years. [DONATUS.] The language is tolerably pure, and the style is for the most part lofty and energetic, but not unfrequently becomes turgid and harsh, while it is uniformly destitute of all grace or polish. The allegorical interpretations of Scripture constantly introduced are singularly fantastic, and the sentiments expressed with regard to free-will would in modern times be pronounced decidedly Arminian. Optatus refers in the course of his arguments (i. 14) to certain state papers and other public documents, which he had subjoined in support of the statements contained in the body of the work. These have disappeared, but in the best editions we find a copious and important collection of "pièces justificatives," collected from various sources, which throw much curious light not only upon the struggles of the Donatists, but upon tne practice of ancient courts and the forms of ancient diplomacy.

Of the epistles and other pieces noticed by Trithemius no trace remains.

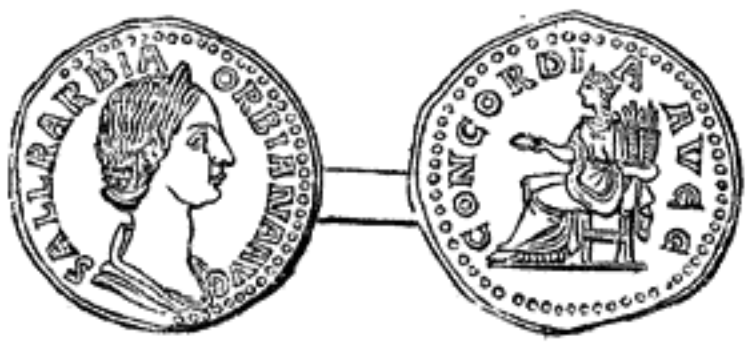
The Editio Princeps of the six books of Optatus was printed by F. Behem (apud S. Victorem prope Moguntiam), fol. 1549, under the inspection of Joannes Cochlaeus, from a MS. belonging to the Hospital of St. Nicolas near Trèves. The text which here appears under a very corrupt and mutilated form was corrected in a multitude of passages by Balduinus, first from a single new MS. (Paris, 8vo. 1653, with the seventh book added in small type), and afterwards from two additional codices (Paris, 8vo. 1659). The second of these impressions remained the standard until the appearance of the elaborate edition by Dupin, printed at Paris, fol. 1700, reprinted at Amsterdam, fol. 1701, and at Antwerp, fol. 1702, the last being in point of arrangement the best of the three, which are very far superior to all others. That of Meric Casaubon (8vo. Lond. 1631) is of no particular value, that of L'Aubespine, bishop of Orleans (fol. Par. 1631) is altogether worthless. Galland, in his Bibliotheca Patrum, vol. v. p. 462 (fol. Venet. 1769), has followed the text of Dupin, selected the most important of his critical notes, adopted his distribution of the "Monumenta Vetera ad Donatistarum Historiam pertinentia," and brought together much useful matter in his Prolegomena, cap. xviii. p. xxix. (Hieronym. de Viris Ill. 110; Honor. i. 3; Trithem. 76; Augustin. de Doctrin. Christ. ii. 40; Lardner, Credibility of Gospel History, c. cv.; Funccius, de L. L. veget. Senect. c. x. § 56—63; Schönemann, Bibl. Patr. Lat. vol. i. § 16; Bähr, Geschichte der Röm. Litt. suppl. band. 2te Abtheil. § 65.) [W. R.]

OPUS (Ὄπους). 1. A son of Zeus and Protogeneia, the daughter of Deucalion, was king of the Epeians, and father of Cambyse or Protogeneia. (Pind. Ol. ix. 85, &c. with the Schol.)

2. A son of Locrus or Zeus by Cambyse, and a grandson of No. 1. (Pind. Ol. l. c.; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 277.) From him a portion of the Locri derived their name Opuntii. [L. S.]

ORA'TA or AURA'TA, C. SE'RGIUS, was a contemporary of L. Crassus the orator, and lived a short time before the Marsic war. He was distinguished for his great wealth, his love of luxury and refinement, and possessed withal an unblemished character. In a fragment of Cicero, preserved by Augustin, Orata is described as a man "ditissimus, amoenissimus, deliciosissimus;" and it is related of him, that he was the first person who invented the pensiles balneae, that is, baths with the hypocausta under them (Dict. of Ant. s. v. Balneum), and also the first who formed artificial oyster-beds at Baiae, from which he obtained a large revenue. He is further said to have been the first person who asserted and established the superiority of the shell-fish from the Lucrine lake, although under the empire they were less esteemed than those from Britain. His surname Orata or Aurata was given to him, according to some authorities, because he was very fond of gold-fish (auratae pisces), according to others, because he was in the habit of wearing two very large gold rings. (Augustin. de Beata Vita, c. 26, p. 308, ed. Bened.; Cic. de Off. iii. 16, de Fin. ii. 22, de Orat. i. 39; Val. Max. ix. 1. § 1; Plin. H. N. ix. 54. s. 79; Varr. R. R. iii. 3. § 10; Colum. viii. 16. § 5; Macrob. Saturn. ii. 11; Festus, s. v. Orata.)

ORBIA'NA, SALLU'STIA BA'RBIA, one of the three wives of Alexander Severus. Her name is known to us from coins and inscriptions only, on which she appears with the title of Augusta. (Eckhel, vol. vii. p. 285.) [W. R.]



COIN OF ORBIANA.

ORBI'CIUS (Ὀρβίκιος). In the Etymologicon Magnum (s. v. Στρατός) there is a short account of the names given to the various subdivisions of an army, and to their respective commanders. It is entitled Ὀρβικίου τῶν περὶ τὸ στράτευμα τάξεων, Orbicii de Exercitus Ordinibus, and occupies about half or two-thirds of a column in the earlier folio editions of the Etymologicon, Venice, 1499 and 1549, and that of Fred. Sylburg, 1594. It is extracted and given among the pieces at the end of the Dictionarium Graecum of Aldus and Asulanus, fol. Venice, 1524, and at the end of the Dictionarium Graecum of Sessa and De Ravanis, fol. Venice, 1525. Of Orbicius nothing is known except that he wrote (unless we suppose the passage to be interpolated) before the compilation of the Etymologicon, which cannot be placed later than the twelfth century, when it is cited by Eustathius, the commentator on Homer. [J. C. M.]

ORBI'LIUS PUPILLUS, a Roman grammarian and schoolmaster, best known to us from his having been the teacher of Horace, who gives him the epithet of plagosus from the severe floggings which his pupils received when they were poring over the crabbed verses of Livius Andronicus. (Hor. Ep. ii. 1. 71.) Orbilius was a native of Beneventum, and had from his earliest years paid considerable attention to the study of literature; but in consequence of the death of his parents, who were both destroyed by their enemies on the same day, he was left destitute, and in order to obtain a living, first became an apparitor, or servant of the magistrates, and next served as a soldier in Macedonia. On returning to his native town he resumed his literary studies, and after teaching there for a long while, he removed to Rome in the fiftieth year of his age, in the consulship of Cicero, B. C. 63. Here he opened a school; but although he obtained a considerable reputation, his profits were small, and he was obliged to live in his old age in a sorry garret. His want of success would not contribute to the improvement of his temper as he grew older, and since he must have been upwards of sixty when Horace became his pupil, we can easily imagine that the young poet found him rather a crabbed and cross-grained master. His flogging propensities were recorded by other poets besides Horace, as for instance in the following line of Domitius Marsus: —

"Si quos Orbilius ferula scuticaque cecidit."

But Orbilius did not, like some schoolmasters, vent all his ill temper upon his pupils, and exhibit a bland deportment to the rest of the world. He attacked his rival grammarians in the bitterest terms, and did not spare the most distinguished men in the state, of which an instance is given by Suetonius and Macrobius (ii. 6), though they differ in the name of the Roman noble whom he made game of, the former calling him Varro Murena, and the latter Galba. Orbilius lived nearly a hundred years, but had lost his memory long before his death. As he was fifty in B. C. 63, he must have been born in B. C. 113, and have died shortly before B. C. 13. A statue was erected to him at Beneventum in the Capitol. He left a son Orbilius, who followed the profession of his father; and a slave and pupil of his, of the name of Scribonius, also attained some celebrity as a grammarian. Orbilius was the author of a work cited by Suetonius under the title of Perialogos, but the name is evidently corrupt. Oudendorp proposed to read Paedagogus, and Ernesti Periautologos. (Suet. de Illustr. Gramm. 9, 19; comp. 4.)

O'RBIUS, P., a Roman jurist, and a contemporary of Cicero. (Brut. 48.) [G. L.]

ORBO'NA, a female Roman divinity, to whom an altar was erected at Rome, near the temple of the Lares in the Via Sacra. She was invoked by parents who had been deprived of their children, and desired to have others, and also in dangerous maladies of children. (Cic. de Nat. Deor. iii. 25; Plin. H. N. ii. 7; Arnob. adv. Gent. iv. 7; Tertull. ii. 14; P. Vict. Reg. Urb. x.) [L. S.]

ORCHO'MENUS (Ὀρχόμενος). 1. A son of Lycaon, and the reputed founder of the Arcadian towns of Orchomenus and Methydrium. (Apollod. iii. 8. § 1; Paus. viii. 3. § 1.)

2. A son of Athamas and Themisto. (Hygin. Fab. 1; comp. ATHAMAS.)

3. A son of Zeus or Eteocles and Hesione, the daughter of Danaus, was the husband of Hermippe, the daughter of Boeotus, by whom he became the father of Minyas. He is called a king of Orchomenus. (Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. i. 230; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 272.) According to other traditions, he was a son (or a brother) of Minyas (Paus. ix. 36. § 4) by Phanosura, the daughter of Paeon. (Comp. Müller, Orchom. p. 135, 2d edit.) [L. S.]

ORCHI'VIUS. [ORCIVIUS.]

C. O'RCHIUS, tribune of the plebs in the third year after the consulship of Cato, B. C. 181, was the author of a sumtuaria lex, limiting the number of guests to be present at entertainments. When attempts were afterwards made to repeal this law, Cato offered the strongest opposition, and delivered a speech in defence of the law, which is referred to by the grammarians. (Macrob. Saturn. ii. 13; Festus, s. vv. Obsonitavere, Percunctatum; Schol. Bob. in Cic. pro Sest. p. 310, ed. Orelli; Meyer, Orat. Rom. Fragmenta, p. 91, &c., 2nd ed.

C. ORCI'VIUS, was a colleague of Cicero in the praetorship, B. C. 66, and presided over cases of peculatus. He is called by Q. Cicero "civis ad ambitionem gratiosissimus" (Cic. pro Cluent. 34, 53; Q. Cic. de Pet. Cons. 5. § 19). The name is also written Orchivius and Orcinnius, but Orcivius seems to be the correct reading. (See Orelli, Onom. Tullian. s. v.)

ORCUS. [HADES.]

OREADES. [NYMPHAE.]

OREITHYIA (Ὀρείθυια). 1. One of the Nereides. (Hom. Il. xviii. 48.)

2. A daughter of Erechtheus and Praxithea. Once as she had strayed beyond the river Ilissus she was carried off by Boreas, by whom she became the mother of Cleopatra, Chione, Zetes, and Calais. (Apollod. iii. 15. § 1, &c.; Apollon. Rhod. i. 215; comp. Plat. Phaedr. p. 194, ed. Heind.; Schol. ad Odyss. xiv. 533.) [L. S.]

ORESAS, a Pythagorean. A fragment of his writings is preserved in Stobaeus, Eclog. p. 105. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. i. p. 860.) [C. P. M.]

ORESTES (Ὀρέστης), the only son of Agamemnon and Clytaemnestra, and brother of Chrysothemis, Laodice (Electra), and Iphianassa (Iphigeneia; Hom. Il. ix. 142, &c., 284; comp. Soph. Elect. 154; Eurip. Or. 23). According to the Homeric account, Agamemnon on his return from Troy did not see his son, but was murdered by Aegisthus and Clytaemnestra before he had an opportunity of seeing him. (Od. xi. 542.) In the eighth year after his father's murder Orestes came from Athens to Mycenae and slew the murderer of his father, and at the same time solemnised the burial of Aegisthus and of his mother, and for the revenge he had taken he gained great fame among mortals. (Od. i. 30, 298, iii. 306, &c., iv. 546.) This slender outline of the story of Orestes has been spun out and embellished in various ways by the tragic poets. Thus it is said that at the murder of Agamemnon it was intended also to despatch Orestes, but that Electra secretly entrusted him to the slave who had the management of him. This slave carried the boy to Strophius, king in Phocis, who was married to Anaxibia, the sister of Agamemnon. According to some, Orestes was saved by his nurse Geilissa (Aeschyl. Choeph. 732) or by Arsinoe or Laodameia (Pind. Pyth. xi. 25, with the Schol.), who allowed Aegisthus to kill her own child, thinking that it was Orestes. In the house of Strophius, Orestes grew up together with the king's son Pylades, with whom he formed that close and intimate friendship which has almost become proverbial. (Eurip. Orest. 804, &c.) Being frequently reminded by messengers of Electra of the necessity of avenging his father's death, he consulted the oracle of Delphi, which strengthened him in his plan. He therefore repaired in secret, and without being known to any one, to Argos. (Soph. Elect. 11, &c., 35, 296, 531, 1346; Eurip. Elect. 1245, Orest. 162.) He pretended to be a messenger of Strophius, who had come to announce the death of Orestes, and brought the ashes of the deceased. (Soph. Elect. 1110.) After having visited his father's tomb, and sacrificed upon it a lock of his hair, he made himself known to his sister Electra, who was ill used by Aegisthus and Clytaemnestra, and discussed his plan of revenge with her, which was speedily executed, for both Aegisthus and Clytaemnestra were slain by his hand in the palace. (Soph. Elect. 1405; Aeschyl. Choeph. 931; comp. Eurip. Elect. 625, 671, 774, &c., 969, &c., 1165, &c., who differs in several points from Sophocles.) Immediately after the murder of his mother he was seized by madness; he perceived the Erinnyes of his mother and took to flight. Sophocles does not mention this as the immediate consequence of the deed, and the tragedy ends where Aegisthus is led to death; but, according to Euripides, Orestes not only becomes mad; but as the Argives, in their indignation, wanted to stone him and Electra to death, and as Menelaus refused to save them, Pylades and Orestes murdered Helena, and her body was removed by the gods. Orestes also threatened Menelaus to kill his daughter Hermione; but by the intervention of Apollo, the dispute was allayed, and Orestes betrothed himself to Hermione, and Pylades to Electra. But, according to the common account, Orestes fled from land to land, pursued by the Erinnyes of his mother. On the advice of Apollo, he took refuge with Athena at Athens. The goddess afforded him protection, and appointed the court of the Areiopagus to decide his fate. The Erinnyes brought forward their accusation, and Orestes made the command of the Delphic oracle his excuse. When the court voted, and was equally divided, Orestes was acquitted by the command of Athena. (Aeschyl. Eumenides.) He therefore dedicated an altar to Athena Areia. (Paus. i. 28. § 5.) According to another modification of the legend, Orestes consulted Apollo, how he could be delivered from his madness and incessant wandering. The god advised him to go to Tauris in Scythia, and thence to fetch the image of Artemis, which was (Eurip. Iph. Taur. 79, &c., 968, &c.) believed to have there fallen from heaven, and to carry it to Athens. (Comp. Paus. iii. 16. § 6.) Orestes and Pylades accordingly went to Tauris, where Thoas was king, and on their arrival they were seized by the natives, in order to be sacrificed to Artemis, according to the custom of the country. But Iphigeneia, the priestess of Artemis, was the sister of Orestes, and, after having recognised each other, all three escaped with the statue of the goddess. (Eurip. Iph. Taur. 800, 1327, &c.)

After his return Orestes took possession of his father's kingdom at Mycenae, which had been usurped by Aletes or Menelaus; and when Cylarabes of Argos died without leaving any heir, Orestes also became king of Argos. The Lacedaemonians made him their king of their own accord, because they preferred him, the grandson of Tyndareus, to Nicostratus and Megapenthes, the sons of Menelaus by a slave. The Arcadians and Phocians increased his power by allying themselves with him. (Paus. ii. 18. § 5, iii. 1. § 4; Philostr. Her. 6; Pind. Pyth. xi. 24.) He married Hermione, the daughter of Menelaus, and became by her the father of Tisamenus. (Paus. ii. 18. § 5.) He is said to have led colonists from Sparta to Aeolis, and the town of Argos Oresticum in Epeirus is said to have been founded by him at the time when he wandered about in his madness. (Strab. vii. p. 326, xiii. p. 582; Pind. Nem. xi. 42, with the Schol.) In his reign the Dorians under Hyllus are said to have invaded Peloponnesus. (Paus. viii. 5. § 1.) He died of the bite of a snake in Arcadia (Schol. ad Eur. Or. 1640), and his body, in accordance with an oracle, was afterwards conveyed from Tegea to Sparta, and there buried. (Paus. iii. 11. § 8.) In a war between the Lacedaemonians and Tegeatans, a truce was concluded, and during this truce the Lacedaemonian Lichas found the remains of Orestes at Tegea or Thyrea in the house of a blacksmith, and thence took them to Sparta, which according to an oracle could not gain the victory unless it possessed the remains of Orestes. (Herod. i. 67, &c.; Paus. iii. 3. § 6, viii. 54. § 3.) According to an Italian legend, Orestes brought the image of the Taurian Artemis to Aricia, whence it was carried in later times to Sparta; and Orestes himself was buried at Aricia, whence his remains were afterwards carried to Rome. (Serv. ad Aen. ii. 116.)

There are three other mythical personages of the name of Orestes, concerning whom nothing of interest is related. (Hom. Il. v. 705, xii. 139, 193; Apollod. i. 7. § 3.) [L. S.]

ORESTES (Ὀρέστης), regent of Italy during the short reign of his infant son Romulus Augustulus, from the 29th of August, A. D. 475, to the 28th of August, 476. As his history is given in the lives of Romulus Augustulus, Nepos, and Odoacer, we need only add here a few remarks. He was a Roman by origin, but born in Pannonia, and when Attila conquered that province, he and his father Tatulus both entered the service of the conqueror till the death of the latter and the downfal of the Hunnic empire. Orestes held the office of secretary to Attila, and was also his ambassador at Constantinople. After the death of Attila, Orestes returned to Italy, where on account of his great wealth, he soon rose to eminence, and obtained the title and rank of patricius. He then married a daughter of Romulus Comes. In 475, while at Rome, he received orders from the emperor Julius Nepos to assemble an army and send it to Gaul, as fears were entertained that the West Gothic king Euric intended another invasion of that country. Being once at the head of an army, Orestes availed himself of his power and riches to make himself master of Italy, and forthwith set out for Ravenna, where Nepos was residing. On his approach Nepos fled in confusion (28th of August, 475) to Salona in Dalmatia, where he met with the deposed emperor Glycerius, his former rival, who was then bishop of that place ; and on the 29th of August Orestes had his son Romulus Augustulus proclaimed emperor, remaining, however, at the head of affairs. His first minister was Parmenus. He sent Latinus and Madusus to Constantinople, that he might be recognised by the emperor Zeno ; aud he made peace with Genseric, the king of the Vandals. The reign of Orestes was of short duration. In the following year (476) Odoacer rose in arms against him, and Orestes having shut himself up in Pavia, was taken prisoner after the town had been stormed by the barbarians, and conducted to Placentia where his head was cut off by order of Odoacer. This took place on the 28th of August, 476, exactly a year after he had compelled Nepos to fly from Ravenna. On the 4th of September Paulus, the brother of Orestes, was taken at Ravenna, and likewise put to death. (The authorities quoted in the lives of ROMULUS AUGUSTULUS, GLYCERIUS, JULIUS NEPOS, and ODOACER.) [W. P.]

ORESTES (Ὀρέστης), a Christian physician of Tyana in Cappadocia, called also Arestes, who suffered martyrdom during the persecution under Diocletian, A. D. 303, 304. An interesting account of his tortures and death is given by Simeon Metaphrastes, ap. Surium, De Probat. Sanctor. Histor., vol. vi. p. 231, where he is named Arestes. See also Menolog. Graec. vol. i. p. 178, ed. Urbin. 1727. He has been canonized by the Greek and Roman churches, and his memory is celebrated on Nov. 9. (See Bzovius, Nomenclator Sanctor. Profess. Medicor.) [W. A. G.]

ORESTES, CN. AUFI'DIUS, originally belonged to the Aurelia gens, whence his surname of Orestes, and was adopted by Cn. Aufidius, the historian, when the latter was an old man [See Vol. I. p. 418, b.]. Orestes was repulsed when a candidate for the tribunate of the plebs, but he obtained the consulship in B. C. 71, with P. Cornelius Lentulus. From an anecdote recorded by Cicero (de Off. ii. 17) Orestes seems to have carried his election partly by the magnificent treats he gave the people. (Cic. pro Dom. 13, pro Planc. 21 ; Eutrop. vi. 8.)

ORESTES, AURE'LIUS. 1. L. AURELIUS L. F. L. N. ORESTES, consul B. C. 157, with Sex. Julius Caesar. (Fasti Capit. ; Plin. H. N. xxxiii. 3. s. 17.)

2. L. AURELIUS L. F. L. N. ORESTES, son of the preceding, was consul B. C. 126, with M. Aemilius Lepidus. He was sent into Sardinia to subdue the inhabitants of the island, who had again risen against the Roman authority, as they had done on many previous occasions. Orestes remained in his province upwards of three years, and obtained a triumph on his return to Rome in B. C. 122. C. Gracchus was quaestor to Orestes in Sardinia, and distinguished himself greatly by the way in which he there discharged the duties of his office. M. Aemilius Scaurus also served under Orestes in Sardinia (Liv. Epit. 60 ; Plut. C. Gracch. 1, 2 ; Cic. Brut. 28 ; Aur. Vict. de Vir. Ill. 72 ; Fasti Capit.) This Aurelius Orestes obtains a place, along with his brother C. Aurelius Orestes, in the list of orators in the Brutus of Cicero (c. 25), who, however, only says of them, "quos aliquo video in numero oratorum fuisse."

3. C. AURELIUS ORESTES, younger son of No. 1. See No. 2, sub finem.

4. L. AURELIUS L. F. L. N. ORESTES, son of No. 2, was consul with C. Marius, in the third consulship of the latter, B. C. 103, and died in the same year. (Fasti : comp. Plut. Mar. 14.)

5. CN. AURELIUS ORESTES, praetor urbanus B. C. 77, one of whose decisions was annulled upon appeal by the consul Mamercus Aemilius Lepidus. (Val. Max. vii. 7. § 6.)

ORESTHEUS (Ὀρεσθεύς), a son of Lycaon, and the reputed founder of Oresthasium, which is said afterwards to have been called Oresteium, from Orestes. (Paus. viii. 3. § 1 ; Eurip. Orest. 1642.)

2. A son of Deucalion, and king of the Ozolian Locrians in Aetolia. His dog is said to have given birth to a piece of wood, which Orestheus concealed in the earth. In the spring a vine grew forth from it, from the sprouts of which he derived the name of his people. (Paus. x. 38. § 1 ; Hecat. ap. Athen. ii. p. 35.) [L. S.]

ORESTILLA, AURE'LIA. [AURELIA.]

ORESTILLA, LI'VIA, called Cornelia Orestina by Dion Cassius, was the second wife of Caligula, whom he married in A. D. 37. He carried her away on the day of her marriage to Piso, having been invited to the nuptial banquet, but divorced her before two months had elapsed, and banished her and Piso. (Suet. Cal. 25 ; Dion Cass. lix. 8.)

ORFITUS, or ORPHITUS, a cognomen of several gentile names under the empire, does not occur in the time of the republic. Orfitus is the correct orthography, as we see from inscriptions. Many of the Orfiti mentioned below are only known from the Consular Fasti, and from inscriptions.

1. SER. CORNELIUS ORFITUS, consul in A. D. 51, with the emperor Claudius (Tac. Ann. xii. 41 ; Plin. H. N. ii. 31 ; and the inscription in Fabrettus, p. 472). In A. D. 66 Orfitus proposed, in honour of the imperial family, that the month of June should for the future be called Germanicus (Tac. Ann. xvi. 12). It would appear, from an incidental notice in Tacitus (Hist. iv. 42), that Orfitus perished not long after this, by an accusation of the informer Aquillius Regulus.

2. SALVIDIENUS ORFITUS, one of the victims of Nero's cruelty and caprice. (Suet. Ner. 37.)

3. PACCIUS ORFITUS, a centurion primi pili in Corbulo's army in the East, in the reign of Nero. (Tac. Ann. xiii. 36, xv. 12.)

4. SALVIDIENUS ORFITUS, banished by Domitian, on the pretext of conspiracy. (Suet. Dom. 10.)

5. CORNELIUS SCIPIO ORFITUS, one of the consules suffecti A. D. 101.

6. SER. SALVIDIENUS ORFITUS, consul A. D. 110, with M. Peducaeus Priscinus.

7. SER. SCIPIO ORFITUS, consul A. D. 149, with Q. Nonius Priscus. He is perhaps the same as the Orfitus who was praefectus urbi in the reign of Antoninus Pius (Capitol. Anton. Pius, 8). This emperor reigned from A. D. 138 to 161.

8. M. GAVIUS ORFITUS, consul A. D. 165, with L. Arrius Pudens.

9. ORFITUS, consul A. D. 172, with Maximus. (Lamprid. Commod. 11.)

10. ORFITUS GAVIUS, consul A. D. 178, with Julianus Rufus. (Lamprid. Commod. 12.)

As the three persons last mentioned all lived in the reign of M. Aurelius (A. D. 161—180), it is impossible to say which of them was the Orfitus who was advanced to various honours in the state by this emperor, although he was the paramour of the empress (Capitol. M. Anton. Phil. 29).

11. ORFITUS, consul in A. D. 270, with Antiochianus. Trebellius Pollio (Claud. 11) calls his colleague Atticianus.

M. O'RFIUS, a Roman eques, of the municipium of Atella, was a tribune of the soldiers in Caesar's army, whom Caesar strongly recommended in B. C. 59 to his brother Quintus, who was then one of Caesar's legates. (Cic. ad Qu. Fr. ii. 14.)

ORGE'TORIX, the noblest and richest among the Helvetii, anxious to obtain the royal power, formed a conspiracy of the principal chiefs in B. C. 61, and persuaded his countrymen to emigrate from their own country with a view of conquering the whole of Gaul. Two years were devoted to making the necessary preparations; but the real designs of Orgetorix having meantime transpired, the Helvetii brought him to trial for his ambitious projects. Orgetorix, however, by means of his numerous retainers, set justice at defiance; and while the Helvetii were collecting forces to compel him to submit to their laws, he suddenly died, probably, as was suspected, by his own hands. Notwithstanding his death the Helvetii carried into execution the project which he had formed, and were thus the first people with whom Caesar was brought into contact in Gaul. After their defeat a daughter of Orgetorix and one of his sons fell into the hands of Caesar. (Caes. B. G. i. 2—4, 26; Dion Cass. xxxviii. 31.)

ORIBA'SIUS (Ὀρειβάσιος or Ὀριβάσιος), an eminent Greek medical writer, who was born probably about A. D. 325. Suidas (s. v. Ὀρειβάσιος) and Philostorgius (Hist. Eccles. vii. 15) call him a native of Sardes in Lydia; but his friend and biographer Eunapius says (Vit. Philos. et Sophist. p. 170, ed. Antw.) he was born at Pergamus in Mysia, the birth-place of Galen. According to the same author, he belonged to a respectable family, and, after receiving a good preliminary education, he studied medicine under Zeno of Cyprus, and had for his fellow-pupils Ionicus and Magnus. He early acquired a great professional reputation. It is not known exactly when or where he became acquainted with the emperor Julian, but it was probably while that young prince was kept in confinement in different places in Asia Minor. He was soon honoured with his confidence and friendship, and was almost the only person to whom Julian imparted the secret of his apostacy from Christianity. (Eunap. l. c. p. 90; Julian, ad Athen. p. 277, B. ed. 1696.) When Julian was raised to the rank of Caesar, and sent into Gaul, Dec. 355, he took Oribasius with him (Julian, l. c. p. 277, C.; Oribas. ap. Phot. Biblioth. Cod. 217); and in the following year (see Clinton's Fasti Rom.), on the occasion of some temporary absence, addressed to him a letter, which is still extant (Epist. 17), and is an evidence both of their intimacy and of their devotion to paganism. It was while they were in Gaul together that Julian commanded Oribasius to make an epitome of Galen's writings, with which he was so much pleased that he imposed upon him the further task of adding to the work whatever was most valuable in the other medical writers. This he accomplished (though not till after Julian had become emperor, A. D. 361) in seventy (Phot. Biblioth. Cod. 217) or (according to Suidas) in seventy-two books, part of which are still extant under the title Συναγωγαὶ Ἰατρικαί, Collecta Medicinalia, and will be mentioned again below. Eunapius seems to say that Oribasius was in some way instrumental in raising Julian to the throne (βασιλέα τὸν Ἰουλιανὸν ἀπέδειξε), but the meaning of the passage is doubtful, as the writer refers for the particulars of the transaction to one of his lost works. He was appointed by the emperor, soon after his accession, quaestor of Constantinople (Suid. l. c.), and sent to Delphi to endeavour to restore the oracle of Apollo to its former splendour and authority; but in this mission he failed, as the only answer he brought back was that the oracle was no more:—

Εἴπατε τῷ βασιλεῖ, χαμαὶ πέσε δαίδαλος αὐλά.
Οὐκέτι Φοῖβος ἔχει καλύβαν, οὐ μάντιδα δάφνην
Οὐ παγὰν λαλέουσαν, ἀπέσβετο καὶ λάλον ὕδωρ.

(Cedren. Hist. Compend. p. 304, ed. 1647.)

He accompanied Julian in his expedition against Persia, and was with him at the time of his death, June 26, A. D. 363. (Philostorg. l. c.) The succeeding emperors, Valentinian and Valens, were not so favourably disposed towards Oribasius, but confiscated his property, and banished him to some nation of "barbarians" (as they are called)—probably the Goths: they had even thought of putting him to death. The cause of this treatment is not mentioned; his friend Eunapius (who is not a very impartial witness) attributes it to envy on account of his reputation (διὰ τὴν ὑπεροχὴν τῆς δόξης), but we may easily suppose the emperors to have had some more creditable motive than this, and might perhaps be allowed to conjecture that he had made himself obnoxious, either in the discharge of his duties as quaestor, or by his enmity against the Christians. In his exile Oribasius exhibited proofs both of his fortitude and his medical skill, whereby he gained such influence and esteem among the barbarian kings, that he became one of their principal men, while the common people looked upon him as almost a god. As Eunapius does not mention that the emperors who recalled Oribasius were different from those who banished him (l. c. p. 173), it is probable that his exile did not last long, and that it ended before the year 369. After his return he married a lady of good family and fortune, and had by her four children, one of whom was probably his son Eustathius, to whom he addressed his "Synopsis," mentioned below. He also had his property restored out of the public treasury by command of the succeeding emperors, but Eunapius does not specify which emperors he means. The date of his death is unknown, but he was still living with his four children when Eunapius inserted the account of his life in his "Vitae Philosophorum et Sophistarum," that is, at least as late as the year 395. (See Clinton's Fasti Rom.) Of the personal character of Oribasius we know little or nothing, but it is clear that he was much attached to paganism and to the heathen philosophy. He was an intimate friend of Eunapius, who praises him very highly, and wrote an account of his life. He attended the philosopher Chrysanthius on his death-bed (Eunap. l. c. p. 197); and there is a short letter addressed to him by Isidorus of Pelusium (Epist. i. 437, ed. Paris, 1638), and two epigrams written in his honour in the Greek Anthology (ix. 199, and Anthol. Planud. iv. 274, vol. ii. p. 106, iii. 295, ed. Tauchn.). He is several times quoted by Aëtius and Paulus Aegineta. Some of his works were translated into Arabic (see Wenrich, De Auctor. Graecor. Version. Syriac. Arab. &c. p. 295); and an abridgement of them was made by Theophanes at the command of the emperor Constantine Porphyrogenitus. (See Lambec. Biblioth. Vindob. vi. pp. 261, 264, 266, ed. Kollar.)

We possess at present three works of Oribasius, which are generally considered to be genuine. The first of these is called Συναγωγαὶ Ἰατρικαί, Collecta Medicinalia, or sometimes Ἑβδομηκοντάβιβλος, Hebdomecontabiblos (Paul. Aegin. lib. i. Praef.), and is the work that was compiled (as was said above) at the command of Julian, when Oribasius was still a young man. It would be impossible to give here an analysis of its contents. It contains but little original matter, but is very valuable on account of the numerous extracts from writers whose works are no longer extant. This work had become scarce, on account of its bulk, as early as the time of Paulus Aegineta (Paul. Aegin. l. c.); it was translated into Syriac in the ninth century by Honain Ibn Ishak and Isa Ibn Yahya, with the title "Collectionis Medicinalis Libri Septuaginta" (Wenrich, l. c.); but in the following century, though Haly Abbas was aware of its existence, he says he had never seen more than one book out of the seventy. (Theor. i. 1, p. 5, ed. 1523.) More than half of this work is now lost, and what remains is in some confusion, so that it is not easy to specify exactly how many books are at present actually in existence; it is, however, believed that we possess twenty-five (viz. 1—15, 21, 22, 24, 25, 44—49), with fragments of two others (viz. 50 and 51). The first fifteen books were first published in a Latin translation by J. Bapt. Rasarius (together with the 24th and 25th), Venet. 8vo. without date, but before 1555. They were published in Greek and Latin by C. F. Matthaei, Mosqu. 1808, 4to., but with the omission of all the extracts from Galen, Rufus Ephesius, and Dioscorides. This edition, which is very scarce, is entitled "XXI. Veterum et Clarorum Medicorum Graecorum varia Opuscula." The first and second books had been previously published in Greek and Latin by C. G. Gruner, Jenae, 1782, 4to. Books 21 and 22 were discovered in MS. by Dietz about fifteen years ago, but have not hitherto been published, either in Greek or Latin. (See Dietz, Schol. in Hippocr. et Gal. vol. i. praef.; Daremberg, Rapport adressé à M. le Ministre de l'Instruction Publique, Paris, 8vo. 1845, p. 7.) Books 24 and 25 treat of anatomy, and may perhaps be the work translated into Arabic with the title "De Membrorum Anatomia." (Wenrich, l. c.) They were translated into Latin by J. Bapt. Rasarius, and published together with the first fifteen books. A Greek edition appeared at Paris, 1556, 8vo. ap. Guil. Morelium, with the title "Collectaneorum Artis Medicae Liber," &c.; and W. Dundass published them in Greek and Latin in 1735, 4to. Lugd. Bat., with the title "Oribasii Anatomica ex Libris Galeni." Book 44 was published in Greek and Latin, with copious notes, by U. C. Bussemaker, Groning. 1835, 8vo.; having previously appeared in Greek, together with books 45, 48, and 49, and parts of 50 and 51 (but with the omission of all the extracts from Galen and Hippocrates), in the fourth volume of Angelo Mai's "Classici Auctores e Vaticanis Codicibus editi." Rom. 1831, 8vo. Books 46 and 47 were published by Ant. Cocchi at Florence, 1754, fol. in Greek and Latin, with the title "Graecorum Chirurgici Libri," &c. Books 48 and 49 were first published in Latin by Vidus Vidius in his "Chirurgia e Graeco in Latinum a se conversa," &c.; and are to be found in Greek, together with fragments of books 50 and 51, in Angelo Mai's collection mentioned above. It will appear at once, from the above list of the editions of the different parts of this work, how much we are in want of a critical and uniform edition of those books which still remain; a want which (as we learn from M. Daremberg's Rapport, quoted above) is likely to be supplied by Dr. Bussemaker.

The second work of Oribasius, that is still extant, was written probably about thirty years after the above, of which it is an abridgment (Σύνοψις). It consists of nine books, and is addressed to his son Eustathius, for whose use and at whose request it was composed. This work was translated into Arabic by Honain Ibn Ishak, with the title "Ad Filium suum Eustathium Libri Novem" (Wenrich, l. c.), and was known to Haly Abbas, who, as well as Paulus Aegineta (l. c.), notices the omission of several topics which he considered ought to have found a place in it. It has never been published in Greek, but was translated into Latin by J. Bapt. Rasarius, and printed at Venice, 1554, 8vo.

The third work of Oribasius is entitled Εὐπόριστα, Euporista or De facile Parabilibus, and consists of four books. It is addressed to Eunapius, probably his friend and biographer, who requested Oribasius to undertake the work, though Photius says (l. c.) that in his time some copies were ascribed to a person of the name of Eugenius. Sprengel doubts (Hist. de la Méd.) the genuineness of this work, but probably without sufficient reason: it appears to be the "smaller" work of Oribasius mentioned by Haly Abbas (l. c.), and is probably the treatise that was translated into Arabic by Stephanus with the title "De Medicamentis Usitatis" (Wenrich, l. c.). Both this and the preceding work were intended as manuals of the practice of medicine, and are in a great measure made up of extracts from his "Collecta Medicinalia." The Greek text has never been printed. The first Latin translation was published by J. Sichard, Basil. 1529, fol. at the end of his edition of Caelius Aurelianus; the next edition is that by J. Bapt. Rasarius, Venet. 1558, 8vo., which is more complete than the preceding. Rasarius united the "Synopsis ad Eustathium," the "Euporista ad Eunapium," and the nineteen books of the "Collecta Medicinalia" that were then discovered (including the two treatises "De Laqueis" and "De Machinamentis"), and published them together, with the title "Oribasii quae restant Omnia," Basil. 1557, 3 vols. 8vo. They are also to be found in H. Stephani "Medicae Artis Principes," Paris, 1567, fol. The pieces entitled "De Victus Ratione, per quodlibet Anni Tempus" (Basil. 1528, fol.) and "De Simplicibus" (Argent. 1533, fol.) are probably extracted from his larger works.

Oribasius is said by Suidas to have been the author of some other works which are now lost, viz. 1. Περὶ Βασιλείας, De Regno; 2. Περὶ Παθῶν, De Affectibus; and 3. Πρὸς τοὺς Ἀποροῦντας τῶν Ἰατρῶν, Ad illos quibus Medicorum Copia non datur (or perhaps rather Ad Medicos dubitantes, vel inopes Consilii), which last has been conjectured to have been the same work as the "Euporista ad Eunapium," mentioned above.

Besides these works, a commentary on the Aphorisms of Hippocrates goes under the name of Oribasius, but is undoubtedly spurious. It was first published in Latin by J. Guinterius Andernacus, Paris, 1533, 8vo., and has been thrice reprinted. It is probable that the work does not exist in Greek, and that it was written by a person who made use of a Latin translation of the "Synopsis ad Eustathium," and who composed it with the intention of passing it off as the genuine work of Oribasius. If so, it is a clumsy forgery, and betrays its spurious origin to the most cursory inspector, being apparently the work of a Christian, and at the same time purporting to be written at the command of Ptolemy Euergetes. It has been conjectured that it was composed by some physician belonging to the school of Salerno, about the beginning of the fourteenth century; but this is certainly too recent, as it is to be found in two MSS. at Paris, which are supposed to belong to the tenth century. (See Littré's Hippocrates, vol. iv. p. 443.)

A further account of Oribasius, especially of his medical opinions, may be found in Freind's Hist. of Physic, vol. i.; Haller's Biblioth. Anat., Biblioth. Chirurg., Biblioth. Botan., and Biblioth. Medic. Pract.; Sprengel's Hist. de la Méd.; and in J. F. C. Hecker's Litterar. Annal. der gesammten Heilkunde, 1825, vol. i., which last work the writer has never seen. See also Fabric. Biblioth. Gr. vol. ix. p. 451, xii. 640, xiii. 353, ed. vet.; and Choulant, Handb. der Bücherkunde für die Aeltere Medicin. [W. A. G.]

ORI'GENES (Ὠριγένης), one of the most eminent of the early Christian writers, not only for his intellectual powers and attainments, but also for the influence exercised by him on the opinions of subsequent ages, and for the dissensions and discussions respecting his opinions, which have been carried on through many centuries down to modern times.

I. Life. Origen bore, apparently from his birth (Euseb. H. E. vi. 14) the additional name of Adamantius (Ἀδαμάντιος), though Epiphanius states (Haeres. lxiv. 73) that he assumed it himself. Doubtless, the name was regarded by the admirers of Origen as significant either of his unwearied industry (Hieron. Ep. xliii. ad Marcellam, c. 1. vol. i. p. 190 ed Vallars.), or of the irrefragable strength of his arguments (Phot. Bibl. cod. 118); but these obviously laudatory interpretations of it render it improbable that Origen assumed it himself, as a boastful temper does not appear to have been at all characteristic of him. The names "Chalcenterus" Χαλκέντερος ("brasen-bowels") given him by Jerome (l. c.), and "Chalceutes" Χαλκεύτης ("brasier"), and "Syntactes" Συντάκτης ("Composer") conferred upon him by others (Epiph. Haeres. lxiii. 1; and Tillemont. Mém. vol. iii. p. 497), appear to have been mere epithets, expressive of his assiduity. As he was in his seventeenth year, at the time of his father's death, which occurred apparently in April 203 (Huet. Origenian. i. 8), in the persecution which began in the tenth year of the reign of the Emperor Severus, his birth must be fixed in or about A. D. 186. The year 187, given in the Chronicon Paschale, is too late; and 185, given by most modern writers, too early. His father was Leonides (Λεωνίδης), a devout Christian of Alexandria. Suidas (s. v. Ὠριγένης) calls him "bishop;" but his authority, unsupported by any ancient testimony, is insufficient to prove his episcopal character. Porphyry (apud Euseb. H. E. vi. 19) speaks of Origen, with whom he claimed to have been acquainted in early life, as having been educated a heathen, and afterwards converted to Christianity; but, as his acquaintance with Origen was apparently very slight, and when Origen was an old man, his authority in such a matter is of little weight. Leonides gave his son a careful education, not only in the usual branches of knowledge, but especially in the Scriptures, of which he made him commit to memory and recite a portion every day.

Origen was a pupil of Clement of Alexandria, and he also received some instruction of Pantaenus apparently after his return from India. [Pantaenus.] He had Alexander, afterwards bishop of Jerusalem, for his early friend and fellow-student (Alex. ap. Euseb. H. E. vi. 14).

In the persecution which commenced in the tenth year of Severus (A. D. 202) Leonides was imprisoned, and after a time beheaded. Origen was anxious to share with his father the glory of martyrdom; and when this desire was frustrated by the watchfulness of his mother, who, after vainly entreating him to give up his purpose, hid away all his clothes, and so prevented him from leaving home, he wrote a letter to his father, exhorting him to steadfastness, in the words "See that thou changest not thy mind for our sakes." By the death of Leonides, his widow, with Origen and six younger sons, was reduced to destitution, the property of the martyr having been confiscated. Origen was, however, received into the house of a wealthy female, then living at Alexandria, who had, among her inmates at the time, one Paul of Antioch, whom she regarded as a son, who was in bad repute on account of his heretical opinions. Neander calls him a Gnostic. His eloquence, however, attracted a considerable audience, not only of those who sympathised in his views, but of the orthodox; yet Origen refused to unite in prayer with him, "detesting," as he has somewhere expressed it, "heretical teachings." (Euseb. H. E. vi. 2.) This repugnance probably quickened his efforts to become independent, and his ardent application to study enabled him soon to extricate himself from difficulty by becoming a teacher of the branches of education comprehended under the epithet "grammatical" (τὰ γραμματικά). (Euseb. ibid.) His attainments included, according to Jerome (De Vir. Illustr. c. 54) and Gregory Thuamaturgus (Paneg. in Origen. c. 7, 8, 9), ethics, grammar, rhetoric, dialectics or logic, geometry, arithmetic, music, and an acquaintance with the tenets of the various philosophical sects; to which may be added an acquaintance with the Hebrew language, a rare acquisition among the Christians of those days. It is probable, however, that several of these attainments were made later in life than the time of which we are now speaking. His knowledge of Hebrew was most likely of later date; from whom he acquired it is not clear. He often quotes (vid. Hieronym. in Rufin. lib. i., Opera, vol. iv. pars ii. col. 363, ed. Benedict, vol. ii. pars i. ed. Vallars.) Huillus, a patriarch of the Jews, of whom nothing appears to be known; but whether he was Origen's instructor in the Hebrew language is only conjecture. If Origen was, as Porphyry (ap. Euseb. H. E. vi. 19) and Theodoret (Graecar. Affection. Curat. lib. vi. Opera, vol. iv. p. 573, ed. Sirmond. p. 869. ed Schulze) affirm, a hearer of Ammonius Saccas [AMMONIUS SACCAS], it was probably at a later period, when he attended a lecturer on philosophy, whom he does not name, to gain an acquaintance with the Greek philosophy. (Origen. ap. Euseb. H. E. vi. 19.) Epiphanius (Haeres. lxiv. 1) says that perhaps he studied at Athens; but it is not likely that he visited that city in early life, though he was there when he travelled into Greece many years afterward.

Within a very short time after he had commenced teacher of grammar, he was applied to by some heathens who desired instruction in Christianity. The first of those who applied to him were Plutarchus, who suffered martyrdom at Alexandria very shortly after, and his brother Heraclas, who became in the sequel Origen's assistant and successor in the office of Catechist, and afterward bishop of Alexandria. At the time of their application to Origen, the office of Catechist was vacant through the dispersion of the clergy consequent on the persecution; and Demetrius, the bishop, shortly after appointed Origen, though only in his eighteenth year, to the office. The young teacher showed a zeal and self-denial beyond his years. The persecution was still raging; but he shrunk not from giving every support and encouragement to those who suffered, frequently at the risk of his life. The number of those who resorted to him as Catechist continually increased; and, deeming his profession as teacher of grammar inconsistent with his sacred work, he gave it up; and that he might not, in the failure of this source of income, become dependent on others, he sold all his books of secular literature, and lived for many years on an income of four oboli a day derived from the proceeds of the sale. His course of life was of the most rigorously ascetic character. His food, and his periods of sleep, which he took, not in a bed, but on the bare ground, were restricted within the narrowest limits; and, understanding literally the precepts of the Lord Jesus Christ, not to have two coats and to take no shoes (Matt. x. 10.), he went for many years barefoot, by which and by other austerities he had nearly ruined his health. The same ascetic disposition, and the same tendency to interpret to the letter the injunctions of the Scriptures, led him to a strange act of self-mutilation, in obedience to what he regarded as the recommendation of Christ. (Matt. xix. 12.) He was influenced to this act also by the consideration of his own youth, and by the circumstance that his catechumens were of both sexes. He wished, however, to conceal what he had done, and appears to have been much confused when it was divulged; but the bishop Demetrius, respecting his motive, exhorted him to take courage, though he did not hesitate, at a subsequent period, to make it a matter of severe accusation against him. (Euseb. H. E. vi. 3, 8; Epiphan. Haeres. lxiv. 3; Hieron. Epist. 65, ed. vett., 41, ed. Benedict., 84, ed. Vallars.) Origen himself (Comment. in Matt. tom. xv. 1) afterwards repudiated this literal understanding of our Lord's words.

With the death of Severus (A. D. 211), if not before, the persecution (in which Plutarchus and others of Origen's catechumens had perished) ceased; and Origen, anxiously desiring to become acquainted with the church at Rome, visited the imperial city during the papacy of Zephyrinus, which extended, according to Tillemont, from A. D. 201, or 202, to 218. Tillemont and Neander place this visit in A.D. 211 or 212. He made however a very short stay; and when he returned to Alexandria (Euseb. H. E. vi. 14), finding himself unable to discharge alone the duties of Catechist, and to give the attention which he desired to biblical studies, he gave up a part of his catechumens (who flocked to him from morning till evening) to the care of his early pupil Heraclas. It was probably about this time that he began to devote himself to the study of the Hebrew language (Euseb. H. E. vi. 15, 16); and also to the study of the Greek philosophy, his eminence in which is admitted by Porphyry (ap. Euseb. H. E. vi. 19), that he might instruct and refute the heretics and heathens, who, attracted by his growing reputation, resorted to him to test his attainments, or to profit by them. Among those who thus resorted to him was one Ambrosius, or Ambrose, a Valentinian, according to Eusebius (H. E. vi. 18); a Marcionite, or a Sabellian, according to other accounts reported by Epiphanius (Haeres. lxiv. 3); at any rate a dissenter of some kind from the orthodox church; a man of wealth, rank, and earnestness of character. Origen convinced him of his error; and Ambrose, grateful for the benefit, became the great supporter of Origen in his biblical labours, devoting his wealth to his service, and supplying him with more than seven amanuenses to write from his dictation, and as many transcribers to make fair copies of his works. (Euseb. H. E. vi. 23.) About this time he undertook a journey into Petraea, the Roman Arabia, at the request of the governor of that province, who, wishing to confer with him on some matter not specified, had despatched an officer with letters to the governor of Egypt and the bishop of Alexandria, requesting Origen might be sent to him. After a short absence on this business, he returned to Alexandria. It was perhaps on this visit that he heard Hippolytus preach [HIPPOLYTUS, No. 1]. After a time he again left Alexandria on account of a serious disturbance which arose there; and, not deeming himself safe in any part of Egypt, withdrew to Caesareia in Palestine. Huet (Origeniana, lib. i. c. ii. § 6), Tillemont, and others identify the tumult (Eusebius calls it "the war") which compelled Origen to quit Alexandria, with the slaughter of the people of that city by Caracalla. [CARACALLA.] If this conjecture is admitted, it enables us to assign to Origen's removal the date A. D. 216. At Caesareia he received the most respectful treatment. Though not yet ordained to the priesthood, he was invited to expound the Scriptures, and to discourse publicly in the church. Theoctistus, bishop of Caesareia, and Alexander, bishop of Jerusalem, the latter of whom had been a fellow-student of Origen, were among the prelates at whose invitation he was induced thus to come forward: and when Demetrius of Alexandria, who was growing jealous of Origen, objected to it as an unheard of irregularity, that a layman should preach before bishops, they vindicated him by citing several precedents. It was perhaps during this visit to Palestine that Origen met with one of the Greek versions of the Old Testament, the Editio Quinta or Sexta, which he published in his Hexapla, and which is said to have been found in a wine jar at Jericho. He returned to Alexandria, apparently about the end of Caracalla's reign, at the desire of Demetrius, who sent some deacons of his church to hasten him home (Euseb. H. E. vi. 19). He returned with zeal to the discharge of his office of Catechist, and to the diligent pursuit of his biblical labours.

His next journey was into Greece. Eusebius (H. E. vi. 23) describes the occasion in general terms, as being ecclesiastical business, but Rufinus (In versione Eusebii, l. c.) and Jerome (De Vir. Illustr. c. 54) more exactly describe the object as being the refutation of heretics who were increasing there. Passing through Palestine on his way, he was ordained presbyter by his friends, Theoctistus and Alexander, and the other bishops of that province, at Caesareia. This aroused again the jealousy of Demetrius, and led to a decisive rupture between him and Origen, who, however, completed his journey, in the course of which he probably met with a Greek version of the O. T. (the Sexta or Quinta Editio of his Hexapla), which had been discovered by one of his friends at Nicopolis, in Epeirus, near the Promontory of Actium, on the Ambracian Gulf (Synopsis Sacrae Scripturae, Athanasio adscripta). Possibly it was on this journey that Origen had the interview with Mammaea, mother of the emperor Alexander Severus, mentioned by Eusebius (H. E. vi. 21). Mammaea was led by the curiosity which Origen's great reputation had excited, to solicit an interview with him when she was at Antioch. Tillemont places this interview at an earlier period, A. D. 218, Huet in A. D. 223; but the date is altogether uncertain. The journey of Origen into Greece is placed by Eusebius, as we understand the passage, in the episcopate of Pontianus at Rome, which extended from A. D. 230, or, according to other accounts, from 233 to 235, and of Zebinus at Antioch from A. D. 228 to 237; but Tillemont and Huet interpret the passage so as to fix the ordination of Origen in A. D. 228, about the time when Zebinus of Antioch succeeded Philetus. We are disposed to place it in A. D. 230.

On his return to Alexandria, he had to encounter the open enmity of Demetrius. The remembrance of incidents of the former part of his life was revived and turned to his disadvantage. His self-mutilation, which had been excused at the time, was now urged against him; and a passage in Epiphanius (Haeres. lxiv. 2) gives reason to think that a charge of having offered incense to heathen deities was also brought against him. Eusebius has omitted the account of the steps taken by Demetrius against Origen from his Ecclesiastical History, on the ground that they were related in the Defence of Origen (Ὑπὲρ Ὠριγένους ἀπολογία, Apologia pro Origene) drawn up by Pamphilus and Eusebius; and the loss of this defence has deprived us of the most trustworthy account of these transactions. However, we learn from Photius, who has preserved (Bibl. Cod. 118) a notice of the lost work, that a council of Egyptian prelates and presbyters was held by Demetrius, in which it was determined that Origen should leave Alexandria, and not be allowed either to reside or to teach there. His office of Catechist devolved or was bestowed on his colleague Heraclas. His ordination, however, was not invalidated, and indeed the passage in Photius seems to imply that the council expressly decided that he should retain his priesthood. But Demetrius was determined that he should not retain it; and, in conjunction with certain Egyptian prelates, creatures, it would appear, of his own, he pronounced his degradation. Origen had probably, before this second sentence, retired from Alexandria into Palestine, where he was welcomed and protected, and where he taught and preached with great reputation. It was, perhaps, mortification at having failed to crush Origen that led Demetrius to take the further step of excommunicating him, and to write to the bishops of all parts of the world to obtain their concurrence in the sentence. Such was the deference already paid to the see of Alexandria, and to the decision of the Egyptian bishops, that, except in Palestine and the adjacent countries, Arabia and Phoenicia, in Greece, and perhaps in Cappadocia, where Origen was personally known and respected, the condemnation appears to have obtained general assent. Even the bishop and clergy of Rome joined in the general cry. (Hieron. Epist. 29, ed. Benedict., 33, ed. Vallars. and apud Rufin. Invectiv. ii. 19, ed. Vallars.) It is probable that Origen's unpopularity arose from the obnoxious character of some of his opinions, and was increased by the circumstance that even in his life-time (Hieron. In Rufin. ii. 18) his writings were seriously corrupted. It appears also that the indiscretion of Ambrosius had published some things which were not designed for general perusal. (Hieron. Epist. 65, ed. vett., 41, ed. Benedict., 84, ed. Vallars. c. 10.) But what was the specific ground of his exile, deposition, and excommunication is not clear; it is probable that the immediate and only alleged ground was the irregularity of his ordination; and that whatever things in his writings were capable of being used to his prejudice, were employed to excite odium against him, and so to obtain general concurrence in the proceedings of his opponents. Possibly the story of his apostasy, mentioned by Epiphanius, was circulated at the same time, and for the same object.

Origen was, meanwhile, secure at Caesareia, where he preached almost daily in the church. He wrote a letter in vindication of himself to some friends at Alexandria, in which he complains of the falsification of his writings. According to Jerome (In Rufin. ii. 18), he severely handled (laceret) Demetrius, and "inveighed against (invehatur) the bishops and clergy of the whole world," expressing his disregard of their excommunication of him: but from some quotations from the letter it appears to have been written in a milder and more forgiving spirit than Jerome's description would lead us to expect. Demetrius died about this time. Tillemont places his death in the same year as Origen's expulsion, viz. A. D. 231, correcting in a note the errors of Eusebius, in his Chronicon, as to the dates of these events. Heraclas succeeded Demetrius; but though he had been the friend, pupil, and colleague of Origen, the change produced no benefit to the latter: the Egyptian clergy were too deeply committed to the course into which Demetrius had led them, to allow them to retract, and Origen remained in exile till his death. About this time he met with Gregory Thaumaturgus, afterwards bishop of Neocaesareia [GREGORIUS THAUMATURGUS], and his brother Athenodorus, who were then youths pursuing their studies. They both became his pupils, and the former of them his panegyrist. (Greg. Thaumat. Panegyrica Oratio in Origen. § 5.) Maximin, who had murdered the emperor Alexander Severus (A. D. 235) and succeeded to the throne, now commenced a persecution of the church in which Origen's friend Ambrose, who had also settled at Caesareia, where he had become a deacon, and Protoctetus, a presbyter of the same church, were involved. Origen, to encourage them to brave death for the truth, composed his treatise Περὶ Μαρτυρίου, De Martyrio. They escaped, however, with life. Origen himself is thought to have been at this time at Caesareia in Cappadocia, where Firmilianus the bishop was his friend: for he appears to have been concealed two years, during some persecution, in the house of a wealthy lady of the Cappadocian Caesareia, named Juliana (Pallad. Histor. Lausiae. c. 147; comp. Tillemont, Mém. vol. iii. p. 542, and Huet, Origenian. lib. i. c. iii. § 2), from whom he received several works of Symmachus, the Greek translator of the Old Testament. (Pallad. l. c.; Euseb. H. E. vi. 17.) If his journey into Cappadocia be placed in the reign of Maximin, he probably returned about the time of Maximin's death (A. D. 238) to Caesareia in Palestine, and there continued, preaching daily and steadily pursuing his biblical studies, composing his commentaries on the prophets Isaiah and Ezekiel and on the Canticles (Euseb. H. E. vi. 32), and labouring also at his Hexapla. These labours were hardly interrupted by a journey into Greece; for he continued his works when on his travels, and finished his commentary on Ezekiel and commenced that on the Canticles at Athens. (Euseb. ibid.) The date of this second journey into Greece is doubtful. According to Suidas (s. v. Ὠριγένης) the commentary on Ezekiel was composed when Origen was in his sixtieth year, i. e. in A. D. 245, and Eusebius (H. E. vi. 32) says it was finished at Athens; but Tillemont infers from the order of events in the narrative of Eusebius that the journey took place before the death of the emperor Gordian III. (A. D. 244). If Tillemont's inference is sound, we must reject the statement of Suidas; and we must also place before the death of Gordian, the visit which Origen made to Bostra in Arabia (Euseb. H. E. vi. 33), and his restoration to the then orthodox belief of Beryllus, bishop of Bostra, who had propagated some notions respecting our Lord's pre-existent nature, which were deemed heretical. [BERYLLUS.] During the reign of Philippus the Arabian (A. D. 244—249), Origen wrote his reply to the Epicurean Celsus, and his commentaries on the twelve minor prophets, and on the Gospel of Matthew; also a number of letters, among which were one to the emperor Philippus, one to the empress Severa his wife, and others to Fabianus, bishop of Rome, and other leading ecclesiastics, to correct their misconceptions respecting himself. He made also a third journey into Arabia, where he convinced some persons of their error in believing that the soul died with the body and was raised again with it; and repressed the rising heresy of the Elcesaitae, who asserted, among other things, that to deny the faith in a time of persecution was an act morally indifferent, and supported their heresy by a book which they affirmed to have fallen from heaven. (Euseb. vi. 36, 37, 38.)

But the life of this laborious and self-denying Christian was drawing near its close. With the reign of Decius (A. D. 249—251) came a renewal of persecution [DECIUS], and the storm fell fiercely upon Origen. His friend Alexander of Jerusalem died a martyr: and he was himself imprisoned and tortured, though his persecutors carefully avoided such extremities as would have released him by death. His tortures, which he himself exactly described in his letters, are related somewhat vaguely by Eusebius. (Euseb. H. E. vi. 39.) However, he survived the persecution, which ceased upon, if not before, the death of Decius (A. D. 251). He received during, or after, the persecution a letter on martyrdom from Dionysius, who had now succeeded Heraclas in the see of Alexandria. [DIONYSIUS, No. 2.] Whatever prospect this letter might open of reconciliation with the Alexandrian Church was of little moment now. Origen was worn out with years, labours, and sufferings. He had lost by death his great friend and supporter Ambrosius, who had not bequeathed any legacy to sustain him during what might remain of life. But poverty had been through life the state which Origen had voluntarily chosen, and it mattered but little to him that he was left destitute for the brief remainder of his pilgrimage. After the persecution, according to Epiphanius, he left Caesareia for Jerusalem, and afterwards went to Tyre. He died in A. D. 253, or, at the latest, early in 254, in his sixty-ninth year, at Tyre, in which city he was buried. (Hieron. De Viris Illustr. c. 54.) His sufferings in the Decian persecution appear to have hastened his end, and gave rise to the statement, supported by the respectable authority of the martyr Pamphilus and others of the generation succeeding Origen's own time, that he had died a martyr in Caesareia during the persecution. This statement, as Photius observes, could be received only by denying the genuineness of the letters purporting to have been written by Origen after the persecution had ceased. (Phot. Bibl. Cod. 118.) It is remarkable that Eusebius does not distinctly record his death.

There are few of the early fathers of whom we have such full information as of Origen, and there are none whose characters are more worthy of our esteem. His firmness in time of persecution; his unwearied assiduity both in his office of catechist and his studies as a biblical scholar and theologian; his meekness under the injurious usage he received from Demetrius and other members of the Alexandrian church; the steadfastness of his friendship with Ambrose, Alexander of Jerusalem, and others; and his general piety and self-denial, entitle him to our highest respect. His bitterest enemies respected his character, and have borne honourable testimony to his worth. The chief ancient authorities for his life have been cited in the course of the article. Their notices have been collected and arranged by various modern writers: as Huet (Origeniana, lib. i.); Cave (Apostolici, or Lives of the Primitive Fathers, and Hist. Litt. ad A.D. 230, vol. i. p. 112, ed. Oxon. 1740—3); Doucin (Hist. De l'Origenisme, liv. i. ii.); Tillemont (Mémoires, vol. iii. p. 494, &c.); Dupin (Nouvelle Biblioth. Trois Premiers Siècles, vol. i. p. 326, &c. 8vo. Paris, 1698, &c.); Oudin (De Scriptorib. Eccles. vol. i. col. 231, &c.); Ceillier (Auteurs Sacrés, vol. ii. p. 584); Fabricius (Bibl. Graec. vol. vii. p. 201, &c.); and Neander (Church History, vol. ii. p. 376, &c. Rose's translation).

WORKS. I. Editions of the Old Testament. Origen prepared two editions of the Old Testament, known respectively as Tetrapla, "The Four-fold," and Hexapla, "The Six-fold." To the latter the names Octapla, "The Eight-fold," and Enneapla, "The Nine-fold," have been sometimes given; but the last name is not found in any ancient writer. There is a difference also in the form of these names. Origen himself, Eusebius, and Jerome use the plural forms τετραπλᾶ, Tetrapla, and ἑξαπλᾶ, Hexapla; but later writers use the singular forms, τετραπλοῦν, Tetraplum, and ἑξαπλοῦν, Hexaplum. Epiphanius, in one place, speaks of ἑξαπλᾶς τὰς βίβλους, Sextuplices Libros. The names τετρασέλιδον, ἑξασέλιδον, ὀκτασέλιδον, Quadruplex Columna (s. pagina), Sextuplex Columna, Octuplex Columna were also applied to the work by ancient writers. In one citation the name τὸ πενταεέλιδον, Quintuplex Columna, is found. In some cases a book of Scripture is cited thus: ἑξαπλοῦς Ἱερεμίας, Sextuplex Hieremias, i. e. "Jeremiah in the Hexapla." But this multiplicity of names must not mislead the reader into the supposition that Origen prepared more than the two works, known respectively as the Tetrapla and Hexapla. Which of the two was first published has been a subject of great dispute with the learned. The text of Eusebius (H. E. vi. 16, ad fin.) is not settled in the place which refers to this point, nor would be decisive if it was. Montfaucon (Praelim. in Hexapla, c. iii.) has cited some passages from Origen and other writers, which indicate the priority of the Tetrapla; and the supposition that the less complete and elaborate work was the earlier is the more probable, especially if we receive the testimony of Epiphanius, that the Hexapla was finished at Tyre, during the time that Origen resided there. For as that residence appears to have extended only from the close of the Decian persecution to his death, it is not likely that he would have had either time or energy to publish the Tetrapla, though it would, indeed, have been only a portion of the Hexapla separated from the rest of the work.

The Hexapla consisted of several copies of the Old Testament, six in some parts, seven in others, eight in others, and nine in a few, ranged in parallel columns. The first column to the right contained the Hebrew text in Hebrew characters, (i. e. those now in use, not the more ancient Samaritan letters,) the second the same text in Greek characters, the third the version of Aquila, the fourth that of Symmachus, the fifth the Septuagint, the sixth the version of Theodotion, the proximity of these several versions to the columns containing the Hebrew text being determined by their more close and literal adherence to the original; and the seventh, eighth, and ninth columns being occupied by three versions, known from their position in this work as ἡ πέμπτη καὶ ἡ ἕκτη καὶ ἡ ἑβδόμη ἐκδόσεις. Quinta, Sexta, et Septima Editiones, i. e. versions. Each of the first six columns contained all the books of the Old Testament, and these six complete columns gave to the work its title Hexapla: the other columns contained only some of the books, and principally the poetical books, and from them the work derived the titles of Octapla and Enneapla, which were therefore only partially applicable. The assertion that the title Hexapla was given to the work on account of its having six Greek versions, we believe to be erroneous. We give as a specimen a passage from Habakkuk ii. 4, which is found in all the columns.

Τὸ Ἑβραικόν.	Τὸ Ἑβραικὸν Ἑλληνικοῖς γράμμασιν.	Ἀκύλας.	Σύμμαχος.	Οἱ Ο′.	Θεοδοτίων.	Ε′.	ϛ′.	Ζ′.
וצדיק באמונתו יחיה	ουσαδικ βημουναθω ιειε.	καὶ δίκαιος ἐν πίστει αὐτοῦ ζήσεται.	ὁ δὲ δίκαιος τῇ ἑαυτοῦ πίστει ζήσει.	ὁ δὲ δίκαιος ἐκ πίστεώς μου ζήσεται.	ὁ δὲ δίκαιος τῇ ἑαυτοῦ πίστει ζήσει.	ὁ δὲ δίκαιος τῇ ἑαυτοῦ πίστει ζήσει.	ὁ δὲ δίκαιος τῇ ἑαυτοῦ πίστει ζήσει	ὁ δὲ δίκαιος τῇ ἑαυτοῦ πίστει ζήσει.

The Tetrapla contained the four versions, the Septuagint, and those of Aquila, Symmachus, and Theodotion. Of the versions of Aquila, Symmachus, and Theodotion, an account is given under their respective names, and of the Septuagint there is a brief notice under ARISTEAS. Of the three remaining versions we give here a brief account. The Quinta Editio, according to Epiphanius (De Mensuris et Ponderib., c. 17, 18), and the author of the Synopsis S. Scripturae, which is ascribed to Athanasius, was found at Jericho in a wine jar, by one of the learned men of Jerusalem; and Epiphanius adds the date of the discovery, the seventh year of Caracalla (A. D. 217 or 218). The Editio Sexta, according to the same authorities, was also found in a wine jar at Nicopolis, on the Ambracian gulf, in the reign of Alexander Severus. These dates would accord respectively with the time of Origen's first visits to Palestine and to Greece. Ancient writers, however, differ as to the discovery of these versions. According to one passage in Jerome (Prologus in Exposit. Cantic. Canticor. secundum Origen.), Origen himself stated, that the Quinta Editio was found at Nicopolis: according to Zonaras (Annal. xii. 11), the Septima was found at Jericho; and according to Nicephorus Callisti, both the Sexta and Septima were found there. Eusebius states that one of the versions was found at Jericho and one at Nicopolis, but does not give their numbers. The difference between these authorities is owing more probably to the carelessness or mistake of the writers or transcribers, than to any variation in the order of the versions in different copies of the Hexapla; for this appears to have been so fixed as to have suggested the common mode of referring to them by their place in the arrangement. The Quinta, Sexta, &c. versions, are anonymous; at least the authors are not known. Jerome (Adv. Rufin. ii. 34, ed. Vallars.) calls the authors of the Quinta and Sexta, Jews; yet a citation from the Editio Sexta, which citation Jerome himself has given in Latin, shows that the author of that version was a Christian. Josephus, author of the Hypomnesticon [JOSEPHUS, No. 12] mentions a current report that the author of the Editio Quinta was a woman. The author of the Editio Septima was probably a Jew. (Montfauc. Praelim. in Hexapla, cap. viii. § 5.) These three versions are far less literal than the other four versions; the Sexta, in particular, has some amplifications of most unauthorized character.

Beside the compilation and arrangement of so valuable a critical apparatus as these versions, Origen added marginal notes, containing, among other things, an explanation of the Hebrew names. There is reason to think that he occasionally gave in his marginal notes a Greek version of the readings of the Syriac and Samaritan versions, of the former in various books, of the latter in the Pentateuch only. Certainly such readings are found, not only in extant MS. where the Hexapla is cited, but in the citations of it by the fathers of the fourth and fifth centuries. It is to be observed also that Origen did not content himself with giving the text of the Septuagint as it stood in his own time, deeming it to have been much corrupted by the carelessness or unscrupulous alterations or additions or omissions of transcribers. (Origen. Comment. in Matth. apud Hodium, De Text. Originalibus, lib. iii. c. iv. § 8.) He amended the text chiefly by the aid of Theodotion's version, allowing the received reading to remain, but marking his proposed alterations or additions with an asterisk (*), and prefixing an obelus (÷) to such words or passages as he thought should be omitted. The use of another mark, the lemniscus (⸗— or ⸗÷), which he is said to have employed, can only be conjectured: the account of its use given by Epiphanius (De Mensur. et Ponderib. c. viii.), is evidently erroneous. Origen's revision of the text of the Septuagint was regarded by succeeding generations as the standard; it was frequently transcribed, and Latin, Syriac, and Arabic versions made from it.

In the preparation of this most laborious and valuable work, Origen was encouraged by the exhortations and supported by the wealth of his friend Ambrose. It is probable that, from the labour and cost required, comparatively few transcripts were ever made; though there were a sufficient number for the leading ecclesiastical writers of succeeding ages to have access to it; as Pamphilus, Eusebius of Caesareia, (these two are said to have corrected the text of the work, and Eusebius added Scholia,) Athanasius, Theodorus of Heracleia, the Arian, Diodorus of Tarsus, Epiphanius, Rufinus, Jerome, Chrysostom, Theodoret, Procopius of Gaza, &c. Others of the fathers employed the work less frequently; and some borrowed their acquaintance with its various readings from the citations of their predecessors. Origen's own copies of the Tetrapla and Hexapla, with the corrections and Scholia of Origen himself and of Pamphilus and Eusebius, long remained in the library of the martyr Pamphilus at Caesareia; and were probably destroyed in the seventh century, either at the capture of that city by Chosroes II. the Persian, or its subsequent capture by the Saracens. The few transcripts that were made have perished also, and the work, as compiled by Origen, has been long lost. Numerous fragments have, however, been preserved in the writings of the fathers. Many of these, containing scraps of the versions of Aquila and the other Greek translators, collected by Petrus Morinus, were inserted by Flaminius Nobilius in the beautiful and valuable edition of the Septuagint, fol. Rome, 1587. These fragments, and some additional ones, with learned notes, were prepared for publication by Joannes Drusius, and published after his death with this title, Veterum Interpretum Graecorum in totum V. T. Fragmenta, 4to. Arnheim, 1622. But the most complete edition is that of the learned Benedictine Montfaucon — Hexaplorum Origenis quae supersunt, 2 vols. fol. Paris, 1714. Montfaucon retained the arrangement of the versions adopted by Origen, and also his asterisks and obeli, wherever they were found in the MSS. employed for the edition; and added a Latin version both to the Hebrew text (for which he employed that of Santes Pagninus or of Arias Montanus with slight alterations, and also the Vulgate), and to the Greek versions. He prefixed a valuable Praefatio and Praeliminaria, to which we have been much indebted, and added to the edition several Anecdota, or unpublished fragments of Origen and others, and a Greek and a Hebrew Lexicon to the Hexapla. An edition based on that of Montfaucon was published in 2 vols. 8vo. Leipzig and Lubec, 1769, 1770, under the editorship of C. F. Bahrdt: it omitted the Hebrew text in Greek letters, the Latin versions, the Anecdota, or previously unpublished extracts from Origen and others, and many of the notes. Bahrdt professed to correct the text, and increased it by some additional fragments; and he added notes of his own to those which he retained of Montfaucon's. Bahrdt's preface intimated his purpose of preparing a Lexicon to the work, but it is not subjoined to the copy now before us, nor can we find that it was ever published.

II. Ἐξηγητικά, Exegetical works. These comprehend three classes. (Hieronym. Praef. in Translat. Homil. Origen. in Jerem. et Ezech.) 1. Τόμοι, which Jerome renders Volumina, containing ample commentaries, in which he gave full scope to his intellect. 2. Σχόλια, Scholia; brief notes on detached passages, designed to clear up obscurities and remove difficulties. 3. Homiliae, popular expositions, delivered chiefly at Caesareia; and in the latter part of his life (i. e. after his sixtieth year, A. D. 246), extemporaneously, being taken down at the time of delivery by persons employed for the purpose. Of the Τόμοι there are few remains. Of the Scholia a number have been collected chiefly from the citations of the fathers, and are given by Delarue under the title of Ἐκλογαί, Selecta. Of the Homiliae a few are extant in the original, and many more in the Latin versions (not very faithful however) of Rufinus, Jerome, and others. Our space does not allow us to give an enumeration of Origen's Exegetical works, but they will be found in Delarue's edition of his works.

In his various expositions Origen sought to extract from the Sacred Writings their historical, mystical or prophetical, and moral significance. (Orig. Homil. XVII. in Genesim, c. 1.) His desire of finding continually a mystical sense led him frequently into the neglect of the historical sense, and even into the denial of its truth. This capital fault has at all times furnished ground for depreciating his labours, and has no doubt materially diminished their value: it must not, however, be supposed that his denial of the historical truth of the Sacred Writings is more than occasional, or that it has been carried out to the full extent which some of his accusers (for instance, Eustathius of Antioch) have charged upon him. His character as a commentator is thus summed up by the acute Richard Simon (Hist. Critique des Principaux Commentateurs du N. T. ch. iii.): — "Origen is every where too long and too much given to digressions. He commonly says every thing which occurs to him with respect to some word that he meets with, and he affects great refinement in his speculations (il affecte de paroître subtil dans ses inventions), which often leads him to resort to airy (sublimes) and allegorical meanings. But notwithstanding these faults, we find in his Commentaries on the New Testament profound learning and an extensive acquaintance with every thing respecting religion; nor is there any writer from whom we can learn so well as from him what the ancient theology was. He had carefully read a great number of writers of whom we now scarcely know the names." His proneness to allegorical and mystical interpretations was probably derived from, at least strengthened by, his study of Plato, and others of the Greek philosophers.

III. Other Works. The exegetical writings of Origen might well have been the sole labour of a long life devoted to literature. They form, however, only a part of the works of this indefatigable father. Epiphanius affirms (Haeres. lxiv. 63) that common report assigned to him the composition of "six thousand books" (ἑξακισχιλίους βίβλους); and the statement, which is repeated again and again by the Byzantine writers, though itself an absurd exaggeration, may be taken as evidence of his exuberant authorship. Jerome compares him to Varro, the most fertile author among the Latins (Hieron. ad Paulam Epistol. 29, ed. Benedictin, 33, ed. Vallars., et apud Rufin. Invectiv. lib. ii. 19), and states that he surpassed him and all other writers, whether Latin or Greek, in the number and extent of his works. Of his miscellaneous works the following only are known: —

1. Ἐπιστολαί, Epistolae. Origen wrote many letters, of which Eusebius collected as many as he could find extant, to the number of more than a hundred (H. E. vi. 36). Most of them have long since perished. Delarue has given (vol. i. p. 1—32) those, whether entire or fragmentary, which remain.

2. Περὶ ἀναστάσεως, De Resurrectione. Eusebius says this work was in two books (H. E. vi. 24), and was written at Alexandria before the Commentaries on the Lamentations of Jeremiah, in which they are referred to. Jerome (ibid.) adds that he wrote two other Dialogi de Resurrectione; and in another place (Ad Pammach. Epistol. 61, edd. vet., 38, ed. Benedictin.; Lib. Contra Joannem Jerosolymitanum, c. 25, ed. Vallarsi) he cites the fourth book on the resurrection, as if he regarded the two works as constituting one. The works on the resurrection are lost, except a few fragments cited by Jerome or by Pamphilus, in his Apologia pro Origene, or by Origen himself in his De Principiis (Delarue, vol. i. pp. 32—37).

3. Στρωματεῖς s. Στρωματέων λόγοι ι'. Stromateων (s. Stromatum) Libri X., written at Alexandria, in the reign of Alexander Severus (Euseb. H. E. vi. 24), in imitation of the work of the same name by Clemens Alexandrinùs. [Clemens Alexandrinus.] The tenth book was chiefly composed of Scholia on the Epistle of Paul to the Galatians. Nothing is extant of the work, except two or three fragments cited in Latin by Jerome. (Delarue, vol. i. pp. 37—41.)

4. Περὶ ἀρχῶν, De Principiis. This work, which was written at Alexandria (Eusebius, H. E. vi. 24), was the great object of attack with Origen's enemies, and the source from which they derived their chief evidence of his various alleged heresies. It was divided into four books. The first treated of God, of Christ, and of the Holy Spirit; of the fall, of rational natures and their final restoration to happiness, of corporeal and incorporeal beings and of angels: the second, of the world and the things in it, of the identity of the God of the old dispensation and of the new, of the incarnation of Christ, of the resurrection, and of the punishment of the wicked: the third book, of the freedom of the will, of the agency of Satan, of the temptations of man, of the origin of the world in time and of its end: the fourth, of the divine original and proper mode of studying the Scriptures. The heterodoxy of this work, according to the standard of the day, or rather perhaps of the next generation, was ascribed by Marcellus of Ancyra to the influence of the Greek philosophy, especially that of Plato, which Origen had been recently studying, and had not taken time maturely to consider. Eusebius replied to Marcellus by denying the Platonism of Origen, and Pamphilus, in his Apologia pro Origene, attempted to prove that he was orthodox. On the outbreak of the Arian controversy, Origen was accused of having been the real author of that obnoxious system; and Didymus of Alexandria, in his Scholia on the Περὶ ἀρχῶν of Origen, in order to refute this charge, endeavoured to show how far he differed from them. [Didymus, No. 4.] But as the limits of orthodoxy became more definite and restricted, this mode of defence was abandoned; and Rufinus, no longer denying the heterodox character of many passages with respect to the Trinity, affirmed that they were interpolations. When, therefore, at the close of the fourth century, he translated the Περὶ ἀρχῶν into Latin, he softened the objectionable features of the work, by omitting those parts relating to the Trinity, which appeared to be heterodox, and illustrating obscure passages by the insertion of more explicit declarations from the author's other writings. On other subjects, however, he was said to have rather exaggerated than softened the objectionable sentiments. (Hieron. Contra Rufin. i. 7.) Such principles of translation would have seriously impaired the fidelity of his version, even if his assertion, that he had added nothing of his own, were true: but as he did not give reference to the places from which the inserted passages were taken, he rendered the credibility of that assertion very doubtful. Jerome, therefore, to expose, as he says (Ibid.), both the heterodoxy of the writer and the unfaithfulness of the translator, gave another and more exact version of the work. Of the original work some important fragments, including a considerable part of the third and fourth books, have been preserved in the Philocalia; in the Epistola ad Mennam, Patriarcham CPolitanum of the emperor Justinian, given in the various editions of the Concilia (e.g. vol. v. p. 635, &c., ed. Labbe, vol. iii. p. 244, &c., ed. Hardouin); and by Marcellus of Ancyra (apud Eusebium, Contra Marcellum). Of the version of Jerome, there are some small portions preserved in his letter to Avitus (Epistol. 59, edd. vett., 94, ed. Benedictin, 124, ed. Vallars.). The version of Rufinus has come down to us entire; and is given with the fragments of Jerome's version and of the original by Delarue (vol. i. pp. 42—195).

5. Περὶ εὐχῆς, De Oratione. This work is mentioned by Pamphilus (Apol. pro Orig. c. viii.), and is still extant. It was first published, 12mo. Oxford, 1685, with a Latin version. (Delarue, vol. i. pp. 195—272.)

6. Εἰς μαρτύριον προτρεπτικὸς λόγος, Exhortatio ad Martyrium, or Περὶ μαρτυρίου, De Martyrio, addressed to his friend and patron Ambrosius, and to Protoctetus of Caesareia, during the persecution under the emperor Maximin (A. D. 235—238), and still extant. (Delarue, vol. i. pp. 273—310.) It was first published by Jo. Rud. Wetstenius (Wetstein) the younger, 4to, Basel, 1574, with a Latin version and notes. Origen's letter of like purport, written when a mere boy to his father, has been already noticed.

7. Κατὰ Κέλσου τόμοι η', Contra Celsum Libri VIII., written in the time of the emperor Philippus (Euseb. H. E. vi. 36), and still extant. In this valuable work Origen defends the truth of Christianity against the attacks of Celsus, an Epicurean, or perhaps a Platonic philosopher [CELSUS]. The Philocalia is chiefly made up of extracts from it. It was first printed in the Latin version of Christophorus Persona, fol. Rome, 1481, and in Greek by David Hoeschelius, 4to, Augsburg, 1605. (Delarue, vol. i. pp. 310—799.)

It may be as well here to mention that the Φιλοκαλία, Philocalia, so often mentioned, was a compilation by Basil of Caesareia, and his friend Gregory of Nazianzus [BASILIUS, No. 2; GREGORIUS NAZIANZENUS], almost exclusively from the writings of Origen, of which many important fragments have been thus preserved, especially from his reply to Celsus. It is divided into twenty-seven chapters. It was first published in the Latin version of Gilbertus Genebrardus, in the second volume of that author's edition of Origen's works, fol. Paris, 1574, and in Greek by Joannes Tarinus, 4to, Paris, 1618. It is not given as a whole by Delarue, but such of the extracts as are not elsewhere extant are distributed to their appropriate places.

Many works of Origen are totally lost. An enumeration of those of which we have any information is given by Fabricius (Bibl. Graec. vol. vii. p. 235, &c). The majority of those which are lost were biblical and exegetical. The others were chiefly directed against the various classes of heretics, and partly consisted of records of his disputations with them. The book De Libero Arbitrio, mentioned by himself in his Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans, was perhaps that portion of his Περὶ ἀρχῶν which relates to that subject. What the Monobiblia, mentioned by Jerome (Ad Paulam Epistol. 29, ed Benedictin, 33, ed. Vallars. and apud Rufin. Invect. lib. ii. 19), was, we have no means of ascertaining. There were, perhaps, other works beside those enumerated by Fabricius (l. c.): for there is no complete list of Origen's works extant; those drawn up by Eusebius (see H. E. vi. 32) in his Life of Pamphilus, and by Jerome (see De Viris Illustr. c. 54) in the mutilated Epistle to Paula, just cited, are now lost.

Several works have been ascribed to Origen, and published under his name, which really do not belong to him. Of these, the most important are the following. (1) Διάλογος κατὰ Μαρκιανιστῶν ἢ περὶ τῆς εἰς Θεὸν ὀρθῆς πίστεως, Dialogus contra Marcionitas sive de Recta in Deum Fide. This was first published in the Latin version of Joannes Picus, 4to, Paris, 1555, and in Greek by Jo. Rud. Wetstenius, with a Latin version, 4to, Basel, 1674. It is given by Delarue (vol. i. pp. 800—872), but not as Origen's. It was ascribed to Origen, perhaps by Basil and Gregory Nazianzen, certainly by Anastasius Sinaita; but Huet has shown that internal evidence is against its being his; and it is in all probability the production of a later age. Adamantius is the "orthodox" speaker in the Dialogue (comp. MAXIMUS HIEROSOLYMITANUS); and there is reason to believe, from the testimony of Theodoret (Haeret. Fabular. Praefat. and i. 25), that the author really bore that name, and was a distinct person altogether from Origen; but that, as Origen also bore the name of Adamantius, the work came to be erroneously ascribed to him. (2) Φιλοσοφούμενα, s. τοῦ κατὰ πασῶν αἱρέσεων ἐλέγχου βιβλίον α'. Philosophumena s. Adversus omnes Haereses, Liber primus. This work was first published with a Latin version and notes, vindicating Origen's title to the authorship, by Jac. Gronovius, in the tenth volume of his Thesaurus Antiquitatum Graecarum, p. 249, &c., under the title of Origenis Philosophumenων Fragmentum. This title is not quite correct: the Philosophumena, or account of the systems of the ancient philosophy, appears to be entire, but is itself only a portion of a larger work against all "heresies" or sects holding erroneous views. The author is not known; but he was not Origen; for in his prooemium he claims episcopal rank, which Origen never held. (The work is in Delarue, vol. i. pp. 872—909.) (3) Σχόλια εἰς εὐχὴν κυριακήν, Scholia in Orationem Dominicam, published by Fed. Morellus, in 1601, as the production of "Origen or some other teacher of that age:" but Huet and Delarue deny that these Scholia are his, and Huet ascribes them to Petrus of Laodiceia, following the editors of the Bibliotheca Patrum, who have given a Latin version of them in that collection. (Delarue, vol. i. pp. 909, 911.)—The above, with (4), an ancient Latin version of a Commentary on Job, are the only supposititious works given by Delarue. Others, however, are extant, and have been given by other editors, but do not require any further notice here.

Beside his own works, Origen revised the Lexicon of Hebrew names, Hebraicorum Nominum S. Scripturae et Mensurarum Interpretatio, of Philo Judaeus [PHILO]; and enlarged it by the addition of the names in the New Testament: the work is consequently ascribed to him in some MSS.: but after his reputed heresies had rendered him odious, the name of Cyril of Alexandria was prefixed to the work in some MSS. in place of his. The Lexicon is extant in the Latin version of Jerome, among whose works it is usually printed. (Vol. ii. pars i. edit. Benedictin, vol. iii. ed. Vallars.)

The collected works of Origen, more or less complete, have been repeatedly published. The first editions contained the Latin versions only; they were those of Jac. Merlinus, 4 vols., or more exactly, 4 parts in 2 vols. fol. Paris, 1512—1519. In this edition the editor published an Apologia pro Origene, which involved him in much trouble, and obliged him to defend himself in a new Apologia, published in A. D. 1522, when his edition was reprinted, as it was again in 1530, and perhaps 1536. The second edition was prepared by Erasmus, who made the versions, and was published after his death by Beatus Rhenanus, fol. Basel. 1536. Panzer (Annales Typ. vol. vii.) gives the version of Erasmus as published in 4 vols. fol. Lyon (Lugdunum), 1536. It was reprinted, with additions, in 1545, 1551, 1557, and 1571. The third and most complete Latin edition was that of Gilbertus Genebrardus, 2 vols. Paris, 1574, reprinted in 1604 and 1619. The value of these Latin editions is diminished by the consideration, that some of the works of Origen, for instance, the De Martyrio and De Oratione, are not contained in them, and that the versions of Rufinus, which make up a large part of them, are notoriously unfaithful. We do not here notice any but professedly complete editions of Origen's works.

Of the Graeco-Latin editions the most important are the following: — Origenis Opera Exegetica, 2 vols. fol. Rouen, 1668, edited by Pierre Daniel Huet,, afterwards Bp. of Avranches. An ample and valuable dissertation on the life, opinions, and works of Origen, entitled Origeniana, was prefixed to this edition. The fragments, collected from the Catenae by Combéfis, were sent to Huet, but were not inserted by him. Huet intended to publish the complete works of Origen, but did not execute his purpose. His edition was reprinted at Paris, in 1679, and at Cologne, or rather Frankfort, in 1685. But the standard edition of Origen's works is that of the French Benedictine, Charles Delarue, completed after his death by his nephew, Charles Vincent Delarue, a monk of the same order, 4 vols. fol. Paris, 1733—1759. The first volume contains the Miscellaneous, including some of the suppositious works; and the other three the Exegetical works, including one of the supposititious Commentarii in Jobum. The fragments of the Hexapla and the Hebraicorum Nominum, &c. Interpretatio, and a portion of the supposititious works, are not given. To the fourth volume are appended (1) Rufinus' version of the Apologia pro Origene of the Martyr Pamphilus, with considerable fragments of the Greek, accompanied by a new Latin version of the fragments. (2) The Epilogus of Rufinus on the interpolation of Origen's writings. (3) Εἰς Ὠριγένην προσφωνητικὸς καὶ πανηγυρικὸς λόγος. In Origenem Prosphonetica ac Panegyrica Oratio, addressed by Gregorius Thaumaturgus to Origen, his preceptor, on leaving him to return to his native land, with the Latin version of Gerard Vossius. (4) The Origeniana of Huet: and (5) an extract from Bishop Bull's Defensio Fidei Nicaenae, cap. ix. on the Consubstantiality of the Son of God. The whole works were accompanied by valuable prefaces, "monita," and notes.

The works of Origen, from the edition of Delarue, revised by Oberthür, were reprinted without notes, in 15 vols. 8vo. Würzburg, 1785, &c. A number of additional passages from Origen, chiefly gleaned from various Catenae, and containing Scholia on several of the books of Scripture, are given in the Appendix to the xivth (posthumous) volume of Galland's Bibliotheca Patrum. The most important of these additions are to the Scholia on the books of Deuteronomy, Samuel, Kings, Job, Psalms, Proverbs, and the Gospels of Matthew and Luke. Some additions to the Scholia on the Canticles, and to the Hexaplar readings on the same book, are contained in the Εἰς τὰ ᾄσματα, Catena in Canticum, of Procopius of Gaza, published in the Classicorum Auctorum e Vaticanis Codd. editorum of Angelo Mai, vol. ix. p. 257, &c. 8vo. Rome, 1837. Two fragments of Origen, one considerable one, Εἰς τὸ κατὰ Λουκᾶν, In Evangelium Lucae (pp. 474—482), and one of a few lines, Εἰς Λευιτικόν, In Leviticum, appear in vol. x. of the same series. Some Scholia of Origen are contained in a collection, Εἰς τὸν Δανιὴλ ἑρμηνεῖαι διαφόρων, In Danielem Variorum Commentarii, published in vol. i. pars ii. p. 161, &c. of the Scriptorum Veterum Nova Collectio, 10 vols. 4to. Rome, 1825, &c. of the same learned editor.

Few writers have exercised greater influence by the force of their intellect and the variety of their attainments than Origen, or have been the occasion of longer and more acrimonious disputes. His influence is the more remarkable as he had not the advantage of high rank and a commanding position in the church; and his freedom in interpreting the Scriptures, and the general liberality of his views were in direct opposition to the current of religious opinion in his own and subsequent times.

Of the more distinctive tenets of this father, several had reference to the doctrine of the Trinity, on which he was charged with distinguishing the οὐσία, substantia, of the Father from that of the Son, with affirming the inferiority of the Holy Spirit to the Son, with making both the Son and Spirit creatures, and with various other errors either asserted by him, or regarded as necessarily flowing from his assertions, which it is not requisite to mention. Others of his opinions had reference to the difficult subject of the incarnation, and to the pre-existence of Christ's human soul, which, as well as the pre-existence of other human souls, he affirmed. He was charged also with holding the corporeity of angels, and with other errors as to angels and daemons, on which subjects his views appear to have fluctuated. He held the freedom of the human will, and ascribed to man a nature less corrupt and depraved than was consistent with orthodox views of the operation of divine grace. He held the doctrine of the universal restoration of the guilty, conceiving that the devil alone would suffer eternal punishment. Other points of less moment we do not notice here. A full discussion of them is contained in the Origeniana of Huet (lib. ii. c. 2, 3).

Origen lived before the limits which separated orthodoxy and heterodoxy were so determinately and narrowly laid down, as in the following centuries; and therefore, though his opinions were obnoxious to many, and embittered the opposition to him, he was not cast out of the church as a heretic in his lifetime, the grounds of his excommunication relating rather to points of ecclesiastical order and regularity, than to questions of dogmatic theology. But some time after his death, and especially after the outbreak of the Arian controversy, and the appeal of the Arians to passages in Origen's works, the cry of heresy was raised by the orthodox party against his writings. The tone, however, of the earlier orthodox leaders, Athanasius, Basil, and Gregory Nazianzen was moderate; others, as Hilary of Poitiers, John of Jerusalem, Didymus, Gregory Nyssen, Eusebius of Vercellae, Titus of Bostra, Ambrose, Palladius, Isidore of Pelusium, and even Jerome himself in his earlier life, defended Origen, though Jerome's change of opinion in respect of Origen afterwards led to his famous quarrel with Rufinus. About the close of the fourth century, Theophilus of Alexandria expelled some monks from Egypt on account of their Origenism; but the oppressive deed was not approved at Constantinople, where the monks were kindly received by the Patriarch Chrysostom and the Empress Eudoxia. The monks were restored: but the conflict of Theophilus and Chrysostom led to the deposition of the latter, one of the charges against whom was that of Origenism. The memory and opinions of Origen were now more decidedly condemned both in the East and West, yet they were favourably regarded by some of the more eminent men, among whom were the ecclesiastical historians Socrates, Sozomen and Theodoret. In the reign of Justinian, Origenism revived in the monasteries of Palestine, and the emperor himself wrote his Epistola ad Menam (s. Mennam) Patriarcham CPolitanum against the Origenists, who were expelled from their monasteries in Palestine, and condemned in the fifth oecumenical (second Constantinopolitan), council A. D. 553. The Greeks generally followed the decision of the council, and a new element, the question of the salvation of Origen, was added to the controversy respecting the truth or error of his doctrines. In the West the dispute was revived with the revival of learning. Merlinus, Erasmus, and Genebrardus, his editors, Joannes Picus of Mirandula, Sixtus of Sena, and the Jesuit Halloix, defended Origen, and affirmed his salvation. The cardinals Baronius and Bellarmin took the opposite side, as did the reformers Luther and Beza. Stephen Binet, a Jesuit, published a little book, De Salute Origenis, Paris, 1629, in which he introduces the leading writers on the subject as debating the question of Origen's salvation, and makes Baronius propose a descent to the infernal regions to ascertain the truth. (Bayle, Dictionnaire, s. v. Origene, note D.) A summary of the history of Origenism is given by Huet (Origeniana, lib. ii. c. 4), and by the Jesuit Doucin, in his Histoire de l'Origenisme. [J. C. M.]

ORI'GENES, a platonic philosopher, who wrote a book De Daemonibus. He is not to be confounded with the subject of the foregoing article, as has been sometimes done. (Porphyr. Vita Plotin. c. 3. 20; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iii. p. 180.) [J. C. M.]

ORI'ON ('Ορίων), a son of Hyrieus, of Hyria, in Boeotia, a very handsome giant and hunter, and said to have been called by the Boeotians Candaon. (Hom. Od. xi. 309; Strab. ix. p. 404; Tzetz. ad Lyc. 328.) Once he came to Chios (Ophiusa), and fell in love with Aero, or Merope, the daughter of Oenopion, by the nymph Helice. He cleared the island from wild beasts, and brought the spoils of the chase as presents to his beloved; but as Oenopion constantly deferred the marriage, Orion one day being intoxicated forced his way into the chamber of the maiden. Oenopion now implored the assistance of Dionysus, who caused Orion to be thrown into a deep sleep by satyrs, in which Oenopion blinded him. Being informed by an oracle that he should recover his sight, if he would go towards the east and expose his eye-balls to the rays of the rising sun, Orion following the sound of a Cyclops' hammer, went to Lemnos, where Hephaestus gave to him Cedalion as his guide. When afterwards he had recovered his sight, Orion returned to Chios to take vengeance, but as Oenopion had been concealed by his friends, Orion was unable to find him, and then proceeded to Crete, where he lived as a hunter with Artemis. (Apollod. i. 4. § 3; Parthen. Erot. 20; Theon, ad Arat. 638; Hygin. Poet. Astr. ii. 34.) The cause of his death, which took place either in Crete or Chios, is differently stated. According to some Eos, who loved Orion for his beauty, carried him off, but as the gods were angry at this, Artemis killed him with an arrow in Ortygia (Hom. Od. v. 121); according to others he was beloved by Artemis, and Apollo, indignant at his sister's affection for him, asserted that she was unable to hit with her bow a distant point which he showed to her in the sea. She thereupon took aim, and hit it, but the point was the head of Orion, who had been swimming in the sea. (Hygin. l. c.; Ov. Fast. v. 537.) A third account states that he harboured an improper love for Artemis, that he challenged her to a game of discus, or that he violated Upis, on which account Artemis shot him, or sent a monstrous scorpion which killed him. (Serv. ad Aen. i. 539; Horat. Carm. ii. 4. 72; Apollod. i. 4. § 5.) A fourth account, lastly, states that he boasted he would conquer every animal, and would clear the earth from all wild beasts; but the earth sent forth a scorpion by which he was killed. (Ov. Fast. v. 539, &c.) Asclepius wanted to recall him to life, but was slain by Zeus with a flash of lightning. [ASCLEPIUS.] The accounts of his parentage and birth-place are varying in the different writers, for some call him a son of Poseidon and Euryale (Apollod, i. 4. § 3), and others say that he was born of the earth, or a son of Oenopion. (Serv. ad Aen. i. 539, x. 763.) He is further called a Theban, or Tanagraean, but probably because Hyria, his native place, sometimes belonged to Tanagra, and sometimes to Thebes. (Hygin. Poet. Astr. ii. 34; Paus. ix. 20. § 3; Strab. ix. p. 404.) After his death, Orion was placed among the stars (Hom. Il. xviii. 486, &c., xxii. 29, Od. v. 274), where he appears as a giant with a girdle, sword, a lion's skin and a club. As the rising and setting of the constellation of Orion was believed to be accompanied by storms and rain, he is often called imbrifer, nimbosus, or aquosus. His tomb was shown at Tanagra. (Paus. ix. 20. § 3.) [L. S.]

ORION and ORUS ('Ωρίων and Ὦρος), names of more than one ancient grammarian. The mode in which they are mentioned by the authorities who speak of them is so confused, that it is a matter of the greatest difficulty to distinguish the different writers, and to assign to them their respective productions. The subject has been investigated with great care and acuteness by Ritschl, and the following are the leading results at which he has arrived. Suidas speaks of two writers of the name of Orion, and one of the name of Orus. The first Orion he makes a native of Thebes in Egypt, the author of an ἀνθολόγιον in three books, dedicated to Eudocia, the wife of the younger Theodosius. The second Orion he describes as an Alexandrian grammarian, the author of, 1. an ἀνθολόγιον; 2. Ἀττικῶν λέξεων συναγωγή; 3. A work on etymology; 4. A panegyric on the emperor Hadrian. Orus is said by Suidas (as the text stands) to have been a grammarian of Alexandria, who taught at Constantinople, the author of a treatise περὶ διχρόνων, a treatise περὶ ἐθνικῶν, one on orthography, and several others. Now Orus and Orion are mentioned some hundreds of times in the Etymologicum Magnum, the Etymologicum Gudianum, and the Etymologicum of Zonaras. But they are neither of them ever styled Alexandrians, while a Milesian Orus is often quoted, here and there a Theban Orus is spoken of, and also a Milesian Orion: and these quotations apportion the writings referred to not only quite differently from Suidas, but not even uniformly as regards these etymological works as compared with each other and themselves. Both a Theban Orion and a Theban Orus are quoted as writing on etymology; a Milesian Orion and Orus περὶ ἐθνικῶν; a Milesian Orus (not an Alexandrian, as Suidas says) on orthography. Now in the midst of this confusion it happens fortunately enough that the etymological work of Orion is still extant; and in it he is distinctly spoken of as a Theban, who taught at Caesarea. The ἀνθολόγιον πρὸς Εὐδοκίαν, in three books, is likewise extant in manuscript, bearing the name of the same author. The dedication of this work to Eudocia fixes the period when the Theban Orion lived to about the middle of the fifth century after Christ. This is confirmed by what Marinus says in his life of Proclus (c. 8), that the latter studied under a grammarian of the name of Orion, who was descended from the Egyptian priestly class. It would appear from this, that Orion taught at Alexandria before he went to Caesarea. There is no reason whatever for considering these to be distinct persons, as Fabricius does (vol. vi. p. 374).

The Alexandrian Orion, who is said by Suidas to have written a panegyric on the emperor Hadrian, would probably be a contemporary of that emperor. It is probably by a mistake that Suidas attributes to him a work on etymology: of the other works assigned to him we know nothing further.

The lexicon of Orion the Theban was first introduced to the notice of philologers by Ruhnken, and was published under the editorship of Sturz at Leipzig in 1820.

In like manner Ritschl distinguishes two grammarians of the name of Orus. In many passages of the Etymologica Orus is quoted and called a Milesian. In others he is quoted without any such distinctive epithet. It might seem a tolerably easy mode of reconciling this with the statement of Suidas to suppose that the Alexandrian Orus, as being the more celebrated, is mentioned without any distinctive epithet, while the Milesian is always thus distinguished. But it is decisive against this supposition, that, besides the internal evidence that the articles taken from Orus and those taken from Orus the Milesian are really taken from one and the same author, all the works attributed by Suidas to the Alexandrian Orus are quoted as the works of the Milesian Orus in the Etymologica. From this, combined with the circumstance that the quotations made by Orus exhibit a more extensive acquaintance with ancient and somewhat rare authors than was to be expected in a Byzantine grammarian of the fourth century, and that in the passages in the Etymologica no author later than the second century is quoted by Orus, Ritschl concludes that there were two grammarians of the name of Orus; one a Milesian, who lived in the second century, and was the author of the works mentioned by Suidas: the other, an Alexandrine grammarian, who taught at Constantinople not earlier than the middle of the fourth century after Christ, and of whose works, if he was the author of any, we possess no remains.

A comparison of the Etymologicum Magnum and the Etymologicum Gudianum with the lexicon of Orion shows that the various articles of the latter have been incorporated in the two former, though not always in exactly the same form as that in which they appear in Orion. It is found also that in the Etymologicum Magnum a very large number of the citations professedly taken from Orus are also found in Orion. Ritschl has shown that it is impossible to substitute in all these passages the name of Orion, as the Orus spoken of is sometimes distinctly called ὁ Μιλήσιος; and that moreover it is not necessary to attempt it, for an article in the Etymologicum Magnum, which ends with the words οὕτως Ὦρος· ἀλλὰ καὶ Ὠρίων καὶ Ἡρωδιανὸς περὶ παθῶν, renders it all but certain that Orion had borrowed a large number of his articles from Orus without acknowledgment. This is confirmed by a comparison of various passages. Orion cites the older authorities by name. Orus he never so quotes; and in this he followed the example of various other grammarians, who were rather given to make use of the labours of their more immediate predecessors without acknowledgment. It is of course possible enough that in a few passages of the Etymologicum Magnum, the name of Orus has been accidentally substituted for that of Orion.

It appears that Orus was the author of the following works. 1. A commentary on the orthography of Herodianus. 2. A treatise of his own on orthography, arranged in alphabetical order (Suidas s. v. Ὦρος. Zonaras quotes Orus ἐν τῇ οἰκείᾳ αὐτοῦ ὀρθογραφίᾳ) The treatises on the diphthongs αι and ει, mentioned by Suidas, were probably portions of this work. 3. Περὶ ἐθνικῶν. 4. Περὶ διχρόνων. 5. Περὶ ἐγκλιτικῶν μορίων. Of this we know nothing further. 6. Fabricius (Bibl. Graec. vol. vi. p. 374) mentions a treatise Περὶ πολυσήμων or πολυσημάντων λέξεων as extant in manuscript. Of this likewise nothing further is known. 7. Περὶ πάθους. This is omitted by Suidas, but is quoted in the Etymologica. 8. Λύσεις προτάσεων τῶν Ἡρωδιανοῦ. An Ἰλιακὴ προσῳδία is attributed to Orus in the Etymol. Magn. (536, 54); probably from a confusion with the work of Herodianus on the same subject. Fabricius (vol. vi. p. 374) speaks of an Etymologicum Ori Milesii, on the authority, as he supposes, of Fulvius Ursinus, whom Fabricius understands to say that he possessed it in manuscript. But Ritschl has shown that the passage of Ursinus does not convey any such assertion. The πίναξ τῶν ἑαυτοῦ, spoken of by Suidas, would indicate that Orus was the author of other treatises besides those mentioned, of which we know nothing. The name ORUS is sometimes found written HORUS. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vi. pp. 193, 374, 601, 603; Ritschl, de Oro et Orione commentatio, Breslau, 1834; and an elaborate article on Orion by Ritschl in Ersch and Gruber's Encyclopädie.) [C. P. M.]

ORITHYIA. [OREITHYIA.]

O'RMENUS (Ὄρμενος). 1. A son of Cercaphus, grandson of Aeolus and father of Amyntor, was believed to have founded the town of Ormenium, in Thessaly. From him Amyntor is sometimes called Ormenides, and Astydameia, his grand-daughter, Ormenis. (Hom. Il. ii. 734, ix. 448, x. 266, Od. xv. 413; Ov. Her. ix. 50.)

2. The name of two Trojans. (Il. viii. 274, xii. 187.) [L. S.]

ORNEUS (Ὀρνεύς), a son of Erechtheus, father of Peteus, and grandfather of Menestheus; from him the town of Orneae was believed to have derived its name. (Hom. Il. ii. 571; Paus. ii. 25. § 5, x. 35. § 5.) [L. S.]

ORNODOPANTES (Ὀρνοδοπάντης), a Persian satrap, whom Bibulus persuaded in B. C. 50 to revolt from Orodes, the Parthian king, and proclaim Pacorus as king. (Dion Cass. xl. 30.) [Comp. Vol. I. p. 356, a.] This Parthian name appears to be the same, with a slightly varied orthography, as that of Ornospades, which occurs in Tacitus. The latter was a Parthian chief of great power and influence in the reign of Tiberius. (Tac. Ann. vi. 37).

ORNOSPADES. [ORNODOPANTES.]

ORNY'TION (Ὀρνυτίων), a Corinthian, was the son of Sisyphus, and the father of Phocus and Thoas. (Paus. ii. 4. § 3, ix. 17. § 4.) [L. S.]

O'RNYTUS (Ὄρνυτος), the name of three different mythical personages. (Apollon. Rhod. i. 208, ii. 65; Paus. viii. 28. § 3.) [L. S.]

ORO'DES (Ὀρώδης), a name common to many Eastern monarchs, of whom the Parthian kings were the most celebrated. Herodes is probably merely another form of this name.

1. ORODES I., king of Parthia. [ARSACES XIV. p. 356.]

2. ORODES II., king of Parthia. [ARSACES XVII., p. 357.]

3. ORODES, son of Artabanus III., king of Parthia. [ARSACES XIX., p. 358, a.]

4. ORODES, a king of the Albanians, conquered by Pompey [POMPEIUS], is called Oroeses by the Greek writers. (Dion Cass. xxxvi. 37, xxxvii. 4; Appian, Mithr. 103, 117; Oros. vi. 4; Eutrop. vi. 11.)

OR()EBA'NTIUS (Ὀροιβάντιος), of Troezene, an ancient epic poet, whose poems were said by the Troezenians to be more ancient than those of Homer. (Aelian, V. H. xi. 2.)

OROESES. [ORODES, No. 4.]

OROETES (Ὀροίτης), a Persian, was made satrap of Sardis by Cyrus, and retained the government of it till his death. Like many other Persian governors, he seems to have aimed at the establishment of an independent sovereignty, and it was probably as one step towards this that he decoyed POLYCRATES into his power by specious promises, and put him to death in B. C. 522. For this act Herodotus mentions two other motives, not incompatible either with one another or with the one above suggested; but certainly the power of the Samian tyrant would have been a barrier to any schemes of aggrandizement entertained by Oroetes; and, in fact, Samos, from its position and consequence, would, perhaps, be the natural enemy of any Lydian potentate. Thus, when Amasis, as a vassal of Babylon, was compelled to take part with Croesus against Cyrus, he found it necessary to abandon his alliance with Polycrates, which, for purposes of commerce, he would, doubtless, have preferred; and the Lacedaemonians were naturally urged to their connection with Croesus by their hostility to Polycrates as a tyrant. (Comp. Herod. i. 69, 70, 77, ii. 178, iii. 39, &c.; Thuc. i. 18; Arist. Polit. v. 10, ed. Bekk.) The disturbed state of affairs which followed the death of Cambyses, B. C. 521, further encouraged Oroetes to prosecute his designs, and he put to death MITROBATES, viceroy of Dascyleium, in Bithynia, regarding him probably as a rival, or, at least, as a spy, and caused a messenger, who brought an unwelcome firman from Dareius Hystaspis, to be assassinated on his way back to court. Dareius, however, succeeded in procuring his death through the agency of BAGAEUS. (Herod. iii. 120—128; Luc. Contempl. 14.) [E. E.]

O'ROLUS. [OLORUS.]

ORONTES or ORONTAS (Ὀρόντης, Ὀρόντας). 1. A Persian, related by blood to the royal family, and distinguished for his military skill. Dareius II. (Nothus) appointed him to be one of the officers of his son, Cyrus the younger; but, after the accession of Artaxerxes Mnemon, Orontes, who commanded in the citadel of Sardis, held it against Cyrus, professing to be therein obeying the king's commands. Cyrus reduced him to submission and pardoned him: but Orontes revolted from him a second time, fled to the Mysians, and joined them in invading his territory. Again Cyrus subdued him, and again received him into favour. When, however, the prince in his expedition against his brother (B. C. 401), had passed the Euphrates, Orontes asked to be entrusted with 1000 horse, promising to check effectually with these the royal cavalry, which was laying waste the country before the invaders. Cyrus consented; but, ascertaining from an intercepted letter of his to Artaxerxes, that he meant to desert with the force committed to him, he caused him to be arrested, and summoned a council, consisting of seven of the principal Persians and Clearchus the Lacedaemonian, to try the case. Orontes had not a word of defence or palliation to offer, and was condemned unanimously by the judges. He was then led off to the tent of Artapatas, one of the chief officers of Cyrus, and was never seen again either dead or alive. How he perished no one knew. Xenophon remarks that, on his way from the council, he received all the customary marks of respect from his inferiors, though they knew his doom. (Xen. Anab. i. 6. §§ 1—11.)

2. A Persian, son-in-law of Artaxerxes Mnemon. In the retreat of the Cyrean Greeks, when Tissaphernes joined their march, twenty days after his solemn and hollow treaty with them, Orontes accompanied him with a separate force under his command, and appears to have been a party to the treachery, by which the principal Greek generals were decoyed into the power of the Persians. He held the satrapy of Armenia (Xen. Anab. ii. 4. §§ 9, &c. 5. § 40, iii. 5. § 17, iv. 3. § 4.) It seems to have been the same Orontes who was appointed by Artaxerxes (in B. C. 386, according to Diodorus) to command the land forces against EVAGORAS, the fleet being committed to Tiribazus. In 385, Tiribazus offered Evagoras certain conditions of peace, which the latter was willing to accept, protesting only against the requisition that he should acknowledge himself the mere vassal of Persia, and claiming the title of king. Hereupon Orontes, jealous of Tiribazus, wrote to court accusing him of treason, and obtained in answer an order to arrest his colleague, and to take upon himself the sole command of the forces. But Tiribazus was a favourite with the army, and the general dissatisfaction, together with some desertions, alarmed Orontes for the result of the war. He hastened therefore to make peace with Evagoras, on the very terms on which the latter had before insisted, and which Tiribazus had refused to grant. Not long after this, the trial of Tiribazus took place. The judges appointed by Artaxerxes unanimously acquitted him, and Orontes was disgraced, and lost the royal favour. (Diod. xv. 2—4, 8—11; Isocr. Evag. p. 201, d; Theopomp. ap. Phot. Bibl. 176; Wess. ad Diod. xiv. 26; Clint. F. H. vol. ii. App. xii.)

3. A Persian satrap of Mysia, joined in the great revolt of the western satraps from Artaxerxes Mnemon, in B. C. 362. He was appointed to the command of the rebel forces and entrusted with a large sum of money sufficient for the pay of 20,000 mercenaries for a year; but, hoping to gain high rewards from the king, he arrested those who came to place the treasure in his hands, and sent them to Artaxerxes; an act of treachery which he followed up by the surrender of a number of towns, and of the mercenary troops. (Diod. xv. 90, 91.)

4. A descendant of Hydarnes (one of the seven conspirators against Smerdis the Magian) is mentioned by Strabo (xi. p. 531), as the last Persian prince who reigned in Armenia, before the division of the country by Antiochus the Great, of Syria, between two of his own officers, Artaxias and Zariadris. [E. E.]

ORO'NTIUS MARCELLUS. [MARCELLUS.]

ORONTOBATES (Ὀροντοβάτης). 1. A Persian, who married the daughter of Pixodarus, the usurping satrap of Caria, and was sent by the king to succeed him. On the approach of Alexander (B. C. 334) Orontobates and Memnon [MEMNON] entrenched themselves in Halicarnassus. But at last, despairing of defending it, they set fire to the town, and under cover of the conflagration crossed over to Cos, whither they had previously removed their treasures. Orontes, however, still held the citadel Salmacis, and the towns Myndus, Caunus, Thera, and Callipolis, together with Triopium and the island of Cos. Next year, when at Soli, Alexander learnt that Orontobates had been defeated in a great battle by Ptolemaeus and Asander. It is natural to infer that the places which Orontobates held did not long hold out after his defeat. (Arrian, i. 23, ii. 5. § 7; Curt. iii. 7. § 4.)

An officer of the name of Orontobates was present in the army of Dareius at the battle of Gaugamela, being one of the commanders of the troops drawn from the shores of the Persian Gulf. (Arrian, iii. 8. § 8.) Whether he was the same or a different person from the preceding, we have no means of knowing. We are not told that the latter was killed as well as defeated.

2. A Median, who was appointed satrap of Media by Antigonus. He soon after successfully repulsed an attempt made upon the province by some partizans of Eumenes and Pithon, B. C. 316. (Diod. xix. 46, 47.) [C. P. M.]

OROPHERNES. [OLOPHERNES.]

ORO'SIUS, PAULUS, a Spanish presbyter, a native, as we gather from his own words (Histor. vii. 22), of Tarragona, flourished under Arcadius and Honorius. Having conceived a warm admiration for the character and talents of St. Augustine, he passed over into Africa about A. D. 413, in order that he might consult him upon the dogmas of the Priscillianists, which at that period were a source of great dissension in the churches of the Western peninsula. The bishop of Hippo flattered by the deep respect of this disciple, gave him a most cordial reception, and after imparting such instructions as he deemed most essential, despatched him to Syria in 414 or 415, ostensibly for the purpose of completing his theological education under St. Jerome, who was dwelling at Bethlehem, but in reality to counteract the influence and expose the principles of Pelagius, who had resided for some years in Palestine. Orosius having found a warm friend in Jerome, began to carry out the object of his mission by industriously spreading the intelligence that Coelestius had been condemned by the Carthaginian synod, impressing at the same time upon all the close connection which subsisted between this convicted heretic and Pelagius, against whom he at length brought a direct charge of false doctrine. The cause was formally heard before the tribunal of John, bishop of Jerusalem, and ended in the discomfiture of the accuser, who, having indulged in some disrespectful expressions towards the judge, was in turn denounced as a blasphemer. He remained in the East until he had ascertained the unfavourable result of the appeal to the council of Diospolis, after which, having obtained possession of the relics of St. Stephen, the protomartyr, the place of whose sepulture had not long before been marvellously revealed, he returned with them to Africa, and there, it is believed, died, but at what period is not known.

The following works by this author are still extant.

I. Historiarum adversus Paganos Libri VII., dedicated to St. Augustine, at whose suggestion the task was undertaken. The gentiles of this age were wont to complain that the dishonour and ruin which had so long threatened the empire, and which had at length been consummated in the sack of Rome by Alaric and his Goths, must be ascribed to the wrath of the ancient deities, whose worship had been abandoned and whose altars had been profaned by the votaries of the new faith. In order to silence their clamour Orosius, upon his return from Palestine, composed this history to demonstrate that from the earliest epoch the world had been the scene of crimes not less revolting, and that men had groaned under calamities still more intolerable from war, pestilence, earthquakes, volcanoes, and the fury of the elements, while they could look forward to no happiness in a future state to console them for their miseries in the present. The annals, which extend from the Creation down to the year A. D. 417, are, with exception of the concluding portion, extracted from Justin, Eutropius, and inferior second-hand authorities, whose statements are rashly admitted and unskilfully combined, without any attempt to investigate the basis upon which they rest, or to reconcile their contradictions and inconsistencies. Although such a compilation might be held in high esteem in the fifth century, and might command the applause of the ecclesiastical biographers from Gennadius downwards, and even of some scholars of a later date, its defects could not escape the keen discernment of Sigonius, Lipsius, and Casaubon, who soon perceived that no original sources of information had been consulted, that the Greek writers had been altogether neglected, either through ignorance or indifference, and that the whole narrative so abounded with gross errors in facts and in chronology as to be almost totally destitute of utility, since no dependence can be placed on the accuracy of those representations which refer to events not elsewhere chronicled. The style which has been pronounced by some impartial critics not devoid of elegance, is evidently formed upon the two great models of the Christian eloquence of Africa, Tertullian and Cyprian. Among the various titles exhibited by the MSS., such as, Historia adversus Paganorum Calumnias; De Cladibus et Miseriis Mundi, and the like, one, which has proved a most puzzling enigma, appears under the varying forms, Hormesta, or Ormesta, or Ormista, sometimes with the addition, id est miseriarum Christiani temporis. Among a multitude of solutions, many of them altogether ridiculous, the most plausible is that which adopting Ormista as the true orthography supposes it to be a compound of Or. m. ist.—an abbreviation for Orosii mundi historia.

The Editio Princeps of the Historia was printed at Vienna, by J. Schüssler, fol. 1471, and presents a text derived from an excellent MS. Another very early impression is that published at Vicenza, in small folio, without a date, by Herm. de Colonia, and from this the Venice editions of 1483, 1484, 1499, and 1500, appear to have been copied. The only really good edition is that of Havercamp, Lug. Bat. 4to. 1738, prepared with great industry, and containing a mass of valuable illustrations.

A translation into Anglo-Saxon was executed by Alfred the Great, of which a specimen was published by Elstob at Oxford in 1690, and the whole work accompanied by a version of the Anglo-Saxon text into English appeared at London, 8vo. 1773, under the inspection of Daines Barrington and John Reinhold Foster. There are old translations into German and Italian also; into the former by Hieronymus Bonerus, fol. Colmar, 1539, frequently reprinted; into the latter by Giov. Guerini Da Lanciza, without date or name of place, but apparently belonging to the sixteenth century.

II. Liber Apologeticus de Arbitrii Libertate, written in Palestine, A. D. 415. Orosius, having been anathematised by John of Jerusalem as one who maintained that man could not, even by the aid of God, fulfil the divine law, published this tract with the double object of proving the injustice of the charge and of defending his own proceedings by demonstrating the fatal tendency of the tenets inculcated by Pelagius. By some oversight on the part of a transcriber, seventeen chapters of the De Natura et Gratia, by Augustine, have been inserted in this piece, a mistake which has led to no small confusion. The Apologeticus was first printed at Louvain, 8vo. 1558, along with the epistle of Jerome against Pelagius, and will be found also in the Bibliotheca Patrum Max. Lugdun. 1677, vol. vi.; it is appended to the edition of the Historiae by Havercamp, and is included in Harduin's collection of Councils, vol. i. p. 200.

III. Commonitorium ad Augustinum, the earliest of the works of Orosius, composed soon after his first arrival in Africa, for the purpose of explaining the state of religious parties in Spain, especially in reference to the commotions excited by the Priscillianists and Origenists. It is usually attached to the reply, by Augustine, entitled Contra Priscillianistas et Origenistas Liber ad Orosium, vol. viii. ed. Bened.

Some Epistolae ad Augustinum appear to have been at one time in existence, but are now lost.

The following productions have been commonly ascribed to Orosius.

1. Dialogus sexaginta quinque Quaestionum Orosii percontantis et Augustini respondentis, found among the works of Augustine. 2. Quaestiones de Trinitate et aliis Scripturae Sacrae Locis ad Augustinum, printed along with Augustini Responsio, at Paris, in 1533. 3. Commentarium in Canticum Canticorum, attributed by Trithemius to Orosius, but in reality belonging to Honorius Augustodunensis. 4. The De Ratione Animae, mentioned by Trithemius, supposed by many to be a spurious treatise, is in reality the Commonitorium under a different title. No complete edition of the collected works has yet appeared. (Augustin. de Ratione Anim. ad Hieron.; Gennad. de Viris Illustr. 39. 46; Trithem. de Script. Eccles. 121; Nic. Anton. Bibl. Hispan. Vet. iii. 1; G. J. Voss. de Historicis Lat. ii. 14; Schönemann, Bibl. Patr. Lat. vol. ii. § 10; Bähr, Geschichte der Römischen Litterat. § 238; suppl. band. 2te Abtheil. § 141; D. G. Moller, Dissertatio de Paulo Orosio, 4to. Altorf. 1689; Voss. Histor. Pelag. i. 17; Sigonius, de Historicis Rom. 3; Lips. Comment. in Tacit. Ann.; Casaubon, de Rebus Sacris, &c. i. 12, especially Mörner, De Orosii Vita ejusque Historiarum Libris septem adversus Paganos, Berol, 1844.) [W. R.]

ORPHEUS (Ὀρφεύς). The history of the extant productions of Greek literature begins with the Homeric poems. But it is evident that works so perfect in their kind are the end, and not the beginning, of a course of poetical development. This assumption is confirmed by innumerable traditions, which record the names of poets before the time of Homer, who employed their music for the civilisation of men and for the worship of different divinities. In accordance with the spirit of Greek mythology, the gods themselves stand at the head of this succession of poets, namely, Hermes, the inventor of the lyre, and Apollo, who received the invention from his brother, and became the divinity presiding over the whole art of music. With Apollo are associated, still in the spirit of the old mythology, a class of subordinate divinities — the Muses. The earliest human cultivators of the art are represented as the immediate pupils, and even (what, in fact, merely means the same thing) the children of Apollo and the Muses. Their personal existence is as uncertain as that of other mythical personages, and for us they can only be considered as the representatives of certain periods and certain kinds of poetical development. Their names are no doubt all significant, although the etymology of some of them is very uncertain, while that of others, such as Musaeus, is at once evident. The chief of these names are Olen, Linus, Orpheus, Musaeus, Eumolpus, Pamphus, Thamyris, and Philammon.

Of these names that of Orpheus is the most important, and at the same time the one involving the greatest difficulties. These difficulties arise from the scantiness of the early traditions respecting him, in tracing which we are rather impeded than aided by the many marvels which later writers connected with his story; and also from the very different religious positions which are assigned to him. On this last point it may be remarked in general that the earliest opinions respecting him seem to have invariably connected him with Apollo; while his name was afterwards adopted as the central point of one system of Dionysiac worship.

One of the most essential points in such an inquiry as the present is, to observe the history of the traditions themselves. The name of Orpheus does not occur in the Homeric or Hesiodic poems; but, during the lyric period, it had attained to great celebrity. Ibycus, who flourished about the middle of the sixth century B. C., mentions him as "the renowned Orpheus" (ὀνομακλυτὸν Ὀρφῆν, Ibyc. Fr. No. 22, Schneidewin, No. 9, Bergk, ap. Priscian. vol. i. p. 283, Krehl). Pindar enumerates him among the Argonauts as the celebrated harp player, father of songs, and as sent forth by Apollo (Pyth. iv. 315. s. 176): elsewhere he mentioned him as the son of Oeagrus (Schol. ad loc.). The historians Hellanicus and Pherecydes record his name, the former making him the ancestor both of Homer and of Hesiod (Fr. Nos. 5, 6, Müller, ap. Procl. Vit. Hes. p. 141, b., Vit. Hom. Ined.); the latter stating that it was not Orpheus, but Philammon, who was the bard of the Argonauts (Fr. 63, Müller, ap. Schol. ad Apollon. i. 23), and this is also the account which Apollonius Rhodius followed. In the dramatic poets there are several references to Orpheus. Aeschylus alludes to the fable of his leading after him trees charmed by the sound of his lyre (Ag. 1612, 1613, Wellauer, 1629, 1630, Dind.); and there is an important statement preserved by Eratosthenes (c. 24), who quotes the Bassarides of the same poet, that "Orpheus did not honour Dionysus, but believed the sun to be the greatest of the gods, whom also he called Apollo; and rising up in the night, he ascended before dawn to the mountain called Pangaeum, that he might see the sun first, at which Dionysus being enraged sent upon him the Bassaridae, as the poet Aeschylus says, who tore him in pieces, and scattered his limbs abroad; but the Muses collected them, and buried them at the place called Leibethra:" but the quotation itself shows the impossibility of determining how much of this account is to be considered as given by Aeschylus. Sophocles does not mention Orpheus, but he is repeatedly referred to by Euripides, in whom we find the first allusion to the connection of Orpheus with Dionysus and the infernal regions: he speaks of him as related to the Muses (Rhes. 944, 946); mentions the power of his song over rocks, trees, and wild beasts (Med. 543, Iph. in Aul. 1211, Bacch. 561, and a jocular allusion in Cyc. 646); refers to his charming the infernal powers (Alc. 357); connects him with Bacchanalian orgies (Hippol. 953); ascribes to him the origin of sacred mysteries (Rhes. 943), and places the scene of his activity among the forests of Olympus. (Bacch. 561.) He is mentioned once only, but in an important passage, by Aristophanes (Ran. 1032), who enumerates, as the oldest poets, Orpheus, Musaeus, Hesiod, and Homer, and makes Orpheus the teacher of religious initiations and of abstinence from murder:

Ὀρφεὺς μὲν γὰρ τελετάς θ' ἡμῖν
κατέδειξε φόνου τ' ἀπέχεσθαι.

Passages exactly parallel to this are found in Plato (Apol. p. 41, a., Protag. p. 316, d.), who frequently refers to Orpheus, his followers, and his works. He calls him the son of Oeagrus (Sympos. p. 179, d.), mentions him as a musician and inventor (Ion, p. 533, c., Leg. iii. p. 677, d.), refers to the miraculous power of his lyre (Protag. p. 315, a.), and gives a singular version of the story of his descent into Hades: the gods, he says, imposed upon the poet, by showing him only a phantasm of his lost wife, because he had not the courage to die, like Alcestis, but contrived to enter Hades alive, and, as a further punishment for his cowardice, he met his death at the hands of women (Sympos. p. 179, d.; comp. Polit. x. p. 620, a.). This account is quite discordant with the notions of the early Greeks respecting the value of life, and even with the example quoted by Plato himself, as far as Admetus is concerned. Plato seems to have misunderstood the reason why Orpheus's "contriving to enter Hades alive," called down the anger of the gods, namely, as a presumptuous transgression of the limits assigned to the condition of mortal men: this point will have to be considered again. As the followers of Orpheus, Plato mentions both poets and religionists (Prot. p. 316, d., Ion, p. 536, b., Cratyl. p. 400, c.), and in the passage last quoted, he tells us that the followers of Orpheus held the doctrine, that the soul is imprisoned in the body as a punishment for some previous sins. He makes several quotations from the writings ascribed to Orpheus, of which one, if not more, is from the Theogony (Cratyl. p. 402, b., Phileb. p. 66, c., Leg. ii. p. 669, d.), and in one passage he speaks of collections of books, which went under the names of Orpheus and Musaeus, and contained rules for religious ceremonies. (Polit. ii. p. 364, e.)

The writings mentioned in the last passage were evidently regarded by Plato as spurious, but, from the other passages quoted, he seems to have believed at least in the existence of Orpheus and in the genuineness of his Theogony. Not so, however, Aristotle, who held that no such person as Orpheus ever existed, and that the works ascribed to him were forged by Cercops and Onomacritus. [ONOMACRITUS.]

Proceeding to the mythographers, and the later poets, from Apollodorus downwards, we find the legends of Orpheus amplified by details, the whole of which it is impossible here to enumerate; we give an outline of the most important of them.

Orpheus, the son of Oeagrus and Calliope, lived in Thrace at the period of the Argonauts, whom he accompanied in their expedition. Presented with the lyre by Apollo, and instructed by the Muses in its use, he enchanted with its music not only the wild beasts, but the trees and rocks upon Olympus, so that they moved from their places to follow the sound of his golden harp. The power of his music caused the Argonauts to seek his aid, which contributed materially to the success of their expedition: at the sound of his lyre the Argo glided down into the sea; the Argonauts tore themselves away from the pleasures of Lemnos; the Symplegadae, or moving rocks, which threatened to crush the ship between them, were fixed in their places; and the Colchian dragon, which guarded the golden fleece, was lulled to sleep: other legends of the same kind may be read in the Argonautica, which bears the name of Orpheus. After his return from the Argonautic expedition he took up his abode in a cave in Thrace, and employed himself in the civilisation of its wild inhabitants. There is also a legend of his having visited Egypt. The legends respecting the loss and recovery of his wife, and his own death, are very various. His wife was a nymph named Agriope or Eurydice. In the older accounts the cause of her death is not referred to, but the legend followed in the well-known passages of Virgil and Ovid, which ascribes the death of Eurydice to the bite of a serpent, is no doubt of high antiquity, but the introduction of Aristaeus into the legend cannot be traced to any writer older than Virgil himself. (Diod. iv. 25; Conon, 45; Paus. ix. 30. § 4; Hygin. Fab. 164.) He followed his lost wife into the abodes of Hades, where the charms of his lyre suspended the torments of the damned, and won back his wife from the most inexorable of all deities; but his prayer was only granted upon this condition, that he should not look back upon his restored wife, till they had arrived in the upper world: at the very moment when they were about to pass the fatal bounds, the anxiety of love overcame the poet; he looked round to see that Eurydice was following him; and he beheld her caught back into the infernal regions. The form of the myth, as told by Plato, has been given above. The later poets, forgetting the religious meaning of the legend, connected his death with the second loss of Eurydice, his grief for whom led him to treat with contempt the Thracian women, who in revenge tore him to pieces under the excitement of their Bacchanalian orgies. Other causes are assigned for the fury of the Thracian Maenads; but the most ancient form of the legend seems to be that already mentioned as quoted by Eratosthenes from Aeschylus. The variation, by which Aphrodite is made the instigator of his death, from motives of jealousy, is of course merely a fancy of some late poet (Conon, 45). Another form of the legend, which deserves much more attention, is that which was embodied in an inscription upon what was said to be the tomb, in which the bones of Orpheus were buried, at Dium near Pydna, in Macedonia, which ascribed his death to the thunderbolts of Zeus: —

Θρήϊκα χρυσολύρην τῆδ' Ὀρφέα Μοῦσαι ἔθαψαν,
Ὃν κτάνεν ὑψιμέδων Ζεὺς ψολόεντι βέλει.

(Diog. Laërt. Prooem. 5; Paus. ix. 30. § 5; Anth. Graec. Epig. Inc. No. 483; Brunck, Anal. vol. iii. p. 253.)

After his death, according to the more common form of the legend, the Muses collected the fragments of his body, and buried them at Leibethra at the foot of Olympus, where the nightingale sang sweetly over his grave. The subsequent transference of his bones to Dium is evidently a local legend. (Paus. l. c.) His head was thrown upon the Hebrus, down which it rolled to the sea, and was borne across to Lesbos, where the grave in which it was interred was shown at Antissa. His lyre was also said to have been carried to Lesbos; and both traditions are simply poetical expressions of the historical fact that Lesbos was the first great seat of the music of the lyre: indeed Antissa itself was the birth-place of Terpander, the earliest historical musician. (Phanocles, ap. Stob. Tit. lxii. p. 399). The astronomers taught that the lyre of Orpheus was placed by Zeus among the stars, at the intercession of Apollo and the Muses (Eratosth. 24; Hygin. Astr. ii. 7; Manil. Astron. i. 324).

In these legends there are some points which require but little explanation. The invention of music, in connection with the services of Apollo and the Muses, its first great application to the worship of the gods, which Orpheus is therefore said to have introduced, its power over the passions, and the importance which the Greeks attached to the knowledge of it, as intimately allied with the very existence of all social order,—are probably the chief elementary ideas of the whole legend. But then comes in one of the dark features of the Greek religion, in which the gods envy the advancement of man in knowledge and civilisation, and severely punish any one who transgresses the bounds assigned to humanity, as may be seen in the legend of Prometheus, and in the sudden death, or blindness, or other calamities of the early poets and musicians. In a later age, the conflict was no longer viewed as between the gods and man, but between the worshippers of different divinities; and especially between Apollo, the symbol of pure intellect, and Dionysus, the deity of the senses: hence Orpheus, the servant of Apollo, falls a victim to the jealousy of Dionysus, and the fury of his worshippers. There are, however, other points in the legend which are of the utmost difficulty, and which would require far more discussion than can be entered upon here. For these matters the reader is referred to Lobeck's Aglaophamus, Müller's Prolegomena zu einer wissenschaftlichen Mythologie, and Klausen's article in Ersch and Gruber's Encyclopädie. Concerning the localities of the legend, see Müller's Literature of Ancient Greece, p. 26, and Klausen. The works of art representing Orpheus are enumerated by Klausen.

Orphic Societies and Mysteries. — All that part of the mythology of Orpheus which connects him with Dionysus must be considered as a later invention, quite irreconcilable with the original legends, in which he is the servant of Apollo and the Muses: the discrepancy extends even to the instrument of his music, which was always the lyre, and never the flute. It is almost hopeless to explain the transition. It is enough to remark here that, about the time of the first development of Greek philosophy, societies were formed, which assumed the name of Orpheus, and which celebrated peculiar mysteries, quite different from those of Eleusis. They are thus described by Müller (Hist. Lit. Anc. Gr. p. 231.): —

"On the other hand there was a society of persons, who performed the rites of a mystical worship, but were not exclusively attached to a particular temple and festival, and who did not confine their notions to the initiated, but published them to others, and committed them to literary works. These were the followers of Orpheus (οἱ Ὀρφικοί); that is to say, associations of persons, who, under the [pretended] guidance of the ancient mystical poet Orpheus, dedicated themselves to the worship of Bacchus, in which they hoped to find satisfaction for an ardent longing after the soothing and elevating influences of religion. The Dionysus, to whose worship the Orphic and Bacchic rites were annexed (τὰ Ὀρφικὰ καλεόμενα καὶ Βακχικά, Herod. ii. 81), was the Chthonian deity, Dionysus Zagreus, closely connected with Demeter and Cora, who was the personified expression, not only of the most rapturous pleasure, but also of a deep sorrow for the miseries of human life. The Orphic legends and poems related in great part to this Dionysus, who was combined, as an infernal deity, with Hades (a doctrine given by the philosopher Heracleitus as the opinion of a particular sect, ap. Clem. Alex. Protrep. p. 30, Potter); and upon whom the Orphic theologers founded their hopes of the purification and ultimate immortality of the soul. But their mode of celebrating this worship was very different from the popular rites of Bacchus. The Orphic worshippers of Bacchus did not indulge in unrestrained pleasure and frantic enthusiasm, but rather aimed at an ascetic purity of life and manners. (See Lobeck, Aglaoph. p. 244.) The followers of Orpheus, when they had tasted the mystic sacrificial feast of raw flesh torn from the ox of Dionysus (ὠμοφαγία), partook of no other animal food. They wore white linen garments, like Oriental and Egyptian priests, from whom, as Herodotus remarks (l. c.), much may have been borrowed in the ritual of the Orphic worship."

Herodotus not only speaks of these rites as being Egyptian, but also Pythagorean in their character. The explanation of this is that the Pythagorean societies, after their expulsion from Magna Graecia, united themselves with the Orphic societies of the mother country, and of course greatly influenced their character. But before this time the Orphic system had been reduced to a definite form by PHERECYDES and ONOMACRITUS, who stand at the head of a series of writers, in whose works the Orphic theology was embodied; such as Cercops, Brontinus, Orpheus of Camarina, Orpheus of Croton, Arignote, Persinus of Miletus, Timocles of Syracuse, and Zopyrus of Heracleia or Tarentum (Müller, p. 235). Besides these associations there were also an obscure set of mystagogues derived from them, called Orpheotelests (Ὀρφεοτελεσταί), "who used to come before the doors of the rich, and promise to release them from their own sins and those of their forefathers, by sacrifices and expiatory songs; and they produced at this ceremony a heap of books of Orpheus and Musaeus, upon which they founded their promises" (Plat. Ion, p. 536, b.; Müller, p. 235). The nature of the Orphic theology, and the points of difference between it and that of Homer and Hesiod, are fully discussed by Müller (Hist. Lit. Anc. Gr. pp. 235—238) and Mr. Grote (vol. i. pp. 22, &c.); but most fully by Lobeck, in his Aglaophamus.

Orphic Literature.—We have seen that many poems ascribed to Orpheus were current as early as the time of the Peisistratids [ONOMACRITUS], and that they are often quoted by Plato. The allusions to them in later writers are very frequent; for example, Pausanias speaks of hymns of his, which he believed to be still preserved by the Lycomidae (an Athenian family who seem to have been the chief priests of the Orphic worship, as the Eumolpidae were of the Eleusinian), and which, he says, were only inferior in beauty to the poems of Homer, and held even in higher honour, on account of their divine subjects. He also speaks of them as very few in number, and as distinguished by great brevity of style (ix. 30. §§ 5, 6. s. 12).

Considering the slight acquaintance which the ancients evidently possessed with these works, it is somewhat surprising that certain extant poems, which bear the name of Orpheus, should have been generally regarded by scholars, until a very recent period, as genuine, that is, as works more ancient than the Homeric poems, if not the productions of Orpheus himself. It is not worth while to repeat here the history of the controversy, which will be found in Bernhardy and the other historians of Greek literature. The result is that it is now fully established that the bulk of these poems are the forgeries of Christian grammarians and philosophers of the Alexandrian school; but that among the fragments, which form a part of the collection, are some genuine remains of that Orphic poetry which was known to Plato, and which must be assigned to the period of Onomacritus, or perhaps a little earlier. The Orphic literature which, in this sense, we may call genuine, seems to have included Hymns, a Theogony, an ancient poem called Minyas or the Descent into Hades, Oracles and Songs for Initiations (Τελεταί), a collection of Sacred Legends (Ἱεροὶ λόγοι), ascribed to Cercops, and perhaps some other works. The apocryphal productions which have come down to us under the name of Orphica, are the following:

1. Ἀργοναυτικά, an epic poem in 1384 hexameters, giving an account of the expedition of the Argonauts, which is full of indications of its late date.

2. Ὕμνοι, eighty-seven or eighty-eight hymns in hexameters, evidently the productions of the Neo-Platonic school.

3. Λιθικά, the best of the three apocryphal Orphic poems, which treats of properties of stones, both precious and common, and their uses in divination.

4. Fragments, chiefly of the Theogony. It is in this class that we find the genuine remains, above referred to, of the literature of the early Orphic theology, but intermingled with others of a much later date. (Eschenbach, Epigenes, de Poesi Orphica Commentarius, Norimb. 1702—1704; Tiedemann, Griechenlands erste Philosophen, Leipz. 1780; G. H. Bode, de Orpheo Poetarum Graecorum antiquissimo, Gott. 1824; Lobeck, Aglaophamus; Bode, Gesch. d. Hell. Dichtkunst, vols. i. ii.; Ulrici, Gesch. d. Hellen. Dichtkunst, vols. i. ii.; Bernhardy, Grundriss d. Griech. Litt. vol. ii. pp. 266, &c.; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. i. pp. 140, &c.; for a further list of writers on Orpheus, see Hoffmann, Lexicon Bibliographicum Scriptorum Graecorum.)

The chief editions of Orpheus, after the early ones of 1517, 1519, 1540, 1543, 1566, and 1606, are those of Eschenbach, Traj. ad Rhen. 1689, 12mo.; Gesner and Hamberger, Lips. 1764, 8vo. and Hermann, Lips. 1805, 8vo., by far the best.

There are also small editions, chiefly for the use of schools, by Schaefer, Lips. 1818, 12mo., and in the Tauchnitz Classics, 1824, 16mo. [P. S.]

ORPHI'DIUS BENIGNUS, a legate of the emperor Otho, fell in the battle of Bedriacum against the troops of Vitellius, A. D. 69. (Tac. Hist. ii. 43, 45.)

ORPHITUS. [ORFITUS.]

ORSA'BARIS (Ὀρσάβαρις), a daughter of Mithridates the Great, who was taken prisoner by Pompey, and served to adorn his triúmph, B. C. 61 (Appian, Mithr. 117). The name Orsobaris occurs aiso on a coin of the city of Prusias, in Bithynia. which bears the inscription ΒΑΣΙΛΙΣΣΗΣ ΜΟΥΣΗΣ ΟΡΣΟΒΑΡΙΟΣ; and this is conjectured by Visconti (Iconogr. Grecque, tom. ii. p. 195) to refer to the same person as the one mentioned in Appian, whom he supposes to have been married to Socrates, the usurper set up by Mithridates as king of Bithynia. [E. H. B.]

ORSI'LOCHUS (Ὀρσίλοχος). 1. A son of the river god Alpheius and Telegone, and the father of Diocles, at Pherae, in Messenia. (Hom. Il. v. 545, Od. iii. 489, xv. 187, xxi. 15; Paus. iv. 30. § 2.)

2. A grandson of No. 1, and brother of Crethon, together with whom he was slain by Aeneias, at Troy. (Hom. Il. v. 542, &c.; Paus. iv. i. § 3.)

3. A son of Idomeneus. (Hom. Od. xiii. 259—271.) [L. S.]

O'RTALUS, or more properly HO'RTALUS, a cognomen of the Hortensii. [HORTENSIUS.]

ORTHA'GORAS (Ὀρθαγόρας). 1. Of Thebes, mentioned by Socrates in the Protagoras of Plato (p. 318, c.), as one of the most celebrated flute-players of his day, and by Athenaeus as one of the instructors of Epaminondas in flute-playing. (Ath. iv. p. 184, e.)

2. A geographer, whose age is unknown, but whose work on India (Ἰνδοὶ λόγοι) is quoted both by Aelian (N. A. xvi. 35; xvii. 6) and by Strabo (xvi. p. 766). His statements in that work, respecting the Red Sea, are quoted by Philostratus (Vit. Apollon. iii. 53; Phot. Biblioth. cod. ccxli. p. 327, b. 10, Bekker). [P. S.]

Ò'RTHIA (Ὀρθία, Ὀρθίς, or Ὀρθωσία), a surname of the Artemis who is also called Iphigeneia or Lygodesma, and must be regarded as the goddess of the moon. Her worship was probably brought to Sparta from Lemnos. It was at the altar of Artemis Orthia that Spartan boys had to undergo the diamastigosis (Schol. ad Pind. Ol. iii. 54; Herod. iv. 87; Xenoph. de Rep. Lac. ii. 10). She also had temples at Brauron, in the Cerameicus at Athens, in Elis, and on the coast of Byzantium. The ancients derived her surname from mount Orthosium or Orthium in Arcadia. [L. S.]

ORTHRUS (Ὄρθρος), the dog of Geryones, who was begotten by Typhon and Echidna. (Hes. Theog. 293; Apollod. ii. 5. § 10.) [L. S.]

ORTIAGON (Ὀρτιάγων), one of the three princes of Galatia, when that country was invaded by the Romans under Cn. Manlius Vulso, in B. C. 189. He was defeated on Mount Olympus by the invaders, and compelled to fly home for refuge. Polybius tells us that he cherished the design of uniting all Galatia under his rule, and that he was well qualified to succeed in the attempt, being liberal, magnanimous, possessed of sagacity and winning manners; and above all, brave and skilful in war. (Polyb. xxii. 21; Liv. xxxviii. 19, &c.) [CHIOMARA] [E. E.]

ORT'YGIA (Ὀρτυγία), a surname of Artemis, derived from the island of Ortygia, the ancient name for Delos, or an island off Syracuse (Ov. Met. i. 694). The goddess bore this name in various places, but always with reference to the island in which she was born. (Strab. x. p. 486.) [L. S.]

ORUS. [HORUS; ORION.]

ORUS, the engraver of a beautiful gem, representing a head of Silenus, in the Museum Worsleyanum, p. 144. [P. S.]

ORXINES (Ὀρξίνης), a noble and wealthy Persian, who traced his descent from Cyrus. He was present at the battle of Gaugamela, when, together with Orontobates, he commanded the troops which came from the shores of the Persian Gulf. Subsequently, during the absence of Alexander (B. C. 325), on the death of Phrasaortes, the satrap of Persis, Orxines assumed the government, and on the return of Alexander came to meet him with costly presents. Alexander does not appear to have been incensed at this usurpation, in which indeed Orxines seems to have been actuated by loyal intentions towards Alexander. But the sepulchre of Cyrus at Pasargadae had been violated and pillaged, and the enemies of Orxines seem to have laid hold of this for the purpose of securing his ruin. He was charged with that and other acts of sacrilege, as well as with having abused his power. Arrian says nothing of the charge being unfounded, but Curtius represents Orxines (or Orsines, as he calls him) as the victim of calumny and intrigue. However that may have been, he was crucified by order of Alexander. (Arrian, iii. 8. § 8, vi. 29. § 3; Curt. iv. 12. § 8, x. 1. §§ 22, 29, 37.) [C. P. M.]

OSACES. [ARSACES XIV., p. 356, a.]

OSI'RIS (Ὄσιρις), the great Egyptian divinity, and husband of Isis. According to Herodotus they were the only divinities that were worshipped by all the Egyptians (Herod. ii. 42). Osiris is described by Plutarch, in his treatise on Isis and Osiris, as a son of Rhea and Helios. His Egyptian name is said to have been Hysiris (Plut. l. c. 34), which is interpreted to mean "son of Isis," though some said that it meant "many-eyed;" and according to Heliodorus (Aeth. ix. 424), Osiris was the god of the Nile, as Isis was the goddess of the earth. (Comp. Bunsen, Aegypt. Stelle in der Weltgesch. vol. i. p. 494, &c.) [L. S.]

O'SIUS. [HOSIUS.]

OSROES. [ARSACES XXV., p. 359, a.]

OSSA (Ὄσσα), the personification of rumour or report, the Latin Fama. As it is often impossible to trace a report to its source, it is said to come from Zeus, and hence Ossa is called the messenger of Zeus (Hom. Od. i. 282, ii. 216, xxiv. 412, Il. ii. 93). Sophocles (Oed. Tyr. 158) calls her a daughter of Hope, and the poets, both Greek and Latin, have indulged in various imaginary descriptions of Ossa or Fama (Hes. Op. et Dies, 705, &c.; Virg. Aen. iv. 174, &c.; Ov. Met. xii. 39, &c.). At Athens she was honoured with an altar. (Paus. i. 17. § 1.) [L. S.]

OSSIPAGA, or OSSIPANGA, also written Ossilago, Ossipagina, was a Roman divinity, who was prayed to, to harden and strengthen the bones of infants. (Arnob. adv. Gent. iii. 30, iv. 7.) [L.S.]

OSTO'RIUS SABI'NUS. [SABINUS.]

OSTO'RIUS SCA'PULA. [SCAPULA.]

OTACI'LIA SEVE'RA, MA'RCIA, the wife of the elder M. Julius Philippus, and the mother of the boy who was put to death by the praetorians after the battle of Verona, A. D. 249. She appears to have had a daughter also, since Zosimus speaks of a certain Severianus as the son-in-law of the emperor. No other circumstances are known regarding this princess, except that she was believed by many of the ancients to have been a Christian. The Alexandrian Chronicle makes a positive assertion to this effect, and Eusebius (H. E. vi. 36) mentions a letter, said to have been addressed to her by Origen. (Tillemont, Notes sur l'Empereur Philippe, in his Histoire des Empereurs, vol. iii. p. 499 ; Eckhel, vol. vii. p. 332 ; Zosim. i. 19.) [W. R.]

COIN OF OTACILIA.

OTACI'LIA, condemned in a judicium by the celebrated jurist C. Aquillius. (Val. Max. viii. 2. § 2.) In the MSS. of Valerius we have ab Otacilia Laterensi, for which we ought perhaps to read ab Otacilia Laterensis, that is, Otacilia, the wife of Laterensis.

OTACI'LIA GENS, sometimes written Octacilia, is first mentioned at the commencement of the first Punic war, when two brothers of this name obtained the consulship, M'. Otacilius Crassus in B. C. 263, and T. Otacilius Crassus in B. C. 261; but after this time the Otacilii rarely occur. The only cognomens in this gens are CRASSUS and NASO. One or two persons, who were accidentally omitted under Crassus, are given below.

OTACI'LIUS. 1. T. OTACILIUS CRASSUS, one of the Roman generals, actively employed during the greater part of the second Punic war, was probably a son of T. Otacilius Crassus, consul in B. C. 261. [CRASSUS, OTACILIUS, No. 2.] He is generally mentioned by Livy without a cognomen, but we learn from two passages (xxiii. 31, xxvi. 33), that he had the surname of Crassus. He was praetor B. C. 217, in which year he vowed a temple to Mens, and is mentioned next year, B. C. 216, as pro-praetor, when he brought a letter to the senate from Hieron in Sicily, imploring the assistance of the Romans against the Carthaginian fleet. In B. C. 215 Otacilius and Q. Fabius Maximus were created duumviri for dedicating the temples they had vowed; and after consecrating the temple of Mens, Otacilius was sent with the imperium into Sicily to take the command of the fleet. From Lilybaeum he crossed over into Africa, and after laying waste the Carthaginian coast fell in with the Punic fleet, as he was making for Sardinia, and captured a few of their ships. On his return to Rome Otacilius became a candidate for the consulship for the year B. C. 214, and would certainly have been elected but for Q. Fabius Maximus, the daughter of whose sister was the wife of Otacilius. The praerogativa centuria had already given their votes in favour of Otacilius, when Fabius dissuaded the people from nominating him to the consulship on the ground that he had not sufficient military abilities to cope with Hannibal. Fabius Maximus and Claudius Marcellus were accordingly appointed consuls; but as some compensation to Otacilius, he was elected praetor for the second time, B. C. 214, and the command of the same fleet was entrusted to him which he had had in the previous year. His command was prolonged during the next three years; and in B. C. 212 he did good service by plundering the Carthaginian coast round Utica, and capturing several corn-vessels in the harbour of the latter city, by means of which he was able to send a supply of corn to the Roman forces, which had just taken Syracuse. In the election of the consuls for the year B. C. 210 Otacilius was again nominated to the consulship by the praerogativa centuria, and again lost his election, when it seemed certain, by the interference of T. Manlius Torquatus. Otacilius, however, never heard of this new affront; for just after the elections were over, word was brought that Otacilius had died in Sicily, B. C. 211. Otacilius was one of the pontifices. (Liv. xxii. 10, 56, xxiii. 21, 31, 32, 41, xxiv. 7—10, xxv. 31, xxvi. 1, 22, 23.)

2. OTACILIUS CRASSUS, one of Pompey's officers, had the command of the town of Lissus in Illyria, and cruelly butchered 220 of Caesar's soldiers, who had surrendered to him on the promise that they should be uninjured. Shortly after this he abandoned Lissus, and joined the main body of the Pompeian army. (Caes. B. C. iii. 28, 29.)

L. OTACI'LIUS PILITUS, a Roman rhetorician, who opened a school at Rome B. C. 81 (Hieronym. in Euseb. Chron. Olymp. 174. 4.) The cognomen of Otacilius is uncertain. Suetonius calls him Pilitus (in some manuscripts Pilutus), Eusebius Plotus, and Macrobius (Saturn. ii. 2) Pitholaus. He had been formerly a slave, and while in that condition acted as door-keeper (ostiarius), being chained, as was customary, to his post. But having exhibited talent, and a love of literature, he was manumitted by his master, and became a teacher of rhetoric. Cn. Pompeius Magnus was one of his pupils, and he wrote the history of Pompey, and of his father likewise, in several books, being the first instance, according to Cornelius Nepos, in which a history was written by a freedman. (Suet. de Ill. Rhet. 3; Voss. de Hist. Lat. i. 9. p. 40.)

OTA'NES (Ὀτάνης). 1. A noble and wealthy Persian, son of Pharnaspes. He was the first who suspected the imposture of Smerdis the Magian, and, when his suspicion was confirmed by the report of his daughter PHAEDIMA (one of the royal wives), he took the chief part in organizing the conspiracy against the pretender and his faction (B. C. 521). After the slaughter of the Magians, Otanes, according to the statement in Herodotus, recommended the establishment of democracy, and, when his fellow-conspirators came to the resolution of retaining monarchy, he abandoned all pretensions to the throne on condition that himself and his descendants should be exempted from the royal authority. At the same time it was decreed that to him and his posterity for ever a Median dress and other gifts of honour should be annually presented. Not long after this, Otanes was placed in command of the Persian force which invaded Samos for the purpose of placing Syloson, brother of Polycrates, in the government; and the act of the madman Charilaüs in murdering a number of the most distinguished Persians provoked him to order an indiscriminate massacre of the Samians. Afterwards, however, in obedience to the warning of a dream, he repeopled the island which he had thus desolated. (Herod. iii. 68—84, 141—149; comp. Strab. xiv. p. 638.)

2. A Persian, son of Sisamnes. His father,

one of the royal judges, was put to death by Cambyses for an unjust sentence, and his skin was stripped off and stretched on the judicial seat which he had occupied. To this same seat, thus covered, Otanes was advanced as his successor, and was compelled to exercise his functions with a constant memento beneath him of his father's fate. About B. C. 506, being appointed to succeed Megabyzus in the command of the forces on the sea-coast, he took Byzantium, Chalcedon, Antandrus, and Lamponium, as well as the islands of Lemnos and Imbros. (Herod. v. 25—27; Larch. and Schweigh. ad loc.) He was probably the same Otanes who is mentioned as a son-in-law of Dareius Hystaspis, and as one of the generals employed against the revolted Ionians in B. C. 499. He joined in defeating the rebels near Ephesus, and, in conjunction with Artaphernes, satrap of Sardis, he took Clazomenae, belonging to the Ionians, and the Aeolian town of Cume. He is not again mentioned by name in Herodotus, but he appears to have taken part in the subsequent operations of the war till the final reduction of Ionia. (Herod. v. 102, 116, 123, vi. 6, &c.) It seems doubtful whether we should identify either of the two above persons with the father of Patiramphes, the charioteer of Xerxes (Herod. vii. 40), or again with the father of Amastris [No. 1]. (Herod. vii. 61.) [E. E.]

OTHO, JU'NIUS. 1. A rhetorician frequently mentioned by the elder Seneca. He was the author of a work on that branch of rhetoric entitled colores (respecting the meaning of which see Quintil. iv. 2. § 88). Through the influence of Sejanus, Otho was made a senator, and by due subservience to the ruling powers, he obtained the praetorship in A. D. 22, in which year he is mentioned as one of the accusers of C. Silanus, proconsul of Asia. (Senec. Controv. i. 3, Declam. ii. 1, &c.; Tac. Ann. iii. 66.)

2. Tribune of the plebs, A. D. 37, the last year of the reign of Tiberius. He was banished for putting his intercessio upon the question of the reward that was to be given to the accuser of Acutia. (Tac. Ann. vi. 47.)

OTHO, L. RO'SCIUS, tribune of the plebs B. C. 67, was a warm supporter of the aristocratical party. When Gabinius proposed in this year to bestow upon Pompey the command of the war against the pirates, Otho and his colleague L. Trebellius were the only two of the tribunes that offered any decided opposition. It is related that, when Otho, afraid of speaking, after the way in which Trebellius had been dealt with [TREBELLIUS], held up two of his fingers to show that a colleague ought to be given to Pompey, the people set up such a shout that a crow that was flying over the forum was stunned, and fell down among them (Dion Cass. xxxvi. 7, 13; Plut. Pomp. 25). In the same year Otho proposed and carried the law which gave to the equites and to those persons who possessed the equestrian census, a special place at the public spectacles, in fourteen rows or seats (in quattuordecim gradibus sive ordinibus), next to the place of the senators, which was in the orchestra (Vell. Pat. ii. 32; Liv. Epit. 99; Dion Cass. xxxvi. 25; Cic. pro Mur. 19; Tac. Ann. xv. 32; Hor. Epod. iv. 15, Ep. i. 1. 62; Juv. iii. 159, xiv. 324). For those equites who had lost their rank by not possessing the proper equestrian census, there was a special place assigned (inter decoctores, Cic. Phil. ii. 18). This law soon became very unpopular; the people, who were excluded from the seats which they had formerly occupied in common with the equites, thought themselves insulted; and in Cicero's consulship (B. C. 63) there was such a riot occasioned by the obnoxious measure, that it required all his eloquence to allay the agitation. (Cic. ad Att. ii. 1).

This L. Roscius Otho must not be confounded, as he has frequently been, with the L. Roscius who was praetor in B. C. 49. The latter had the cognomen of Fabatus [FABATUS]. The Otho spoken of by Cicero in B. C. 45, may be the same as the tribune. (Cic. ad Att. xiii. 29, comp. xii. 37. § 2, 38. § 4, 42. § 1.)

OTHO, SA'LVIUS. 1. M. SALVIUS OTHO, the grandfather of the emperor Otho, was descended from an ancient and noble family of the town of Ferentinum, in Etruria. His father was a Roman eques, his mother was of low origin, perhaps even a freedwoman. Through the influence of Livia Augusta, in whose house he had been brought up, Otho was made a Roman senator, and eventually obtained the praetorship, but was not advanced to any higher honour. (Suet. Otho, 1; Tac. Hist. ii. 50.)

2. L. SALVIUS OTHO, the son of the preceding, and the father of the emperor Otho, was connected on his mother's side with many of the most distinguished Roman families, and stood so high in the favour of Tiberius and resembled this emperor so strongly in person, that it was supposed by most that he was his son. He discharged the various public offices at Rome, was consul suffectus in A. D. 33 (Suet. Galb. 6), obtained the proconsulate of Africa, and administered the affairs of this province, as well as of other extraordinary commands which he held, with great diligence and energy. In A. D. 42 he was sent into Illyricum, where the Roman army had lately rebelled against Claudius. On his arrival he put to death several of the soldiers, who had killed their own officers under the pretext that they had excited them to rebellion, and who had even been rewarded by Claudius for this very act. Such a proceeding, though it might have been necessary to restore the discipline of the troops, gave great umbrage at the imperial court; but Otho soon afterwards regained the favour of Claudius by detecting a conspiracy which had been formed against his life by a Roman eques. The senate conferred upon him the extraordinary honour of erecting his statue on the Palatine, and Claudius enrolled him among the patricians, adding that he did not wish better children than Otho. By his wife Albia Terentina he had two sons and one daughter. The elder of his sons, Lucius, bore, says Suetonius, the surname of Titianus, but we may conclude from Tacitus (Ann. xii. 52) and Frontinus (Aquaed. 13), that he had the cognomen of Otho as well [see below, No. 3]. His younger son, Marcus, was the emperor Otho. His daughter was betrothed, when quite young, to Drusus, the son of Germanicus. (Suet. Otho, 1; Tac. Hist. ii. 50.)

3. L. SALVIUS OTHO TITIANUS, was the son of No. 2, and the elder brother of the emperor Otho. He was consul A. D. 52, with Faustus Cornelius Sulla (Tac. Ann. xii. 52; Frontin. Aquaed. 13).

In A. D. 63 Titianus was proconsul in Asia, and had Agricola for his quaestor. It is related to the honour of the latter that he was not corrupted by the example of his superior officer, who indulged in every kind of rapacity (Tac. Agric. 6). On the death of Galba in January A. D. 69, Titianus was a second time made consul, with his brother Otho, the emperor. When the latter set out from Rome against the generals of Vitellius, he left Titianus in charge of the city, but he soon afterwards sent for him and gave him the chief command in the war. It was partly through his eagerness to engage with the Vitellian troops, that his brother lost the empire; and on the downfall of the latter Titianus was so little dreaded, that he was pardoned by Vitellius—pietate et ignavia excusatus, says Tacitus. (Tac. Hist. i. 75, 77. ii. 23, 33, 39, 60.)

OTHO, M. SA'LVIUS, Roman emperor A. D. 69, was descended from an ancient Etruscan family. His father L. Otho, who was consul in A. D. 33, had two sons, Marcus and L. Salvius Titianus. [See above, No. 2.] Marcus Otho was born in the early part of A. D. 32. He was of moderate stature, ill-made in the legs, and had an effeminate appearance. He was one of the companions of Nero in his debaucheries, till he was sent as governor to Lusitania, which he administered with credit during the last ten years of Nero's life [NERO, p. 1163, a.]. Otho attached himself to Galba when he revolted against Nero, in the hope of being adopted by him and succeeding to the empire. But Galba, who knew Otho's character, and wished to have a worthy successor, adopted L. Piso, on the tenth of January, A. D. 69, and designated him as the future emperor. (Tacit. Hist. i. 15.)

Otho thus saw his hopes disappointed. His private affairs also were in a ruinous condition, and he resolved to seize the power which an astrologer had foretold him that he would one day possess. He enlisted in his design a few soldiers, and on the fifteenth of January he was proclaimed emperor by a mere handful of men, who, with their swords drawn, carried him in a litter to the camp, where he was saluted emperor. Otho was ready to promise any thing and to stoop to any thing to extricate himself from his dangerous position, and to receive the prize at which he aimed (Tacit. Hist. i. 36). A little vigour and decision on the part of Galba might have checked the rising. The matter was at last decided by Otho and the soldiers making their way into the forum, upon which the standard-bearer of the cohort that accompanied Galba snatched from it the emperor's effigy, and threw it on the ground. This was the signal for deserting Galba, who received his death-blow from a common soldier.

The soldiers showed they were the masters of the emperor by choosing as praefecti praetorio, Plotius Firmus and Licinius Proculus; Flavius Sabinus, the brother of Vespasian, was made praefectus urbi. On the evening of the day in which Galba was murdered the senate took the oath of fidelity to Otho, who afterwards offered a sacrifice in the Capitol, with no favourable omens. The new emperor showed his moderation or his prudence by protecting against the fury of the soldiers, Marius Celsus, who had maintained his fidelity to Galba, and who showed the same devotion afterwards to the cause of Otho. The punishment of Tigellinus, the guilty encourager of Nero's crimes, and the first to desert him, was demanded by the people, and granted. This abominable wretch received the news of his death being required while he was enjoying the waters of Sinuessae, and he cut his throat with a razor. The indulgence of Otho towards those who were his personal enemies, and the change in his habits shown by devoting himself to the administration of affairs, gave people hopes that the emperor would turn out better than was expected. Still these appearances were by many considered deceptive, and there was little confidence in a man who owed his elevation to the murder of Galba, and the violence of the soldiers, whom he was compelled to keep in good humour. Otho was acknowledged emperor by Luceius Albinus, governor of Mauritania (Tacit. Hist. ii. 58), and by Carthage and the rest of Africa. The legions in Dalmatia, Pannonia, and Maesia took the oath of fidelity to the emperor. He was also recognised by Egypt, by Mucianus in Syria, and by Vespasian in Palestine; by Gallia Narbonensis, Aquitania, and by Spain. But he had a formidable opposition in the legions stationed in Germany on the Rhine, whither Vitellius had been sent to take the command by Galba, in the month of December, A. D. 68. Vitellius was a glutton, a drunkard, and a man of no capacity, but by his affable manners and his liberality he gained the good will of the soldiers who were dissatisfied with Galba. Vitellius had the command of four legions on the Lower Rhine, and two other legions on the upper course of the river were under Hordeonius Flaccus. Some of the Gallic towns also were ill disposed to Galba.

Neither Flaccus nor Vitellius had energy enough to commence a movement: it was begun by Fabius Valens, who commanded a legion in Lower Germany, and stimulated Vitellius to aim at the supreme power. Alienus Caecina, who also commanded a legion in Upper Germany, and was an officer of ability, hated Galba; and thus, before the murder of the aged emperor, every thing was ripe for a revolt in Germany.

Vitellius, who was in the town of Cologne (colonia Agrippinensis), was greeted with the title of imperator, on the third of January, A. D. 69. He accepted the title of Germanicus, but he would not assume that of Caesar. There was a striking contrast between the ardour of the soldiers, who wished to march for Italy in the midst of the winter, and the sluggishness of their newly-elected emperor, who even by midday was drunk and stupified with his gluttonous excesses. But every thing favoured Vitellius. Valerius Asiaticus, governor of Belgica, declared for him, and Junius Blaesus, governor of Gallia Lugdunensis. The troops in Rhaetia and Britain were also on his side. Valens and Caecina were sent forward, each at the head of a large army. The lazy emperor followed at his leisure. Valens had advanced as far as Toul (civitas Leucorum, Tacit. Hist. i. 64; D'Anville, Notice de la Gaule, "Tullum"), when he heard of Galba's death, the news of which determined Gallia Narbonensis and Aquitania to declare for Vitellius, though they had taken the oath to Otho. Cluvius Rufus, the governor of Spain, did the same.

Valens advanced by the route of Autun, Lyon, Vienne, and Lucus (Luc), to the foot of the Alps, plundering, and robbing all the way. The march of Caecina was still more disastrous to the country through which he made his way. He readily picked a quarrel with the Helvetii, many of whom were slaughtered, and others were sold as slaves. Aventicum (Avenche), their capital, surrendered, and its fate was left to the mercy of Vitellius, who yielded to the eloquent entreaty of Claudius Cossus, one of the legati who were sent to mollify the emperor. Caecina, while he was still on the north side of the Alps, received intelligence that a body of cavalry on the Po had taken the oath to Vitellius, under whom they had formerly served in Africa. Mediolanum (Milan), Vercellae, and other towns in North Italy, followed this example. Caecina having sent some Gallic, Lusitanian, British, and German troops over the mountains to support his new friends, led his soldiers across the Pennine Alps, through the snow with which they were still covered.

The revolt of Vitellius had not reached Rome at the time of Galba's death. As soon as it was known, Otho wrote to Vitellius, and offered to give him all that he could desire, and even to share the empire with him. Vitellius replied by offers on his part, but they could come to no terms, and both sides made preparation for war. A disturbance was caused at Rome by the praetorian soldiers, who suspected that there was some design against Otho. They broke into the palace, threatening to kill the senators, many of whom were supping with Otho, and with difficulty made their escape. The soldiers penetrated even to the emperor's apartment, in order to be assured that he was alive. The tumult was at last allayed, but the approach of a civil war, from the evils of which the state had so long been secure, caused general uneasiness.

Otho left Rome for North Italy about the fourteenth of March. His brother Titianus remained at Rome to look after the city, with Flavius Sabinus, Vespasian's brother, who was praefectus urbi. Otho had under him three commanders of ability, Suetonius Paulinus, Marius Celsus, and Annius Gallus. He marched on foot at the head of his troops, in a plain military equipment (Tacit. Hist. ii. 11). Otho's fleet was master of the sea on the north-west coast of Italy, and the soldiers treated the country as if it was a hostile territory. They defeated the Ligurian mountaineers and plundered Albium Intemelium (Vintimiglia). Annius Gallus and Vestricius Spurinna were commissioned by Otho to defend the Po. Spurinna, who was in Placentia, was attacked by Caecina, but succeeded in repelling him and destroying a large part of his force. Caecina retired, but the magnificent amphitheatre which was outside the walls was burnt during the contest. Caecina retreated towards Cremona, and bodies of his troops sustained fresh defeats. Martius Macer, at the head of Otho's gladiators, surprised some auxiliaries of Caecina, who took refuge in Cremona, but Macer from caution prevented his men from following them into the town. His conduct brought suspicion on Suetonius and the other generals of Otho, and Titianus, his brother, was sent for to take the conduct of the war. Caecina made another attempt to retrieve his losses, but he was beaten by Marius Celsus and Suetonius, who, however, would not allow the men to follow up their advantage; and that which probably was prudence, became the foundation of a charge of treason against him from his troops.

Valens, who was at Ticinum (Pavia), now joined his forces to those of Caecina, and the two generals, who had been jealous of one another, now thought only of combining to defeat the enemy. Otho's generals advised him to avoid a decisive battle, but his own opinion, and that of his brother and of Proculus, praefectus praetorio, was in favour of bringing the war at once to a close; and this determination ruined the cause of Otho. He was advised to retire to Brixellum (Brescelli), to be out of the way of danger, and he went there with a considerable force. The generals of Vitellius knew the state of affairs in Otho's army, and were ready to take advantage of it. The hostile armies were on the Po. The forces of Otho, under Titianus and Proculus, were marched to the fourth milestone from Bedriacum (Cividale?), and on their route they suffered for want of water. They had now sixteen miles to march to the confluence of the Adda and the Po, to find the enemy, whom they came up with before they were expected. A fierce battle was fought in which Otho's troops were entirely defeated. It is said that forty thousand men fell in this battle. The troops of Vitellius followed up the pursuit within five miles of Bedriacum, but they did not venture to attack the enemy's camp on that day. On the next day the two armies came to terms, and the soldiers of Otho received the victors into their camp.

Though Otho had still a large force with him, and other troops at Bedriacum and Placentia, he determined to make no further resistance, and to die by his own hand. After settling his affairs with the utmost coolness and deliberation, he stabbed himself. The manner of his death is circumstantially told by Suetonius. His life had been dissolute, and his conduct at the last, though it may appear to have displayed courage, was in effect only despair. He died on the fifteenth of April, A. D. 69, in the thirty-seventh year of his age. His sepulchre was at Brixellum, and Plutarch, who saw it, says that it bore simply his name, and no other inscription. Suetonius, who records every thing, has not forgotten Otho's wig. His hair was thin, and he wore a perruque, which was so skilfully fitted to his head that nobody could tell it from true hair. (Suetonius, Otho; Plutarch, Otho; Dion Cassius, lxiv.; Tacitus, Hist. i. ii.; all the authorities are collected by Tillemont, Histoire des Empereurs, vol. i.) [G. L.]

COIN OF THE EMPEROR OTHO.

OTHRY'ADES (Ὀθρυάδης), a Spartan, was one of the three hundred selected to fight with an equal number of Argives for the possession of Thyrea. Othryades was the only Spartan who survived the battle, and he remained on the field, and spoiled the dead bodies of the enemy, while Alcenor and Chromius, the two survivors of the Argive party, hastened home with the news of victory, supposing that all their opponents had been slain. On the second day after this, Othryades having remained at his post the whole time, the main armies of the two states came to ascertain the result, and, as the victory was claimed by both sides, a general battle ensued, in which the Argives were defeated. Othryades slew himself on the field, being ashamed to return to Sparta as the one survivor of her three hundred champions. The above is the account of Herodotus. Pausanias tells us, that in the theatre at Argos there was a sculptured group representing Perilaus, an Argive, son of Alcenor, as slaying Othryades; and the story of his suicide, as given by Herodotus, is also contradicted by the account in Suidas, where we find (adopting the amended reading) that, being wounded, he lay among the dead, unnoticed by Alcenor and Chromius, and that, on their departure from the field, he raised a trophy, traced on it an inscription with his blood, and died (Herod. i. 82; Thuc. v. 41; Suid. s. v. Ὀθρυάδης; Luc. Contempl. ad fin.; Hemst. ad loc.; Pseudo-Simon. ap. Anth. i. p. 63, ed. Jacobs; Dioscor. ibid. i. p. 247; Nicand. ibid. ii. p. 2; Chaerem. ibid. ii. p. 56; Thes. ap. Stob. vii. p. 92; Ov. Fast. ii. 663.) [E. E.]

OTHRYONEUS (Ὀθρυονεύς), an ally of king Priam, from Cabesos, who sued for the hand of Cassandra, and promised in return to drive the Greeks from Troy, but was slain by Idomeneus. (Hom. Il. xiii. 363, &c. 772.) [L. S.]

OTRE'RA (Ὀτρηρά), a daughter or wife of Ares, who is said to have built the temple of Artemis at Ephesus. (Hygin. Fab. 225; Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. i. 1033.) [L. S.]

OTREUS (Ὀτρεύς), a king of Phrygia, whom Priam assisted against the Amazons. (Hom. Il. iii. 186, Hymn. in Ven. 111.) [L. S.]

OTUS (Ὦτος), a son of Poseidon and Iphimedeia, was one of the Aloeidae. (Hom. Il. v. 385, Od. xi. 305; Pind. Pyth. iv. 89; Apollod. i. 7. § 4; comp. ALOEIDAE.) [L. S.]

OTYS. [COTYS.]

O'VIA, the wife of C. Lollius, with whom Cicero had some pecuniary transactions in B. C. 45. It appears that Cicero had purchased an estate of her, and owed her some money. (Cic. ad Att. xii. 21, 24, 30, xiii. 22.)

P. OVI'DIUS NASO was born at Sulmo, a town about ninety miles from Rome, in the country of the Peligni. He marks the exact date of his birth in his Tristia (iv. 10. 5, &c.); from which it appears that the year was that in which the two consuls, Hirtius and Pansa, fell in the campaign of Mutina, and the day, the first of the festival of the Quinquatria, on which gladiatorial combats were exhibited. This means that he was born on the 13th Kal. April, A. U. C. 711, or the 20th March, B. C. 43. He was descended from an ancient equestrian family (Trist. iv. 10. 7), but possessing only moderate wealth. He, as well as his brother Lucius, who was exactly a year older than himself, was destined to be a pleader, and received a careful education to qualify him for that calling. After acquiring the usual rudiments of knowledge, he studied rhetoric under Arellius Fuscus and Porcius Latro, and attained to considerable proficiency in the art of declamation. But the bent of his genius showed itself very early. The hours which should have been spent in the study of jurisprudence were employed in cultivating his poetical talent; and when he sat down to write a speech he produced a poem instead. (Trist. iv. 10. 24.) The elder Seneca, too, who had heard him declaim, and who has preserved a portion of one of his rhetorical compositions, tells us that his oratory resembled a solutum carmen, and that any thing in the way of argument was irksome to him. (Controv. ii. 10.) His father, an economical, painstaking man, denounced his favourite pursuit as leading to inevitable poverty; but, though Ovid listened to this advice, all his attempts to master the ruling passion proved fruitless. The death of his brother, at the early age of twenty, probably served in some degree to mitigate his father's opposition, for the patrimony which would have been scanty for two might amply suffice for one. Ovid's education was completed at Athens, where he made himself thoroughly master of the Greek language. Afterwards he travelled with the poet Macer, in Asia and Sicily; in which latter country he appears to have spent the greater part of a year. It is a disputed point whether he ever actually practised as an advocate after his return to Rome. Bayle asserts the affirmative from Tristia, ii. 93. But that verse seems rather to refer to the functions of a judge than of a counsel. The picture Ovid himself draws of his weak constitution and indolent temper prevents us from thinking that he ever followed his profession with ardour and perseverance, if indeed at all; and the latter conclusion seems justified by a passage in the Amores, i. 15. 6. The same causes deterred him from entering the senate, though he had put on the latus clavus when he assumed the toga virilis, as being by birth entitled to aspire to the senatorial dignity. (Trist. iv. 10. 29.) He became, however, one of the Triumviri Capitales, a sort of magistrates somewhat akin to our sheriffs, whose office it was to decide petty causes between slaves and persons of inferior rank, and to superintend the prisons, and the execution of criminals. Subsequently he was made one of the Centumviri, or judges who tried testamentary and even criminal causes. In due time he was promoted to be one of the Decemviri, who assembled and presided over the court of the Centumviri; an office which entitled him to a seat in the theatre distinguished above that of the other Equites (Fasti, iv. 383).

Such is all the account that can be given of Ovid's business life. As in the case of other writers, however, we are more interested to know the circumstances which fostered and developed his poetical genius, than whether he was a sound lawyer and able judge. Ovid appears to have shown at an early age a marked inclination towards gallantry. It was probably some symptoms of this temperament that induced his parents to provide him with a wife when he was yet a mere boy. The choice, however, was a bad one. She was quite unsuitable to him, and apparently not unimpeachable in character; so that the union was but of short duration. The facility of divorce which then prevailed at Rome rendered the nature of such engagements very different from the solemn one which they possess in modern days. A second wife was soon wedded, and as speedily dismissed, though Ovid himself bears witness to her purity. The secret of this matrimonial fickleness is explained by the fact that Ovid had a mistress. Filial duty dictated his marriages; inclination threw him into the arms of Corinna. This cause may even have been divided with another. Ovid was a poet, and to a poet in those days a mistress was indispensable. What Roman of the Augustan age would have ventured to inscribe an elegy to his wife! The thing was utterly impossible. But elegiac poetry was then all the vogue at Rome, from its comparative novelty. Catullus, who introduced it from the Greek, had left a few rude specimens; but Gallus and Tibullus were the first who brought it to any perfection, and appropriated it more exclusively to the theme of licentious love.

Gallus was followed by Tibullus, and he by Propertius; so that Ovid claimed to be the fourth who succeeded to the elegiac lyre. In this enumeration Catullus is entirely omitted. In Propertius, who was some years older than himself, Ovid not only found a μουσαγέτης, but also a hierophant very capable of initiating him in all the mysteries of Roman dissipation. (Saepe suos solitus recitare Propertius ignes, Trist. iv. 10.) Ovid was an apt scholar; but his views were more ambitious than his master's, whom he was destined to surpass in the quality, not only of the Muse, but of the mistress, that he courted. The Cynthia of Propertius seems to have been merely one of that higher class of accomplished courtezans with which Rome then abounded. If we may believe the testimony of Sidonius Apollinaris, in the following lines, Corinna was no less a personage than Julia, the clever and accomplished, but abandoned daughter of Augustus:—

> Et te carmina per libidinosa
> Notum, Naso tener, Tomosque missum:
> Quondam Caesareae nimis puellae
> Ficto nomine subditum Corinnae.

This authority has been rejected on the ground that it ascribes Ovid's banishment to this intrigue, which, for chronological and other reasons, could not have been the case. But, strictly taken, the verses assert no such thing. They merely tell us that he was sent to Tomi "carmina per libidinosa," which was, indeed, the cause set forth in the edict of Augustus; and the connection with Julia is mentioned incidentally as an old affair, but not by any means as having occasioned his banishment. Such hints of antiquity are not to be lightly disregarded; and there are several passages in Ovid's Amores which render the testimony of Sidonius highly probable. Thus it appears that his mistress was a married woman, of high rank, but profligate morals; all which particulars will suit Julia. There are, besides, two or three passages which seem more especially to point her out as belonging to the family of the Caesars; and it is remarkable that in the fourteenth elegy of the first book Ovid alludes to the baldness of his mistress, which agrees with an anecdote of Julia preserved by Macrobius. (Saturn. ii. 5.) Nor can the practice of the Roman poets of making the metrical quantity of their mistress's feigned name answer precisely to that of the real one be alleged as an insuperable objection. We have already seen that Sidonius Apollinaris did not so consider it. In Ovid's case the great disparity of rank would have made it dangerous to adopt too close an imitation; not to mention that the title of Corinna would convey a compliment to Julia, as comparing her for wit and beauty to the Theban poetess.

Be this as it may, it cannot be doubted that Ovid's mistress was a woman of high rank; and as this circumstance dispensed with those vulgar means of seduction which may be supplied by money, and which the poet's moderate fortune would have prevented him from adopting, even had he been so inclined (Ars Am. ii. 165), so it compelled him to study those arts of insinuation which are most agreeable to the fair sex, and to put in practice his own maxim, ut ameris amabilis esto. It was thus he acquired that intimate knowledge of the female heart, and of all the shades of the amatory passion, which appears in so many parts of his writings, and which he afterwards embodied in his Art of Love, for the benefit of his contemporaries and of posterity. His first attempts in verse seem to have been in the heroic metre, and on the subject of the Gigantomachia, but from this he was soon diverted by his passion for Corinna, to which we owe the greater part of the elegies in his Amores. How much of these is to be set down to poetic invention? How much is to be taken literally? These are questions which cannot be accurately answered. In his later poems he would have us believe that his life is not to be judged by his writings, and that he did not practise the precepts which he inculcated. (Trist. i. 8. 59, ii. 354, &c.) But some of his effusions are addressed to other mistresses besides Corinna; and the warmth, nay the grossness of mere animal passion, which breathes in several of them, prevents us from believing that his life was so pure as it answered his purpose to affirm in his exile; though we may readily concede that he conducted his amours with sufficient discretion to avoid any open and flagrant scandal (Nomine sub nostro fabula nulla fuit, Trist. iv. 10. 68). On the other hand, something may doubtless be ascribed to youthful vanity, to the fashion of the age, and above all to his determination to become a poet. His love for his art was boundless. He sought the acquaintance of the most eminent poets of the day, and when they were assembled together he regarded them as so many divinities. Among his more intimate poetical friends, besides Macer and Propertius, were Ponticus and Bassus. Horace was considerably his senior, yet he had frequently heard him recite his lyric compositions. Virgil, who died when Ovid was twenty-four, he had only once seen; nor was the life of Tibullus sufficiently prolonged to allow him to cultivate his friendship. It is remarkable that he does not once mention the name of Maecenas. It is possible, however, that that minister, whose literary patronage was in some degree political, and with a view to the interests of his master, had retired from public affairs before Ovid had acquired any considerable reputation.

How long Ovid's connection with Corinna lasted there are no means of deciding. Some of the elegies in the Amores are doubtless his earliest remaining compositions; and he tells us that he began to write when the razor had passed but once or twice over his chin (Trist. iv. 10. 58). That work, however, as we now possess it, is a second edition, and evidently extends over a considerable number of years. But some of the elegies may have been mere reminiscences, for we can hardly think that Ovid continued the intrigues after he had married his third wife. His former marriages were matters of duty; this seems to have been one of choice. The lady was one of the Fabian family, and appears to have been every way worthy of the sincere affection which Ovid entertained for her to the day of his death. She had a daughter by a former union, who married Suillius. At what time the poet entered on this third marriage cannot be ascertained; but we can hardly place it later than his thirtieth year, since a daughter, Perilla, was the fruit of it (Trist. iii. 7. 3), who was grown up and married at the time of his banishment. Perilla was twice married, and had a child by each husband; one of whom seems to have been Cornelius Fidus. Ovid was a grandfather before he lost his father at the age of ninety; soon after whose decease his mother also died.

This is all the account that can be given of Ovid's life, from his birth to the age of fifty; and it has been for the most part drawn from his own writings. It is chiefly misfortune that swells the page of human history. The very dearth of events justifies the inference that his days glided away smoothly and happily, with just enough of employment to give a zest to the pursuits of his leisure, and in sufficient affluence to secure to him all the pleasures of life, without exposing him to its storms and dangers. His residence at Rome, where he had a house near the Capitol, was diversified by an occasional trip to his Pelignan farm, and by the recreation which he derived from his garden, situated between the Flaminian and Clodian ways. His devotion to love and to Corinna had not so wholly engrossed him as to prevent his achieving great reputation in the higher walks of poetry. Besides his love Elegies, his Heroical Epistles, which breathe purer sentiments in language and versification still more refined, and his Art of Love, in which he had embodied the experience of twenty years, he had written his Medea, the finest tragedy that had appeared in the Latin tongue. The Metamorphoses were finished, with the exception of the last corrections; on which account they had been seen only by his private friends. But they were in the state in which we now possess them, and were sufficient of themselves to establish a great poetic fame. He not only enjoyed the friendship of a large circle of distinguished men, but the regard and favour of Augustus and the imperial family. Nothing, in short, seemed wanting, either to his domestic happiness or to his public reputation. But a cloud now rose upon the horizon which was destined to throw a gloom over the evening of his days. Towards the close of the year of Rome, 761 (A. D. 8), Ovid was suddenly commanded by an imperial edict to transport himself to Tomi, or, as he himself calls it, Tomis (sing. fem.), a town on the Euxine, near the mouths of the Danube, on the very border of the empire, and where the Roman dominion was but imperfectly assured. Ovid underwent no trial, and the sole reason for his banishment stated in the edict was his having published his poem on the Art of Love. It was not, however, an exsilium, but a relegatio; that is, he was not utterly cut off from all hope of return, nor did he lose his citizenship.

What was the real cause of his banishment? This is a question that has long exercised the ingenuity of scholars, and various are the solutions that have been proposed. The publication of the Ars Amatoria was certainly a mere pretext; and for Augustus, the author of one of the filthiest, but funniest, epigrams in the language, and a systematic adulterer, for reasons of state policy (Suet. Aug. 69), not a very becoming one. The Ars had been published nearly ten years previously; and moreover, whenever Ovid alludes to that, the ostensible cause, he invariably couples with it another which he mysteriously conceals. According to some writers, the latter was his intrigue with Julia. But this, besides that it does not agree with the poet's expressions, is sufficiently refuted by the fact that Julia had been an exile since B.C. 2. (Dion Cass. lv. 10; Vell. Pat. ii. 100.) The same chronological objection may be urged against those who think that Ovid had accidentally discovered an incestuous commerce between Augustus and his daughter. To obviate these objections on the score of chronology, other authors have transferred both these surmises to the younger Julia, the daughter of the elder one. But with respect to any intrigue with her having been the cause of Ovid's banishment, the expressions alluded to in the former case, and which show that his fault was an involuntary one, are here equally conclusive, and are, too, strengthened by the great disparity of years between the parties, the poet being old enough to be the father of the younger Julia. As regards the other point — the imputed incest of the emperor with his granddaughter — arguments in refutation can be drawn only from probability, for there is nothing in Ovid's poems that can be said directly to contradict it. But in the first place, it is totally unsupported by any historical authority, though the same imputation on Augustus with regard to his daughter might derive some slight colouring from a passage in Suetonius's life of Caligula (c. 23). Again, it is the height of improbability that Ovid, when suing for pardon, would have alluded so frequently to the cause of his offence had it been of a kind so disgracefully to compromise the emperor's character. Nay, Bayle (art. Ovide) has pushed this argument so far as to think that the poet's life would not have been safe had he been in possession of so dangerous a secret, and that silence would have been secured by his assassination. The conjecture that Ovid's offence was his having accidentally seen Livia in the bath is hardly worthy of serious notice. On the common principles of human action we cannot reconcile so severe a punishment with so trivial a fault; and the supposition is, besides, refuted by Ovid's telling us that what he had seen was some crime. One of the most elaborate theories on the subject is that of M. Villenave, in a life of Ovid published in 1809, and subsequently in the Biographie Universelle. He is of opinion that the poet was the victim of a coup d'état, and that his offence was his having been the political partizan of Posthumus Agrippa; which prompted Livia and Tiberius, whose influence over the senile Augustus was then complete, to procure his banishment. This solution is founded on the assumed coincidence of time in the exiles of Agrippa and Ovid. But the fact is that the former was banished, at least a year before the latter, namely some time in A. D. 7 (Dion Cass. lv. 32; Vell. Pat. ii. 112), whereas Ovid did not leave Rome till December A. D. 8. Nor can Ovid's expressions concerning the cause of his disgrace be at all reconciled with Villenave's supposition. The coincidence of his banishment, however, with that of the younger Julia, who, as we learn from Tacitus (Ann. iv. 71) died in A. D. 28, after twenty years' exile, is a remarkable fact, and leads very strongly to the inference that his fate was in some way connected with hers. This opinion has been adopted by Tiraboschi in his Storia della Letteratura Italiana, and after him by Rosmini, in his Vita d' Ovidio, who, however, has not improved upon Tiraboschi, by making Ovid deliberately seduce Julia for one of his exalted friends. There is no evidence to fix on the poet the detestable character of a procurer. He may more probably have become acquainted with Julia's profligacy by accident, and by his subsequent conduct, perhaps, for instance, by concealing it, have given offence to Livia, or Augustus, or both. But we have not space here to pursue a subject which at best can only end in a plausible conjecture; and therefore the reader who is desirous of seeing it discussed at greater length, is referred to the Classical Museum, vol. iv. No. 13.

Ovid has described in one of his most pathetic elegies (Trist. i. 3), the last night spent in Rome, and the overwhelming sorrow with which he tore himself from his home and family. To add to his affliction, his daughter was absent with her husband in Africa, and he was thus unable to bid her a last farewell. Accompanied by Maximus, whom he had known from a child, and who was almost the only friend who remained faithful to him in his adversity, he departed for the shores of the Adriatic, which he crossed in the month of December. After experiencing some of the storms common at that season, and which had well nigh shipwrecked him, he at length landed safely on the Corinthian isthmus, and having crossed it, embarked in another vessel at Cenchreae, on the Saronic gulf. Hence his navigation through the Hellespont, and northwards up the Euxine to his destined port, seems to have been tedious, but safe. The greater part of a year was consumed in the voyage; but Ovid beguiled the time by the exercise of his poetical talent, several of his pieces having been written on shipboard. To one like Ovid, accustomed from his youth to all the luxury of Rome, and so ardent a lover of politeness and refinement (Ars Am. iii. 121), painful indeed must have been the contrast presented by his new abode, which offered him an inhospitable soil, a climate so severe as to freeze even the wine, and the society of a horde of semi-barbarians, to whose language he was a stranger. Life itself was hardly safe. When winter had covered the Danube with ice, the barbarous tribes that dwelt beyond, crossed it on their horses, plundering all around, and insulting the very walls of Tomi. Add to all this the want of convenient lodging, of the decent luxuries of the table, and of good medical advice, and we shall scarcely be surprised at the urgency with which the poet solicits, not so much for his recal as for a change in his place of banishment. He has often been reproached with the abjectness of his supplications, and the fulsome flattery towards Augustus by which he sought to render them successful: nor can these charges be denied, or altogether defended. But it seems very unreasonable to require the bearing of a Cato from the tender poet of love under such truly distressing circumstances. To a Roman, who looked upon the metropolis as the seat of all that was worth living for, banishment, even to an agreeable spot, was an evil of great magnitude. In Ovid's case it was aggravated tenfold by the remoteness and natural wretchedness of the place. If he deified Augustus it was no more than was done by Virgil, Horace, and the other poets of the age, without a tithe of his inducements to offer in excuse. But in truth this was nothing more than a part of the manners of the age, for which neither Ovid nor any other writer is to be held individually responsible. Such deifications were public and national acts, formally recognised by the senate. But in the midst of his misfortunes, Ovid felt a noble confidence in his genius and fame; and it is refreshing to read a passage like the following, where he exults in the impotence of the imperial tyrant to hurt them:—

> En ego, cum patria caream, vobisque, domoque,
> Raptaque sint, adimi quæ potuere mihi;
> Ingenio tamen ipse meo comitorque fruorque:
> Caesar in hoc potuit juris habere nihil.
> Trist. iii. 7. 45.

Nor were his mind and spirit so utterly prostrated as to prevent him from seeking some relief to his misfortunes by the exercise of his poetical talents. Not only did he finish his Fasti, in his exile, besides writing the Ibis, the Tristia, Ex Ponto, &c., but he likewise acquired the language of the Getae, in which he composed some poems in honour of Augustus. These he publicly recited, and they were received with tumultuous applause by the Tomitae. With his new fellow-citizens, indeed, he had succeeded in rendering himself highly popular, insomuch that they honoured him with a decree, declaring him exempt from all public burthens. (Ex Ponto, iv. 9. 101.) From the same passage (v. 39, &c.) we learn that the secret of his popularity lay in his unaltered bearing; that he maintained the same tranquillity of mind, the same modesty of demeanour, for which he had been known and esteemed by his friends at Rome. Yet, under all this apparent fortitude, he was a prey to anxiety, which, combined with the effects of a rigorous climate, produced in a few years a declining state of health. He was not afflicted with any acute disorder; but indigestion, loss of appetite, and want of sleep, slowly, but surely, undermined a constitution originally not the most robust. (Ex Ponto, i. 10, &c.) He died in the sixtieth year of his age and tenth of his exile, A. D. 18, a year also memorable by the death of the historian, Livy. Two or three pretended discoveries of his tomb have been made in modern times, but they are wholly undeserving of attention.

1. Among the earliest of Ovid's works must be placed the Amorum Libri III., which however extends over a considerable number of years. According to the epigram prefixed, the work, as we now possess it, is a second edition, revised and abridged, the former one having consisted of five books. The authenticity of this epigram has been questioned by Jahn, but Ovid himself tells us in another place that he had destroyed many of the elegies dedicated to Corinna. (Multa quidem scripsi, sed quæ vitiosa putavi, Emendaturis ignibus ipse dedi, Trist. iv. 10. 61.) Nor can we very well account for the allusion made to the Ars Amatoria in the Amores (ii. 18, 19), except on the assumption of a second and late edition of the latter, in which the piece containing the allusion was inserted. This second edition must, however, have been published before the third book of the Ars, since the Amores are there mentioned (v. 343) as consisting of three books. The elegies of the Amores seem thrown together without any regard to chronological order. Thus from the first elegy of the third book it would seem that Ovid had not yet written tragedy; whilst in the eighteenth elegy of the preceding book he not only alludes to his Medea (v. 13), but, as we have seen, to his Ars Amatoria. This want of sequence is another proof of a later edition. Though the Amores is principally addressed to Corinna, it contains elegies to other mistresses. For instance, the ninth and tenth of the first book point evidently to one of a much inferior station to Corinna; and the seventh and eighth of the second book are addressed to Cypassis, Corinna's maid.

2. Epistolae Heroïdum, twenty-one in number, were an early work of Ovid. By some critics the authenticity of the last six has been doubted, as also that of the fifteenth (Sappho to Phaon), because it is found only in the most recent MSS. But Ovid mentions having written such an epistle (Amor. ii. 18. 26), and the internal evidence is sufficient to vindicate it. From a passage in the Ars Amatoria (iii. 346—Ignotum hoc aliis ille novavit opus) Ovid appears to claim the merit of originating this species of composition; in which case we must consider the epistle of Arethusa to Lycotas, in the fourth book of Propertius, as an imitation. P. Burmann, however, in a note on Propertius, disallows this claim, and thinks that Ovid was the imitator. He explains novavit in the preceding passage of the Ars as follows:—"Ab aliis neglectum et omissum rursus in usum induxit." But this seems very harsh, and is not consistent with Ovid's expression "ignotum aliis." We do not know the date of Propertius's death; but even placing it in B. C. 15, still Ovid was then eight and twenty, and might have composed several, if not all, of his heroical epistles. Answers to several of the Heroïdes were written by Aulus Sabinus, a contemporary poet and friend of Ovid's, viz. Ulysses to Penelope, Hippolytus to Phaedra, Aeneas to Dido, Demophoon to Phillis, Jason to Hypsipyle, and Phaon to Sappho (see Amores, ii. 18, 29). Three of these are usually printed with Ovid's works; but their authenticity has been doubted, both on account of their style, and because there are no MSS. of them extant, though they appear in the Editio princeps. From the passage in the Ars Am. before referred to (iii. 345) it would seem as if the Heroïdes were intended for musical recitative. (Vel tibi composita cantetur epistola voce. Comp. Alex. ab Alex. Gen. Dier. ii. 1.) A translation of these epistles into Greek by Maximus Planudes exists in MS., but has never been published.

3. Ars Amatoria, or De Arte Amandi. This work was written about B. C. 2, as appears from the sham naval combat exhibited by Augustus being alluded to as recent, as well as the expedition of Caius Caesar to the East. (Lib. i. v. 171, &c.) Ovid was now more than forty, and his earlier years having been spent in intrigue, he was fully qualified by experience to give instruction in the art and mystery of the tender passion. The first two books are devoted to the male sex; the third professes to instruct the ladies. This last book was probably published some time after the two preceding ones. Not only does this seem to be borne out by vv. 45, &c., but we may thus account for the Ars (then in two books) being mentioned in the Amores, and also the Amores, in its second edition of three books, in the third book of the Ars. At the time of Ovid's banishment this poem was ejected from the public libraries by command of Augustus.

4. Remedia Amoris, in one book. That this piece was subsequent to the Ars Am. appears from v. 9. Its subject, as the title implies, is to suggest remedies for the violence of the amatory passion. Hence Ovid (v. 47) compares himself to the spear of Telephus, which was able both to wound and heal.

5. Nux. The elegiac complaint of a nut-tree respecting the ill-treatment it receives from wayfarers, and even from its own master. This little piece was probably suggested by the fate of a nut-tree in Ovid's own garden.

6. Metamorphoseon Libri XV. This, the greatest of Ovid's poems in bulk and pretensions, appears to have been written between the age of forty and fifty. He tells us in his Tristia (i. 6) that he had not put the last polishing hand to it when he was driven into banishment; and that in the hurry and vexation of his flight, he burnt it, together with other pieces. Copies had, however, got abroad, and it was thus preserved, by no means to the regret of the author (Trist. i. 6. 25). It consists of such legends or fables as involved a transformation, from the Creation to the time of Julius Caesar, the last being that emperor's change into a star. It is thus a sort of cyclic poem made up of distinct episodes, but connected into one narrative thread, with much skill. Ovid's principal model was, perhaps, the Ἑτεροιούμενα of Nicander. It has been translated into elegant Greek prose by Maximus Planudes, whose version was published by Boissonade (Paris, 1822), and forms the 46th vol. of Lemaire's Bibliotheca Latina.

7. Fastorum Libri XII., of which only the first six are extant. This work was incomplete at the time of Ovid's banishment. Indeed he had perhaps done little more than collect the materials for it; for that the fourth book was written in Pontus appears from ver. 88. Yet he must have finished it before he wrote the second book of Tristia, as he there alludes to it as consisting of twelve books (Sex ego Fastorum scripsi totidemque libellos, v. 549). Masson, indeed, takes this passage to mean that he had only written six, viz. "I have written six of the Fasti, and as many books"; and holds that Ovid never did any more. But this interpretation seems contrary to the natural sense of the words, and indeed to the genius of the language. The Fasti is a sort of poetical Roman calendar. with its appropriate festivals and mythology, and the substance was probably taken in a great measure from the old Roman annalists. The study of antiquity was then fashionable at Rome, and Propertius had preceded Ovid in this style of writing in his Origines, in the fourth book. The model of both seems to have been the Αἴτια of Callimachus. The Fasti shows a good deal of learning, but it has been observed that Ovid makes frequent mistakes in his astronomy, from not understanding the books from which he took it.

8. Tristium Libri V. The five books of elegies under the title of Tristia were written during the first four years of Ovid's banishment. They are chiefly made up of descriptions of his afflicted condition, and petitions for mercy. The tenth elegy of the fourth book is valuable, as containing many particulars of Ovid's life.

9. Epistolarum ex Ponto Libri IV. These epistles are also in the elegiac metre, and much the same in substance as the Tristia, to which they were subsequent (see lib i. ep. 1, v. 15, &c). It must be confessed that age and misfortune seem to have damped Ovid's genius both in this and the preceding work. Even the versification is more slovenly, and some of the lines very prosaic.

10. Ibis. This satire of between six and seven hundred elegiac verses was also written in exile. The poet inveighs in it against an enemy who had traduced him, and who some take to have been Hyginus, the mythologist. Caelius Rhodiginus (Antiq. Lect. xiii. 1) says, on the authority of Caecilius Minutianus Apuleius, that it was Corvinus. Though the variety of Ovid's imprecations displays learning and fancy, the piece leaves the impression of an impotent explosion of rage. The title and plan were borrowed from Callimachus.

11. Consolatio ad Liviam Augustam. The authenticity of this elegiac poem has been the subject of much dispute among critics, the majority of whom are against it. The principal names on the other side are Barth, Passerat, and Amar, the recent French editor. However, it is allowed on all hands to be not unworthy of Ovid's genius. Scaliger and others have attributed it to P. Albinovanus.

12. The Medicamina Faciei and Halieuticon are mere fragments, and their genuineness not altogether certain. Yet Ovid in the Ars Am. (iii. 205) alludes to a poem which he had written in one book on the art of heightening female charms, and which must, therefore, have been prior to the Ars; and Pliny (H. N. xxxii. 54) mentions a work of his on fishing, written towards the close of his life. Of his tragedy, Medea, only two lines remain. Of this work Quintilian says, "Ovidii Medea videtur mihi ostendere quantum ille vir praestare potuerit si ingenio suo temperare quam indulgere maluisset," x. 98. He seems to have written other works now lost: as, Metaphrasis Phaenomenon Arati, Epigrammata, Liber in malos Poetas, or sort of Dunciad (Quintil. vi. 3), Triumphus Tiberii de Illyriis, De Bello Aetiaco ad Tiberium, &c. Several spurious pieces have been attributed to him; as the Elegia ad Philomelam, De Pulice, Priapeia, &c. That his poems in the Getic language have not been preserved is, perhaps, chiefly to be regretted on the score of their philological value.

That Ovid possessed a great poetical genius is unquestionable; which makes it the more to be regretted that it was not always under the control of a sound judgment. Niebuhr, in his Lectures, edited by Dr. Schmitz (vol. ii. p. 166), calls him, next to Catullus, the most poetical amongst the Roman poets; in allusion, perhaps, to the vigour of fancy and warmth of colouring displayed in some parts of his works. The same eminent scholar ranks him, in respect of his facility, among the very greatest poets. Of the truth of this remark no doubt can be entertained. Ovid has himself described how spontaneously his verses flowed; and the fact is further attested by the bulk of his productions. But this was a dangerous gift. The facility of composition possessed more charms for him than the irksome, but indispensable labour of correction and retrenchment. Hence those prolix and puerile descriptions which led Quintilian (x. 88) to characterise him as nimium amator ingenii sui, laudandus tamen in partibus; and of which a notable instance has been pointed out by Seneca (N. Q. iii. 27) in the description of the flood (Metam. i. 262, &c.); which, though it commences with sublimity, is spoilt by the repetition of too many, and some of them trite and vulgar, images of the same thing. Nor was this his only fault. He was the first to depart from that pure and correct taste which characterises the Greek poets, and their earlier Latin imitators. His writings abound with those false thoughts and frigid conceits which we find so frequently in the Italian poets; and in this respect he must be regarded as unantique. Dryden's indignation at these misplaced witticisms led him to rank Ovid amomg the second-rate poets (see his Life of Virgil, and Dedication of the Aeneis). But though a just criticism cannot allow these faults to pass without severe reprehension, there are numerous passages which show that Ovid was capable of better things.

The Amores, his earliest work, is less infected with concetti than some of his later ones; and is marked by grossness and indecency, rather than by false wit or overwrought refinement. His fictitious love epistles, or Heroïdes, as, indeed, might be naturally expected, partake more of the latter qualities; but they are remarkable for terse and polished versifications, and the turns of expression are often highly effective. The Ars Amatoria may be said to contain appropriate precepts, if that be any recommendation, or if love, in the proper sense of the term, requires them; the little god himself being the best instructor, as Boccaccio has so well shown in the tale of Cymon and Iphigenia. In a certain sense it may be styled a didactic poem, and, like most works of that nature, contains but little poetry, though the subject seems more than usually favourable to it. The first two or three books of the Metamorphoses, in spite of their faults, abound with poetical beauties; nor are they wanting, though scattered with a more sparing hand, in the remaining ones; as, among other instances, in the tale of Pyramus and Thisbe; the charming rustic picture of the household of Baucis and Philemon; and the description of the Cave of Sleep, in the eleventh book, which for vigour of fancy is not perhaps surpassed by any thing in Spencer. In the Fasti Ovid found a favourable subject from the poetical nature of the mythology and early legends of Rome, which he has treated with great power and effect. His prolixity was here more restricted than in the Metamorphoses, partly by the nature of his plan, and partly, perhaps, by the metre; and he has treated his subject in a severer taste. Schiller (Ueber naive und sentimentalische Dichtung) will not allow the Tristia and Ex Ponto to be called poetry, from their being the offspring, not of inspiration but of necessity; and it must be confessed that there is little except the versification to entitle them to the name. As, however, Gibbon has remarked (Decline and Fall, c. 18, note), they are valuable as presenting a picture of the human mind under very singular circumstances; and it may be added, as affording many particulars of the poet's life. But in forming an estimate of Ovid's poetical character, we must never forget that his great poem had not the benefit of his last corrections; and that by the loss of his tragedy, the Medea, we are deprived, according to the testimony of antiquity, of his most perfect work; and that, too, in a species of composition which demands the highest powers of human genius. The loss which we have thus sustained may be in some measure inferred from the intimate knowledge which Ovid displays of the female heart; as in the story of Byblis in the Metamorphoses, and in the soliloquy of Medea in the same work, in which the alternations of hope and fear, reason and passion, are depicted with the greatest force.

The editions of Ovid's works are very numerous, and the following list contains only the more remarkable: —

Editio Princeps (Balthazar Azoguidi), Bologna, 1471, 2 vols. fol. Also at Rome the same year (Sweynheym and Pannarz), 2 vols. fol. First Aldine edition, Venice, 1502, 3 vols. 8vo. Bersmann's edition, Leipsig, 1582, 3 vols. 8vo. Elzevir edition, by D. Heinsius, Leyden, 1629, 3 vols. 12mo. Variorum edition, by Cnippingius, Leyden, 1670, 3 vols. 8vo. In usum Delphini, Lyons, 1689, 4 vols. 4to. Burmann's edition, Amsterdam, 1727, 4 vols. 4to.; this is reckoned the best edition. By Mitscherlich, Göttingen, 1798, 2 vols. large 8vo. Burmann's text, but no notes. By J. A. Amar, Paris, 1820, 9 vols. 8vo. Part of Le Maire's Bibliotheca Latina : cum Notis Variorum, Oxford, 1825, 5 vols. large 8vo., Burmann's text and Bentley's MS. emendations, from his copy of Burmann's edition in the British Museum. These emendations are also printed in an appendix to Le Maire's edition. By J. C. Jahn, Leipsig, 1828, 2 vols. 8vo.

The following are some editions of separate pieces :—Metamorphoses, by Gierig, Leip. 1784. The same, cura Jahn, Leip. 1817, 2 vols. 8vo.; by Loers, Leip. 1843, 8vo. Fasti, by Merkel, Berlin, 1841, 8vo. Tristia, by Oberlin, Strasburg, 1778, 8vo.; by Loers, Trev. 1839, 8vo. Amatoria (including Heroïdes, Ars Am. &c.) by Wernsdorf, Helmstadt, 1788 and 1802, 2 vols. 8vo.; by Jahn, Leip. 1828. Heroïdes, by Loers, Cologn. 1829, 8vo. There is a learned French commentary on the Heroïdes, by Bachet de Meziriac, the Hague, 1716, 2 vols. 8vo. (2d ed.)

Ovid has been translated into most of the European languages. Among English metrical versions may be mentioned the Metamorphoses, by Arthur Golding, London, 1567, 4to.; the same, Englished in verse, mythologized, and represented in figures, by G. Sandys, Oxford, 1626, fol.; the same by various hands, viz. Dryden, Addison, Gay, Pope, and others, edited by Dr. Garth, who wrote the preface, London 1717 fol. This translation has gone through several editions. The same in blank verse, by Howard, London, 1807, 8vo. Ovid's Elegies, in three books, by C. Marlowe, 8vo. Middleburg. The Epistles, by G. Turbervile, London, 1569. The Heroical Epistles, and Ex Ponto, by Wye Saltonstall, London, 1626. The Epistles, by several hands, viz. Otway, Settle, Dryden, Earl Mulgrave, and others, with a preface by Dryden, London, 1680 (several subsequent editions). The Fasti, by J. Gower, Cambridge, 1640, 8vo.

Besides the two ancient memoirs of Ovid commonly prefixed to his works, several short accounts of his life, by Aldus Manutius, Paulus Marsus, Ciofani, and others, are collected in the 4th vol. of Burmann's edition. In the same place, as well as in Lemaire's edition, will be found Masson's Life, originally published at Amsterdam in 1708. This is one of the most elaborate accounts of Ovid, but too discursive, and not always accurate. There is a short sketch in Crusius' Lives of the Roman Poets. By far the best Life is the Italian one by the Cavaliere Rosmini, Milan, 1821, 2 thin vols. 8vo. (2nd ed.) [T. D.]

OVI'DIUS JUVENTI'NUS. [JUVENTINUS.]

OVI'NIUS. 1. The proposer of a plebiscitum, of uncertain date, which gave the censors certain powers in regulating the list of the senators. Respecting the provisions of this law, see Dict. of Ant. s. v. Lex Ovinia.

2. Q. OVINIUS, a Roman senator, was put to death by Octavianus on the conquest of M. Antonius and Cleopatra, because he had disgraced himself by taking charge of the lanificium and textrinum of the Egyptian queen. (Oros. vi. 19.)

3. OVINIUS CAMILLUS, a senator of an ancient family, had meditated rebellion against Alexander Severus, but instead of being punished was kindly treated by this emperor. (Lamprid. Alex. Sev. 48.)

4. L. OVINIUS RUSTICUS CORNELIANUS, consul A. D. 237, with P. Titius Perpetuus (Fasti).

O'VIUS, a contemporary of Cicero mentioned by him in B. C. 44 (ad Att. xvi. 1. § 5).

O'VIUS CALA'VIUS. [CALAVIUS, No. 1.]

O'VIUS PA'CCIUS. [PACCIUS.]

OXATHRES ('Οξάθρης), a Persian name, which is also written OXOATHRES and OXYATHRES, and is frequently confounded or interchanged both by Greek and Latin writers with OXARTES and OXYARTES. Indeed, it is probable that these are all merely different forms of the same name. (See Ellendt, ad Arrian. Anab. iii. 8. § 8; Mützell, ad Curt. viii. 4. § 21.)

1. A younger brother of Artaxerxes II. Mnemon king of Persia. He was treated with kindness by his brother, and even admitted to the privilege of sharing the king's table, contrary to the usual etiquette of the Persian court. (Plut. Artax. 1, 5.) Ctesias (Pers. 49, ed. Baehr) calls him Oxendras.

2. Brother of Dareius III. Codomannus. He was distinguished for his bravery, and in the battle of Issus, B. C. 333, took a prominent part in the combat in defence of the king, when attacked by the Macedonian cavalry under Alexander himself. (Diod. xvii. 34; Curt. iii. 11. § 8.) He afterwards accompanied Dareius on his flight into Bactria, and fell into the hands of Alexander during the pursuit, but was treated with the utmost distinction by the conqueror, who even assigned him an honourable post about his own person; and subsequently devolved upon him the task of punishing Bessus for the murder of Dareius. (Diod. xvii. 77; Curt. vi. 2. §§ 9, 11, vii. 5. § 40; Plut. Alex. 43.) He was the father of AMASTRIS queen of Heracleia. (Memnon, c. 4. ed. Orell.; Arr. Anab. vii. 4. § 7; Strab. xii. p. 544; Steph. Byz. s. v. Ἄμαστρις.)

3. Son of Abulites, the satrap of Susiana under Dareius Codomannus, commanded the contingent furnished by his father to Dareius at the battle of Arbela, B. C. 331. On the approach of Alexander to Susa, Oxathres was sent to meet him and bear the submission of Abulites: he was favourably received, and soon after appointed to the government of Paraetacene, which he held until the return of Alexander from India, when he was put to death by the king for maladministration of his province. According to Plutarch, Alexander slew him with his own hand. (Arr. Anab. iii. 8, 16, 19, vii. 4; Curt. v. 2. § 8; Diod. xvii. 65; Plut. Alex. 68.)

4. A son of Dionysius tyrant of Heracleia and of Amastris, the daughter of No. 2. He succeeded, together with his brother Clearchus, to the sovereignty of Heracleia on the death of Dionysius, B. C. 306: but the government was administered by Amastris during the minority of her two sons. Soon after the young men had attained to manhood and taken the direction of affairs into their own hands, they caused their mother to be put to death: but this act of parricide brought upon them the vengeance of Lysimachus, who made himself master of Heracleia, and put both Clearchus and Oxathres to death. According to Diodorus, they had reigned seventeen years; but Droysen assigns their death to the year B. C. 285. (Memnon, c. 4—6; Diod. xx. 77; Droysen, Hellenism. vol. i. pp. 609, 634.)

5. A son of Mithridates the Great, who was taken prisoner in the insurrection of the citizens of Phanagoria, B. C. 64. He was afterwards given up to Pompey, by whom he was led captive in his triumph at Rome. (Appian, Mithr. 108, 117.)

OXYARTES (Ὀξυάρτης) or OXARTES (Ὀξάρτης). Concerning the different forms of this name see OXATHRES.

1. A king of Bactria, said to have been contemporary with Ninus king of Assyria, by whom his kingdom was invaded and conquered. The history of this expedition, though doubtless a mere fable, is given in great detail by Diodorus (ii. 6). He appears to be the same person who is called by Syncellus and Eusebius, Zoroaster. (Syncell. p. 133; Euseb. Arm. p. 44; Wesseling, ad Diod. l. c.; Baehr, ad Ctes. p. 405.)

2. A Bactrian, father of Roxana, the wife of Alexander the Great. He is first mentioned as one of the chiefs who accompanied Bessus on his retreat across the Oxus into Sogdiana (Arr. Anab. iii. 28. § 15). After the death of Bessus, Oxyartes deposited his wife and daughters for safety in a rock fortress in Sogdiana, which was deemed impregnable, but which nevertheless soon fell into the hands of Alexander, who not only treated his captives with respect and attention, but was so charmed with the beauty of Roxana as to design to make her his wife. Oxyartes, on learning these tidings, hastened to make his submission to the conqueror, by whom he was received with the utmost distinction; and celebrated by a magnificent feast the nuptials of his daughter with the king, B. C. 327 (Arr. Anab. iv. 18, 19, 20. § 7; Curt. viii. 4. § 21—29; Strab. xi. p. 517; Plut. Alex. 47; concerning the discrepancies in these statements see Mützell, ad Curt. l. c. and Droysen's Alexander, p. 346). Shortly after we find him successfully interposing to prevail upon Chorienes to surrender his rock fortress; and at a subsequent period he was appointed by Alexander satrap of the province of Paropamisus, or India south of the Caucasus (Arr. Anab. iv. 21, vi. 15; Curt. ix. 8. § 9; Plut. Alex. 58). In this position he continued until the death of Alexander, and was confirmed in his government, both in the first division of the provinces immediately after that event, and in the subsequent one at Triparadeisus, B. C. 321 (Diod. xviii. 3, 39; Justin, xiii. 4; Arrian. ap. Phot. p. 71, b.; Dexippus, ibid. p. 64, b.). At a later period we find him sending a small force to the support of Eumenes; but after the death of that general, B. C. 316, he seems to have come to terms with Antigonus, who was content to assume the appearance of confirming him in an authority of which he would have found it difficult to dispossess him (Diod. xix. 14, 48). It seems probable that he must have died before the expedition of Seleucus against India, as we find that monarch ceding Paropamisus to Sandracottus, without any mention of Oxyartes. (Strab. xv. p. 724; Droysen, Hellenism. vol. i. p. 520.) [E. H. B.]

OXYATHRES. [OXATHRES.]

OXYCANUS (Ὀξυκανός), or PORTICANUS, as he is called by Q. Curtius, an Indian prince, whose territories lay to the west of those of Musicanus. On the approach of Alexander he had not come to meet him, or sent ambassadors to make his submission to the conqueror. Alexander accordingly marched against him, and speedily took by storm two of his cities, Oxycanus himself being made prisoner. The other towns in his dominions speedily submitted.

It has been supposed that in the latter part of the names Oxycanus and Musicanus is to be traced the word Khawn or Khan, so that Oxycanus might mean the Rajah of Ouche, Musicanus the Rajah of Moosh. To this it is objected that Khan is a Turkish title, and that there is nothing to show that it was in use in that region at the time of Alexander's invasion. (Arrian, vi. 16. § 1; Q. Curt. ix. 8. § 11; Thirlwall, Hist. Gr. vol. vii. p. 48, note). [C. P. M.]

OXYDATES (Ὀξυδάτης), a Persian of high rank, who, for some cause or other, had been imprisoned by Dareius at Susa, and was found lying there under sentence of death, when the city fell into the hands of Alexander. For this reason he seemed the more likely to be faithful to Alexander, who appointed him satrap of Media. In this office Oxydates was subsequently superseded by Arsaces. (Arrian, iii. 20. § 4; Curt. vi. 2. § 11, viii. 3. § 17.) [C. P. M.]

OXYLUS (Ὄξυλος). 1. A son of Ares and Protogeneia. (Apollod. i. 7. § 7.)

2. A son of Haemon (according to Apollod. ii. 8. § 3, of Andraemon), and husband of Pieria, by whom he became the father of Aetolus and Laïas. He was descended from a family of Elis, but lived in Aetolia; and when the Dorians invaded Peloponnesus, they, in accordance with an oracle, chose him as one of their leaders. He afterwards became king of Elis, which he conquered. (Paus. v. 3, in fin. 4. § 1, &c.; Aristot. Polit. vi. 2. § 5; Strab. viii. p. 333.)

3. A son of Orius, who became the father of the Hamadryades, by his sister Hamadryas. (Athen. iii. p. 78.) [L. S.]

OXYNTAS (Ὀξύντας), son of Jugurtha, was led captive, together with his father, before the triumphal car of Marius (B. C. 104); but his life was spared, and he was placed in custody at Venusia. Here he remained till B. C. 90, when he was brought forth by the Samnite general, C. Papius Mutilus, and adorned with the insignia of royalty, in order to produce a moral effect upon the Numidian auxiliaries in the service of the Roman general L. Caesar. The device was successful, and the Numidians deserted in great numbers; but of the subsequent fortunes of Oxyntas we know nothing. (Eutrop. iv. 27; Oros. v. 15; Appian, B. C. i. 42.) [E. H. B.]

OXYTHEMIS (Ὀξύθεμις), a friend of Demetrius Poliorcetes, who was sent by him to the court of Agathocles, king of Sicily, with whom he had just concluded an alliance, ostensibly in order to receive the ratification of the treaty, but with a secret mission to examine the real state of affairs in Sicily. The death of Agathocles followed shortly after, B. C. 289, and it was Oxythemis who placed him on the funeral pile, as we are told, before life was yet extinct. (Diod. xxi. Exc. Hoesch. pp. 491, 492.) [E. H. B.]

P.

PACA'RIUS, DE'CIMUS, procurator of Corsica in A. D. 69, wished to send assistance to Vitellius, but was murdered by the inhabitants. (Tac. Hist. ii. 16.)

PACATIA'NUS, a Roman emperor, known to us only from coins, a specimen of which is annexed. From the number of coins of this emperor found in Aŭstria, Eckhel thinks that the brief reign of Pacatianus was probably in Pannonia or Moesia. The full name of Pacatianus was TI. CL. MAR. PACATIANUS. Mar. is variously interpreted, some making it Marius, some Marcius, and others Marinus. Eckhel adopts the last, and assigns the coins to the times of Philippus and Decius (Eckhel, vol. vii. p. 338). There was a Pacatianus, consul A. D. 332, in the reign of Constantine (Fasti).

COIN OF THE EMPEROR PACATIANUS.

PACA'TUS, CLAU'DIUS, although a centurion, was restored to his master by Domitian, when he was proved to be his slave. (Dion Cass. lxvii. 13.)

PACA'TUS, DREPA'NIUS. [DREPANIUS.]

PACA'TUS, MINU'CIUS. [IRENAEUS, No. 3.]

PACCIA'NUS. 1. Was sent by Sulla into Mauritania to help Ascalis, whom Sertorius was attacking, but he was defeated and slain by Sertorius. (Plut. Sert. 9.)

2. C., a Roman prisoner taken on the defeat of Crassus by the Parthians. As he bore the greatest resemblance to Crassus among the prisoners, the Parthians put on him a female dress, and paraded him in mockery of the Roman general. (Plut. Crass. 32.)

PA'CCIUS. This name is frequently written Pactius, but in inscriptions we only find Paccius, and the derivative Paccianus also points to Paccius as the correct orthography. It appears that the name was originally not Roman. [See Nos. 1 and 2.]

1. OVIUS PACCIUS, a priest in the Samnite army, B. C. 293 (Liv. x. 38).

2. PACCIUS and VIBIUS, two brothers, the noblest among the Bruttii, came to the consul Q. Fabius in B. C. 209 to obtain pardon from the Romans (Liv. xxvii. 15).

3. M. PACCIUS, a friend of Atticus, B. C. 54 (Cic. ad Att. iv. 16).

4. PACCIUS AFRICANUS, expelled from the senate after the death of Vitellius, A. D. 70 (Tac. Hist. iv. 41).

5. PACCIUS ORFITUS. [ORFITUS, No. 3.]

PA'CCIUS (Πάκκιος), or PACCIUS ANTIOCHUS (Πάκκιος Ἀντίοχος), a physician about the beginning of the Christian era, who was a pupil of Philonides of Catana, and lived probably at Rome. He made a large fortune by the sale of a certain medicine of his own invention, which was much employed, and the composition of which he kept a profound secret. At his death he left his prescription as a legacy to the Emperor Tiberius, who, in order to give it as wide a circulation as possible, ordered a copy of it to be placed in all the public libraries. (Scribon. Larg. De Compos. Medicam. c. 23. § 97. p. 209; Marcell. Empir. De Medicam. c. 20. p. 324.) Some of his medical formulae are quoted by Galen (De Compos. Medicam. sec. Loc. iv. 4, 8, ix. 4, vol. xii. pp. 715, 751, 760, 772, 782, xiii. 284; De Compos. Medicam. sec. Gen. vii. 7, vol. xiii. p. 984), Scribonius Largus (l. c., and c. 40. § 156. p. 218), Aëtius (ii. 3. § 109, 111, pp. 354, 359), and Marcellus Empiricus (l. c.). [W. A. G.]

PACENSIS, AEMI'LIUS, was tribune of the city cohorts (urbanae cohortes) at the death of Nero, but was deprived of this office by Galba. He subsequently joined Otho, who restored to him his tribunate, was chosen one of the generals of Otho's army, and perished fighting in the Capitol against the Vitellian troops, A. D. 69. (Tac. Hist. i. 20, 87, ii. 12, iii. 73.)

PACHES (Πάχης). An Athenian general, the son of a man named Epicurus (or, according to Diod. xii. 55, Epiclerus). In the autumn of B. C. 428 Paches was sent out at the head of 1000 hoplites to reinforce the troops which, on the revolt of Mytilene, had been sent out under Cleippides, and had entrenched themselves in two forts near the city, while the fleet blockaded the harbour. On the arrival of Paches a wall was carried round the city on the land side, with forts at the strongest points. In the summer of B. C. 427 the Spartans sent a fleet under the command of Alcidas for the relief of Mytilene; but Alcidas delayed so much on his voyage that the Mytilenaeans, and even Salaethus, whom the Spartans had sent before their fleet, gave up all hopes of its arrival. By the advice of Salaethus the commonalty of the Mytilenaeans were entrusted with the arms of the regular infantry; but they forthwith rose against the aristocratical party, and the latter, fearing a capitulation on the part of the commonalty, surrendered the city to Paches, leaving the decision of their fate entirely to the Athenians. At this juncture Alcidas arrived at Embaton; but, instead of attacking the Athenians, sailed southwards along the coast of Ionia. Paches, hearing from many quarters of the approach of the Peloponnesian fleet, set out in pursuit of it; but, not coming up with it, returned at leisure along the coast of Ionia. In his course he touched at Notium. Here his assistance was called in by the democratical party, who were being hard pressed by their political opponents, who were supported by the ruling party among the Colophonians, and by a body of mercenaries, commanded by an Arcadian named Hippias, borrowed from the satrap Pissuthnes. Paches invited Hippias to a parley; but when he came he immediately arrested him, and forthwith attacked the garrison, which was overpowered and cut to pieces. Hippias, with whom Paches had made a solemn engagement, that, if the parley did not lead to an agreement, he should be reconducted in safety into the town, was taken by Paches within the walls, and then barbarously put to death by being shot with arrows; Paches urging that he had fulfilled the stipulation. Notium was given up to the party which had called in the aid of the Athenians. Paches now returned to Lesbos, and proceeded to reduce those parts of the island which still held out. He sent home most of his forces, and with them Salaethus and a large number of Mytilenaeans who on the surrender of the city had taken refuge at the altars, and were removed thence by Paches to Tenedos. On the arrival of the first decree of the Athenians, ordering the execution of all the adult citizens of Mytilene, and the enslavement of the women and children, Paches was about to put it into execution, when the second decree arrived, sparing the lives of the inhabitants, but ordering the destruction of their walls and the surrender of the fleet. Paches, after complying with these instructions, returned to Athens. On his arrival there he was brought to trial on some charge, and, perceiving his condemnation to be certain, drew his sword and stabbed himself to the heart in the presence of his judges. (Plut. Nicias, c. 6, Aristid. c. 26.) On what grounds he was impeached it is very difficult to ascertain. There is a story preserved in an epigram of Agathias (Jacobs, Anal. vol. iv. p. 34), according to which Paches, after the surrender of Mytilene, became enamoured of two women of the city, Hellanis and Lamaxis, and murdered their husbands that he might accomplish his designs. The victims of his cruelty, however, escaped to Athens, and made known his criminal proceedings; and their prosecution of him ended in his death. There seems no sufficient reason for rejecting this story. If the offence be thought hardly sufficient to have occasioned the condemnation to death of a general who had just returned after a most successful series of military operations, there are various suppositions which might remove the difficulty. It is possible that Cleon was incensed against him for not putting the first decree into execution more promptly, or there might have been some ground for exciting odium against him on account of his not having set out in chase of Alcidas sooner than he did; for it appears that he did not act upon the first information which he received. Or various other pretexts might be imagined, which would furnish a handle to the demagogues of the day. It seems likely that the singular death of Paches gave occasion for the introduction of that provision in the decree of Cannonus, according to which in certain cases the defendant was to plead his cause in fetters. (Thuc. iii. 18, 28, 33, 34—36, 49; Poppo, ad iii. 50; Diod. l. c.; Strab. xiii. p. 600; Philological Museum, vol. ii. p. 236.) [C. P. M.]

PACHO'MIUS (Παχώμιος), as Socrates and Palladius write the name, or PACHU'MIUS (Παχούμιος), according to the author of the Vita Pachumii, an Egyptian ascetic of the fourth century, one of the founders, if not pre-eminently the founder of regular monastic communities. "The respect which the Church at present entertains," says Tillemont (Mém. vol. vii. p. 167), "for the name of St. Pachomius, is no new feeling, but a just recognition of the obligations which she is under to him, as the holy founder of a great number of monasteries; or rather as the institutor, not only of certain convents, but of the conventual life itself, and of the holy communities of men devoted to a religious life." Of this eminent person there is a prolix life, Βίος τοῦ ἁγίου Παχουμίου, Vita S. Pachumii, in barbarous Greek, the translation perhaps of a Sahidic original, by a monk of the generation immediately succeeding Pachomius; also there is a second memoir, or extracts of a memoir, either by the writer of the life, or by some other writer of the same period, supplementary to the first work, and to which the title Paralipomena de SS. Pachomio et Theodoro has been prefixed; and there is an account of Pachomius, in a letter from Ammon, an Egyptian bishop, to Theophilus, patriarch of Alexandria: Ἐπιστολὴ Ἀμμῶνος ἐπισκόπου περὶ πολιτείας καὶ βίου μερικοῦ Παχουμίου καὶ Θεοδώρου, Epistola Ammonis Episcopi de Conversatione ac Vitae Parte Pachumii et Theodori. All these pieces are given by the Bollandists, both in a Latin version (pp. 295—357), and in the original (Appendix, pp. 25*—71*) in the Acta Sanctorum, Maii, vol. iii. with the usual introduction by Papebroche.

Pachomius was born in the Thebaïd, of heathen parents, and was educated in heathenism; and, while a lad, going with his parents to offer sacrifice in one of the temples of the gods, was hastily expelled by the order of the priest as an enemy of the gods. The incident was afterwards recorded as a prognostic of his subsequent conversion and saintly eminence. At the age of twenty he was drawn for military service in one of the civil wars which followed the death of Constantius Chlorus, in A. D. 306. The author of the Vita Pachumii says that he was levied for the service of Constantine the Great, in one of his struggles for the empire. Tillemont thinks that the war referred to was Constantine's war with Maxentius in A. D. 312, but supposes that Pachomius was drawn to serve in the army of Maximin II., in his nearly contemporary struggle against Licinius, as it is difficult to conceive that Constantine should be allowed to raise troops by conscription in Egypt, then governed by his jealous partner in the empire, Maximin. A similar difficulty applies to all Constantine's civil contests, until after the final overthrow of Licinius in A. D. 323, and the only civil war of Constantine after that was against Calocerus in Cyprus, in 335; the date of which is altogether too late, as Pachomius (Epistol. Ammon. c. 6) was converted in the time of Alexander, bishop of Alexandria, who died A. D. 326. It is likely, therefore, that the mention of Constantine's name is an error of the biographer, and that Tillemont is right in thinking that the conscription in which Pachomius was drawn was ordered by Maximin II. We may, therefore, with Tillemont, fix the time of Pachomius' birth in A. D. 292. Papebroche makes the war to be that of Diocletian (under whom Constantine, then a youth, was serving) against the usurper Achilles, A. D. 296, but this supposition is inadmissible.

The conscripts were embarked in a boat and conveyed down the Nile; and being landed at Thebes, were placed in confinement, apparently to prevent desertion. Here they were visited and relieved by the Christians of the place, and a grateful curiosity led Pachomius to inquire into the character and opinions of the charitable strangers. Struck with what he heard of them, he seized the first opportunity of solitude to offer the simple and touching prayer, "O God, the creator of heaven and earth, if thou wilt indeed look upon my low estate, notwithstanding my ignorance of thee, the only true God, and wilt deliver me from this affliction, I will obey thy will all the days of my life, and will love and serve all men according to thy commandment." He was, however, obliged to accompany his fellow-conscripts, and suffered many hardships during this period of enforced service: but the settlement of the contest having released him from it, he hastened back into the Thebaïd, and was baptized in the church of Chenoboscia, near the city of Diospolis the Less; and, aspiring at pre-eminent holiness, commenced an ascetic life, under the guidance of Palaemon, an anchoret of high repute. After a time, he withdrew with Palaemon to Tabenna, or Tabenesis, which appears to have been in an island or on the bank of the Nile, near the common boundary of the Theban and Tentyrite nomi. Some time after this removal his companion Palaemon died, but whether he died at Tabenna, or whether he had returned to his previous abode, is not clear. Pachomius found, however, another companion in his own elder brother Joannes, or John, who became his disciple. But his sphere of influence was now to be enlarged. Directed by what he regarded as a Divine intimation, he began to incite men to embrace a monastic life; and obtaining first three disciples, and then many more, formed them into a community, and prescribed rules for their guidance. As the community grew in number, he appointed the needful officers for their regulation and instruction. He built a church as a place of worship and instruction for the poor shepherds of the neighbourhood, to whom, as there was no other reader, he read the Scriptures. The bishop of Tentyra would have raised him to the rank of presbyter, and requested Athanasius, patriarch of Alexandria, when visiting the Thebaïd, to ordain him: but Pachomius, being aware of the design, hid himself until the patriarch had departed. His refusal of the office of presbyter did not diminish his reputation or influence; new disciples flocked to him, of whom Theodorus or Theodore was the most illustrious, new monasteries sprung up in his neighbourhood, including one for women, founded by his sister. Of these several communities he was visitor and regulator general, appointing his disciple Theodore superior of his original monastery of Tabenna, and himself removing to the monastery of Proü, which was made the head of the monasteries of the district. He died of a pestilential disorder, which had broken out among the monks, apparently in A. D. 348, a short time before the death or expulsion of the Arian patriarch, Gregory [GREGORIUS, No. 3], and the restoration of Athanasius [ATHANASIUS], at the age, if his birth is rightly fixed in A. D. 292, of fifty-six. Some place his death in A. D. 360.

In speaking of Pachomius as the founder of monastic institutions, it must not be supposed that he was the founder of the monastic life. Antonius, Ammonas, Paulus and others [ANTONIUS; AMMONAS; PAULUS] had devoted themselves to religious solitude before him; and even the practice of persons living an ascetic life in small communities existed before him; but in these associations there was no recognized order or government. What Pachomius did was to form communities on a regular plan, directed by a fixed rule of life, and subject to inspection and control. Such monastic communities as existed before him had no regularity, no permanence: those which he arranged were regularly constituted bodies, the continuity of whose existence was not interrupted by the death of individuals. Miracles, especially divine visions, angelic conversations, and the utterance of prophecies, are ascribed to him, but not in such number as to some others.

There are various pieces extant under the name of Pachomius:—1. Two Regulae Monasticae; one shorter preserved by Palladius (Hist. Lausiac. c. 38), and said by him to have been given to Pachomius by the angel who conveyed to him the Divine command to establish monasteries. This rule is by no means so rigid as the monastic rules of later times. Palladius reports it partly, it would seem, in the very words of the original, partly in substance only. He adds that the monasteries at Tabenna and in the neighbourhood, subject to the rule, contained 7000 monks, of whom 1500 were in the parent community first established by Pachomius; but it is doubtful if this is to be understood of the original monastery of Tabenna, or that of Proü. The longer Regula, said to have been written in the Egyptian (Sahidic?) language, and translated into Greek, is extant in a Latin version made from the Greek by Jerome. It is preceded by a Praefatio, in which Jerome gives an account of the monasteries of Tabenna as they were in his time. Cave (Hist. Litt. ad ann. 340, vol. i. p. 208, ed. Oxford, 1740—1743) disputes the genuineness of this Regula, and questions not only the title of Pachomius to the authorship of it, but also the title of Jerome to be regarded as the translator. He thinks that it may embody the rule of Pachomius as augmented by his successors. It is remarkable that this Regula, which comprehends in all a hundred and ninety-four articles, is divided into several parts, each with separate titles; and Tillemont supposes that they are separate pieces, collected and arranged by Benedictus Anianus. This Regula was first published at Rome by Achilles Statius, A. D. 1575, and then by Petrus Ciacconus, also at Rome, A. D. 1588. It was inserted in the Supplementum Bibliothecae Patrum of Morellus, vol. i. Paris, 1639; in the Bibliotheca Patrum Ascetica, vol. i. Paris, 1661; in the Codex Regularum of Holstenius, Rome, A. D. 1661; and in successive editions of the Bibliotheca Patrum, from that of Cologn. A. D. 1618: it appears in vol. iv. of the edition of Lyon, A. D. 1677, and in vol. iv. of the edition of Galland, Venice, A. D. 1765, &c. It is given also in Vallarsi's edition of the works of Jerome, vol. ii. pars i. 2. Monita, extant in a Latin version first published by Gerard Vossius, with the works of Gregorius Thaumaturgus, 4to. Mayence, 1604, and given in the Bibliotheca Patrum (ubi supra). 3. SS. PP. Pachomii et Theodori Epistolae et Verba Mystica. Eleven of these letters are by Pachomius. They abound in incomprehensible allusions to certain mysteries contained in or signified by the letters of the Greek alphabet. They are extant in the Latin version of Jerome (Opera, l. c. and Bibliotheca Patrum, l. c.), who subjoined them as an appendix to the Regula, but without explaining, probably without understanding, the hidden signification of the alphabetical characters, which were apparently employed as ciphers, to which the correspondents of Pachomius had the key (comp. Gennadius, De Viris Illustr. c. 7; Sozom. H. E. iii. 14). 4. Ἐκ τῶν ἐντολῶν τοῦ ἁγίου Παχουμίου, Praecepta S. Pachomii s. Pachumii, first published in the Acta Sanctorum, Maii, vol. iii. in Latin in the body of the work, p. 346, and in the original Greek in the Appendix, p. 62*, and reprinted in the Bibliotheca Patrum of Galland, vol. iv., where all the extant works of Pachomius are given. (The chief authorities for the life and works of Pachomius are cited in the course of the article; add Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ix. p. 312, &c.) [J. C. M.]

PACHO'MIUS, distinguished as the YOUNGER. Among the histories published by Heribert Rosweyd (Vitae Patrum, fol. Antwerp, 1615, p. 233) is one of a certain Posthumius of Memphis, father (i. e. abbot) of five thousand monks. The MSS. have Pachomius instead of Posthumius. The truth of the whole history is, however, strongly suspected by the editors of the Acta Sanctorum, who have, nevertheless, printed it in the introduction to the account of Pachomius of Tabenna, the subject of the preceding article. [J. C. M.]

PACHOMIUS. Valentine Ernest Loescher, in the Appendix to his Stromatea, s. Dissertationes Sacri et Literarii Argumenti, 4to. Wittemberg, 1723, published in the original Greek with a Latin version a discourse entitled Pachomii Monachi Sermonem contra Mores sui Saeculi et Providentiae Divinae Contemtum. Nothing is known of the author: but from internal evidence afforded by the work itself, it is probable that he was either an Egyptian or Syrian, and wrote not long after the subjugation of his native country by the Saracens in the seventh century. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ix. p. 313, note n. sub fin.) [J. C. M.]

PACHY'MERES, GEORGIUS (Γεώργιος ὁ Παχυμερής), one of the most important of the later Byzantine writers, was born in, or about A. D. 1242 at Nicaea, whither his father, an inhabitant of Constantinople, had fled after the capture of Constantinople by the Latins, in 1204. Thence Pachymeres sometimes calls himself a Constantinopolitan. After receiving a careful and learned education, he left Nicaea in 1261, and took up his abode in Constantinople, which had then just been retaken by Michael Palaeologus. Here Pachymeres became a priest. It appears that besides divinity he also, according to the spirit of the time, studied the law, for in after years he was promoted to the important posts of Πρωτέκτικος, or advocate general of the church (of Constantinople), and Δικαιοφύλαξ, or chief justice to the imperial court, perhaps in ecclesiastical matters, which, however, were of high political importance in the reigns of Michael Palaeologus and his successor, Andronicus the elder. As early as 1267 he accompanied, perhaps as secretary, three imperial commissioners to the exiled patriarch Arsenius, in order to investigate his alleged participation in an alleged conspiracy against the life of Michael Palaeologus. They succeeded in reconciling these two chiefs of the state and the church. The emperor Michael having made preparatory steps towards effecting a union of the Greek and Latin churches, Pachymeres sided with the patriarch Joseph, who was against the union; and when the emperor wrote in defence of the union Pachymeres, together with Jasites Job, drew up an answer in favour of the former state of separation. It was Pachymeres who was the author of the deed of abdication of the patriarch Joannes Beccus. When the emperor Andronicus repealed the union, Pachymeres persuaded the patriarch Georgius Cyprius, who was for it, to abdicate. It seems that Pachymeres also devoted some of his time towards teaching, because one of his disciples was Manuel Phile, who wrote an iambic poem on his death, which is given by Leo Allatius quoted below.

Pachymeres died probably shortly after 1310; but some believe that his death took place as late as 1340. There is a wood-cut portrait of Pachymeres prefixed to Wolf's edition of Nicephorus Gregoras, Basel, 1562, which the editor had engraved after a drawing of a MS. of his Historia Byzantina, "which was then at Augsburg." Pachymeres wrote several works of importance, the principal of which are:

1. Historia Byzantina, being a history of the emperors Michael Palaeologus and Andronicus Palaeologus, the Elder, in thirteen books, six of which are devoted to the life of the former, and seven to that of the latter. This is a most valuable source for the history of the time, written with great dignity and calmness, and with as much impartiality as was possible in those stormy times, when both political and religious questions of vital importance agitated the minds of the Greeks. The style of Pachymeres is remarkably good and pure for his age. It would seem as if Wolf intended to publish this work from the above-mentioned Augsburg codex, but was prevented from doing so by causes not known to us. That Codex, however, was not complete, but the remaining portions were discovered by Petavius in Paris, who published them in Greek, together with the History of St. Gregoras, some fragments of Nicephorus Gregoras and others, Paris, 1616, 8vo. The complete editio princeps, however, is that of Petrus Possinus, Greek and Latin, Rome, 1666—69, 2 vols. fol. To each of the two lives the editor wrote a very valuable commentary, the one like the other divided into three books, and in both cases the first contains a Glossarium, the second Notes, and the third the Chronology of the period. He added to it "Liber de Sapientia Indorum," being a Latin translation of an Arabic work on that subject which was known to, and is referred to, by Pachymeres. Immanuel Bekker published a reprint of this edition, revised in several places, but without the "Liber de Sapientia," Bonn, 1835, 2 vols. 8vo., which belongs to the Bonn Collection of the Byzantines.

2. Καθ' ἑαυτόν, a poetical autobiography of Pachymeres which is lost, and the existence of which is only known by the author giving two fragments of it in his History. Were this work extant, we should know more of the life of so important a man as Pachymeres.

3. Epitome in universam fere Aristotelis Philosophiam. A Latin version by Philip Bech, together with some writings of Synesius, Basel, 1560, fol.; the Greek text, with a Latin version, Augsburg, 1600, fol., by J. Wagelin, who ascribes it to one Gregorius Aneponymus.

4. Epitome Philosophiae Aristoteliae, a portion of No. 3, ed. 1, Gr. et Lat. by Jacob. Foscarini, Venice, 1532, under the title "De Sex Definitionibus Philosophiae," which Camerarius inserted in his edition of the Categories of Aristotle. 2. A Latin version by J. B. Rasarius, Paris, 1547. 3. The Greek Text, ibid., 1548. 4. Gr. et Lat. by Edward Barnard, Oxon., 1666.

5. Περὶ ἀτόμων γραμμῶν, a Paraphrase of Aristotle's work on the same subject (on indivisible lines). It was formerly attributed to Aristotle himself, and appeared as such in the earlier editions of that philosopher. The first edition, with the name of Pachymeres in the title, is that by Casaubon, who affixed it to his edition of Aristotle (1597). The first separate edition, with a Latin translation, was published by J. Schegk, Paris, 1629, 12mo.

6. Παράφρασις εἰς τὰ τοῦ ἁγίου Διονυσίου τοῦ Αρεοπαγίτου εὑρισκόμενα, which the author wrote at the suggestion of Athanasius, patriarch of Alexandria. Editions : Greek, by Gulielmus Morellus, Paris, 1561 ; Greek and Latin, in the two editions of the works of Dionysius Areopagita, by Petrus Lansselius, Paris, 1615, fol., and by B. Corderius, Antwerp, 1634, fol.

7. De Processione Spiritus Sancti, in Leo Allatius, Graecia Orthodoxa; a short treatise.

8. Ἔκφρασις τοῦ Αὐγουστεῶνος, a description of the column erected by Justinian the Great in commemoration of his victories over the Persians, in the church of St. Sophia in Constantinople. It was published by Boivin in his Notes to Nicephorus Gregoras.

9. Several minor works.

(Leo Allatius, Diatriba de Georgiis ; Hankius, Script. Byzant.; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vii. p. 775, &c.) [W. P.]

PACIACUS, L. JU'NIUS, served under Caesar in the Spanish war, B.C. 45, and was sent by Caesar with six cohorts and some cavalry to strengthen Ulia, which was besieged by Cn. Pompey. (Auct. B. Hisp. 3 ; Cic. ad Fam. vi. 18, ad Att. xii. 2.) Paciacus, which Drumann preserves (Gesch. Roms, vol. iv. p. 52), is hardly a Roman name. Orelli reads Paciaecus, which is preferable ; but it may perhaps be Pacianus, a name which occurs elsewhere sometimes with one c and sometimes with two. [PACCIANUS, PACIANUS.]

PACIACUS, VI'BIUS, sheltered M. Crassus in Spain, when he fled thither to escape the proscription of Marius and Cinna. (Plut. Crass. 4.) In this name also, as in that of Junius Paciacus, we ought perhaps to read Pacianus.

PACIAECUS. [PACIACUS.]

PACIA'NUS, bishop of Barcelona, in Spain, flourished A. D. 370, and died at an advanced age, under Theodosius. Jerome describes him (de Vir. Illustr. p. 192, Francf. 1684) as renowned for his chastity and eloquence, and says that he wrote several works, of which he expressly mentions those against the Novatians, and one entitled κέρβος. A work of Pacianus against the Novatians is still extant, in the form of three letters addressed to a Novatian of the name of Sempronius. The work called by Jerome κέρβος, that is cervus, for the former has by some accident got into the text from the Greek version, is no longer extant ; but Pacianus tells us, in a treatise of his which has come down to us, and which is entitled Paraenesis sive Exhortatorius Libellus ad Poenitentiam, that he had written a book called Cervulus. We also possess a work of Pacianus on Baptism, intended for the use of catechumens. The works of Pacianus have been published by Tilius, Paris, 1538 ; by Paulus Manutius, Rome, 1564 ; and in the Bibl. Patr. Maxim. vol. iv. pp. 305—319.

Pacianus had a son, Flavius Dexter, a friend of Jerome, who dedicated to him his work, De Viris Illustribus. [FLAVIUS, p. 174, b.]

PACIDEIANUS, a gladiator mentioned in a passage of Lucilius, which is quoted or referred to more than once by Cicero (Opt. gen. orat. 6, Tuscul. iv. 21, ad Qu. Fr. iii. 4. § 2).

PACI'DII, two generals of the Pompeian party in Africa under Metellus Scipio, one of whom fell in the battle of Tegea, B.C. 46 (Hirt. B. Afr. 13, 78).

M. PACI'LIUS, described by Cicero as "homo egens et levis," was the accuser of Sthenius before Verres (Cic. Verr. ii. 38, 40). The Paciliana domus, which Q. Cicero wished to purchase, must have belonged to a different Pacilius. (Cic. ad Att. i. 14. § 7.)

PA'CILUS, a family name of the patrician Furia gens.

1. C. FURIUS PACILUS FUSUS, consul B.C. 441 with M'. Papirius Crassus (Liv. iv. 12). He was censor B.C. 435 with M. Geganius Macerinus : the events of his censorship are given under MACERINUS, No. 3. (Liv. iv. 22, 24, ix. 33, 34.) He was one of the consular tribunes in B.C. 426, and was unsuccessful in a battle against the Veientines (Liv. iv. 31).

2. C. FURIUS PACILUS, son of the preceding, was consul B.C. 412 with Q. Fabius Vibulanus Ambustus (Liv. iv. 52).

3. C. FURIUS C. F. C. N. PACILUS (Fasti Capit.), was consul B.C. 251 with L. Caecilius Metellus in the first Punic war. The history of their consulship is given under METELLUS, No. 1.

PACONIA'NUS, SE'XTIUS, one of the bold and unscrupulous agents of Sejanus, was involved in the fall of his master, to the great joy of the senators, whose secrets he had frequently betrayed. He was sentenced to death in A. D. 32, unless he gave information ; but in consequence of his doing so, the sentence was not carried into execution. He remained in prison till A. D. 35, in which year he was strangled on account of his having written some libellous verses against Tiberius while in confinement. (Tac. Ann. vi. 3, 4, 39.)

PACO'NIUS. 1. M. PACONIUS, a Roman eques, violently deprived of his property by the tribune Clodius. (Cic. pro Mil. 27.)

2. PACONIUS, described by Cicero as some Mysian or Phrygian, who complained of Q. Cicero (Cic. ad Qu. Fr. i. 1. § 6). Perhaps we ought to read Paeonius.

3. M. PACONIUS, a legatus of Silanus, proconsul of Asia, was one of his accusers in A. D. 22. Paconius was afterwards put to death by Tiberius on a charge of treason. He was the father of Paconius Agrippinus. (Tac. Ann. iii. 67 ; Suet. Tib. 61.)

4. PACONIUS AGRIPPINUS. [AGRIPPINUS, p. 82, a.]

PA'CORUS (Πάκορος), a common Parthian name.

1. The son of Orodes I. (Arsaces XIV.), king of Parthia. His history is given under ARSACES XIV., p. 356.

2. A contemporary of Pacorus, the son of Orodes [No. 1], was one of the royal cup-bearers. After Pacorus, the son of Orodes, had conquered Saxa, Antony's quaestor (B.C. 40), and had overrun a great part of Syria, Antigonus, the son of Aristobulus, applied to him for help to restore him to the Jewish throne. This request was immediately complied with ; and Pacorus, the cup-bearer, was sent with a large force against Jerusalem. The city surrendered : Hyrcanus and Phasaël were taken prisoners, and Herod fled to Rome. (Joseph. Antiq. xiv. 13, B. Jud. i. 13 ; comp. HYRCANUS. p. 544, b.) Dion Cassius, who makes no mention of Pacorus, the cup-bearer, attributes this expedition to the son of Orodes (xlviii. 26) ; and Tacitus in like manner speaks of Jerusalem having been taken by the king Pacorus (Hist. v. 9); but the authority of Josephus on all matters relating to Jewish history is superior to that of these historians.

3. The son of Vonones II., king of Parthia, obtained the kingdom of Media on the death of his father, while his brother Vologeses I. succeeded to the Parthian throne. [ARSACES XXIII. p. 358, b.]

4. King of Parthia, succeeded his father Vologeses I. [ARSACES XXIV.]

5. AURELIUS PACORUS, a king of the Greater Armenia, was a contemporary of the Antonines, and is mentioned in a Greek inscription published by Gruter (p. 1091, No. 10). It appears by this inscription that Pacorus had purchased a burial-place for himself and his brother Aurelius Meridates, and that both brothers resided at Rome, where one of them died. Niebuhr supposes that a passage in Fronto has reference to this Pacorus, in which a Pacorus is said to have been deprived of his kingdom by L. Verus (Fronto, p. 70, ed. Niebuhr), and he further concludes from the name Aurelius that he was a client of the imperial family and a Roman citizen. He may be the same as the Pacorus who was placed as king over the Lazi, a people on the Caspian sea, by Antoninus Pius. (Capitol. Anton. Pius, 9).

PA'CTIUS. [PACCIUS.]

PACTUMEIUS CLEMENS. [CLEMENS.]

PACTUMEIUS MAGNUS, a man of consular rank, slain by Commodus (Lamprid. Commod. 7), occurs as one of the consules suffecti in A. D. 183. He had a daughter Pactumeia Magna, who is mentioned in the Digest (28, tit. 5, s. 92), where we also read of a Pactumeius Androsthenes, who was no doubt a freedman of Magnus.

PA'CTYAS (Πακτύας), a Lydian, who on the conquest of Sardis (B. C. 546), was charged by Cyrus with the collection of the revenues of the province. When Cyrus left Sardis on his return to Ecbatana, Pactyas induced the Lydians to revolt against Cyrus and the Persian governor Tabalus; and, going down to the coast, employed the revenues which he had collected in hiring mercenaries and inducing those who lived on the coast to join his army. He then marched against Sardis, and besieged Tabalus in the citadel. Cyrus sent an army under the command of Mazares against the revolters; and Pactyas, hearing of its approach, fled to Cume. Mazares sent a messenger to Cume to demand that he should be surrendered. The Cumaeans referred the matter to the oracle of Apollo at Branchidae. The oracle directed that he should be surrendered; and this direction was repeated when, at the suggestion of Aristodicus [ARISTODICUS] the oracle was consulted a second time. But the Cumaeans, not liking actually to surrender Pactyas, and yet being afraid to keep him, sent him to Mytilene. Hearing, however, that the Mytilenaeans were bargaining about his surrender, the Cumaeans sent a vessel to Mytilene, and conveyed him to Chios. The Chians surrendered him, and, according to stipulation, received possession of Atarneus as a recompense. The Persians, to whom Pactyas was surrendered, kept him in custody, intending to deliver him up to Cyrus. Of his subsequent fate we hear nothing. (Herod. i. 153—160; Paus. iv. 35. § 10.) [C. P. M.]

PACULLA, A'NNIA or MI'NIA, a Campanian woman, one of the chief agents in introducing the worship of Bacchus into Rome, B. C. 186. (Liv. xxxix. 13).

PACU'VII, a Campanian family, is first mentioned in the time of the second Punic war, when we read of Pacuvius Calavius, who persuaded the inhabitants of Capua to revolt to Hannibal [CALAVIUS, No. 4]. Besides the poet Pacuvius, there were a few Romans of this name in the latest times of the republic and under the empire.

M. PACU'VIUS, one of the most celebrated of the early Roman tragedians, was born about B. C. 220, since he was fifty years older than the poet Accius or Attius (Cic. Brut. 64), who was born in B. C. 170 [ACCIUS]. This agrees with the statement of Jerome (in Euseb. Chron. Olymp. 156. 3) that Pacuvius flourished about B. C. 154, since we know from various sources that Pacuvius attained a great age, and accordingly the time understood by the indefinite term flourished may properly be placed in B. C. 154, though Pacuvius was then about sixty-five years old. Jerome further relates that Pacuvius was almost ninety years of age at the time of his death, which would therefore fall about B. C. 130. Pacuvius was a native of Brundisium, and accordingly a countryman of Ennius, with whom he was connected by ties of blood, and whom he is also said to have buried. According to the accounts of most ancient writers he was the son of the sister of Ennius, and this is more probable than the statement of Jerome, that he was the grandson of Ennius by his daughter, since Ennius was only nineteen years older than Pacuvius. Pacuvius appears to have been brought up at Brundisium, but he afterwards repaired to Rome, though in what year is uncertain. Here he devoted himself to painting and poetry, and obtained so much distinction in the former art, that a painting of his in the temple of Hercules, in the forum boarium, was regarded as only inferior to the celebrated painting of Fabius Pictor (Plin. H. N. xxxv. 4. s. 7). After living many years at Rome, for he was still there in his eightieth year (Cic. Brut. l. c.), he at last returned to Brundisium, on account of the failure of his health, and died in his native town, in the ninetieth year of his age, as has been already stated. We have no further particulars of his life, save that his talents gained him the friendship of Laelius, and that he lived on the most intimate terms with his younger rival Accius, of whom he seems to have felt none of that jealousy which poets usually entertain towards one another. After his retirement to Brundisium Pacuvius invited his friend to his house, and there they spent some time together, discoursing upon their literary pursuits. These notices, brief though they are, seem to show that Pacuvius was a man of an amiable character; and this supposition is supported by the modest way in which he speaks of himself, in an epigram which he composed for his tombstone, and which, even if it be not genuine, as some modern writers have maintained, indicates at least the opinion which was entertained of him in antiquity. The epigram runs as follows (Gell. i. 24):—

"Adulescens, tametsi properas, te hoc saxum rogat, Uti sese aspicias, deinde, quod scriptum est, legas.
Hic sunt poëtae Pacuvi Marci sita
Ossa. Hoc volebam, nescius ne esses. Vale."

Pacuvius was universally allowed by the best writers in antiquity to have been one of the greatest of the Latin tragic poets. Horace regarded him and Accius (Ep. ii. 1. 56) as the two most important of the early tragedians ; and he is especially praised for the loftiness of his thoughts, the vigour of his language, and the extent of his knowledge. Hence we find the epithet doctus frequently applied to him, and the great critic Varro (ap. Gell. vii. 14) praises him for the ubertas of his style. He was at the same time an equal favourite with the people, with whom his verses continued to be esteemed in the time of Julius Caesar (comp. Cic. de Amic. 7 ; Suet. Caes. 84). The tragedies of Pacuvius continued, like those of his predecessors on the Latin stage, to be taken from Sophocles, Euripides, and the great Greek writers ; but he did not confine himself to a mere translation of the latter, as most of the previous Latin writers had done, but worked up his materials with more freedom and independent judgment, of which we have an example in his Dulorestes, which was an adaptation to the Latin stage of the Iphigeneia in Tauris of Euripides. Some of the plays of Pacuvius were not based upon the Greek tragedies, but belonged to the class called Praetextatae, in which the subjects were taken from Roman story. One of these was entitled Paullus, and had as its hero the celebrated L. Aemilius Paullus who conquered Perseus, king of Macedonia (Gell. ix. 14). The following titles of his tragedies have come down to us :—Anchises ; Antiopa ; Armorum Judicium ; Atalanta ; Chryses ; Dulorestes ; Hermiona ; Iliona ; Medus or Medea ; Niptra ; Periboea ; Tantalus (doubtful) ; Teucer ; Thyestes. Of these the Antiopa and the Dulorestes were by far the most celebrated.

Although the reputation of Pacuvius rested almost exclusively on his tragedies, yet he seems to have written other kinds of poetry. He is expressly mentioned as having composed Saturae, according to the old Roman meaning of the word (Diomedes, iii. p. 482, ed. Putschius), and there seems no reason for doubting, as some modern writers have done, that he also wrote comedies. The Pseudo is expressly mentioned as a comedy of Pacuvius (Fulgentius, p. 562), and the Tarentilla may also have been a comedy. The fragments of Pacuvius are published in the collections of Stephanus, Fragmenta Vet. Poët., Paris, 1564, of Scriverius, Tragicorum Vet. Fragm. Lugd. Batav. 1620, and of Bothe, Poët. Latii Scenic. Fragm. vol. i. Lips. 1834. (The principal ancient authorities respecting Pacuvius are: Hieronym. in Euseb. Chron. Olymp. 156. 3 ; Plin. H. N. xxxv. 4. s. 7 ; Vell. Pat. ii. 9 ; Quintil. x. 1 ; Gell. vii. 14, xiii. 2, xvii. 21 ; Cic. de Optim. Gen. Orat. i. 6, Brut. 64, 74, de Amic. 7, Tusc. ii. 21, de Orat. i. 58, ad Herenn. iv. 4 ; Hor. Ep. ii. 1. 55 ; Pers. i. 77. The chief modern writers are: Delrio, Syntagm. Trag. Lat. Antv. 1594, and Paris, 1620 ; Sagittarius, De Vita et Scriptis Livii Andronici, M. Pacuvii, &c., Altenb. 1672 ; Annibal di Leo, Memorie di M. Pacuvio Antichissimo Poeta Tragico, Napoli, 1763 ; Lange, Vindiciae Trag. Rom. Lips. 1822 ; Näke, Comment. de Pacuvii Duloreste, Ind. Lect. Bonn. 1822 ; Stieglitz, de Pacuvii Duloreste, Lips. 1826 : Vater, in Ersch and Gruber's Encyklopädie, art. Pacuvius.)

PACU'VIUS. 1 and 2. M. and Q. PACUVII, with the cognomen CLAUDII, who subscribed the accusation of Valerius against M. Scaurus, B. C. 54. (Ascon. in Scaur. p. 19, ed. Orelli.)

3. SEX. PACUVIUS, tribune of the plebs, B. C. 27, in which year Octavian received the title of Augustus, outdid all his contemporaries in his flattery of Augustus, and devoted himself as a vassal to the emperor in the Spanish fashion. (Dion Cass. liii. 20.) Dion Cassius says, that according to some authorities his name was Apudius ; but it would appear that Pacuvius is the right name, since Macrobius tells us (Sat. i. 12) that it was Sex. Pacuvius, tribune of the plebs, who proposed the plebiscitum by which the name of the month of Sextilis was changed into that of Augustus in honour of the emperor. This Sex. Pacuvius appears to be the same as the Pacuvius Taurus, upon whom Augustus perpetrated a joke, when he was one day begging a congiarium from the emperor. (Macrob. Sat. ii. 4.) The Sex. Pacuvius Taurus, plebeian aedile, mentioned by Pliny (H. N. xxxiv. 5. s. 11), was a different person from the preceding one, and lived at a more ancient time.

4. PACUVIUS LABEO, to whom was addressed a letter of Capito, cited by A. Gellius (v. 21).

5. PACUVIUS, a legate of Sentius in Syria, A. D. 19 (Tac. Ann. ii. 79), is probably the same Pacuvius who is mentioned by Seneca (Ep. ii. 12).

PACU'VIUS, C. ATEIUS, was one of the pupils of Servius Sulpicius, who are enumerated by Pomponius. (Dig. 1. tit. 2. s. 2. § 44.) This appears to be the Ateius, who is cited by Labeo (Dig. 23. tit. 3. s. 79) as authority for an opinion of Servius on the words "cum commodissimum esset," which were part of the terms of a gift of dos. Another opinion of Servius is cited from him also by Labeo (34. tit. 2. s. 39. § 2). This Pacuvius appears also to be the jurist quoted by Ulpian (13. tit. 6. s. 1). [G. L.]

PAEA'NIUS (Παιάνιος), the author of a translation of the history of Eutropius into Greek. It is quite uncertain who this Paeanius was, but it has been conjectured that he lived not long after Eutropius himself. This translation, of which Zonaras seems to have often availed himself, is not very accurate, but still not inelegant. It was printed for the first time by F. Sylburg in the third volume of his Romanae Historiae Scriptores, Francof. 1590, and is also contained in the editions of Eutropius by Hearne, Havercamp, and Verheyk. It has been printed in a separate form by Kaltwasser under the title, "Paeanii Metaphrasis in Eutropii Historiam Romanam, in usum scholarum," Gotha, 1780.

PAEAN (Παιάν, Παιήων or Παιών), that is, "the healing," is according to Homer the designation of the physician of the Olympian gods, who heals, for example, the wounded Ares and Hades. (Il. v. 401, 899.) After the time of Homer and Hesiod, the word Παιάν becomes a surname of Asclepius, the god who had the power of healing. (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1494 ; Virg. Aen. vii. 769.) The name was, however, used also in the more general sense of deliverer from any evil or calamity (Pind. Pyth. iv. 480), and was thus applied to Apollo and Thanatos, or Death, who are conceived as delivering men from the pains and sorrows of life. (Soph. Oed. Tyr. 154 ; Paus. i. 34. § 2 ; Eurip. Hippol. 1373.) With regard to Apollo and Thanatos however, the name may at the same time contain an allusion to παίειν, to strike, since both are also regarded as destroyers. (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 137.) From Apollo himself the name

Paean was transferred to the song dedicated to him, that is, to hymns chanted to Apollo for the purpose of averting an evil, and to warlike songs, which were sung before or during a battle. [L. S.]

PAEDARITUS. [PEDARITUS.]

PAEON (Παίων), of Amathus, wrote an account of Theseus and Ariadne, referred to by Plutarch (Thes. 20).

2. A son of Antilochus, and grandson of Nestor. (Paus. ii. 18. § 7.)

3. A son of Endymion, and brother of Epeius, Aetolus, and Eurycyde; from whom the district of Paeonia, on the Axius in Macedonia, was believed to have derived its name. (Paus. v. 1. § 2, &c.) [L. S.]

PAEON (Παίων). 1. A son of Poseidon by Helle, who fell into the Hellespont. In some legends he was called Edonus. (Hygin. Poet. Astr. ii. 20.)

PAEO'NIA (Παιωνία), i. e. the healing goddess, was a surname of Athena, under which she had a statue at Athens, and an altar in the temple of Amphiaraus at Oropus. (Paus. i. 2. § 4, 34. § 2.) [L. S.]

PAEO'NIUS, instructed the two young Ciceros, Marcus and Quintus, in rhetoric, B. C. 54 (Cic. ad Qu. Fr. iii. 3. § 4).

PAEO'NIUS (Παιώνιος). 1. Of Ephesus, an architect, whose time is uncertain; most probably he lived between B. C. 420 and 380. In conjunction with Demetrius, he finally completed the great temple of Artemis, at Ephesus, which Chersiphron had begun [CHERSIPHRON]; and, with Daphnis the Milesian, he began to build at Miletus a temple of Apollo, of the Ionic order. (Vitruv. vii. Praef. § 16.) The latter was the famous Didymaeum, or temple of Apollo Didymus, the ruins of which are still to be seen near Miletus. The former temple, in which the Branchidae had an oracle of Apollo (from which the place itself obtained the name of Branchidae), was burnt at the capture of Miletus by the army of Dareius, B. C. 498. (Herod. vi. 19; see Bähr's Note.) The new temple, which was on a scale only inferior to that of Artemis, was never finished. It was dipteral, decastyle, hypaethral: among its extensive ruins two columns are still standing. (Strab. xiv. p. 634; Paus. vii. 5. § 4; Chandler, p. 151; Ionian Antiq. vol. i. c. 3. p. 27; Hirt, Gesch. d. Baukunst, vol. ii. p. 62, and pl. ix. x.)

2. Of Mende, in Thrace, a statuary and sculptor, of whom we have but little information, but whose celebrity may be judged of from the fact, that he executed the statues in the pediment of the front portico of the temple of Zeus at Olympia, those in the pediment of the portico of the opisthodomus being entrusted to Alcamenes (Paus. v. 10). He also made the bronze statue of Nike, which the Messenians of Naupactus dedicated at Olympia. (Paus. x. 26. § 1.) He must have flourished about the 86th Olympiad, B. C. 435. (See further, Sillig, Catal. Art. s. v.; Müller, Archäol. de Kunst, § 112. n. 1. § 119, n. 2.) [P. S.]

PAERI'SADES or PARI'SADES (Παιρισάδης or Παρισάδης). The latter form is the more common: but the former, which is that used by Strabo, is confirmed by the evidence of coins.

1. A king of Bosporus, son of Leucon, succeeded his brother Spartacus in B.C. 349, and reigned thirty-eight years. (Diod. xvi. 52.) No events of his reign have been transmitted to us, except that we find him at one period (apparently about B. C. 333) engaged in a war with the neighbouring Scythians (Dem. c. Phorm. p. 909), and he appears to have continued the same friendly relations with the Athenians which were begun by his father Leucon. (Id. ib. p. 917.) But we are told, in general terms, that he was a mild and equitable ruler, and was so much beloved by his subjects as to obtain divine honours after his death. (Strab. vii. p. 310.) He left three sons, Satyrus, Eumelus and Prytanis. (Diod. xx. 22.)

He is probably the same person as the Birisades mentioned by Deinarchus (c. Dem. p. 95), to whom Demosthenes had proposed that a statue should be erected at Athens. (See Wesseling ad Diod. xiv. 93; Clinton, F. H. vol. ii. p. 284.)

2. Son of Satyrus, and grandson of the preceding. He was the only one of the children of Satyrus who escaped from the designs of his uncle Eumelus, and took refuge at the court of Agarus king of Scythia, B. C. 308. (Diod. xx. 24.)

3. A second king of Bosporus, and the last monarch of the first dynasty that ruled in that country. He was probably a descendant of No. 1, but the history of the kingdom of Bosporus, during the period previous to his reign, is wholly lost. We only know that the pressure of the Scythian tribes from without, and their constantly increasing demands of tribute, which he was unable to resist, at length induced Paerisades voluntarily to cede his sovereignty to Mithridates the Great. (Strab. vii. pp. 309, 310.) The date of this event is wholly unknown, but it cannot be placed earlier than B. C. 112, nor later than B. C. 88. It is uncertain whether an anecdote related by Polyaenus (vii. 37) refers to this Paerisades or to No. 1. [E. H. B.]

PAETI'NUS, a lengthened form of Paetus [PAETUS], like Albinus of Albus, was a family name of the Fulvia Gens. It superseded the family name of Curvus, of which it was originally an agnomen, and was superseded in its turn by the name of Nobilior.

1. M. FULVIUS CURVUS PAETINUS, consul B. C. 305. [FULVIUS, No. 2.]

2. M. FULVIUS PAETINUS, consul B. C. 299 with T. Manlius Torquatus. (Liv. x. 9.)

3. SER. FULVIUS PAETINUS NOBILIOR, consul B. C. 255. [NOBILIOR, No. 1.]

PAETUS, a cognomen in many Roman gentes, was indicative, like many other Roman cognomens, of a bodily defect or peculiarity; as for instance, Capito, Fronto, Naso, Varus, &c. It signified a person who had a slight cast in the eye, and is accordingly classed by Pliny with the word Strabo (H. N. xi. 37. s. 55); but that it did not indicate such a complete distortion of vision as the latter word is clear from Horace, who describes a father calling a son that was Strabo by the name of Paetus, when he wished to extenuate the defect (Sat. i. 3. 45). Indeed, the slight cast implied in the word Paetus was considered attractive rather than otherwise, and we accordingly find it given as an epithet to Venus. (Ov. Ar. Am. ii. 659; Auctor, Priapeia, 36).

PAETUS, AE'LIUS. The Paeti were the most ancient family of the Aelia gens, and some of them were celebrated for their knowledge of the Roman law. See below.

1. P. Aelius Paetus, consul B. C. 337, with C. Sulpicius Longus, and magister equitum 321, to the dictator Q. Fabius Ambustus. He was one of the first plebeian augurs, B. C. 300. (Liv. viii. 15, ix. 7, x. 9.)

2. P. Aelius Paetus, plebeian aedile B. C. 296. (Liv. x. 23.)

3. C. Aelius Paetus, consul B. C. 286, with M. Valerius Maximus Potitus (Fasti).

4. Q. Aelius Paetus, a pontifex who fell in the battle of Cannae, B. C. 216. He had been a candidate for the consulship for this year. (Liv. xxiii. 21, comp. xxii. 35.)

5. P. Aelius Paetus, consul B. C. 201, a jurist. See below.

6. Sex. Aelius Paetus Catus, consul B. C. 198, a jurist. See below.

7. Q. Aelius P. F. Q. N. Paetus (Fasti Capit.), son apparently of No. 5, and grandson of No. 4. He was elected augur B. C. 174, in place of his father P. Aelius Paetus (Liv. xli. 21), and was consul B. C. 167, with M. Junius Pennus. He obtained Gallia as his province, and his colleague Pisae, but the two consuls performed nothing of importance, and returned to Rome after laying waste the territory of the Ligurians. (Liv. xlv. 16, 44 ; Cic. Brut. 28.) This is the Aelius of whom it is related by Valerius Maximus (iv. 3. § 7) and Pliny (H. N. xxxiii. 11, s. 50), that the Aetolians sent him in his consulship magnificent presents of silver plate, since they had in a former embassy found him eating out of earthenware, and that he refused their gift. Valerius calls him Q. Aelius Tubero Catus, and Pliny Catus Aelius ; they both seem to have confounded him with other persons of the same name, and Pliny commits the further error of calling him the son-in-law of L. Aemilius Paullus, the conqueror of Macedonia. [Tubero.]

8. Aelius Paetus Tubero. [Tubero.]

The annexed coin belongs to P. Aelius Paetus, but it is uncertain to which person of the name. It bears on the obverse the head of Pallas, and on the reverse the Dioscuri.

COIN OF P. AELIUS PAETUS.

PAETUS, AE'LIUS, jurists. 1. P. Aelius Paetus, was probably the son of Q. Aelius Paetus, a pontifex, who fell in the battle of Cannae. (Liv. xxiii. 21.) Publius was plebeian aedile B. C. 204, praetor B. C. 203 (Liv. xxix. 38), magister equitum B. C. 202, and consul with C. Cornelius Lentulus B. C. 201. Paetus held the urbana jurisdictio during his year of office as praetor, in which capacity he published an edict for a supplicatio at Rome to commemorate the defeat of Syphax. (Liv. xxx. 17.) On the departure of Hannibal from Italy in the same year, Paetus made the motion for a five days' supplicatio. The year of the election of Paetus to the consulship was memorable for the defeat of Hannibal by P. Cornelius Scipio at the battle of Zama. (Liv. xxx. 40.) Paetus during his consulship had Italy for his province ; he had a conflict with the Boii, and made a treaty with the Ingauni Ligures. He was also in the same year appointed a decemvir for the distribution of lands among the veteran soldiers of Scipio, who had fought in Africa. (Liv. xxxi. 4.) He was afterwards appointed a commissioner (triumvir) with his brother Sextus and Cn. Cornelius Lentulus to settle the affairs of Narnia, the people of which place complained that there was not the proper number of colonists (coloni), and that certain persons, who were not coloni, were passing themselves off as such. (Liv. xxxii. 2.) In B. C. 199, he was censor with P. Cornelius Scipio Africanus. He afterwards became an augur, and died B. C. 174, during a pestilence at Rome. (Liv. xli. 26.) Paetus is mentioned by Pomponius (Dig. 1. tit. 1. s. 2. § 37) as one of those who professed the law (maximam scientiam in profitendo habuerunt), in the Roman sense of that period.

2. Sex. Aelius Paetus, the brother of Publius, was curule aedile B. C. 200, consul B. C. 198, with T. Quinctius Flamininus (Liv. xxxii. 7), and censor B. C. 193 with Cn. Cornelius Cethegus. (Liv. xxxiv. 44, xxxv. 9.) During their censorship, the censors gave orders to the curule aediles to appoint distinct seats at the Ludi Romani for the senators, who up to that time had sat promiscuously with others. The Atrium of Libertas and the Villa Publica were also repaired and enlarged by the censors. Sextus had a reputation as a jurist and a prudent man, whence he got the cognomen Catus.

Egregie cordatus homo Catus Aelius Sextus

(Cic. de Orat. i. 45), which is a line of Ennius.

Sextus was a jurist of eminence, and also a ready speaker. (Cic. Brut. c. 20.) He is enumerated among the old jurists who collected or arranged the matter of law (juris antiqui conditor ; Cod. 7. tit. 7. s. 1), which he did in a work entitled Tripartita or Jus Aelianum. This was a work on the Twelve Tables, which contained the original text, an interpretation, and the Legis actio subjoined. It still existed in the time of Pomponius (Dig. 1. tit. 2. s. 2. § 38) ; and was probably the first commentary written on the Twelve Tables. Cicero (de Or. i. 56) speaks of his Commentarii, which may or may not be a different work from the Tripartita. Gellius (iv. 1) quotes Servius Sulpicius, as citing an opinion of Catus Aelius (or Sextus Aelius) on the meaning of the word Penus. The same passage is quoted by Ulpian, De Penu legata (33. tit. 9. s. 3. § 9), where the common reading is Sextus Caecilius, which, as Grotius contends, ought to be Sextus Aelius. He is also cited by Celsus (Dig. 19. tit. 1. s. 38), as the text stands. The Aelius quoted by Cicero (Top. c. 2) as authority for the meaning of "assiduus," is probably Sextus Aelius.

Zimmern takes the Aelius mentioned in Cicero's Brutus (c. 46) to be the jurist, but this is obviously a mistake. (Brutus, ed. Meyer, c. 20, 46.) Meyer also denies that the whole work of Sextus on the Twelve Tables was called Jus Aelianum ; he limits the name to that part which contained the Actiones. Pomponius speaks of three other "libri" as attributed to Sextus, but some denied that they were his. Cicero (de Or. iii. 33) refers to Sextus as one of those who were consulted after the old fashion.

PAETUS, SEX. ARTICULEIUS, consul A. D. 101 with the emperor Trajan (Fasti).

PAETUS, AUTRO'NIUS. 1. P. AUTRONIUS PAETUS, was elected consul for B. C. 65 with P. Cornelius Sulla; but before he and Sulla entered upon their office, they were accused of bribery by L. Aurelius Cotta and L. Manlius Torquatus, and condemned. Their election was accordingly declared void: and their accusers were chosen consuls in their stead. Enraged at his disappointment Paetus conspired with Catiline to murder the consuls Cotta and Torquatus; and this design is said to have been frustrated solely by the impatience of Catiline, who gave the signal prematurely before the whole of the conspirators had assembled. (Sall. Cat. 18; Dion Cass. xxxvi. 27; Ascon. in Cornel. p. 74, ed. Orelli; Suet. Caes. 9; Liv. Epit. 101.) [CATILINA, p. 629, b.] Paetus afterwards took an active part in the Catilinarian conspiracy, which broke out in Cicero's consulship. After the suppression of the conspiracy Paetus was brought to trial for the share he had had in it; he entreated Cicero with many tears to undertake his defence, pleading their early friendship, and their having been colleagues in the quaestorship, but this the orator refused (Cic. pro Sull. 6), and all his former friends in like manner withdrew from him their support. He was accordingly condemned, and went into exile at Epeirus, where he was living when Cicero himself went into banishment in B. C. 58. Cicero was then much alarmed lest Paetus should make an attempt upon his life (Sall. Cat. 17, 47; Dion Cass. xxxvii. 25; Cic. pro Sull. passim; Cic. ad Att. iii. 2, 7.) Autronius Paetus has a place in the list of orators in the Brutus of Cicero, who however dismisses him with the character, "voce peracuta, atque magna, nec alia re ulla probabilis" (c. 68).

2. P. AUTRONIUS PAETUS, consul suffectus B. C. 33 in place of Augustus, who resigned his office immediately after entering upon it on the Kalends of January. (Fasti; Appian, Illyr. 28; comp. Dion Cass. xlix. 43; Suet. Aug. 26.)

3. L. AUTRONIUS L. F. L. N. PAETUS is stated in the Capitoline Fasti to have obtained a triumph as proconsul from Africa in the month of August, B. C. 29.

PAETUS, CAECINA. [CAECINA, No. 5.]

PAETUS, C. CAESE'NNIUS, sometimes called CAESO'NIUS, was consul A. D. 61 with C. Petronius Turpilianus. He was sent by Nero in A. D. 63 to the assistance of Domitius Corbulo [CORBULO], in order to defend Armenia against the attacks of Vologeses, king of Parthia. Arrogant by nature, and confident of success, he thought himself superior to the veteran Corbulo, and crossed the Taurus, boldly asserting that he would recover Tigranocerta, which Corbulo had been obliged to leave to its fate. This, however, he was unable to accomplish; but he took a few fortified places, acquired some booty, and then, as the year was far advanced, led back his army into winter-quarters, and sent to Nero a magnificent account of his exploits. But as Vologeses shortly after appeared with a large force, Paetus marched forth against him (according to Dion Cassius, with the view of relieving Tigranocerta), but after losing a few troops he hastily withdrew across mount Taurus, leaving 3000 soldiers to defend the passes of the mountain. These troops, however, Vologeses cut to pieces, and then proceeded to lay siege to the town of Rhandeia or Arsamosata on the river Arsanias, in which Paetus had taken refuge. The place was well supplied with provisions, and Corbulo was at no great distance; but such was the pusillanimity of Paetus that he was afraid to wait for the assistance of Corbulo, and purchased peace from the Parthians on the most disgraceful terms. In consequence of this conduct Paetus was deprived of his command and expected severe punishment on his return to Rome, but Nero dismissed him uninjured with a few insulting words (Tac. Ann. xv. 6, 8—15, 17, 25; Dion Cass. lxii. 21, 22; Suet. Ner. 39.) After the accession of Vespasian, Caesennius Paetus was appointed governor of Syria, and deprived Antiochus IV., king of Commagene, of his kingdom. (Joseph. B. J. vii. 7.) [See Vol. I. p. 194, b.]

The name of Caesennius Paetus, proconsul, occurs on the coins of Ephesus and Smyrna, struck in the reign of Domitian. This Caesennius Paetus may have been a son of the preceding Paetus; for Tacitus makes mention of one of his sons who was with his father in Armenia (Ann. xv. 10), and also of a son, apparently a different one, who was serving as tribune of the soldiers under Corbulo (Ann. xv. 28).

PAETUS, L. CASTRI'NIUS, mentioned by Caelius in a letter to Cicero (ad Fam. viii. 2) in B. C. 51, may perhaps be the same person as the L. Castronius Paetus, the leading man in the municipium of Luca, whom Cicero recommended to Brutus in B. C. 46 (ad Fam. xiii. 13).

PAETUS, C. CONSI'DIUS, known only from coins, a specimen of which is annexed. The obverse represents the head of Venus, and the reverse a sella curulis.

COIN OF C. CONSIDIUS PAETUS.

PAETUS, L. PAPI'RIUS, a friend of Cicero, to whom the latter has addressed several letters (ad Fam. ix. 15—26). From these letters it appears that Papirius Paetus belonged to the Epicurean school, and that he was a man of learning and intelligence. He is mentioned once or twice in Cicero's letters to Atticus (ad Att. i. 20. § 7, ii. 1. § 12).

PAETUS THRA'SEA. [THRASEA.]

PAETUS, VALERIA'NUS, put to death by Elagabalus. (Dion Cass. lxxix. 4.)

PAGASAEUS (Παγασαῖος), i. e. the Pagasaean, from Pegasus, or Pegasae, a town in Thessaly, is a surname of Apollo, who there had a sanctuary said to have been built by Trophonius (Hes. Scut. Herc. 70, with the Schol.), and of Iason, because the ship Argo was said to have been built at Pagasus. (Ov. Met. vii. 1, Her. xvi. 345.) [L. S.]

PAGONDAS (Παγώνδας). 1. A native of Thebes who gained the victory in the chariot-race with entire horses, in the twenty-fifth Olympiad, on which occasion that species of contest was introduced for the first time. (Paus. v. 8. § 7.)

2. The father of Pindar, according to Eustathius (Prooem. Comment. Pind.).

3. A native of Thebes, the son of Aeoladas. He was one of the Boeotarchs in the year B.C. 424, when the Athenian expedition to Delium took place. After the fortification of Delium the Athenian troops received orders to return, and the light troops proceeded without stopping to Attica. The heavy-armed infantry halted a short distance from Delium to wait for the Athenian general Hippocrates. Meantime the Boeotian forces had assembled at Tanagra. Most of the Boeotarchs were unwilling to attack the Athenians. But Pagondas, who was one of the two Theban Boeotarchs, and was commander-in-chief of the Boeotian forces, wishing that the chance of a battle should be tried, by an appeal to the several divisions of the army persuaded the troops to adopt his views. His harangue is reported by Thucydides (iv. 92). The day being far advanced, he led the main body of his troops at full speed to meet the Athenians, despatching one portion to keep in check the cavalry stationed by Hippocrates at Delium; and, having reached a spot where he was only separated by a hill from the enemy, he drew up his army in battle array, and reached the summit of the ridge when the Athenian line was scarcely formed. As the Boeotian troops halted to take breath Pagondas again harangued them. The Theban division, which was twenty-five deep, bore down all opposition, and the appearance of two squadrons of Boeotian cavalry, which Pagondas had sent round the back of the hill to support his left wing, threw the Athenians into complete confusion, and the rout became general. Seventeen days after the battle the fortress at Delium was also taken. (Thuc. iv. 91—96; Athen. v. p. 215, f.)

4. A man of the name of Pagondas is spoken of by Theodoretus (de Cur. Affect. Graec. lib. ix.), as a legislator among the Achaeans. But as nothing further is known of him, and Pagondas is a name that does not elsewhere appear in use among the Achaeans, all those bearing the name of whom we have any certain knowledge being Boeotians, it has been conjectured with some probability that the name Pagondas in the passage of Theodoretus has been substituted through some mistake for Charondas. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. p. 36.) [C. P. M.]

PALAEO'LOGUS (Παλαιολόγος), the name of an illustrious Byzantine family, of which there are said to have been descendants still existing in the 17th century (Du Cange, Familiae Byzantinae, p. 255). This family is first mentioned in the eleventh century [see below No. 1], and from that time down to the downfall of the Byzantine empire the name constantly occurs. It was the last Greek family that sat upon the throne of Constantinople, and it reigned uninterruptedly from the year 1260 to 1453, when Constantinople was taken by the Turks, and the last emperor of the family fell while bravely defending his capital. A branch of this family ruled over Montferrat in Italy from A. D. 1305 to 1530, Theodorus Comnenus Palaeologus, the son of Andronicus II., taking possession of the principality in virtue of the will of John of Montferrat, who died without children. This branch of the family does not fall within the compass of the present work; and we can only mention the leading Palaeologi spoken of in Byzantine history. A full account of all of them is given by Du Cange, where all the authorities for the following particulars are collected (Familiae Byzantinae, pp. 230—348).

1. NICEPHORUS PALAEOLOGUS, with the title of Hypertimus, was a faithful servant of the emperor Nicephorus III. Botaniates (A. D. 1078—1081), and was rewarded by him with the government of Mesopotamia. He perished in battle in the reign of his successor Alexius I. Comnenus, while defending Dyrrhachium (Durazzo) against the Normans, A. D. 1081.

2. GEORGIUS PALAEOLOGUS, the son of the preceding, was celebrated for his military abilities, and served with his father under the emperors Nicephorus III. and Alexius I. He married Irene, the daughter of the Protovestiarius Andronicus Ducas.

3. MICHAEL PALAEOLOGUS, with the title of Sebastus, probably a son of No. 2, was banished by Calo-Joannes or Joannes II. Comnenus, the successor of Alexius I. Comnenus (A. D. 1118—1143), but was recalled from banishment by Manuel I. Comnenus, the successor of Calo-Joannes. He commanded the Greek forces in southern Italy, and carried on war with success against William, king of Sicily, but died in 1155, in the middle of his conquests, at the town of Bari, which he had taken a short time before.

4. GEORGIUS PALAEOLOGUS, with the title of Sebastus, a contemporary of No. 3, was employed by Manuel I. Comnenus in many important embassies. He is supposed by Du Cange to be the same as the Georgius Palaeologus, who took part in the conspiracy by which Isaac II. Angelus was dethroned, and Alexius III. Angelus raised to the crown in 1195, and who was killed in the storming of Crizimon in 1199.

5. NICEPHORUS PALAEOLOGUS, governor of Trapezus, about A. D. 1179.

6. ANDRONICUS PALAEOLOGUS, married the eldest daughter of the emperor Theodorus Lascaris.

7. ALEXIUS PALAEOLOGUS, married Irene, the eldest daughter of Alexius III. Angelus, and was destined by this emperor as his successor, but he died shortly before the arrival of the Crusaders at Constantinople.

8. ANDRONICUS PALAEOLOGUS, the ancestor of the imperial family of the Palaeologi, was Magnus Domesticus under the emperors Theodorus Lascaris and Joannes III. Vatatzes. He assumed the surname of Comnenus, which was borne likewise by his descendants. He married Irene Palaeologina, the daughter of Alexius Palaeologus [No. 7], and the grand-daughter of the emperor Alexius III. His children being thus descended, both on their father's and mother's side, from the Palaeologi are called by Georgius Phranzes (i. 1) διπλοπαλαιολόγοι. The following stemma, which has been drawn up by Wilken (in Ersch and Gruber's Encyklopädie, art. Paläologen) from Du Cange's work, exhibits all the descendants of this Andronicus Palaeologus. The lives of all the emperors are given in separate articles, and the other persons are not of sufficient importance to require a distinct notice. Of course, all the persons on this stemma bore the name of Palaeologus, but it is omitted here in order to save space.

STEMMA PALAEOLOGORUM.

      - A son, died 1332.
      - Maria, m. Stephen, king of Hungary.
  - Theodorus, despotes.
  - Three daughters.
- Joannes, Magnus Domesticus.
- Constantinus Sebastocrator.
- Two daughters.

PALAEMON (Παλαίμων), signifies the wrestler, as in the surname of Heracles in Lycophron (663); but it also occurs as a proper name of several mythical personages.

1. A son of Athamas and Ino, was originally called Melicertes. When his mother, who was driven mad by Hera, had thrown herself with her boy, who was either still alive or already killed, from the Molurian rock into the sea, both became marine divinities, viz. Ino became Leucothea, and Melicertes became Palaemon. (Apollod. iii. 4. § 3; Hygin. Fab. 2; Ov. Met. iv. 520, xiii. 919.) According to some, Melicertes after his apotheosis was called Glaucus (Athen. vii. p. 296), whereas, according to another version, Glaucus is said to have leaped into the sea from his love of Melicertes. (Athen. vii. p. 297.) The apotheosis was effected by the Nereides, who saved Melicertes, and also ordered the institution of the Nemean games. The body of Melicertes, according to the common tradition, was washed by the waves, or carried by dolphins into port Schoenus on the Corinthian isthmus, or to that spot on the coast where subsequently the altar of Palaemon stood. (Paus. i. 44. § 11, ii. 1. § 3; Plut. Sympos. v. 3.) There the body was found by his uncle Sisyphus, who ordered it to be carried by Donacinus and Amphimachus to Corinth, and on the command of the Nereides instituted the Isthmian games and sacrifices of black bulls in honour of the deified Palaemon. (Tzetz. ad Lyc. 107, 229; Philostr. Her. 19, Icon. ii. 16; Paus. ii. 1. § 3; Schol. ad Eurip. Med. 1274; Eurip. Iph. Taur. 251.) On the isthmus of Corinth there was a temple of Palaemon with statues of Palaemon, Leucothea, and Poseidon; and near the same place was a subterraneous sanctuary, which was believed to contain the remains of Palaemon. (Paus. ii. 2. § 1.) In the island of Tenedos, it is said that children were sacrificed to him, and the whole worship seems to have had something gloomy and orgiastic about it. (Philostr. l. c.; Hom. Od. iii. 6.) In works of art Palaemon is represented as a boy carried by marine deities or dolphins. (Philostr. Icon. ii. 16.) The Romans identified Palaemon with their own god Portunus, or Portumnus. [PORTUNUS.]

2. A son of Hephaestus, or Aetolus, or Lernus, was one of the Argonauts. (Apollod. i. 9. § 16; Apollon. Rhod. i. 202; Orph. Argon. 208.)

3. A son of Heracles by Autonoe, the daughter of Peireus, or by Iphinoe, the daughter of Antaeus. (Apollod. ii. 7. § 8; Tzetz. ad Lyc. 662.)

4. One of the sons of Priam. (Hygin. Fab. 90.) [L. S.]

PALAEMON, Q. REMMIUS, a celebrated grammarian in the reigns of Tiberius, Caligula, and Claudius, is placed by Jerome (ad Euseb.) in the eighth year of the reign of Claudius, A. D. 48. He was a native of Vicentia (Vicenza), in the north of Italy, and was originally a slave; but having been manumitted, he opened a school at Rome, where he became the most celebrated grammarian of his time, and obtained great numbers of pupils, though his moral character was so infamous that Tiberius and Claudius used to say that there was no one to whom the training of youths ought so little to be entrusted. Suetonius gives rather a long account of him (de Illustr. Gram. 23), and he is also mentioned by Juvenal on two occasions (vi. 451, vii. 251—219). From the scholiast on Juvenal (vi. 451) we learn that Palaemon was the master of Quintilian.

PALAE'PHATUS (Παλαίφατος), the name of four literary persons in Suidas, who, however, seems to have confounded different persons and writings.

1. Of Athens, an epic poet, to whom a mythical origin was assigned. According to some he was a son of Actaeus and Boeo, according to others of Iocles and Metaneira, and according to a third statement of Hermes. The time at which he lived is uncertain, but he appears to have been usually placed after Phemonoe [PHEMONOE], though some writers assigned him even an earlier date. He is represented by Christodorus (Anth. Graec. i. p. 27, ed. Tauchnitz) as an old bard crowned with laurel > δάφνῃ μὲν πλοκαμῖδα Παλαίφατος ἔπρεπε μάντις στεψάμενος, δόκεεν δὲ χέειν μαντάδεα φωνήν.

Suidas has preserved the titles of the following poems of Palaephatus: Ἔγραψε δὲ (1) κοσμοποιΐαν, εἰς ἔπη ϵ′, (2) Ἀπόλλωνος καὶ Ἀρτέμιδος γονὰς ἔπη γ′, (3) Ἀφροδίτης καὶ Ἔρωτος φωνὰς καὶ λόγους ἔπη ϵ′, (4) Ἀθηνᾶς ἔριν καὶ Ποσειδῶνος ἔπη α′, (5) Λητοῦς πλόκαμον.

2. Of Paros, or Priene, lived in the time of Artaxerxes. Suidas attributes to him the five books of Ἄπιστα, but adds that many persons assigned this work to Palaephatus of Athens. This is the work which is still extant, and is spoken of below.

3. Of Abydus, an historian (ἱστορικός), lived in the time of Alexander the Great, and is stated to have been loved (παιδικά) by the philosopher Aristotle, for which Suidas quotes the authority of Philo, Περὶ παραδόξου ἱστορίας, and of Theodorus of Ilium, Ἐν δευτέρῳ Τρωϊκῶν. Suidas gives the titles of the following works of Palaephatus: Κυπριακά, Δηλιακά, Ἀττικά, Ἀραβικά. Some writers believe that this Palaephatus of Abydus is the author of the fragment on Assyrian history, which is preserved by Eusebius, and which is quoted by him as the work of Abydenus. There can, however, be little doubt that Abydenus is the name of the writer, and not an appellative taken from his native place. (Voss. de Hist. Graec. pp. 85, 375, ed. Westermann.) [ABYDENUS.]

4. An Egyptian or Athenian, and a grammarian, as he is described by Suidas, who assigns to him the following works: (1) Αἰγυπτιακὴ θεολογία. (2) Μυθικῶν βιβλίον α′. (3) Λύσεις τῶν μυθικῶς εἰρημένων. (4) Ὑποθέσεις εἰς Σιμωνίδην. (5) Τρωϊκά, which some however attributed to the Athenian [No. 1], and others to the Parian [No. 2]. He also wrote (6) Ἱστορία ἰδία. It has been supposed that the Μυθικά and the Λύσεις are one and the same work; but we have no certain information on the point. Of these works the Τρωϊκά seems to have been the most celebrated, as we find it frequently referred to by the ancient grammarians. It contained apparently geographical and historical discussions respecting Asia Minor and more particularly its northern coasts, and must have been divided into several books. (Comp. Suidas, s. v. Μακροκέφαλοι; Steph. Byz. s. v. Χαριμάται; Harpocrat. s. v. Δυσαύλης.)

There is extant a small work entitled Παλαίφατος περὶ ἀπίστων, or "Concerning Incredible Tales," giving a brief account of some of the most celebrated Greek legends. That this is merely an abstract of a much larger work is evident from many considerations; first, because Suidas speaks of it as consisting of five books [see above, No. 2]; secondly, because many of the ancient writers refer to Palaephatus for statements which are not found in the treatise now extant; and thirdly, because the manuscripts exhibit it in various forms, the abridgement being sometimes briefer and sometimes longer. It was doubtless the original work to which Virgil refers (Ciris, 88):

"Docta Palaephatia testatur voce papyrus."

Respecting the author of the original work there is however much dispute, and we must be content to leave the matter in uncertainty. Some of the earliest modern writers on Greek literature assigned the work to the ancient epic poet [No. 1]; but this untenable supposition was soon abandoned, and the work was then ascribed to the Parian, as it is by Suidas. But if this Palaephatus was the contemporary of Artaxerxes as Suidas asserts, it is impossible to believe that the myths could have been treated at so early a period in the rationalizing way in which we find them discussed in the extant epitome. In addition to which we find the ancient writers calling the author sometimes a peripatetic and sometimes a stoic philosopher (Theon, Progymn. 6, 12; Tzetzes, Chil. ix. 273, x. 20), from which we must conclude, if these designations are correct, that he must have lived after the time of Alexander the Great, and could not therefore even have been the native of Abydus [No. 3], as others have maintained. It is thus impossible to identify the author of the work with any of the three persons just mentioned; but from his adopting the rationalistic interpretation of the myths, he must be looked upon as a disciple of Evemerus [EVEMERUS], and may thus have been an Alexandrine Greek, and the same person as the grammarian spoken of by Suidas, who calls him an Egyptian or Athenian. [No. 4.]

The work Περὶ απίστων consists of 51 sections, of which only the first 46 contain explanations of the myths. The remaining five sections are written in an entirely different style, without any expression of distrust or disbelief as to the common form of the myth; and as they are wanting in all manuscripts at present extant, they are probably the work of another hand. In the first 46 sections Palaephatus generally relates in a few lines the common form of the myth, introducing it with some such words as φασὶν ὡς, λέγεται ὡς, &c.; he then expresses his disbelief, and finally proceeds to give what he considers a rational account of the matter. The nature of the work is well characterised by Mr. Grote (Hist. of Greece, vol. i. p. 553, &c.):—"Another author who seems to have conceived clearly, and applied consistently, the semi-historical theory of the Grecian myths, is Palaephatus. In the short preface of his treatise 'Concerning Incredible Tales,' he remarks, that some men, from want of instruction, believe all the current narratives; while others, more searching and cautious, disbelieve them altogether. Each of these extremes he is anxious to avoid: on the one hand, he thinks that no narrative could ever have acquired credence unless it had been founded in truth; on the other, it is impossible for him to accept so much of the existing narratives as conflicts with the analogies of present natural phaenomena. If such things ever had been, they would still continue to be—but they never have so occurred; and the extra-analogical features of the stories are to be ascribed to the licence of the poets. Palaephatus wishes to adopt a middle course, neither accepting all nor rejecting all; accordingly, he had taken great pains to separate the true from the false in many of the narratives; he had visited the localities wherein they had taken place, and made careful inquiries from old men and others. The results of his researches are presented in a new version of fifty legends, among the most celebrated and the most fabulous, comprising the Centaurs, Pasiphae, Actaeon, Cadmus and the Sparti, the Sphinx, Cycnus, Daedalus, the Trojan horse, Aeolus, Scylla, Geryon, Bellerophon, &c. It must be confessed that Palaephatus has performed his promise of transforming the 'Incredibilia' into narratives in themselves plausible and unobjectionable, and that in doing so he always follows some thread of analogy, real or verbal. The Centaurs (he tells us) were a body of young men from the village of Nephele in Thessaly, who first trained and mounted horses for the purpose of repelling a herd of bulls belonging to Ixion, king of the Lapithae, which had run wild and did great damage: they pursued these wild bulls on horseback, and pierced them with their spears, thus acquiring both the name of Prickers (κέντορες) and the imputed attribute of joint body with the horse. Actaeon was an Arcadian, who neglected the cultivation of his land for the pleasures of hunting, and was thus eaten up by the expense of his hounds. The dragon whom Cadmus killed at Thebes, was in reality Draco, king of Thebes; and the dragon's teeth, which he was said to have sown, and from whence sprung a crop of armed men, were in point of fact elephant's teeth, which Cadmus, as a rich Phoenician, had brought over with him: the sons of Draco sold these elephants' teeth, and employed the proceeds to levy troops against Cadmus. Daedalus, instead of flying across the sea on wings, had escaped from Crete in a swift-sailing boat under a violent storm. Cottus, Briareus, and Gyges were not persons with one hundred hands, but inhabitants of the village of Hecatoncheiria in Upper Macedonia, who warred with the inhabitants of Mount Olympus against the Titans. Scylla, whom Odysseus so narrowly escaped, was a fast-sailing piratical vessel, as was also Pegasus, the alleged winged horse of Bellerophon. By such ingenious conjectures, Palaephatus eliminates all the incredible circumstances, and leaves to us a string of tales perfectly credible and common-place, which we should readily believe, provided a very moderate amount of testimony could be produced in their favour. If his treatment not only disenchants the original myths, but even effaces their generic and essential character, we ought to remember that this is not more than what is done by Thucydides in his sketch of the Trojan war. Palaephatus handles the myths consistently, according to the semi-historical theory, and his results exhibit the maximum which that theory can ever present: by aid of conjecture we get out of the impossible and arrive at matters intrinsically plausible, but totally uncertified; beyond this point we cannot penetrate, without the light of extrinsic evidence, since there is no intrinsic mark to distinguish truth from plausible fiction."

It has been already remarked that the manuscripts of the Περὶ Ἀπίστων present the greatest discrepancies, in some the work being much longer and in others much shorter. The printed editions in like manner vary considerably. It was first printed by Aldus Manutius, together with Aesop, Phurnutus, and other writers, Venice, 1505, fol.,
